'Nastya,' he repeated musingly, and cautiously kissed her breast. 'No, it's a nice name. Na-stya,' he repeated slowly.

'What is there nice about it? Malvina, Wanda, Zhenia, they're nice names—especially Irma. . . . Oh, darling,' and she pressed close to him. 'You are a dear . . . so dark. I love dark men. You're married surely?'

'No, I'm not.'

'Oh, tell us another. Every one here says he's a bachelor. You've got six children for sure!'

It was dark in the room, for the windows were shuttered and the lamp hardly burned. Her face was quite close to his head, and showed fantastic and changing on the dim whiteness of the pillow. Already it was different from the simple, handsome, round grey-eyed, Russian face of before. It seemed to have grown thinner, and strangely changing its expression every minute, seemed now tender, kind, mysterious. It reminded Ribnikov of some one infinitely familiar, long beloved, beautiful and fascinating.

'How beautiful you are!' he murmured. 'I love you. . . . I love you!'

He suddenly uttered an unintelligible word, completely foreign to the woman's ear.

'What did you say?' she asked in surprise.

'Nothing. . . . Nothing. . . . Nothing at all. . . . My dear! Dear woman . . . you are a woman. . . . I love you. . . .'

He kissed her arms, her neck, trembling with impatience, which it gave him wonderful delight to suppress. He was possessed by a tender and tempestuous passion for the well-fed, childless woman, for her big young body, so cared for and beautiful. His longing for woman had been till now suppressed by his austere, ascetic life, his constant weariness, by the intense exertion of his mind and will: now it devoured him suddenly with an intolerable, intoxicating flame.

'Your hands are cold,' she said, awkward and shy. In this man was something strange and alarming which she could in no way understand. 'Cold hands and a warm heart.'

'Yes, yes, yes. . . . My heart,' he repeated it like a madman, 'My heart is warm, my heart. . . .'

Long ago she had grown used to the outward rites and the shameful details of love; she performed them several times every day—mechanically, indifferently, and often with silent disgust. Hundreds of men, from the aged and old, who put their teeth in a glass of water for the night, to youngsters whose voice was only beginning to break and was bass and soprano at once, civilians, army men, priests in mufti, baldheads and men overgrown with hair from head to foot like monkeys, excited and impotent, morphomaniacs who did not conceal their vice from her, beaux, cripples, rakes, who sometimes nauseated her, boys who cried for the bitterness of their first fall—they all embraced her with shameful words, with long kisses, breathed into her face, moaned in the paroxysm of animal passion, which, she knew beforehand, would then and there be changed to unconcealed and insuperable disgust. Long ago all men's faces had in her eyes lost every individual trait—as though they had united into one lascivious, inevitable face, eternally bent over her, the face of a he-goat with stubbly, slobbering lips, clouded eyes, dimmed like frosted glass, distorted and disfigured by a voluptuous grimace, which sickened her because she never shared it.

Besides, they were all rude, exacting and devoid of the elements of shame. They were ludicrously ugly, as only the modern man can be in his underclothes. But this elderly little officer made a new, peculiar, attractive impression on her. His every movement was distinguished by a gentle, insinuating discretion. His kiss, his caress, and his touch were strangely gentle. At the same time he surrounded her imperceptibly with the nervous atmosphere of real and intense passion which even from a distance and against her will arouses a woman's sensuality, makes her docile, and subject to the male's desire. But her poor little mind had never passed beyond the round of everyday life in the house, and could not perceive this strange and agitating spell. She could only whisper shyly, happy and surprised, the usual trivial words: 'What a nice man you are! You're my sweet, aren't you?'

She got up, put the lamp out, and lay beside him again. Through the chinks between the shutters and the wall showed thin threads of the whitening dawn, which filled the room with a misty blue half-light. Behind the partition, somewhere an alarm-clock hurriedly rang. Far away some one was singing sadly in the distance.

'When will you come again?' the woman asked.

'What?' Rubnikov asked sleepily, opening his eyes. 'When am I coming? Soon—tomorrow. . . .'

'I know all about that. Tell me the truth. When are you coming? I'll be lonely without you.'

'M'm. . . . We will come and be alone. . . . We will write to them. They will stay in the mountains . . . ' he murmured incoherently.

A heavy slumber enlocked his body; but, as always with men who have long deprived themselves of sleep, he could not sleep at once. No sooner was his consciousness overcast with the soft, dark, delightful cloud of oblivion than his body was shaken by a terrible inward shock. He moaned and shuddered, opened his eyes wide in wild terror, and straightway plunged into an irritating, transitory state between sleep and wakefulness, like a delirium crowded with threatening and confused visions.

The woman had no desire to sleep. She sat up in bed in her chemise clasping her bended knees with her bare arms, and looked at Ribnikov with timid curiosity. In the bluish half-light his face grew sharper still and yellower, like the face of a dead man. His mouth stood open, but she could not hear his breathing. All over his face, especially about the eyes and mouth, was an expression of such utter weariness and profound human suffering as she had never seen in her life before. She gently passed her hand back over his stiff hair and forehead. The skin was cold and covered all over with clammy sweat. Ribnikov trembled at the touch, cried out in terror, and with a quick movement raised himself from the pillow.

'Ah! Who's that, who?' he cried abruptly, wiping his face with his shirt-sleeve.

'What's the matter, darling?' the woman asked with sympathy. 'You're not well? Shall I get you some water?'

But Ribnikov had mastered himself, and lay down once more.

'Thanks, it's all right now. I was dreaming. . . . Go to sleep, dear, do.'

'When do you want me to wake you, darling?' she asked.

'Wake. . . . In the morning. . . . The sun will rise early. . . . And the horsemen will come. . . . We will go in a boat. . . . And sail over the river. . . .' He was silent and lay quiet for some minutes. Suddenly his still, dead face was distorted with terrible pain. He turned on his back with a moan, and there came in a stream from his lips mysterious, wild-sounding words of a strange language.

The woman held her breath and listened, possessed by the superstitious terror which always comes from a sleeper's delirium. His face was only a couple of inches from hers, and she could not tear her eyes away. He was silent for a while and then began to speak again, many words and unintelligible. Then he was silent again, as though listening attentively to some one's speech. Suddenly the woman heard the only Japanese word she knew, from the newspapers, pronounced aloud with a firm, clear voice:

'Banzai!'

Her heart beat so violently that the velvet coverlet lifted again and again with the throbbing. She remembered how they had called Ribnikov by the names of Japanese generals in the red cabinet that day, and a far faint suspicion began to stir in the obscurity of her mind.

Some one lightly tapped on the door. She got up and opened.

'Clotilde dear, is that you?' a woman's gentle whisper was heard. 'Aren't you asleep? Come in to me for a moment. Leonka's with me, and he's standing some apricot wine. Come on, dear!'

It was Sonya, the Karaim,<sup>1</sup> Clotilde's neighbour, bound to her by the cloying, hysterical affection which always pairs off the women in these establishments.

<sup>1</sup>The Karaim are Jews of the pure original stock who entered Russia long before the main immigration and settled in the Crimea. Under the Tsarist regime, they were free from the ordinary Jewish restrictions.

'All right. I'll come now. Oh, I've something very interesting to tell you. Wait a second. I'll dress.'

'Nonsense. Don't. Who are you nervous about? Leonka? Come, just as you are!'

She began to put on her petticoat.

Ribnikov roused in his sleep.

'Where are you going to?' he asked drowsily.

'Only a minute. . . . Back immediately. . . . I must . . .' she answered hurriedly tying the tape round her waist. 'You go to sleep. I'll be back in a second.'

He had not heard her last words. A dark heavy sleep had instantly engulfed him.

Leonka was the idol of the whole establishment, beginning with Madame, and descending to the tiniest servant. In these places where boredom, indolence, and cheap literature produce feverishly romantic tastes, the extreme of adoration is lavished on thieves and detectives, because of their heroic lives, which are full of fascinating risks, dangers and adventures. Leonka used to appear in the most varied costumes, at times almost made up. Sometimes he kept a meaning and mysterious silence. Above all every one remembered very well that he often proclaimed that the local police had an unbounded respect for him and fulfilled his orders blindly. In one case he had said three or four words in a mysterious jargon, and that was enough to send a few thieves who were behaving rowdily in the house crawling into the street. Besides there were times when he had a great deal of money. It is easy to understand that Henrietta, whom he called Genka and with whom he had an assiduous affair, was treated with a jealous respect.

He was a young man with a swarthy, freckled face, with black moustaches that pointed up to his very eyes. His chin was short, firm and broad; his eyes were dark, handsome and impudent. He was sitting on the sofa in his shirt-sleeves, his waistcoat unbuttoned and his necktie loose. He was small but well proportioned. His broad chest and his muscles, so big that his shirt seemed ready to tear at the shoulder, were eloquent of his strength. Genka sat close to him with her feet on the sofa; Clotilde was opposite. Sipping his liqueur slowly with his red lips, in an artificially elegant voice he told his tale unconcernedly:

'They brought him to the station. His passport—Korney Sapietov, resident in Kolpin or something of the kind. Of course the devil was drunk, absolutely. "Put him into a cold cell and sober him down." General rule. That very moment I happened to drop into the inspector's office. I had a look. By Jove, an old friend: Sanka the Butcher—triple murder and sacrilege. Instantly I gave the constable on duty a wink, and went out into the corridor as though nothing had happened. The constable came out to me.

"What's the matter, Leonti Spiridonovich?" "Just send that gentleman round to the Detective Bureau for a minute." They brought him. Not a muscle in his face moved. I just looked him in the eyes and said:—Leonka rapped his knuckles meaningly on the table—"Is it a long time, Sanka, since you left Odessa and decided to honour us here?" Of course he's quite indifferent—playing the fool. Not a word. Oh, he's a bright one, too. "I haven't any idea who Sanka the Butcher is. I am . . . so and so." So I come up to him, catch hold of him by the beard—hey, presto—the beard's left in my hand. False! . . . "Will you own up now, you son of a bitch?" "I haven't any idea." Then I let fly straight at his nose—once, twice—a bloody mess. "Will you own up?" "I haven't any idea." "Ah, that's your game, is it? I gave you a decent chance before. Now, you've got yourself to thank. Bring Arseni the Flea here." We had a prisoner of that name. He hated Sanka to death. Of course, my dear, I knew how they stood. They brought the Flea. "Well, Flea, who's this gentleman?" The Flea laughs. "Why Sanka the Butcher, of course! How do you do, Sanichka? Have you been honouring us a long while? How did you get on in Odessa?" Then the Butcher gave in. "All right, Leonti Spiridonovich. I give in. Nothing can get away from you. Give us a cigarette." Of course I gave him one. I never refuse them, out of charity. The servant of God was taken away. He just looked at the Flea, no more. I thought, well, the Flea will have to pay for that. The Butcher will do him in for sure.'

'Do him in?' Genka asked with servile confidence, in a terrified whisper. 'Absolutely. Do him in. That's the kind of man he is!'

He sipped his glass complacently. Genka looked at him with fixed, frightened eyes, so intently that her mouth even opened and watered. She smacked her hands on her lips.

'My God, how awful! Just think, Clotilduchka! And you weren't afraid, Leonya?'

'Well, am I to be frightened of every vagabond?'

The rapt attention of the woman excited him, and he began to invent a story that students had been making bombs somewhere on Vassiliev Island, and that the Government had instructed him to arrest the conspirators. Bombs there were—it was proved afterwards—twelve thousand of them. If they'd all exploded then not only the house they were in, but half Petersburg, perhaps, would have been blown to atoms. . . . Next came a thrilling story of Leonka's extraordinary heroism, when he disguised himself as a student, entered the 'devil's workshop,' gave a sign to some one outside the window, and disarmed the villains in a second. He caught one of them by the sleeve at the very moment when he was going to explode a lot of bombs.

Genka groaned, was terror-stricken, slapped her legs, and continually turned to Clotilde with exclamations:

'Ah! what do you think of all that? Just think what scoundrels these students are, Clotilduchka! I never liked them.'

At last, stirred to her very depths by her lover, she hung on his neck and began to kiss him loudly.

'Leonichka, my darling! It's terrible to listen to, even! And you aren't frightened of anything!'

He complacently twisted his left moustache upwards, and let drop carelessly: 'Why be afraid? You can only die once. That's what I'm paid for.'

Clotilde was tormented all the while by jealous envy of her friend's magnificent lover. She vaguely suspected that there was a great deal of lying in Leonka's stories; while she now had something utterly extraordinary in her hands, such as no one had ever had before, something that would immediately take all the shine out of Leonka's exploits. For some minutes she hesitated. A faint echo of the tender pity for Ribnikov still restrained her. But a hysterical yearning to shine took hold of her, and she said in a dull, quiet voice: 'Do you know what I wanted to tell, Leonya? I've got such a queer visitor to-day.'

'H'm. You think he's a sharper?' he asked condescendingly. Genka was offended.

'A sharper, you say! That's your story. Some drunken officer.'

'No, you mustn't say that,' Leonka pompously interrupted. 'It happens that sharpeners get themselves up as officers. What was it you were going to say, Clotilde?'

Then she told the story of Ribnikov with every detail, displaying a petty and utterly feminine talent for observation: she told how they called him General Kuroki, his Japanese face, his strange tenderness and passion, his delirium, and finally how he said 'Banzai!'

'You're not lying?' Leonka said quickly. Keen points of fire lit in his eyes.

'I swear it's true! May I be rooted to the ground if it's a lie! You look through the keyhole, I'll go in and open the shutter. He's as like a Japanese as two peas.'

'Come on,' he said resolutely. 'Who did he arrive with?'

Only Karyukov and Strahlmann remained of the all-night party. Karyukov could not be awakened, and Strahlmann muttered something indistinctly. He was still half drunk and his eyes were heavy and red.

'What officer? Blast him to hell! He came up to us when we were in the "Buff," but where he came from nobody knows.'

He began to dress immediately, snorting angrily. Leonka apologised and went out. He had already managed to get a glimpse of Ribnikov's face through the keyhole, and though he had some doubts remaining, he was a good patriot, distinguished for impertinence and not devoid of imagination. He decided to act on his own responsibility. In a moment he was on the balcony whistling for help.

VII

Ribnikov woke suddenly as though an imperative voice within him had said 'Wake up'. An hour and a half of sleep had completely refreshed him. First of all he stared suspiciously at the door: it seemed to him that some one was watching him from there with a fixed stare. Then he looked round. The shutter was half open so that every little thing in the room could be seen. The woman was sitting by the table opposite the bed, silent and pale, regarding him with big, bright eyes.

'What's happened?' Ribnikov asked in alarm. 'Tell me, what's been happening here?'

She did not answer, but her chin began to tremble and her teeth chattered.

A suspicious, cruel light came into the officer's eyes. He bent his whole body from the bed with his ear to the door. The noise of many feet, of men evidently unused to moving cautiously, approached along the corridor, and suddenly was quiet before the door.

Ribnikov with a quick, soft movement leapt from the bed and twice turned the key. There was an instant knock at the door. With a cry the woman turned her face to the table and buried her head in her hands.

In a few seconds the captain was dressed. Again they knocked at the door. He had only his cap with him; he had left his sword and overcoat below. He was pale but perfectly calm. Even his hands did not tremble while he dressed himself, and all his movements were quite unhurried and adroit. Doing up the last button of his tunic, he went over to the woman, and suddenly squeezed her arm above the wrist with such terrible strength that her face purpled with the blood that rushed to her head.

'You!' he said quietly, in an angry whisper, without moving his jaws. 'If you move or make a sound, I'll kill you. . . .'

Again they knocked at the door, and a dull voice came: 'Open the door, if you please.'

The captain now no longer limped. Quickly and silently he ran to the window, jumped on to the window-ledge with the soft-spring of a cat, opened the shutters and with one sweep flung wide the window frames. Below him the paved yard showed white with scanty grass between the stones, and the branches of a few thin trees pointed upwards. He did not hesitate for a second; but at the very moment that he sat sideways on the iron frame of the window-sill, resting on it with his left hand, with one foot already hanging down, and prepared to leap with his whole body, the woman threw herself upon him with a piercing cry and caught him by the left arm. Tearing himself away, he made a false movement and suddenly, with a faint cry as though of surprise, fell in an awkward heap straight down on the stones.

Almost at the very second the old door fell flat into the room. First Leonka ran in, out of breath, showing his teeth; his eyes were aflame. After him came huge policemen, stamping and holding their swords in their left hands. When he saw the open window and the woman holding on the frame and screaming without pause, Leonka quickly understood what had happened. He was really a brave man, and without a thought or a word, as though he had already planned it, he took a running leap through the window.

He landed two steps away from Ribnikov who lay motionless on his side. In spite of the drumming in his head, and the intense pain in his belly and his heels from the fall, he kept his head, and instantly threw himself heavily with the full weight of his body on the captain.

'Ah. I've got you now,' he uttered hoarsely, crushing his victim in mad exasperation.

The captain did not resist. His eyes burned with an implacable hatred. But he was pale as death, and a pink froth stood in bubbles on his lips.

'Don't crush me,' he whispered. 'My leg's broken.'

HYDROMEL

Vassili Iretsky

(1882— )

TRANSLATED BY D. C. ANDERSON

---

FROM his long-legged English father Bromley had inherited obstinacy and perseverance, from his Cossack mother a poetic love for the open vastness of the black-soil plains. These strangely dissimilar qualities managed somehow to blend without friction: so an individual was formed.

When his education at a forestry school was completed, Bromley negotiated for a plot of land in the province of Viatka. While waiting for the official documents confirming his purchase, he established himself on the plot with his wife and two-year-old child.

The property comprised a meadow not yet fully cleared, a tiny copse of half a score pine trees, and an insignificant little stream without source or end, which lost itself ineffectually somewhere in the valley below.

Bromley pitched his tent in the meadow, installed his family and effects, and set to work. Almost entirely with his own hands he built a small house in the Tyrolean style. He bought a horse, small but sturdy and stout-hearted; and two cows. He erected a greenhouse and, last of all, some beehives. Thus, in four years he became a person of consequence in the eyes of his neighbours. They looked at his little six-hectares estate, a neat patchwork of natural colours—like a picture in a children's story-book—and said "There's a nice job done!"

It was not easy to astonish the bee-keepers of that district, a district which might have been created especially for apiculture, under the direct protection too of St. Sosima and St. Savati; nevertheless Bromley astonished them. Except perhaps in the Caucasus there were no bees like his in the whole country.

And the variety of gear he had! Smokers, feeding troughs, baskets for catching the swarms: there was no end to it all; like a museum it was. The whole of Bromley's time was spent on this work; and he never rested content till everything down to the last little detail was perfection itself. Moreover his bees paid him handsomely. Fifty-two hives yielded him ten quintals of honey, to say nothing of the wax.

With his flaming mop of red hair, Bromley bore himself with an air of proud independence. "Like a Greek god" the neighbours said; and they called him Jupiter, a nickname, sadly inappropriate though it was, which stuck to him to the end of his life. His eyes shone with the concentrated light of a man completely absorbed in his work; their restlessness was all too human to justify the divinity attributed to him.

Each year the mottled mosaic of Bromley's enclosure acquired some new splash of colour. One year the hives would be repainted; another year there might be a new fence; or even the pink and white of a chubby baby making its first experiments in crawling against the brilliant green carpet of the lawn.

On the holding now lived three little girls, as slender, supple and ruddy as fox cubs. And on one fine day arrived a stiff-backed lady with unsmiling eyes and a fringed parasol, the English governess Bromley had engaged for his children.

The varied sounds carried by the hot summer wind across the holding—the chirping of crickets, the buzzing of bees, the lowing of cows, the clucking of hens, the squeaking of the windlass of the well, were now added to by the rise and fall of scales played listlessly on a piano.

Now and then Bromley would pause from his cares as head of a family and survey his little kingdom. He would listen to all these sounds, breathe deep the scents of the earth, and let his whole being fill with a sense of the goodness of things that told him beyond doubt that he was a happy man. Then, after a quick look round to make sure no one was near to spy on his idleness, he would throw himself down in the long grass and a benign smile would curl his lips as he lent his ear to the eternal language of the countryside. Suddenly, close at hand he might hear the furious buzzing of a bee trapped in the tangled grass; he would seek it out, then help it to free itself from its green snare, and watch it fly away free again. With its sac full of honey, it would make for its home in the hive; and Bromley would remember his duties. He would jump to his feet and set his hand once more to those labours which made him too resemble a busy bee.

According to his passport, Bromley's religion was orthodox; but he never went to church. He believed in God and loved Him: he looked on Him as the great calm source of all power, as the designer of that great pulse-beat which controls all living things.

From time to time he would open his heart about such matters to his wife. Quiet and thoughtful, she would listen; but she did not share his beliefs. Her conception of God was peace and silence: all uncertainty, change, and unrest were hostile to Him. Such things, she asserted, were in the dominion of the Devil. With an indulgent smile Bromley gave his considered opinion: "Peace and silence form a rest from trouble. This rest must be earned: to have value it must be preceded by anxiety. At the same time, if this rest never came to us, all trouble and anxiety would have been suffered in vain."

Late one night Bromley was wakened by noises made by the horses in the stable. He put on his dressing-gown and went out on to the balcony to investigate. The noises ceased; but Bromley stayed outside to listen to the silence of the close night. Presently he became aware of a deep rhythmical breathing. He whispered to himself: "It is the earth breathing in deep sleep at the end of her hard day's work". Then, added to this thought, came unbidden the secret suspicion that what he heard was the breathing of God himself enjoying a sweet repose.

One winter's day grim-visaged trouble made its entrance into the clearing. Against the white carpet of wind-swept snow appeared first one horse, then a second, then a third. The horses, spattered with snow-flakes and smelling of their stables, carried each a surly-looking man wearing epaulettes and a fur cap. Under their arms were black portfolios crammed to bursting-point with papers. The hinges of the gate groaned mournfully as they threw it open. This groaning started other harsh noises. The old dog Rex echoed it with a bark; then, fearing his own temerity, put his tail between his legs and slunk into his kennel from whose shelter he could inspect these uninvited guests with more safety. The purpose of their visit was unknown to him, but he feared it deeply: he set up a plaintive howling as they disappeared one by one through the porch of the house, without even troubling to brush the snow off their coats. When Bromley saw his visitors he too could have howled had he not inherited his English father's self-control.

submit yourself unquestioningly to my authority. Here is the Warrant and the Party Certificate. You are understood to own a number of hives: the whole lot are to be nationalized for the benefit of the workers: that goes for all the honey and wax you've got too." Then one of the others, a man wearing a stoker's gloves, added: "For your own good I advise you not to try on any bluff or to waste our time. Hand over everything you've got; if you don't—you'll be shot. We aren't leaving here empty-handed."

Bromley clenched his teeth, and said: "I can see it's useless for me to dispute your power to carry out what you threaten. I'll give you some honey and wax; but you mustn't take all I've got of it; you must leave me some to feed the swarms on. Even you can understand they'd all be dead in a week without food."

"Comrade," answered the first speaker, "we've got our orders and we're going to carry them out. The workers' and peasants' government commands you categorically to hand back everything you've filched from them. Don't start arguing the point. If you don't hand over your stuff with good grace it won't make any difference: we'll take it all the same. As to what you say about the bees, you can put in a special petition."

Bromley saw it was futile to oppose them further. He went to his study, took a large bunch of keys from a hook on the wall, threw a sheep-skin cloak round his shoulders, and strode to the front-door.

His wife and daughters were terror-struck when they saw the look on his face. All four of them stood trembling with fright.

So disaster began.

In the heated shed where the hives were kept, unqualified hostility was established at once. In ordinary business dealings Bromley was apt to be curt; now he was very brusque: to every word addressed to him he replied aggressively. He pointed to the kegs of honey, and gruffly suggested they be carried out into the yard; then he stood back to watch with a cold eye while his property was taken from him. The five intruders sweated and grunted as they carried out the heavy kegs. Soon they were tired. Bromley still watched them motionless.

"Eh, citizen," one of the men said, straightening his back, "you look as if you thought rather a lot of yourself. We may have to teach you a sharp lesson. How d'you fancy the idea of finding out what it's like to spend three months in an underground prison?"

Then the leader addressed him. "My friend's right," he said. "You just stop standing there plotting sabotage. Send for someone to help us. You're bound to have got some poor proletarian employed on the place."

"I have no one," Bromley answered quietly. "The man I had left me last autumn."

"Then you can do the job yourself! For once in a way you can work for the proletariat, instead of the other way on. And, anyhow, parasites have been formally prohibited."

Bromley threw him a contemptuous look. "Parasites," he said looking him up and down, "are people who live by the honest labour of others. All my life I have never worked less hard than any ordinary workman, and perhaps a good deal harder. This honey was produced by my labour, certainly not by yours; yet you assume the——" He was not given time to finish. An obscene oath burst from the leader, followed by: "In accordance with my powers I have the right in the event of resistance to arrest and shoot you. You are resisting: I arrest you!"

Bromley spent the next few days in an underground cellar. What impressed itself deepest on his memory of that time was not the prison bars nor the damp walls, but the never-ceasing tramp of feet from one part of the building to another across piles of broken furniture, smashed crockery, and an ankle-deep litter of paper.

In addition to the soldiers guarding him, there were numbers of officials who bustled here and there as busy as flees, bawling at each other as they clumped about. And as they clumped about they ate.

At the prison gates, in a cloud of thick yellowish steam, a crowd of men and women shoved and buzzed like a swarm of hungry bees. "What about those warrants?" "Can I buy one?" "Where?" "Who from?" "Mister comrade, can we get anything to eat here? We've just come from Glasovo." "My horse was commandeered five days ago; no one's paid me a cent." "Who can tell me anything?"

"Comrades," shouted one of the officials, "the information bureau is opposite. This office is only for the verification of warrants."

"Tell me, my dear," babbled one old woman, "which of these gentlemen are the Commissars?"

After many postponements Bromley's interrogation unexpectedly began.

"Are you the proprietor Bromley?"

"Proprietor? When I own only six and a half hectares and not a single labourer? I did have one, but he left me a long while ago."

"Henceforward you will exploit no one. You are a proletarian now."

"Not a proletarian, a peasant."

"A peasant, and you wear a tie? Don't tell stupid lies!"

His questioners were three in number: a jolly-looking sailor, a scowling mistrustful workman with tired and crafty eyes, and a third man who was difficult to place. He wore a leather cap and his face was clean-shaven; he sat silent and there was a cruel twist to his mouth.

On the table, which was littered with papers, were a hunk of bread, a sausage, and a lady's mother-of-pearl handbag.

The sailor, apparently taking no interest in the talk, was cleaning his nails with a bent fork. Suddenly, with a child-like grin, he exclaimed: "Comrade, you're talking rot! You've made profits out of your land. That sort of thing's been stopped. Now's the time for the workers to make a bit of profit for a change. That's all there is to it."

Bromley spoke up. "The only thing that matters is the bees. The land's not worth enough to worry about."

With his mind occupied only with the welfare of his little buzzing friends, he began to explain quietly and clearly how bees should be looked after. The sailor stopped cleaning his nails and listened attentively. It amused him to hear that such tiny creatures needed so much care. He lit a cigarette, shut his eyes, and imagined this strange kingdom of the insect world laid out before him.

The workman pretended not to be interested in anything Bromley was saying. In reality he was much interested and much surprised.

The silent man in the leather cap was waiting impatiently for Bromley to finish; only then would his role begin. His ill-nature got the better of him; interrupting Bromley in the middle of a sentence, he stuttered out in a monotonous foreign accent: "All that's got nothing to do with the case." The sailor put his hand on Bromley's arm to restrain him. The three interrogators exchanged glances, then took up pens and wrote:

"The land of the proprietor Bromley is nationalized for the benefit of the working-class, furthermore it will provide accommodation for the children. Comrade Tchelishkin is appointed Commissar over the property. A proportion of the honey not to exceed four pounds per month will be granted to Bromley on the condition that he behaves properly. Comrade Tchelishkin will live on the property in a style calculated to provide him with substantial nourishment corresponding to human needs."

Bromley set out for his home accompanied by Tchelishkin and the latter's strange-looking mistress, a lethargic and discontented woman. After the bustle of the big government headquarters which the whole town had become, the open country slowly helped his troubled spirits to grow calmer.

For some way the three of them walked in silence, with occasional furtive glances at each other. When they had covered seven kilometres Tchelishkin could stand the silence no longer. He started a conversation with his mistress, though his words were really addressed at the frowning Bromley. After a bit he spoke to him direct. "You'll find me a strict man," he said, "and they've given me my instructions and a copy of the proceedings in your case: I'm going to abide by them. But if you on your side will fall in with the instructions I shan't have anything against you, and we'll get on all right together. What d'you say about it?"

"What can I say?" replied Bromley. "Your idea's quite sensible—in the circumstances."

"The situation's like this, it seems to me," went on Tchelishkin, "you'll do your work conscientiously; and I'll just keep an eye on things as an accredited representative of the people. That way we won't have any cause to quarrel. But the first thing to be done is to form a servants' committee."

Bromley chuckled. "How can we form a servants' committee? The only people on the whole place are myself, my wife, and an old nurse."

Tchelishkin felt the irony and resented it; but it did not defeat him. "That's just like your sort of people," he said with as much contempt as he could put into his tone. "That's just how you intellectuals argue, like a lot of wriggling snakes! You say there's no committee; well, I'm telling you there's jolly well got to be one! You're behind the times with all your silly excuses. A servants' committee there's got to be! This show's going to be run properly."

"All right; but where shall I find the members?"

"Organize them."

Tchelishkin's mistress had been listening quietly; her silence became unbearable to her: she chipped in with: "See he does it without any monkey-business, though. We all know what these bourgeois are like!"

Bromley sighed. He thought: "This is going to be a tussle to see which of us can hold out longest."

The days that followed were filled with irritating fuss.

"I may not have had a grand education like some people," declared Tchelishkin, "but I do know something about bees." And he demanded the keys of the bee-house, the wood-shed, and the provision store. He reckoned up the amount of honey in stock, and calculated that half the quantity would suffice to feed the bees during the winter: so he took two full casks into town. When he got back he had a requisition order for hay in his pocket.

Thus were sown the seeds of discord; they germinated on the question of living-quarters.

Tchelishkin's mistress took a fancy to the study: for nothing in the world would Bromley give it up. From morning to night their wrangling was heard from one end of the house to the other. The frightened children, too terrified to speak, hid in corners. Bromley's wife hated rows: she would have preferred martyrdom to them any day. Now she counselled concession to all demands; but Bromley would not give in.

"You've shown quite plainly," said Tchelishkin, "that you have the true instincts of a capitalist; therefore I arrest you."

He took him into town.

They set out scowling and muttering at each other; but after a while the snow and ice on the road cooled their tempers. Tchelishkin was the first to speak.

"You've been behaving like an owl—if I may use the expression. I know what you're thinking, you're thinking I'm being unreasonable. It's obvious you never heard I was made a chevalier of the order of St. George. No; you're the one who's being unreasonable. Why? I'll tell you. Simply because you refuse to acknowledge the Revolution. Hasn't the Revolution happened? It certainly has! From the moment it happened, you should have realized you'd got to reckon with it, and give up all these silly airs and graces. But no; you must go on acting like a perfect specimen of the ancient regime."

Bromley looked at him, but made no answer. He thought: "The fellow's out of his mind. Some devil has possessed him."

Once again they found themselves in the yellow fog of the government office. Officials still strode about, and as they strode they shouted and chewed. The air smelt of ink, sweat, and soot.

The interrogation was peaceable, and even had a feeling of lazy good-nature to it; but the verdict surprised even Tchelishkin.

"The horse belonging to the proprietor Bromley shall be entered on the register and put at the disposal of the transport service. His hay, flour, and cattle are requisitioned."

Tchelishkin was extremely put out by the turn events had taken, for it struck at his own comfort. He was in a murderous mood. Once outside the office, he threw all the blame on Bromley.

"Call yourself an intellectual?" he shouted at him. "Not enough intelligence even to get us out of a mess like this!"

Bromley said nothing, and brooded. "If only they'll leave the bees alone!" he prayed. And the bees with their long hungry proboscides knew not a word of what was going on. Their thoughts and dreams and hopes were centred only on the returning sunshine which soon would warm their wings again.

The high snow-drifts lost their dazzling whiteness, then melted; the black earth began to peep out again; and the scent of last year's rotting vegetation struck the nostrils: Spring was announcing herself.

Bromley had just started on cleaning out the hives when the order arrived: "Deliver up half your hives to be distributed among more needy people." He sighed and resigned himself to the inevitable. In the order nothing was said about sending honey as feed for the confiscated bees, and anyhow he could not spare it; yet compassion smote him for the defenceless little creatures. He packed some honey to go with them, though he knew quite well that the bees' new masters would simply eat it with their teas. He had given it, however; what more could he do?

All of them were needed to carry the bees to town—his wife, his daughters, and Bromley himself. Bromley seemed to have become taller and thinner; and, as he strode along with his copper hair bared to the wind and his eyes fixed on the far horizon, he resembled nothing less than a Viking. To cheer himself up he thought: "I will breed fresh swarms."

Then summer came. Once more the sun's rays made heavy the atmosphere, the music of bees was heard, and the sweet scent of rye in the ear was carried on the breeze. At moments Bromley felt that everything was back where it had been in the good old days. The eternal regular movement animating all living matter! What was it? God? But no; the strength-giving spirit was divine no longer, for everything Bromley knew and loved was slowly being destroyed.

At the end of June the bees began to swarm. Tchelishkin, in the pride of his commanding position, pipe in mouth, strolled masterfully about the holding. He watched very closely the detail of all work going on. His mind was made up to learn this job of bee-keeping against the coming day when this red-headed bourgeois should finally give him cause to chase him out. Then he would be proprietor.

Bromley looked up from his work in the bee-house. "For the love of God, don't smoke!" he pleaded. "Bees can't bear tobacco smoke."

"Well, I never!" rejoined Tchelishkin.

"I tell you it's true! Not only smoking either! Onions and garlic as well. If they smell them on your breath, they get terribly upset; and they may get all out of condition."

Tchelishkin laughed. "Is that so? Sounds to me like sabotage on their part. Perhaps they've formed a committee." Tchelishkin laughed again.

A new order came: "Dispatch your new hives to the agricultural bureau without delay."

Bromley paled as he read it; then he stroked his chin. An idea came to him, a brilliant idea; a smile quivered in the corners of his mouth; only just in time did he screen it from Tchelishkin's watching eye. "No," thought Bromley, "the agricultural bureau shan't have all the profits of all my labour!" He would hide the swarms in the woods—in boxes fitted into hollow trees far from the prying eyes of treacherous men. "God help me in this!"

Early next morning, while Tchelishkin still snored into his mistress's ear, Bromley scoured the forest for the most hidden and inaccessible places. On the tops of trees he placed hives, and there carried the swarms. Tchelishkin noticed nothing, neither bees full of honey flying into the woods, nor that the swarms had mysteriously disappeared. True he did ask once or twice why fewer bees were about. Then Bromley would scrutinize the hives with care, and scratch his head. "Have you smoked in here?" he asked. "You must have done! That's a thing bees never forgive. Is there no way of convincing you that that is not just an idea of my own?" Bromley rejoiced at the easy success of his stratagem.

In the autumn, when Bromley was gathering in the honey, a District Committee arrived at the house followed closely by a Commission from the town. Both stayed for two days.

In the morning they quarrelled rowdily, after noon they gave themselves up to a plentiful and pacific meal, and in the evening they set to quarrelling again: each party threatening to arrest the other. In the end they divided the honey among themselves and decamped, taking all the poultry with them.

In their quarrels the townsmen ranged themselves against the villagers.

"You rascals, how dare you let him keep a piano? What right has he to have one? What have you got to say about it? What times d'you think we're living in? The old regime? Is Proletariat only an empty word to you? And you say political power's been put into better hands!"

The villagers were abashed, and decided without further parley that the piano be requisitioned for the Youth Circle. Tchelishkin was as furious as a polecat; his mistress abandoned her role of lady and swore like a peasant; as for Bromley . . .

The imperturbability he had inherited from his father stood him now in good stead: without it he would have sobbed like a child. But he was a strong man, energetic and enduring, and had never known the meaning of the word despair. But his poor wife wept silently and in secret: to hide her tears from her children she retired to her bedroom and cried into her pillow. Yes, Bromley had never known despair; but it was not far off now.

Although it was only autumn, hunger was beginning to make itself felt. With a sigh and a frown, Bromley sent the children out to gather mushrooms, while he himself ventured into the villages to try to barter household ornaments for flour. As for Tchelishkin, realizing what winter would be like on that place, he hurried back into town to get some other post there. On taking his leave of Bromley, he handed him an order allowing him to remove all the blankets, pillows and curtains.

The concealed hives yielded good honey: the breed had not deteriorated. Above all Tchelishkin was gone, Tchelishkin who for so many long unhappy days had strode about to remind them of their misfortunes; now they could collect their thoughts and reflect; fill their hearts with hope, and plan for the future. They will never come here again! They will forget us! They will leave us in peace while our wounds heal! Keep quiet and don't talk about them! Keep still and hide like a field-mouse when it sees a bird of prey wheeling against the sky above it!

The hives were still out in the woods, where Bromley had to go secretly, noiselessly, to tend them, under the shielding silence of the forest. He was thinking of bringing them back again to the warm for the winter when a man came looking for him. The executive committee wished to see him, he was told: they had come to a decision.

He walked to the town with anxiety gnawing at his heart, like a man on the watch for a bear. What new catastrophe could be waiting for him? But how hard it was to divine what those savage disturbers of the peace might want! The meaning of frost-feathers on window panes was easier to decipher.

Once again he was in the presence of those untidy piles of scribbled paper, those ink-stains, that irritating uproar which seemed to lead nowhere. There was a smell of decay and cheap tobacco. From behind the table tired eyes stared at him, then dropped uneasily to a portfolio of papers.

"It is proposed," he heard said, "to set up a children's colony in your district. To be precise, in the words of the written order: 'On the holding of the proprietor Bromley'. The order also says: 'Expropriate the house within twenty-four hours'." Bromley bowed his head: the inevitable and irrevocable was coming about. The tired eyes fixed their attention on a blot of ink, and their owner went on hurriedly: "From the humanitarian point of view you have all my sympathy; but what else can I do? We must find somewhere to put the children. As to the 'twenty-four hours', don't let that worry you too much: it's only put in to make it sound important. Everyone who writes tries to make himself sound important; that's what paper's for. But there's always a way to get round the law. You will have three days' grace. Three days, but no longer. Bear that in mind."

Bromley strode home with paces as long as if he were walking on stilts. He accepted the fact that he must now depart; and his mind was occupied only by the consideration of what articles of his moveable property he should take with him, what leave, what hide. The nearer he got to his home, the more eager he was to arrive so that he might have done with this sorry business.

Sad hours followed. His wife's first thought was for the ikons, which she took from the walls and crammed tightly into a hamper. Bromley had always carefully refrained from references to her piety; now restraint was thrown to the winds. "What d'you want with all that rubbish?" he cried. "You're mad!"

With a look of horror his wife turned her meek blue eyes to him and murmured in anguish: "You too? You've become a bolshevik! At last they've succeeded in contaminating even you!"

Yes, yes, anything you like! But was this a time for praying and weeping? The enemy was at the gate; they must hurry. In a stony silence he emptied cupboards, chests of drawers, trunks, of all their contents; and packed the most essential things in hampers. His dry lips were tight-pressed for he too hated parting with so many things they had known and lived with for many years. His wife's dresses seemed to him a superfluous encumbrance, yet from consideration for her he packed them too.

The household packing done, he went to the apiary, to bid a last sad farewell to all the bulky and diverse apicultural implements he would have to leave behind. In orderly rows on the shelves stood the smokers, clean and burnished; next to them the baskets for taking up the swarms, the feeding-troughs, the graters, funnels for straining the wax, tea-pots, syringes, frames, basins for heating the wax, buckets, honey-strainers, coarse and fine; an army of utensils he had chosen with so much care and which had served him well for so many years. All now to be left behind, all to be abandoned! O dear God! For the last time he touched them, caressed them. There stood the Vingham smoker, shaped like a torpedo, shining even in the gloom; how often had his loving fingers unscrewed its parts, cleaned and reassembled them with care and precision! There too stood the Dultia feeder. Shall I take it with me, shall I take them all?

His wife entered the bee-shed and watched him as he quickly set to work. "Why take all these things," she inquired, "when the bees must stay behind?"

"The bees stay behind? How can you imagine such a thing? You must be mad!"

She asked no more questions, merely wondered how they were to carry such a load, how house it in an already over-crowded flat in town? She was surprised still more later, when he loaded not one single hive onto the wagonette.

They set out in the night along the rough country roads, their ears straining for hostile noises in the darkness. The cloudy shadows of that autumn night made them imagine almost they were fleeing from the shame of some misdeed.

At dawn they reached the house of Bromley's sister-in-law. Creeping like thieves, so as not to be seen by other tenants, they climbed the stairs. The children were wrapped in shawls and sent to lie in a dark corner, where they soon dropped off to sleep. The two women—Bromley's wife and sister-in-law—wandered distracted from room to room, their eyes streaming with tears: like dripping candles, Bromley thought. But he was calm: a practical idea, tempering the gloom of his misfortunes, lay at the back of his mind. He sat busy thinking it over.

For several days they talked only in undertones, as if some dread disease were in their midst; and the women arranged and rearranged the furniture, taking care to make no noise in doing it. They were surprised and alarmed at Bromley's air of having nothing to fear. He spoke in normal tones, tramped about the house without a thought for the noise he made, and even chatted loudly with the neighbours. Then one fine day he disappeared.

Late next night he returned to them. His clothes were sodden and mud-smeared as if he had been through a marsh. On his back was a great bundle of firewood; but when the bundle was untied out came four of his precious hives. The whole operation was carried out so secretly that, save his wife, no one was aware of it. She asked him where he had found the bees. With a knowing look he answered: "Where from but the hives I hid in the woods?" The others had been too dangerous to approach.

Bromley's active nature was satisfied only when he was sure of constant work; this satisfaction he thought to get by taking a job in an office; but it turned out to be sadly incomplete. Days passed and he grew morose. There was nothing now to hope for but a miracle.

Bromley hated idle chatter. Unless the talk concerned a practical matter, of vital interest to himself, he let his attention wander to reveries of ownership, past and, possibly, to come. It was bad for him to have ample time now for such reveries. It led to his putting off of urgent duties. A pair of shoes needed soling? Ah well, what does it matter? Later on when times are better I'll buy a new pair. So he waited, fabricating comfortable fictions to excuse his idleness.

Suddenly his mood changed: the sharp goad of conscience pricked him; he jumped to his feet. "Work, work, work!" he exclaimed. "I must work!" He threw back his shoulders and grappled with life anew.

Telling no one of his purpose he settled to a task of sawing, planing, and boring, with a stubbornness which was all his own. His duties at the office—making entries in pale thin ink in ledgers, and adding columns of figures under the heading "Current and distributing account"—hindered him not at all. His boring, sawing, and planing went on.

Then spring came again to give warmth to the air, cockchafers started their singing; and the bees, drunk with liberty, took flight from the home Bromley had built them and buzzed happily under the sky-light of the attic.

Bromley too was drunk, drunk with joy. He looked quite youthful again as he smiled and said: "We had to go through with it, but here we still are!" Everything now seemed to him as it had been in the happy past, for could he not listen all day to the music produced against the blue sky by those cheerful little creatures who worked only to make themselves useful to others? Misfortunes were forgotten; no more notice was taken of overcrowding, insufficient food, nightly intrusions, or worn-out shoes. Summer passed at a gallop; the sunshine quickly healed the wounds of winter and gave strength to the belief: "Everything will be all right. Perhaps not to-day, nor tomorrow, nor even the day after tomorrow; but for certain a time is coming when everything will be all right."

One thing only made Bromley uneasy. A lot of talk was going around about bees being kept in the attic of a certain house. People were astonished when they heard such a thing was being done; they got excited about it; they envied. "That chap will be a bee-keeper till he dies," they said. "For two pins he'd set up a hive on the church steeple." But Bromley was bothered by this talk. He wished he could shield his bees from all those curious eyes and dangerous tongues. They will destroy my work with their chatter, he said to himself. Yet, though he pondered on the problem at his work, at his leisure, he could find no way to silence the chatterers. His fears were well-founded for, sure enough, the talk reached the ears of the authorities; and soon some uninvited guests presented themselves at his front door.

They searched the whole house, then reached the attic.

"Where did you get these bees?" they wanted to know.

"From the woods. They are half-wild."

"What right have you to keep them?"

"Since when has it been forbidden? Can you show me the decree?" He spoke calmly, but only because he was keeping a tight hold on his temper and his fears. The men exchanged looks, and appeared to agree with his argument. With a nod they left him.

Then autumn came and the time for gathering the honey. Now he was to see the real significance of the men's silent and empty-handed departure. No sooner had he gathered all the honey than they called again. This time they did not leave behind them even enough honey to feed the bees during the coming winter.

So the light of day went out for Bromley. His last defences had been carried; this final pillaging had broken his spirit. His shoulders drooped, his mouth sagged, his whole being pictured dumb wretchedness. Somehow he contrived to feed the bees—they could hardly be left to die—but his sawing and planing were heard no more. Why work hard for nothing? He let his arms drop to his sides: for the whole winter they hung limp like wet whip thongs. Wounded to the innermost core of his being, he mooned silently about the house without appearing even to notice his wife and children.

At last the day came when he bethought himself of two hives which he had once made for travelling. He fixed them with a strap to his shoulders, packed a change of linen and a little food in his haversack, and set out for Petrograd. There, surely in the general turmoil of a great city he would be able to pass unnoticed; there people would leave him in peace. Pray God they would!

It was not a long journey, two and a half days to be exact; yet a terrible anxiety lay on Bromley every foot of the way, with every telegraph pole that flashed by, at every station. Six times armed bands swept like snowstorms down upon the train and invaded the carriages. On the pretext of searching for contraband goods they clawed over everything. They smashed in boxes, thrust their ramrods through pillows, ripped, scattered, and swore; and finally took to themselves what they wanted—bread, butter, a sucking-pig, but above all flour: when they found it a white cloud would arise, and some poor traveller would scowl in impotent rage.

Bromley's bees always provoked suspicion. "Bees? What d'you want with bees? I expect it's really alcohol you're carrying. Or even brandy; eh, comrade? You'd better open it up."

Each time the same argument would follow.

"What's the good of opening it? I tell you it's only bees! If I open the hive the whole swarm will die. Your smoke will get at them. Bees can't abide smoke."

"Oh, they can't abide smoke, can't they? Then they'll have to get used to it. And we still don't know they really are bees. Look here, comrade, you'd better stop this funny game, and show us what you've got. It's our duty to make sure; we've got our orders; and we're used to tricks like yours."

"I give you my word of honour they're nothing but bees."

"Word of honour! You've thought of a fine way of convincing us! Word of honour indeed! A word of honour nowadays is worth less than a Soviet rouble. Stop wasting our time!"

"All right; put your ear against the hive: you'll hear them buzzing."

Six times this scene was re-enacted. Six times Bromley's heart stopped beating and froze with fear. The bees would perish, tobacco smoke would poison them, they would weaken and fall sick. And, in the intervals when he dropped off, nightmares haunted and followed him. He saw before him great red hands with dirty fingers. Take them away! Take them away!

After the sixth search he became calmer, and was settling himself down to sleep when someone shouted to him: "You just wait a bit! There's still the stop at Mga. That's where you'll find you'll really sweat."

"What is there special about that station?"

"Special?" The man laughed loosely, tapped his nose, and gave a knowing wink to his neighbours. "You're not telling me you haven't heard! You've never heard about Liga? You'll soon find out about him. There's a brigand for you. Not a man, he isn't. He's a devil, an imp of hell, the strangler of speculators—Anathase Liga!" The passengers trembled. "Even if you've got a trading-permit, he just spits on it. The authorities are too far away to touch him. There's not a trick he's not up to. He can twist anything you say to make it mean what he wants it to mean. He could prove that the good God himself was a speculator. That's the sort of a fellow Liga is!"

Hearts beat faster or slower according to their habit under the stress of fear. Then—Liga appeared.

He was thin, consumptive, and sharp-featured as a hawk. Entering a carriage like a general at a review, he made a haughty inspection of all those who were delivered into his power, and at once began to shout. Like Julius Caesar he referred to himself in the third person, and took no trouble to hide the admiration he felt for himself.

"Good morning, citizens! I, Anathase Liga, chief of the demarcation line, have the honour to salute you. No doubt you've heard of me already. Allow me to feel you all over a little. So as not to waste time, don't bother to do any unnecessary undressing; and don't try to think of any tricks to play on me. If any of you have got contraband goods in here, declare them. You know quite well you can't fool me."

He spoke fast, and all the time his sharp little eyes were untying all the knots, piercing into valises, hampers, bales, and penetrating to the bottom of portfolios, into bags hung round necks, into waistcoat-pockets.

Sometimes speculators and peasants travelling with provisions, especially when they belonged to the red army, tipped each other the wink, and so crowded up a carriage that it was difficult for inspectors to get into it; indeed they took a grave risk in going in, for a serious assault was easy in such dark and crowded conditions.

In cases like that Liga would stand at the door glaring at the heads, feet, and buttocks protruding from the benches. He would let out a contemptuous roar: "Ha, you thought you'd made a nice little trap for Liga! You said to yourselves he'll be too frightened to come in! Never! Liga is afraid of no man. Liga has ten hefty bodyguards round him. Would anyone care to feel their muscles? You'll find Liga a pretty shrewd fellow; and the luck is generally on his side, what's more. You enjoy being crowded like this, do you? Well, move up a bit closer: you'll keep warmer."

His fearless energy was born of a consumptive's impetuosity, the impetuosity which had won him three St. George's Crosses in the war, and afterwards had helped him to climb the steep ladder of executive power. He revelled in enterprises of danger and difficulty, missions impossible of achievement; and real enjoyment came to him when he could bring to his activities his powers of subtle imagination. For example, his imagination once prompted him to stop in front of a sleepy and demure-looking lady, and say: "I hope madam will forgive me, but the exigencies of the service compel me to undress her." To the accompaniment of a chorus of laughter mixed with a few muttered expressions of outraged sensibility, he graciously led his victim out of the carriage, with an invitation to step into his office. There on the spittle-covered floor he made her undress. As he expected, a small bag of diamonds fell from her corset, some gold ten-rouble pieces nestled in her stockings, and a belt containing alcohol was round her waist. Leaving to an underling the task of drawing up a report, he returned to the carriage to acquaint the uneasy ant-hill there with all that had just happened.

"I beg you all to be calm. You know Liga will never cheat you of a little entertainment. Liga has just had the good luck to find twenty-two diamonds and the equivalent of six million roubles which will go to Moscow to be shared out among the poor. Now who else would like to undress? Whose turn is it?"

Under the flash of his penetrating little blood-shot eyes heads were lowered—as birds try to hide themselves at the sight of a gun—but sometimes too late; sometimes a victim hid a guilty look too slowly.

There were times, of course, when Liga was not so lucky. On some occasions his imagination led him too far; but these did not trouble him greatly: he knew all the ways of getting out of a predicament.

Once he undressed an engineer, and found nothing. He felt him all over, ripped the lining of his coat, ransacked his luggage; there was no contraband. He decided to let the man go in peace, but this engineer had other ideas. He explained himself as a person of importance, charged by Lenin himself with a task of electrification.

"I demand an enquiry," he said with indignation. "What right had you to undress me? What cause was there? The matter shall not rest at this!"

Liga snorted; for a moment he was worried; then quickly calm came back to him: he had thought of a way out; a look as if he had just remembered something crossed his thin face. He opened the engineer's valise again, and rummaged inside it. He found what he wanted, a small envelope which he now rapped on the table. "Tchourakoff," he ordered, "write down this report. On such and such a date, in such and such a month, in the presence of so and so . . . and all the rest of it . . . then: 'In the suspected valise were found four improper drawings and three pornographic photographs. This constitutes an offence against the morals of the workers and peasants. The said drawings and photographs have been confiscated to the State. They are forwarded herewith. I await your necessary instructions.'" Then he turned to the dis comforted engineer. "Are you satisfied, citizen? Sign here, and you will receive a copy."

Several times people warned Liga to take care. "One day you will get caught," they said. "Someone will denounce you. Your conduct is not always—shall we say?—quite correct. You haven't done so badly out of all those diamonds and gold bracelets and millions; you make a pretty good thing too out of all the flour and butter. Take care, you may find yourself put up against a wall."

Liga laughed. "Don't you worry about Liga! Liga could clear himself of anything. Just try and see if you can prove I've made a profit out of my job. You think someone may denounce me, someone may say: 'He has hidden a hundred million roubles'? Suppose they do. What then? Where are those millions? I've been in the hands of the Cheka once already. For three months they kept me in a dungeon and grilled me; and what came of it? I'd got into their hands through the cleverest of all examining magistrates, Lekasse himself. There's a man for you! Not one scrap of pity! He boasts that no one ever gets away from him: they all go to the wall—but not Liga. I just talked to him as if I were talking to a father confessor."

"You confessed?"

"I confessed nothing, I denied everything. 'What have I done wrong?' I said to him. 'All you can say is I have a rather hasty temper. What does that matter to the government of workers and peasants? They've got a hasty temper themselves.' The magistrate laughed and released me."

"Excuse me, but what have you got there, citizen?" he asked Bromley.

"Bees, honey-bees."

"Carrying a swarm, are you? Now isn't that nice! All the same I think you'd better show it to me."

"How can I show it to you?"

"In whatever way you please, but show it. Bees are fond of honey and have no marked objection to sugar. Perhaps it's really sugar you're carrying. What makes you hesitate? You can be quite frank about your possessions with me. That's what I'm here for, to help people to be frank."

"As God is my witness, these are bees and only bees!"

"Look here, citizen, why drag God into this dirty company?" He swept his arm round the carriage. "You can see for yourself all these people are nothing but speculators and traders. And I'm not so sure about you. To put it plainly, I don't believe a word you're saying."

"Very well. Have the goodness to put your ear here. . . . Now can you hear them buzzing?"

"Not yet. We'd better stir them up a bit to verify your story. From the little education I had I seem to remember that bees are afraid of smoke. We'll just blow a little in through this hole."

Bromley shuddered. "Please, please! They'll all die! They're almost dead now, in this suffocating atmosphere."

Liga must have heard the ring of truth in that cry, for he made no more effort to verify Bromley's story; yet he was never very willing to concede a point. Carefully watching the effect of his words, he said slowly: "All right, I believe you; but why haven't you taken out a permit? It appears that these bees are not government property; perhaps they belong to the workers and peasants . . . Ah, you see what I'm getting at? Yes, it'll be best for all parties if you come with me while I write out a report. I'm sure you won't mind waiting here till I receive the necessary instructions and the matter can be fully cleared up. That'll be better for the bees too; they'll be glad of a rest after travelling so far."

Bromley stood up. In a resigned but dignified manner he passed the strap of the hives across his shoulders; then said, weighing every word: "I must obey your orders; but I'd like you to know what I think of you. You are behaving wickedly, inhumanely. I am carrying these bees because I am a specialized bee-keeper. For no reason I can understand you want to harm me. The bees will die, I know that: I've been breeding this sort for eight years now; then, through a caprice of yours . . ."

"Cut it short, citizen. They'll be worrying at Petrograd why the train's late."

"Through a caprice of yours all my hard work will be undone. I am ready." Then he remembered something. He stooped down and drew from under the seat a black earthenware pot. "You'd better have the honey too. It was food for the bees. Six times I've managed to hide it from the bandits. Now I give it to you quite willingly."

Liga blinked his eyes and looked at him closely. Then in a tone no one had ever heard him use before he said: "All right, all right! Liga is not a dog. He knows how to give way when he comes up against someone honest. Bon voyage, citizen."

A voice from the corner of the carriage said: "Bravo, Liga! You're not such a bad fellow after all." Then when Liga had disappeared the same voice said: "This chap here's a lucky chap all right! He's got the knack of getting what he wants."

In the gloomy twilight could be heard cries of anger coming from pilaged carriages further along the train; then the train moved, gathered speed laboriously, and with many grating sounds proceeded on its way.

Is that the last of it? wondered Bromley to himself. Can I dare hope my troubles are at an end?

When, five hours later, the long lines of the houses of the capital came into view, he drew a deep sigh of relief. Arrived! God be praised!

The train with passengers leaning like a long row of mud-splashes from every window steamed into Petrograd station soon after night had descended. Bromley made his way irresolutely through the crowd, then had difficulty in convincing himself that there were no cabs or trams to carry him the remainder of his journey. With a heavy heart he set out on foot for Lesnoi. He had not walked many paces through the soggy slush of snow before he realized it would be next to impossible for him to reach the suburbs of the city that night. Two hives weighing fifty kilos, and a heavy sack on shoulders already loaded down with the weariness of three days sitting in a train with no continuous sleep made his footsteps lag. He halted, swung the load from his shoulders, and sat himself down on the granite pedestal of a monument. Where, he wondered, could he pass the night?

After a few seconds he became conscious of someone sitting beside him. He looked down and saw a quite tiny person muttering and swearing over the contents of a large sack, a child of perhaps thirteen years.

"Could you tell me of somewhere to sleep tonight?" Bromley asked.

"Sorry, I can't," the urchin answered dryly as he busied himself in emptying his pockets. "As a matter of fact I've got some lodgings not far from here, though I don't know if they'll let me in again. Anyhow it's not lodgings I've got really; it's more like a corner of a room."

"D'you think they'd let me in? I will pay. I'll pay with bread. I've got a long way to go, to Lesnoi."

The boy was silent for a moment. "My landlady's a pretty hard woman, what you might call a Tartar. I shouldn't think she'd let you in: she's too afraid of typhoid. Where d' you come from? . . . Oh, from Viatka! It might do the trick if you said you came from Zvanka."

They set off side by side. For twenty paces there was silence; then Bromley asked: "What d'you do for an occupation?"

"Same as everyone else, I speculate. I've just been to Vologda looking for butter."

"Did you get much?"

"I got a lot of it, though there's not much left with me now. Thirty-five pounds I bought; but train thieves stole fifteen, and the curds I had as well. But that's what speculation's like. Tell me, citizen, what's butter worth in Viatka now? Is there a shortage there?"

"I can't really say," replied Bromley a little ashamed of his ignorance of commerce. "I think it's a thousand." Then he added: "Have you any parents?"

"Not now," the boy replied. "All I've got's an invalid brother. He's eight, but he can't use his legs. I have to find food for him: I pay for his board and lodging. It'd be best for him if he died soon; I shan't be able to do much more for him. I've been arrested four times. I go to Vologda every week, or to Tchernopovetz or Viatka. I've had typhus. It got me at Vologda. I was in bed a month and a half, and ever since then my legs have been weak and I've had a cough. I'll die soon. What'll happen to my little brother? That bothers me. Look here, citizen, don't go and tell my landlady he's my brother. I pretend he's only my cousin. My surname's different from his."

"How did that happen?"

"It was just a bit of necessity." He stepped over a gutter, then added carelessly: "I stabbed one of the brigands in the hand. I meant to get him in the side, but I only cut his hand. They put me down to go to a penitentiary colony, but I slipped out of that all right, then I changed my name. That's to say, I didn't really change my name. What I did was to buy an identification card for a pound of butter." He laughed. "Now I'm like an actor, I go about with someone else's name. D'you think it matters? Before I die I'll confess about it. The long and short of it is, I'm a globe-trotter."

Shifting his sack onto the other shoulder the boy asked gently: "Tell me, citizen, can you think out a way of making sure my little brother gets what he needs? You see, when I'm dead there'll be no one to get food for him. He can't look after himself. I've just been to a fortune-teller. I gave her half a pound of butter to tell me without any mincing of words what my future was. She said I'd die soon. That's all right for me, but there's my brother. I once won a million and a half at cards. I thought it'd do to fix up my little brother's life for him, but it didn't work out like that. The whole lot went on caramels and chocolate. I bought him a quilt though, but nothing else. D'you think you could advise me what to do?"

"How old are you?" Bromley asked.

"Twelve," answered the young globe-trotter, "but even so I can read and write."

Bromley had no time to think over the boy's question. He had suddenly to duck his head to enter the dark passage of a porter's lodge in which his feet dragged in mud below and water dripped down his neck from above. Then they crossed a dismal courtyard impregnated with the stink of cats and bathed with the rank effluvium of an ancient dwelling.

"What's your name?" asked Bromley.

"Gania, Gabriel."

"Well, Gabriel, plead my cause well. I'm very tired. It's a long way to Lesnoi."

Gania clicked his tongue with compassion and said: "Yes, that's a long long way, and a state of siege has been declared. You're forbidden to be out after eleven." Then he pulled hard at a cracked bell. A dog barked. Footsteps dragged themselves nearer. A cautious unfriendly voice asked: "Who's there?"

"Me."

"Me who?"

"Me, of course!"

Cautiously the door was opened. The landlady listened to Bromley's request with a half-hostile attitude, and refused firmly. "I've no rooms vacant. You can't have lodgings if you're not registered. Etc. Etc."

Since he was on the point of collapse with fatigue, Bromley pleaded humbly with no effort to conceal his misery. "No, no, I won't let you in!" the landlady screamed. Then she turned angrily to Gania: "As for you, you have no right to live here at all. In future you can find somewhere else. D'you think this is a hotel?"

Bromley sighed. He was by now resigned to having to move on somewhere else, but he ventured questioningly: "A pound of honey?"

The landlady reflected for an instant, then to confirm what she thought she had heard, asked: "What d'you say?"

"I will give you one pound of honey for a night's lodging."

"In advance?"

"Yes, yes!" Bromley exclaimed excitedly. With great relief he slipped the strap of the hives from his shoulder: he felt that in another moment he would have fallen where he stood. Half an hour later he was stretched his full length on a straw mat and his cloak was over him. A night-light burned brightly, till by-and-by it spluttered out. The bees were out in the corridor. Gania was sitting on the foot of his brother's bed. While waiting for sleep to claim him, Bromley listened to the little globe-trotter's soft voice telling his ailing brother all about his expedition in search of butter and all his grand plans for the future. He remembered the words of his wife, "Unrest and uncertainty are the opposites of God: they lie in the domination of the Devil." Then, his imagination half paralysed by drowsiness presented to him, not Gania sitting on the foot of the bed, but a perky little imp possessed of the spirit of cunning and knowing well how to use it to further his mischievous ends. Suddenly a torturing thought came to him: the bees? Were they still alive? Would they die in this used-up air? Would this cold and the jolting of their journey prove too much for their resistance? Was all his work to be brought to nothing? Were all his hopes to be crushed? If only the good God had not planned that for him!

His sleep was sound, though punctuated by a short and vivid dream. He saw himself at his old home taking up a new swarm, while beyond him the white frocks of his three little girls frisked in and out of the hives against the brilliant metallic green of the grass.

In the morning he had a quick conference with Gania. If the latter went to Viatka, he would go and see Bromley's wife, and hand her a letter asking her to provide him with shelter and tell him all the news. Then Bromley threw the strap of the hives across his shoulders, and set out for Lesnoi.

As he trudged by muddy pavements and snow-strewn streets he wondered whether he would find the landlady he had known still in charge of his old apartments. When he had known her she was fifty: that was ten years ago. Perhaps she had died? Perhaps she had moved? Alternately he felt convinced: "She will still be there"; "She will be gone". He tried to tell his fortune in this by counting the numbers of the windows in the houses he passed: an even number would mean he found his old landlady, an odd number—the dreaded reverse. Seven times he tempted providence. Six houses in Viborg Road gave a favourable result. His anxiety assuaged, he gave his mind to other matters. "When I've got myself settled in, I'll sell my gold watch; then I'll be able to buy a board and fix the hives by the window. There'll be a little hole in the window they can fly out by."

The melting snow around him stank putrid from the rotting rubbish it contained; yet in the midst of this miasma of decay he imagined suddenly he smelt the sweet perfume of acacias. He remembered there were acacias at the house he was making for. Was this sudden feeling that he smelt them a kindly message that after all his troubles his quest would be successful? Or was it trying to tell him the acacias had been cut down, cut down as the fence would have been to feed the stove? Derelict and forlorn the house rose before his imagination like a plucked fowl. Pray God this had not happened! His misgivings grew as he trudged forward.

His anxiety was not justified. He found everything he had hoped for: his old landlady, the acacias, and even a room free. True the room was empty of furniture, there was no glass in the windows, the skirting had been torn away, but—it was a room. The landlady too had the same pillaged and patched appearance. Instead of shoes on her feet was a multiplicity of thick old socks, and the rest of her resembled a busted pillow.

When she first opened the door to Bromley she eyed him with a cold suspicious eye; then recognition twisted her wrinkles into smiles; in a shrill voice, which matched ill with her thick curves, she welcomed him: "You? It's not possible!"

"Yes, it is me."

Yes, yes, she thought, Mr. Bromley it certainly is, but a changed Mr. Bromley: his bearing was different and his eyes were tired now and yellow, sad, and a little dim. His red hair too had lost its golden sheen. One thing however remained the same—the stubborn line of his eyebrows. That still showed vigour, youth, and staying-power. As she looked at him her memories made her blush. She recollected shamefacedly the love she had felt for this bright student, the advances she had been the first to make, the cold dignity of his rebuff.

Bromley quickly told the story of his misfortunes, and ended: "I want to try my luck in Petrograd. Can you take me in? It's my last throw."

The landlady glanced at the bees and nodded her shawl-covered head. "You stay here with me and do what you like. I know you, you're one of the obstinate ones."

Her words seemed to lighten by a thousand kilos the weight on Bromley's back. He threw back his shoulders, and his heart beat normally again. The memory of his troubles slipped from him. He felt an urge to shout with joy! But no, the blows fate had dealt him had taught him not to be excited by a trifling triumph. Now that the problem of where to live was solved, his mind flicked back to his bees; but it was quickly recalled by the demands of friendship: he told his landlady about his three red-headed little girls, his quiet and thoughtful wife, and the fresh green meadow where he had pitched his tent those long years ago. Then he fell silent and went up to his room.

In solitude there he set himself to the labours he had planned. He bought some planks and carpenter's tools, mended the windows and stove, and above all fed his bees. Their need of care was great: the journey had upset them more than even he had feared. They shivered as if frozen; they seemed almost to want to die. But Bromley knew he would pull them through, and everything would come right again as it had been in the long-distant past. An almost heavenly strength possessed him as his spirits rose.

In his mind's eye he saw the arrival in Petrograd of his quiet wife and noisy children. Then he saw himself accepting a nice comfortable job in the pine forest; there they would all live in a little wooden house, and a meadow could be seen through the windows (how could anyone live without a green meadow?) and also this was the most important thing—on the grass would be a mottled mosaic of bee-hives. He thought he could already feel the waving steamy heat of the burning summer sun, and hear the most beautiful music in the world, the buzzing music of those industrious little creatures which God had sent onto earth to set an example to us all. Already too he was inhaling the sweet aromas of evening as they lapped against his face like rollers of the ocean; he saw the bees at the close of day, tired, with their full honey-sacs flying slowly home to their hives; and he heard the sonorous timbre of his daughters' laughter. This last thought brought him back from his reverie. What was happening to his wife and daughters?

Remembering Gania's promise to call at his home in Viatka, he hurried across the city. As he strode along he thought out the best way of placing the feeding-troughs and wondered whether it would be necessary to plant some mignonette.

Gania was not at home when he arrived; but his little paralysed brother foraged in a mess of broken chocolate and sunflower seeds under his pillow, and produced a crumpled envelope. Bromley tore it open, and the meaning of the few words he read in a clumsy, childish hand surged over him like a flood of corroding poison: "Our darling mother died yesterday of Spanish flu."

For once the fortitude and self-control he had inherited from his father did not serve him. He let out a roar of anguish. A fierce hatred shook his whole body. Against whom? He could not have said. The little invalid gazed at him with the big compassionate eyes of an ikon, and sensed the presence of grief. Although this was a stranger's grief and he was ignorant of its cause, he began sobbing silently.

Bromley regained control of himself. A decision was called for. His children were there in Viatka with no one to look after them: here were his bees in the same condition. His blood was there: here was the altar of his hopes. He clenched his teeth, and set himself to unravel the knot. The two possible solutions to the dilemma inevitably clashed.

Because bees do not like smoke, Bromley had never tasted tobacco; now he felt an irresistible envy for all smokers. As soon as he was out again in the street he bought himself a packet of cigarettes; then he said to himself: "Before I have finished the packet, I must have made up my mind."

He set out on the streets to Lesnoi as he had done twelve days before. Again he sought to discover his fate by counting the windows of the houses: even numbers, he would go back to Viatka; odd numbers, he would stay in Petrograd. He had not walked half the way, however, nor finished the cigarettes before he made the sudden and irrevocable decision to stay. He had left Viatka without a thought about whether he had the right to leave or not; perhaps a second time he would not be allowed to leave. In that event the bees in Petrograd would certainly perish. He must stay here and send for his children.

When he got home he went straight up to bed, without seeing his landlady. After any deep emotion he usually slept heavily and long—like a newborn baby, as they say in story-books. Now he slept for fifteen hours on end. When he woke again he had a racking headache and his legs were weak. The calm assurance he had felt when he took his decision to stay in Petrograd had somewhat waned. However he sat down and wrote a letter to friends at Viatka about his children; but a dull indifference to what might happen had got him in its clutches. Nevertheless he attended to his bees with his usual affection: he filled their feeder with sugared water, then lighted the stove with care not to make a smoke. This duty done, he set himself to planing a piece of wood, for some small boxes were needed. But he groaned at his work. A clogging tiredness weighed him down. Was it from grief? he wondered.

The tiredness became too much for him. He put his tools aside, and lay down on the pallet, pulling his cloak around him; quickly he fell into a light disturbed sleep.

It was as if only one half of his consciousness slept. The waking part stood watching everything that happened to the other. Fantastic apparitions tions went in and out of it illuminated by a red-hot fire; then they piled themselves together into heavy round blocks of varying sizes. They made noises too. At first they resounded like balls in a skittle-alley, then they tinkled, then, when they struck his skull and started spinning, they made a rattling sound. It was incomprehensible and meaningless; but his waking part went on watching closely while the little blocks swallowed the big ones and hungrily chewed them into tiny pieces. Still unsatiated they attacked his head from every side, sometimes coming near his teeth. Then he snapped at them and tried to chew them to ease the pressure on his skull. He did not succeed in this; but soon some large grindstones came to his aid. They had no difficulty in crushing all the blocks, but they went further: as if by accident, they swallowed the side of his head which lay on the pillow. Then followed terrible minutes, terrible because each grindstone had a face at the base of which wagged a jaw resembling the snout of a pig. But eventually everything ended well: the grindstones started turning, the faces moved, and the jaws chewed and gnashed with fury. Occupied with their own work, they paid no more attention to Bromley. He sighed with relief, sat up quickly, and looked around him. His room was in darkness, and his head seemed not to belong to him: it had become horribly heavy, and pivoted as if it had been set in motion by invisible pistons.

"I must have caught cold," thought Bromley, vexed. He remembered a tin of aspirin he had put on a shelf soon after he arrived there two weeks ago. He would take some now. He tried to rise, but the effort required was too much for him: his head fell back on the pillow, the last ounce of strength left his body, and dreams recaptured him.

This time the dream was of a snow-storm with mounted men in great fur caps riding through it. Then everything became a blank.

Four days later the landlady knocked timidly on his door. She knew his liking for solitude, and would never enter his room without being called, even to make the bed. Now, getting no answer to her knocking, she knocked again, and again and again and again. Then she cautiously opened the door, and threw a quick look round the room. She saw Bromley lying with his eyes open, wild, and bloodshot. On the bare floor he was lying: the mattress, blankets, and pillow had been tossed aside. Great runnels of hot dirty sweat trickled across his temples and splashed to the floor boards, whence rose a thin thread of steam.

The landlady looked at his eyes, and fled the room terrified. A few minutes passed and she returned accompanied by a white-coated student. In silence and with every care they tried to get him back into bed. He resisted them: he shouted, kicked, and threw off again the pillow they had placed under his head. So they tied his body and legs in the bedding; then they left the room.

For several minutes Bromley lay still uttering incoherent groans. Suddenly he sat up, shook himself, and placed his elbows on a chair beside him. With a great effort he succeeded in standing to his full height, dragging with him the blankets, mattress, and pillow which were tied to him. He took a step forward, panted, and stood still. He seemed to be listening for something, and his face shone with the gleam of happy madness.

The hot rays of the spring sunshine had set the bees in a flutter and were calling them out of doors. They buzzed feverishly in their hives and crowded in and out through the hole in the window. Listening to the familiar happy sound, Bromley, hobbled like a horse, tottered to greet them, his face glowing with joy.

Standing there in the sunshine he once again resembled a Greek god. Tall and defiant, his copper-coloured hair shining like an aureole round his head, his body swathed in steam from the feverish sweat: the picture was of a divine being hovering in the clouds.

But a weight on his back and on his legs, an insupportable weight, anchored him to the earth and made him powerless. With growing irritation he shook himself, he threatened some invisible enemy with his bony fists, then, with the violence of despair, tried to throw off his ridiculous bonds, a pillow, a mattress, and a quilt. For a moment his arms thrashed like flails, then slowly grew feeble, and his strength ebbed never to rise again.

The famished bees, now four days without food, crept for the thousandth time sadly, hopefully, and uselessly along their empty feeding-trough. Then they dragged themselves across the floor towards their master, and there they stood perplexed in front of his cold and glazing eyes.

WITHOUT CHERRY BLOSSOM

IT SEEMS as if there never had been so magnificent a spring before.
But, dear Verusha, I feel sad.

Sad, ill, as if I'd done something rather second-rate. . . .

I've a bottle with a broken neck in my window at the hostel, and a broken withered little branch of bird cherry in it. I brought it home last night. . . .
And when I look at that bottle, somehow I want to cry.

I'll be brave and tell you all. I lately made the acquaintance of a comrade from another faculty. I am far removed from sentiment of any kind, as he would say; far from bemoaning lost innocence, and even further from any gnawing of conscience over my first "fall." But there is something that rubs me up the wrong way, not clear, confused, ever present.

I'll tell you later, with "shameless" frankness, how it all happened. But first of all I would like to put some questions to you.

When you and Paul were united, for the first time, didn't you wish that the day of your first love might be to you a sort of festival day, somehow or other different from the everyday?

For instance, would it have seemed humiliating to you, on that spring festival day of your life, to go out of doors in dirty boots, or to wear a torn or soiled blouse?

I ask you because all my acquaintances, the folk of my own age, look on the matter differently. I do not seem to have sufficient pluck to think and act just as I feel.

It needs a good deal of effort to go against the accepted opinion of those among whom one lives.

With us the accepted attitude towards the beautiful is one of youthful disdain, and it is the same with regard to any daintiness or correctness of attire or fastidiousness in the home.

Our hostel is all dirt, filth, disorder, tumbled beds. Cigarette ends on the window ledges, flimsy partitions between the cubicles all covered with torn placards and advertisements. There is not one of us who tries to beautify his dwelling, and as there is a rumour that we are going to be transferred to another building, the students are even more careless than they would be ordinarily, and frequently do deliberate damage to the place.

It is as if there were someone or other before whom we are ashamed to be seen occupying ourselves with such trifles as a clean and beautiful room and healthy fresh air in it. It is not because we have serious business on hand and no time, but because we feel obliged to despise everything connected with care for beauty.

That is the more strange because we all know that the powers that be, our poverty-stricken proletarian powers, spend a vast amount of money and energy simply to make everything beautiful, putting flower-gardens all over the place, the like of which was unknown under the old régime of squires and capitalists, though they prided themselves on their love of an elegant, beautiful life. All Moscow gleams with stucco, and our university, which stood a hundred years looking like a tumble-down police station, has now been converted into the most beautiful building in Moscow.

And we . . . feel an involuntary pride in the fact that it is so beautiful. But for all that, our own life inside these walls, purified by our new government, our own life is dominated by filth and disorder.

All the girls and our men-comrades behave as if they were afraid of being accused of delicacy and good manners. They deliberately cultivate a coarse and debauched way of talking and slap one another on the hips. And when they refer to sex they make use of the most coarse expressions, the most disgusting street slang.

The most abominable epithets have with us full civic rights. And when some of our girls, I will not say all, a few, feel mortified, something even worse sets in. The rest try to accustom them "to the mother tongue."

Cynicism, the tone of coarse debauch and the trampling underfoot of all fastidiousness alone have success. Perhaps it is because we are a poverty-stricken lot, and having nothing to spend on dress, we just spit upon the whole business or like to pretend that we do. Or it may be that we think of ourselves as the soldiers of the revolution, for whom naturally sentimental notions and fastidiousness have no place. But if we are soldiers of the revolution we ought somehow to take an example from the power we have set up, and strive for beauty in life not simply for the sake of the beautiful, but for the sake of cleanliness and health. For that reason it seems about time that we decided to give up this exaggerated, over-emphasised barracks style.

But, you know, the majority like it. To say nothing of our men, our girls like it; it gives them more freedom and demands little exercise of will on their part.

But this neglect of the beautiful, the pure and the healthy leads to an appalling hooliganism in our intimate relationships. It begets a coarseness, a lack of ceremony, a fear of showing the least human delicacy of feeling or of sensibility or care towards one's woman friend or any of the girls.

It all comes from the fear of infringing the unwritten moral code.

Things are different with you at the academy. I am sometimes sorry that I entered the university. My mother, who is a village midwife, looks up to me with a sort of pious respect as to a higher being, but I often wonder what she would think if she saw the filth in which we live and heard the latest bad language that we habitually use.

For us love does not exist; we have only sexual relationships. And so, love is scornfully relegated to the realm of "psychology," and our right to existence is only understood physiologically.

The girls live with their men friends, and it is a small matter to go with them for a week or a month, or promiscuously, for one night only. And anyone who is trying to find in love anything beyond the physiological is laughed down as mental or a bad case.

II

What does he think he is? An ordinary student in high boots and a blue blouse unbuttoned at the neck. He always pushes back his untidy locks from his brow with his hands.

His eyes attracted me. When he is by himself and is walking along the corridors one feels a great seriousness and calm in his eyes.

But directly he fell in with any of his fellow-students he became, it seemed to me, exaggeratedly noisy, loose and coarse. The girls inspired him with self-confidence because he was handsome, the men because he was clever. He seemed to be afraid to lose the sort of leadership which he had.

I saw two men in him, one possessing a good deal of inner strength and seriousness of mind, the other a vulgar wag who irritated you by the way he had of showing off and impressing others with the appearance of being very coarse, much more coarse than, in fact, he is.

Yesterday at sunset we went out for the first time together. Evening stillness had settled on the city and the street noises were subdued. The air was fresh and there was a pleasant odour of the damp earth coming from the squares.

"Come along to my place, I don't live far from here," said he.

"No, I'm not coming."

"What's that? Etiquette?"

"It's not etiquette at all. That, in the first place. In the second place, it's very pleasant out of doors at the moment."

He shrugged his shoulders.

We walked along the quay and stood for a while at the drawbridge. A girl came selling branches of bird cherry blossom. I bought a spray of it and had to wait a long while for my change. He stood to one side, looking at me and frowning slightly.

"Can't you get on without cherry blossom?"

"I can. But it's better with cherry blossom than without."

"I manage always without cherry blossom, and somehow it does not turn out badly," said he, grinning unpleasantly.

Two girls were ahead of us. A whole crowd of students were mauling them, and when they tore themselves away the students burst into fits of laughter, stared after the girls and called out things after them.

"They've put the girls in a bad temper. Went to them without cherry blossom, and the girls took fright," said my companion.

"Why do you dislike cherry blossom so much?" I asked.

"Well, it all ends the same way, cherry blossom or no cherry blossom. . . . Why mince matters?"

"You speak in that way because you have never loved."

"Why is that necessary?"

"Then what is there in a woman for you?"

"Oh, drop this Chinese ceremoniousness and call me thou, don't call me you! As for woman, there is something there for me, and I dare say it amounts to a good deal."

"I shan't call you you. If everyone uses thou there is no pleasure in it."

We passed some lilac bushes. I stopped a moment to pin the cherry blossom to my blouse. He made a sudden movement, pushed back my head and tried to kiss me.

I pushed him back.

"Don't want to; all right, don't!" said he calmly.

"I don't want it. As you don't love anyone, it's all the same to you what woman you kiss. If instead of me it had been someone else, you'd have wanted to kiss her just the same."

"Quite right. A woman also kisses whom she wants to, and does not confine herself to one. We had a little beano lately, and the fiancée of a friend of mine who was there kissed me with as much gusto as she did him. And if it had been someone else near her, she'd have done the same by him. And that couple are marrying for love at the registration office and the rest of it."

I was annoyed in the depths of myself when I heard him speak thus. I had fancied that he was not entirely indifferent to me. How many times had he sought my glance even when I was in a dense crowd of other students! And why should he spoil this delightful spring evening with licentious and coarse ideas, when one craved tenderness and quiet conversation?

I hated him at that moment. We were passing a bench on which a lady of a kind was sitting. She wore silk stockings and her legs were crossed above the knees. She raised her eyes whenever anyone went by.

My companion stared fixedly at her. And having gone on a few steps he turned round and stared at her again. I felt as if I had been stung.

"Let's sit down here," said he at the next bench. He wanted to sit down there so that he could continue to stare at her.

All at once I felt so upset that I felt I might begin to cry. Fearing lest I should break down, I told him I did not want to be with him any longer and said good-bye.

He was taken aback, and evidently bewildered.

"Why?" he asked. "Don't you like me to be sincere? Would it be better if I dressed my ideas up and lied?"

"I'm sorry you do not possess anything that does not need to be dressed up."

"Well, what are you going to do about it?" said he, as if not at first grasping what I meant. "In that case I'll be going also. Good-bye." He held my hand in his for a moment. "Only it's foolish, it's foolish," he repeated, and threw my hand down and strode away towards his home.

I also was taken by surprise. I did not think that he would go away.

I stopped on the corner of the boulevard and looked round. It was one of those May nights when you feel that the life encompassing you is for that night only and never to be repeated. The moon, with wisps of cloud about her, stood on high in a warm, cloudy yellow haze. The far-distant sunset tones were lost behind the roofs of many houses and the Kremlin towers. And the infrequent street lights were dimmed by the moonlight.

And there were gay crowds of young men and girls in the brightly lighted square in front of the cathedral, and loving couples on the garden seats under low-branching, close-cropped trees and lilac bushes.

There was a murmur of light conversation and laughter; one saw the glowing ends of cigarettes. Everyone seemed affected, intoxicated by the awakening warmth of the night and eager not to lose a moment of it.

But when such a night strikes no chord in your soul, when you are lonely and miserable and have no companion, you feel very sad, you could not feel worse.

A few moments earlier I had been indifferent whether he was with me or not. But the thought of his staring at that woman on the bench preyed on my mind. I felt a tearful anxiety, and I weakened to such an extent that I wanted nothing else in the world but that he should be with me.

In a word—don't condemn me—I could not bear to be like one who has been expelled from the glad company, thrown out from the choir, this spring festival night.

And without considering what it might mean, I retraced my steps and hurried towards his house.

III

There was but one thought in my head: he might have gone out, I might be late, I might remain solitary. And then I reproached myself for breaking away from him so ridiculously without making the slightest effort to bring out the good side of his character.

I reflected that in this I had behaved in just the same way as those who shrug their shoulders at unpleasant conditions and do nothing to better them. It meant that I wanted to get something better without any expense of energy on my part.

I went under the gateway of the old stone house and felt the strange contrast of the air of the warm May night out of doors and the cold reek of unheated walls.

There are still many entrances like this in Moscow, with unwashed doors and rags of old advertisements hanging from them, filthy outer stairways scribbled over and unswept.

He didn't at all expect to see me again. Apparently he was about to sit down to work. There was a slight table that looked like a plasterer's trestles set up against one of the walls. An electric lamp bulb hung on a cord from the ceiling, but had been pulled over to the table and was fixed there by a nail.

"So, the heroine has returned!" he exclaimed. "Evidently thought better of it. So much the better."

He came up to me grinning and took me by the arm. Perhaps he was going to kiss me or stroke me, but he did neither.

"I was sorry we quarrelled and I wanted to put it right," said I.

"What was there to put right? Wait a moment, I'll put a notice on the door that I'm not at home. Otherwise someone may come."

He wrote out the notice, standing at the table, and then went out with it. Alone in the room, I had a look round.

This room of his had the same general character as that staircase. The walls were scrawled with telephone numbers; cigarette ends and scraps of paper littered the unswept floor. There was a tumbled, unmade bed alongside one of the walls, just as in one of our rooms at the hostel; dirty dishes on the window-ledge, empty bottles, butter-paper, egg-shells, cans.

I felt somewhat embarrassed and could not think what I would say to him when he came back. It would not be very wise to be silent, as that might be construed to mean something quite different.

Then it occurred to me to ask myself why he had gone out to fix that notice on the door. What if someone did come?

Suddenly I understood, and at the thought I went dizzy and caught my breath. With a beating heart I went to the window-ledge, having the intention of clearing away the bottle and cigarette boxes to make a place to sit down. I saw that my hand trembled. All the same I did clear the ledge and lay down on it on my stomach.

I had never felt before such an agitated tension of expectation as I did as I lay there listening for what might happen behind my back.

My only regret was that the best minutes of my life and happiness, perhaps of my first day of love, must be accomplished in the midst of the leavings of yesterday's food in this bespattered, dirty room.

That was why, when he came back into the room, I suggested we go out for some fresh air.

An expression of surprise and vexation flitted across his face.

"Why?" he asked. "Haven't you just come from out there?"

Then his voice changed.

"I've fixed it so that nobody is likely to disturb us. Don't talk nonsense. I'm not going to let you out anywhere now," said he hurriedly.

"I don't like being here."

"Ah, beginning all that over again . . ." said he crossly. "What's the matter? Where do you want to go to?"

His speech was choking and rapid, and his hands trembled when he thought to restrain me from going.

My hands also trembled, and my heart beat so violently it was dark before my eyes. A conflict was raging in my mind, the mood of surrender, the feeling that no one would disturb us, and the mood of protest, engendered by his thievish hurried whispering, his greedy haste and the loss of his calm and self-restraint. He seemed to have only one thing at heart, to succeed before any of his comrades burst in upon him. He showed impatience and irritation at the slightest show of resistance on my part.

We women even in free love cannot look too squarely at the actual Fact. For us the fact is always at the end of the chapter, while at the beginning we are charmed by the man himself, his mind, his talents, his soul, his tenderness. We always begin by desiring something other than physical union. When this other desire has not been satisfied and a woman falls a victim to the momentary impulse of her senses, she experiences a disgust with herself instead of a fullness and happiness. She becomes hostile to the man as towards an accomplice in her fall, as towards a gross being who has forced her to have disagreeable and abominable sensations.

The unmade bed, those egg-shells in the window, the dirt, his furtive glances, and the feeling that things were not going the way they should, had already discountenanced me.

"I can't remain!" I exclaimed, almost in tears.

"Now what's the matter? Don't you like the furniture? Not enough poetry in it? But I'm not some baron . . ." he cried with ill-concealed vexation.

I suppose the expression on my face changed at his shouting, for, as if anxious to undo the impression he might have made by these words, he began to calm me in hurried whispers.

"That's all right, dear, stop . . . it's quite true someone might come in."

I ought most certainly to have gone away then. But the fact of being alone with him there enkindled such sheer desire in me as in him. I chose to deceive myself and stayed on in the false expectation that something would intervene. . . .

"Wait, I'll make some poetry for you," said he, and turned out the light.

That was better truly, for one did not see the dirty bed nor the bottles nor the cigarette ends on the floor.

I stood at the window with my back to him. He came up behind me and put an arm round my neck while I remained looking out at the window. I could not see the expression of his face, but I was grateful to him for that embrace. I would have liked to stand there for a long, long while.

But his impatience got the better of him. He kept thinking that his comrades might come in. "How long will you stand there?" he asked, leading me away from the window with his arm.

When we got up he first of all turned on the light.

"Oh, I don't want any light," I cried in misery and alarm.

He looked at me with astonishment, and shrugging his shoulders, turned the light out again. Then he went back to the bed and began to tidy it.

"I must put my room-mate's bed straight, otherwise Vanya'll guess right away that I've had a lady in the room," said he.

He was fussing around the bed and was on all-fours on the floor, evidently looking for something. I was left alone. Presently he came up to me. Almost against my will I gave a deep sigh and turned my head round to see him. I was struggling with all my strength to overcome my feelings. He stretched out a hand.

"There," said he, "your hairpins. I crawled and crawled about the floor. Why must you be absolutely without light? You'd better be off now or somebody will be along. I'll see you out by the back way. The front door will be shut now."

We did not say a word to one another, and somehow seemed to be avoiding one another's eyes.

When I got into the street I walked some way mechanically, without a thought. Then suddenly I felt something metallic in my hand and I shuddered, remembering that it was the hairpins which he had put in my palm. I even stood and gazed at them. They were certainly hairpins, nothing more or less.

Still holding them in my hand, I staggered home. I still had that spray of crumpled blossom on my blouse, and it hung loose like a rag.

And the same wonderful night held sway over the town. The moon stood high over the masses of buildings, and the little clouds were like curling smoke. The same vague, misty horizon lay far away over the city.

And there was the same aroma of apple blossom, bird cherry and grass. . . .

IN THE TOWN OF BERDICHEV

IT WAS STRANGE to see Vavilova's dark weather-beaten face turn red.

'What are you laughing at?' she said at last. 'Don't be silly.'

Koziriov took a paper from the table, looked at it and, shaking his head, burst out laughing again.

'Oh, I can't help it,' he said laughing, '... report ... of the Commissar of the first battalion ... forty days' leave because of pregnancy.'

He became serious.

'Well, all right. But who will take your place? Perelmutter, of the political section?'

'Perelmutter is a staunch Communist,' said Vavilova.

'You're all staunch,' remarked Koziriov, and, lowering his voice, as though he were talking about something shameful, asked:

'Are you going to have the baby soon, Claudia?'

'Yes, soon,' answered Vavilova and, taking off her fur cap, wiped the perspiration off her forehead.

'I would have got rid of it,' she said in a bass voice. 'But I waited too long: you know yourself that at Groubeshov I never got off my horse for three months. And when I went to the hospital the doctor refused to do it.'

The corners of her lips drooped as though she were going to cry.

'I even threatened the damned fellow with my Mauser, but he refused—he said it was too late.'

She went out, and Koziriov remained sitting at the table and looking at the report.

'So this is Vavilova,' thought he. 'Nothing very womanish about her—carries a Mauser, wears leather breeches, has led her battalion in the attack any number of times, and even her voice is not a woman's—yet Nature must tell in the end, apparently.'

And for some reason he was resentful and felt a little sad.

On the report he wrote 'Order,' and waving his nib hesitatingly over the paper, sat frowning—how should he word it?

'Leave of forty days to be given from this day': he pondered a little and added 'On account of illness,' then above that scribbled in 'woman's illness,' swore to himself, and crossed out 'woman's illness.'

'Now make soldiers of them!' he said, and called his orderly.

'Our Vavilova, eh?' he said loudly and angrily. 'You've heard, I suppose?'

'Yes, I've heard,' answered the orderly, and shaking his head spat on the ground.

Together they condemned Vavilova and all women generally, made a few jokes, laughed, and then Koziriov ordered him to fetch the Staff Commander and said:

'You must go and see her—tomorrow, I should say; find out whether she is in a private house or in hospital, and how she's getting on.'

Then he and the Staff Commander hung over the table till next morning, their fingers moving over the map, speaking in short abrupt sentences—the Poles were approaching.

Vavilova went to live in a room requisitioned for her.

The little house stood in the Yatki, as the market-place was called, and belonged to Chaim Abraham Leibovich Magazannik, whom the neighbours and even his own wife called Chaim Tuter, which means Tartar.

Vavilova's entry into the house was not effected without a scandal. She was brought to the house by an employee of the communal department, a thin lad in a leather jacket and Red Army helmet. Magazannik swore at him in Jewish: the youth was silent and shrugged his shoulders.

Then Magazannik went over to the Russian language.

'What impudence these whipper-snappers have,' he shouted to Vavilova, as though he expected her to share his indignation. 'That's all they could think of. Of course, there are no bourgeois in the town. There's only one room left for the Soviet, and that one belongs to the poor man Magazannik. Only from a working-man with seven children can they take a room. What about Litvak the grocer? And Khodorov the clothier? And Ashkenazi, the leading millionaire in the town?'

Around him stood Magazannik's children, seven ragged curly-pated angels gazing at Vavilova with their coal-black eyes. As big as a house, she was twice as tall as their father. They thought it all terribly funny and very interesting.

Finally Magazannik was pushed aside, and Vavilova passed into her room.

Such a concentrated smell of human beings coming from the sideboard, the flat feather beds which were as dark and flabby as the breasts of the old women who had once received those feather beds as part of their dowry, and the chairs with their gaping seats, assailed her nostrils, that she took a deep breath as though she were going to plunge into deep water.

At night she could not sleep. The Magazannik family snored on the other side of the wall like an orchestra composed of many instruments, from the droning double-bass to the high flutes and violins. The closeness of the summer night, the heavy smells—everything seemed to suffocate her.

What smells there were in the room!

Of kerosene, of garlic, of perspiration, of goose dripping, of unwashed linen. The odours of the human animal.

She felt her swollen dilated belly; at times the living being within her kicked and turned round.

For months she had struggled with it, honestly and persistently: sprung heavily from her horse; at 'Subotniks'<sup>1</sup> in the towns, silent and strenuous, she rolled about pine blocks weighing many poods; drank herbs and infusions in the villages; used up so much of the iodine belonging to the regimental chemical stores that the surgeon thought of sending a complaint to the sanitary department of the brigade; scalded herself with boiling water in the bath-house until she was covered with blisters.

But it obstinately went on growing, preventing her from walking and from riding; she suffered from nausea, vomited, and was drawn down to the earth.

At first she laid all the blame on that sad and ever-silent man who had been stronger than herself, and had found a way through her thick leather jacket and cloth tunic to her woman's heart. She saw how he was the first to run on the little wooden bridge which was so terrible in its simplicity, how the enemy's machine-gun crackled, and how he seemed to vanish: the empty greatcoat threw its arms up and falling, hung over the brook.

She flew past him on her ardent little horse and the battalion, as though it were pushing her, poured after her.

After this it remained. It was to blame for everything. And now Vavilova lay conquered, and it victoriously kicked her with its heels, and lived in her.

In the morning, when Magazannik was getting ready to go to work, and his wife was giving him breakfast, driving away flies, children, and the cat, he said, speaking in a low voice and glancing at the wall of the requisitioned room:

'Give her some tea, a plague on her.'

He basked in the sunlit columns of dust, the smells, the children's cries, the cat's miaowing, the grumbling of the samovar. He did not feel like going to the workshop: he loved his wife, his children, his old mother, and he loved his home.

He went away sighing, and in the house only women and children remained.

The Yatki market-place seethed the whole day long. Peasants were selling birchwood, white as though it had been chalked all over; peasant-women were rustling their wreaths of onions; old Jewish women sat over fluffy hills made of geese with their legs tied together. Out of this luxuriant white flower the goose-seller would pull out a living petal with a sinuous neck and her customers would blow on the tender fluff between its legs and feel the yellow fat under the soft warm skin.

Dark-legged girls in coloured kerchiefs carried tall red pots full to the brim with wild strawberries, and timidly, as though they were going to run away, looked at their customers. Moist yellow lumps of butter wrapped in downy leaves of green burdock were being sold from carts.

A blind beggar, with the white beard of a wizard, wept tragically and as though in prayer as he held out his hand, but his terrible grief touched no one: everybody passed him with indifference. A peasant-woman tore the smallest onion off her wreath and threw it into the old man's iron basin. He felt it all over, and leaving off his prayers, said angrily:

'May your children provide for you like this in your old age,' and once again started crooning his prayer, the prayer which was as ancient as the Jewish people.

People were selling, buying, touching, feeling, raising their eyes thoughtfully to the heavens as though they expected somebody in the tender blue sky to advise them whether they should buy a pike or whether it were better to buy a carp. Meanwhile everybody went on making a deafening noise, swearing, abusing each other, and laughing.

Vavilova tidied up and swept the room. She put away her greatcoat, fur cap, and boots. Her head was bursting from the street noises. The little Tutors were making a noise inside the house, and she seemed to be asleep and having an unpleasant strange dream.

When Magazannik came in the evening after work, he stood amazed in the doorway: at the table sat his wife Beila and by her side sat a huge woman in a wide dress, with loose slippers on her bare feet, and a bright kerchief tied round her head; they were laughing together softly, talking to each other, and holding up tiny toy-like baby clothes in their big fat hands.

In the day-time Beila had gone into Vavilova's room. Vavilova was standing by the window, and Beila's sharp woman's eye saw her condition.

'I beg your pardon,' said Beila with determination, 'but you're pregnant.'

And Beila, throwing up her hands, laughing and lamenting, started fussing round her.

'Yes,' said she. 'Children—you don't know yet what a misfortune they are,' and she pressed and squeezed the youngest Tuter against her bosom. 'They're such a misfortune, such a calamity, such a nuisance. Every day they want to eat, and not one week passes but one has a rash, or another the fever, or another an abscess. And Doctor Baraban, God bless him, takes ten pounds of the best rye flour for every visit.'

She stroked little Sonia's head.

'And they're all alive—I haven't lost one.'

She discovered that Vavilova knew nothing, did not know how to do anything, and understood nothing. She bent down immediately before Beila's great knowledge. She listened to Beila and asked her questions, and Beila, laughing with pleasure at the Commissar's knowing nothing, told her about everything.

How to feed and bath the baby and put him to sleep, what must be done to prevent his crying at night, how many napkins and shirts one must have, how new-born babies scream themselves hoarse, turn blue, and it seems as though one's heart must stop beating for fear that the baby may die, how to cure diarrhoea, what causes the itch, how the spoon suddenly begins to make a noise in the baby's mouth and by that you can tell that he is beginning to cut his teeth.

A complicated world with its own laws, customs, joys, and sorrows.

Vavilova knew nothing of this world. And Beila condescendingly, like an elder sister, introduced her to it.

'Get out of the way,' she screamed at the children, 'out into the yard!' And when only the two of them were left in the room, Beila, her voice lowered to a whisper, started telling her about the confinement. O, this was not a simple thing. Like an old soldier, Beila told the young recruit about the great pangs and joys of childbirth.

'Giving birth to children,' said she, 'you think is a simple matter, like a war: bang-bang and it's all over; oh no, by no means, it's not nearly as simple.'

Vavilova listened to her. For the first time, during the whole of her pregnancy, she had met a person who spoke about this accidental and unpleasant thing which had overtaken her as a happy event which would be the most important and necessary occurrence in Vavilova's life.

And in the evening the discussion was continued this time with Tuter participating. No time was to be lost: after supper Tuter took a candle and climbed up to the attic and making a great din, dragged down an iron cradle and a bath for the new human being.

'Don't worry, Comrade Commissar,' he said laughingly, his eyes sparkling. 'Our business, which you are taking on, is in full swing.'

'Be quiet, be quiet, you rascal,' uttered his wife. 'It's not for nothing that people call you the Tartar.'

At night Vavilova lay in her bed. The heavy smells no longer oppressed her as they had done the night before. She had become used to them, and did not even notice them. She did not want to think about anything.

She seemed to hear horses neighing somewhere, and to see a long line of brown horses' heads: each had a white patch on the forehead. The heads were incessantly moving, nodding, and baring their teeth. She thought about the battalion, and remembered Kirpichov, the political instructor of the second company. All was quiet on the Front. Who was lecturing about the July days? The surveyor must be rated soundly for having delayed the arrival of the boots. And then they could cut up cloth themselves for puttees. In the second company there were a good many dissatisfied men, especially that curly-headed fellow who sang songs of the Don. Vavilova yawned and closed her eyes. The battalion went away far far into the distance, into the pink corridor of the dawn, between the wet stacks of snow. And her thoughts about it were somehow unreal.

It pushed her impatiently with its little heels. Vavilova opened her eyes and sat up in bed.

'A girl or a boy?' she asked aloud. And she suddenly felt how the heart in her bosom became big and warm and began to throb.

'A girl or a boy?'

The confinement began in the day-time.

'Oh!' screamed Vavilova hoarsely, woman-like, as she felt a sharp, all-penetrating pain seize her suddenly.

Beila put her to bed. Sioma ran gaily for the midwife.

Vavilova held Beila's hand and said quietly and rapidly:

'It's begun, Beila, and I thought it would start only in ten days. It's begun, Beila.'

Then the pains passed away, and to Vavilova it seemed that they need not have sent so quickly for the midwife.

But half an hour later the pains started again. Vavilova's face turned quite dark and the sunburn on it looked dead: as though it had been laid on by accident. Vavilova lay with clenched teeth; she looked as if she were thinking of something shameful and painful, as if she were about to jump up and cry 'What have I done, what have I done?' as she covered her face with her hands in despair.

The children were peeping into the room, the blind grandmother was heating a large saucepan of water on the stove. Beila kept looking at the door: the expression of anguish on Vavilova's face frightened her. At last the midwife came. Her name was Rosalia Samoilovna. Her hair was cut short and she was stocky and red-faced. The house was immediately filled with her querulous penetrating voice. She scolded Beila, the children, and the old grandmother. Everybody started running around her. The primus stove in the kitchen started humming. The table and chairs were taken out of the room; Beila washed the floor with as much haste as though she were putting out a fire; Rosalia Samoilovna herself drove the flies away with a towel. Vavilova watched her and it seemed to her as though the Commander of the army had arrived at Staff Headquarters. He was also stocky, red-faced, and querulous, and he used to come when something had gone wrong at the Front, and everybody would read the communiqués and look at each other and whisper, as though a dead or dangerously sick man lay there. And the Commander would brutally tear aside this veil of mystery and silence—shouting, abusing, giving orders and laughing, as though baggage trains cut off and regiments surrounded by the enemy were none of his business.

She submitted to Rosalia Samoilovna's dictatorial voice, answered her questions, turned round, and did everything she ordered her to do. At times she seemed to be losing consciousness; the walls and ceiling seemed to lose their sharpness of surface and outline, to be breaking and falling on her in waves. The midwife's loud voice would bring her to herself again and she could see her red perspiring face and the white tail-ends of the kerchief round her neck. She thought of nothing now. She wanted to howl like a wild beast and to bite the pillow. Her bones seemed to crack and to break, and the clammy sickening perspiration stood out in drops on her forehead. She did not scream, however, but only ground her teeth and, convulsively tossing her head about from side to side, gulped in the air.

Now and again the pains left her as though she had never had any, and in astonishment she would look about her, listen to the noise of the market, and gaze with wonder at the glass on the stool and the picture on the wall.

But when the child, furious in his desire to live, started tearing at her again, she felt the horror of the renewed pangs and a confused feeling of joy: let it be as soon as possible—after all it was inevitable.

Rosalia Samoilovna said in a low voice to Beila:

'If you think that I should have liked to have my first child at thirty-six, you're mistaken, Beila.'

Vavilova did not hear her words, but she felt frightened because the midwife had spoken in a low voice.

'What, shan't I live?' she asked.

She did not catch Rosalia Samoilovna's answer.

Beila stood in the door pale and flustered, and said, shrugging her shoulders:

'Well, well. And who wants this torture—neither she, nor the child, nor the father, may he perish, nor God in Heaven. Who was the clever person who invented it for our misfortune?'

The confinement lasted for many hours.

When Magazannik came home he sat on the steps outside. He was as worried as though it was his Beila who was in childbirth. The twilight deepened, and the windows were lit up. Jews were returning from synagogue, carrying their prayer clothes under their arm. In the moonlight the empty Yatki market-place, the little houses, and the streets seemed picturesque and mysterious. Cavalry-men in riding-breeches marched about the brick pavements clinking their spurs. Girls were eating sunflower seeds and laughing at the Red Army men. One of them was saying in a quick patter:

'And I eat sweets and throw the papers at him, and I eat and throw the papers at him.'

'Ay,' said Magazannik, 'we didn't have enough troubles of our own, but the whole Partisan Brigade must come and be confined in my house.' Suddenly he began to listen intently and half rose from where he was sitting. From behind the door he heard a man's hoarse voice.

The voice was shouting such violent obscene oaths that Magazannik, after listening for a while, shook his head and spat on the ground: it was Vavilova, mad with pain in the final phase of labour, fighting with God, with woman's cursed lot.

'That I understand,' said Magazannik, 'that I understand: a Commissar is having a baby; while Beila can only say one thing "Oh mother, oh mother?"'

Rosalia Samoilovna slapped the new-born baby on his wrinkled damp buttocks and announced:

'A boy!'

'What did I say!' exclaimed Beila triumphantly, and opening the door, cried out exultantly:

'Chaim, children, a boy!'

And the whole family clustered in the doorway and talked excitedly to Beila. Even the blind grandmother felt her way to her son and smiled at the great miracle. She moved her lips, her head trembled, her dead hands felt their way over her black kerchief. She was smiling and whispering silently. The children pushed her away from the door but she stretched out her neck and tried to get in: she wanted to hear the voice of ever-triumphant life.

Vavilova looked at the new-born child. She was surprised that such an insignificant bit of reddish-blue flesh could have caused such terrible suffering.

She had imagined that her child would be big, freckly, and snub-nosed, with a bristling red head, and that he would immediately start fighting and kicking, crying loudly, and trying to get away. But he was a weak little fellow, like an oat-stem grown up in a cellar; he could not keep his little head up; his small crooked legs moved about as though they were dried up; his whitish-blue eyes were blind; and his whimper could hardly be heard. It seemed as though, if the door were suddenly opened, he would be extinguished like the thin bent candle that Beila had fastened to the edge of the cupboard.

And although it was like a hot-house in the room, she stretched out her arms and said:

'He is cold: give him to me.'

The little man whimpered, moving his head about. Vavilova was afraid to move, but she looked at him sideways and watched his movements.

'Eat, eat, little son,' she said, and began to cry.

'Sonny, sonny,' she murmured, and one by one the tears fell from her eyes, and the transparent drops ran down her dark cheeks and over the pillow.

She remembered the silent man, and felt pity for them both with a sharp maternal pang. For the first time she wept for him who was killed in the battle at Korosten: for he would never see his son.

And this tiny helpless creature was born without his father, and she covered him up with her blanket so that he should not feel cold.

But perhaps she was crying for quite a different reason. At any rate Rosalia Samoilovna, smoking a cigarette and sending the smoke through the open window-pane, said:

'Let her cry, let her cry. That calms the nerves better than bromide. My patients always cry after childbirth.'

On the third day after the baby was born, Vavilova got up. Her strength returned to her rapidly: she walked about a great deal, and helped Beila in the house. When no one was at home she would sing softly to the little man: the little man was called Aliosha, Alioshenka.

'You ought to see,' Beila said to her husband, 'this Russian woman is quite mad. She has already been three times to the doctor with him. The door mustn't be opened in the house, because he might catch cold, or be woken up, or he's feverish. In fact, she's just like a good Jewish mother.'

'Well, why not?' answered Magazannik. 'If a woman puts on leather breeches do you think she turns into a man?' And he shrugged his shoulders and closed his eyes.

A week later Koziriov and the chief of staff came to see Vavilova. They smelt of leather, tobacco, and horse sweat. Aliosha was asleep in his cradle, which was covered by a piece of muslin to protect him from the flies. Creaking in a most deafening manner, like two new boots, they went up to the cradle and looked at the thin little face of the sleeping child. His face was twitching in his sleep: the twitching was due only to movements of the skin, but these movements gave the face various expressions—sometimes of melancholy, sometimes of anger, and sometimes a smile.

The two commanders exchanged a look.

'Yes,' said Koziriov.

'Yes, indeed,' said the Chief of Staff.

Then they sat down and started telling Vavilova the latest news. The Poles had taken the offensive, and our forces were retreating. Of course this was temporary. The fourteenth army was rallying at Zhmerinka. Divisions were approaching from the Urals. The Ukraine would be ours. In a month's time a change would probably take place. But meanwhile the Poles were making themselves unpleasant.

Koziriov uttered an oath.

'Shut up,' said Vavilova. 'Don't make such a noise—you'll wake him.'

'Yes, our blood is always up,' said the Chief of Staff, and burst out laughing.

'You're always ready with your jokes,' said Vavilova and added with the air of a martyr: 'You might leave off smoking too: you're smoking like a chimney.'

The two army men suddenly felt bored. Koziriov yawned. The Chief of Staff looked at his watch and said:

'We mustn't be late at Lissaya Gora.'

'And his watch is a gold one,' she thought to herself with exasperation.

'Well, good-bye, Claudia,' said Koziriov, and got up. 'I've ordered them to send you a sack of flour, some sugar and fat: they'll bring it to you to-day in a trap.'

They went out into the street. The little Magazanniks stood round the horses. Koziriov climbed into the saddle with a groan. The Chief of Staff clicked with his tongue and jumped on his horse as it was moving.

When they came to the corner, they both unexpectedly, as though by common consent, drew in their reins and stopped.

'Yes,' said Koziriov.

'Yes, indeed,' answered his chief. They laughed, struck their horses, and galloped to Lissaya Gora.

The trap arrived that evening. Magazannik dragged in the sacks of food, and going into Vavilova's room, said in a mysterious whisper:

'What do you think of this news, Comrade Vavilova: Tsesarsky's brother-in-law came to our workshop—,' he looked about him, as though he were excusing himself before Vavilova, and said in a surprised tone of voice:

'The Poles are in Choudnov, and Choudnov is forty versts away from here.'

Beila came into the room. She listened for a while, and then said with determination:

'What's the use of talking? The Poles will be here to-morrow. So I want to tell you this. Poles, Austrians, Galicians, whoever they are, you can remain with us. You have been sent enough food, thank God, to last you three months.'

Vavilova was silent. For the first time in her life she did not know what to do.

'Beila,' she said, and stopped.

'I'm not afraid,' said Beila, 'do you think I'm afraid? Give me five like them, and I'll not be afraid. But have you ever seen a mother who left her child when he was a week and a half old?'

All night long outside the windows there could be heard the neighing of horses, the rumbling of wheels, and excited angry voices. Baggage trains were going from Shepetovka to Kazatin.

Vavilova sat by the cradle. The child was asleep. She looked at the little yellow face, and thought to herself that after all nothing special would happen, Koziriov said that they would return in a month's time. Just as long as she had intended to be on leave. But if she were cut off for longer? Even that did not worry her.

When Aliosha became a little stronger, they would make their way through the front.

Who would touch them—a peasant-woman and a baby-in-arms? And Vavilova pictured how one early summer morning she would cross the fields, a coloured kerchief round her head, with Aliosha in her arms, gazing around him and holding out his little arms. How delightful! She started singing in a thin voice:

'Sleep, sonny, sleep,' and rocking the cradle, fell into a doze.

In the morning the market was busy as usual. People seemed particularly excited that day. Some were watching the unending chain of military carts and laughing happily. But soon the baggage train had passed. The streets were full of people. The inhabitants—'the population,' as the commandants called them in their orders, stood at the gates. Everybody was talking in an excited whisper and looking over his shoulder. It was said that the Poles had already occupied the small town of Piatka, fifteen versts away. Magazannik did not go to work. He sat in Vavilova's room and philosophized to his heart's content.

An armoured car thundered past in the direction of the railway station: it was thickly covered with dust and it seemed as though the steel had become tarnished as a result of weariness and many sleepless nights.

'I'll tell you the truth,' said Magazannik, 'this is the best time for people: one rule has gone, and the other hasn't come yet. No requisitions, no contributions, no pogroms.'

'It's only in the daytime that he's so clever,' said Beila. 'But when at night the whole town is in a hubbub, shrieking for help from the bandits, he sits as pale as death and trembles with fear.'

'Don't keep on interrupting,' said Magazannik, angrily.

He kept running out into the street and returning with the latest news. The Revolutionary Committee had already evacuated the town during the night, the Party Committee had followed it, and the staff had left in the morning. The station was already empty. The last division had gone.

Suddenly cries were heard in the street. An aeroplane was in sight. Vavilova went to the window. Although the aeroplane was flying high, white and red circles on the wings could be seen distinctly. It was a Polish observation aeroplane. The machine made a circle over the town and then flew towards the station. Guns began to be heard booming from the direction of Lissaya Gora: shells flew over the town, and from somewhere in the distance, beyond the level crossing, came the sound of exploding missiles.

First the shells wailed like the wind, then the guns sighed heavily, and a few seconds later the explosions rang out joyously. The Bolsheviks were hindering the advance of the Poles. Soon the Poles started replying: shells burst in different parts of the town.

Bang! went the exploding air with a deafening roar; bricks fell and scattered, smoke and dust hung over the shattered walls of houses. Silence descended on the streets, severe and deserted, as in a picture. Each explosion was followed by such quiet that the hearts of the inhabitants were struck with terror. And all the time the sun shone in the cloudless sky and radiantly lit up the town which lay prostrate beneath it like a corpse.

The whole town lay hidden in cellars and basements, sighed and groaned with terror, shut its eyes, and held its breath without knowing why.

Everybody, even the children, knew that this bombardment was called artillery preparation, and that before entering the town, the troops would send out a few more dozen shells. And then everybody knew it would become incredibly quiet and that suddenly, their horses' hoofs ringing, a reconnoitring party would gallop along the wide street from the direction of the level crossing. And then, dying of fear and curiosity, everybody would peep from behind their doors, curtains, and cracks in the shutters, and covered with perspiration, would come out on tip-toe into the street.

A detachment would arrive in the square. The horses would stoop and snort; their riders would talk excitedly to each other in a marvellously simple human tongue, and the Commander, delighted at the total submission of the prostrate conquered town, would shout in a drunken voice, discharge his revolver into the muzzle of silence, and draw up his horse.

And then from every direction infantry and cavalry would pour in; dusty tired men, thrifty peasants in blue greatcoats, good-natured but capable of murder, would run about from house to house, searching greedily for the population's chickens, towels and boots.

Everyone knew this, because the town had changed hands fourteen times already, had been occupied by Petlura, Denikin, the Bolsheviks, Galicians, Poles, Tutunik's, and Maroussia's bands, and 'nobody's' Ninth Regiment. And each time it was the same as before.

'They're singing!' cried Magazannik. 'They're singing!'

And forgetting his fear, he ran out into the street. Vavilova followed him.

After the stuffiness of the dark room Vavilova breathed the light and warmth of the summer day with particular pleasure. She had awaited the Poles with much the same feeling as she had experienced during her confinement: let them come quickly. The explosions had frightened her: she was afraid that they would waken Aliosha; she brushed aside the whistle of the shells as she would have brushed aside flies.

'Be quiet, be quiet,' she sang over the cradle. 'You'll wake Aliosha.'

She had tried not to think about anything just then. She had made up her mind already: in a month's time either the Bolsheviks would return or she and the baby would make their way to them through the Front.

'I can't understand anything,' said Magazannik. 'Have a look.'

Marching along the wide and empty street in the direction of the level crossing, from which the Poles were to have come, was a detachment of military cadets. They were dressed in white canvas trousers and tunics.

'May the Red Flag be the symbol of the working people,' they sang slowly as if sadly.

They were marching towards the Poles.

Why? For what reason?

Vavilova watched them. And suddenly she remembered: the great Red Square, several thousand volunteers of the working-classes who were going to the front thronging round a hastily set-up wooden platform. A bald man, waving his cap, was making a speech. Vavilova stood quite near him.

She was so agitated that she could not understand half the words the man was saying in his clear though slightly guttural voice. The people standing near her listened to him and breathed heavily. An old man in a wadded coat for some reason or other was weeping.

What had happened to her in the square, under the dark walls, she did not know. Once in the night she had wanted to tell that silent man about it. She thought he would understand. But she was unable to explain anything. But when they marched from the square to the Briansk railway station, they sang that song.

And as she watched the faces of these singing cadets, she again felt what she had felt two years ago.

Now in the street Magazannik saw a woman in a fur hat and greatcoat following the cadets and fitting an iron ring into her big tarnished Mauser as she went.

Magazannik followed her with his eyes and said:

'These were the sort of people who used to be in the Bund. These are real people, Beila. Are we real people? We're just scum.'

Aliosha had woken up and was crying and trying to kick off his napkin. Coming to herself, Beila said to her husband:

'Listen, the baby is awake. You had better light the primus—I must heat up some milk.'

The detachment disappeared round the corner.

HUNGER

LITTLE CLUSTERS OF MILLET grew here and there. Their long, dry stalks gave the plants the look of open scissors. They lay heeled over under the stress of drought and wind with their bare roots showing. Though maimed they still wanted to live and drag out a wretched existence on the black, parched earth. When the late June rain came and washed down their dusty stalks, they recovered a little and reared themselves obliquely in the air without the strength to stand upright. Their stalks sprawled piteously in all directions and produced frail, thin blossoms—and died, scorched up by the heat.

The oats were thin and scanty and after pushing up their sharp blades in early spring had stopped growing. The haulm grew pale and wrinkled and changed by degrees into dry and prickly straw. Only a very few stalks formed ears, and in these the grain had no time to ripen and the husks were empty.

Barley had come up here and there. Its thin, beardless ears contained nothing but withered, shrunk seeds.

The twining bean vines bore thin, flat pods and curled about one another in a tangle. A solitary, belated dark red blossom opened here and there beneath its pale pink hood. They unfolded feebly and slowly while a corrosive rust covered them by degrees.

Blue campanulas and weeds of all sorts decked out the breathless fields for an hour or two in the early morning. Wild flax embraced the flowering stalks in a death-grapple and both died a common death.

Happy families of wild dill flowered in the morning, round caps on their heads. Towards midday the wind blew their caps off and the cheery white-headed companies perished.

Hot winds blew at midday—whirling, tousle-headed horrors. They reared up and chased over the fields like wild, runaway horses with flowing tails and greedily licked up the dust. Lambs fell down dead. The herds of cattle stood all day long in the dried-up lakes and then crept slowly back up the naked, trodden hills.

II

First Jemeljan's cow, Burjonushka, fell helplessly to the ground. Her nostrils were dirty and choked with dust. They got her on to the middle of the road, bound her sprawling legs with ropes and so dragged her home to the village. She did not bellow nor make any resistance. She lay despondently where she was with her small head turned to one side. Only her stricken eyes were glazed in the agony of death. At home Annushka and her three children cried over her; grandfather Vassili gave a sad little cough and tapped the dead beast's flanks with his stick. Jemeljan was whetting a knife. When they laid out the emaciated, red-haired carcase to drag it behind the barn for the dogs to devour, Jemeljan suddenly said to grandfather:

"Father, cut her belly open."

Grandfather Vassili understood. He rolled up the sleeves of his linen shirt and thrust his arm as high as the shoulder into the belly when he had cut it open. He drew out the empty guts, cut out lungs, heart, liver and kidneys and laid them all out carefully on the straw. Jemeljan hacked Burjonka's rump into small pieces and put the pieces in a barrel and threw the lungs, heart and liver, all gory as they were, into the kitchen where his wife was standing.

"Cook that!"

Burjonka's hide was hung up in the cart-shed. The dog licked up the blood. When they sat at table round a dish of Burjonka's flesh, not a sound was made and not a word was spoken. Not one made a face or mentioned that Burjonka had been slaughtered after she was dead. There was no bread on the table. The children looked at their father, who sat in this unwonted silence with a stern frown on his face. Grandfather Vassili suddenly began to cough and let his spoon drop. A little piece of Burjonka had stuck in his throat. He got up from the table before the end of the meal. His legs went weak and his heart thumped. He wanted to go out, but before he reached the threshold he had to put both hands over his mouth to keep it shut. As though joking or up to some mischief, he bent over a broken jar and shook his head.

"Go outside!"

He too got up without finishing his supper. Anna spat secretly under the bench. That night she talked to her little one in its cradle:

"Die now, Petjenka. Cow gone. Milk all gone. How am I going to feed you?"

Jemeljan could not sleep. He sat for a long time on the edge of the bed, with sunken head and eyes tight shut, and saw famine as it slowly approached. It came without haste, long arms outstretched. The circle closed in, the misery that stalked them grew ever nearer. Jemeljan sat enclosed within this circle and did not know what to do, whither to go or to whom to bend the knee.

III

In the morning grandfather Vassili went into the fields. He went in a long linen smock without a cap and hit at the hard clods with his stick. The path cracked in deep cracks. The squirrels whistled monotonously. Green, large-headed locusts with round blind eyes fell at his feet like dry rain. The old man turned to pluck some tiny ears of barley and rubbed them in his palm and felt for the grain. He stood looking at the oats for a long time, and then tortured with anxiety he shook his head:

Death!

IV

A week later a linen bag with two shoulder straps was stitched together for him, and Jemeljan said in a low voice without looking his father in the face:

"Father, you must go begging!"

Grandfather Vassili cut himself a stick to keep off the dogs and shod it with an iron tip and began practising: "Help—there is no other help for us . . ." His voice trembled. Tears dimmed his eyes. When Jemeljan and his wife were out of the house he sat by the fire against the chimney and droned sadly and monotonously the beggars' chant:

"There is no other help for us . . ."

He got nothing in his own village. He had to set off for Smolnoje. It was a hot, still morning. Light puffs of cloud which the wind had not yet scattered, hung high overhead. There was the fragrance of early morning coolness in the air. When he had climbed the hill beyond the village he took off his old cap and looked joyfully up at the clouds: perhaps it would rain. All alone among the fields he raised his shame-faced moan:

"For there's no other help for us——"

Chanted and wept.

The sun rose. The clouds melted away. Grandfather, bent with care, swallowed the dust of the road which the wind blew in his face. He did not reach Smolnoje. He sat down in the middle of the road and crossed himself in terror. He put his cap under his head and spread out his sack. A long-legged fly jumped onto his face. A squirrel whistled close to his ear. There was a pungent smell of camomile. Turning his head an inch or so he said in a low voice:

"Death has overtaken me. I can go no farther."

He plucked a dusty stalk of grass, chewed it and spat. He said nothing but only thought:

"Glad to chew grass like a cow."

At midday Jemeljan came along with a cart. Grandfather lay in the middle of the road as Burjonka had. Shod in bast shoes, he lay with his legs splayed out in mute and melancholy resignation. The horse kept stopping every moment, his head between his knees. It seemed an almost hopeless task to get the old man home. Jemeljan walked beside the shaft trying not to think and seeing all the time the long bony arms outstretched to throttle him.

The children lay about at home with swollen limbs. Their mother wept at the sight of them and sat by the empty hearth.

The old man was laid in the passage and covered with a skin. When he saw the stern frown on his son's face he whispered hurriedly:

"Don't be angry, my son. I'll soon be dead."

v

In August the two Lugin brothers left the village. They slaughtered two cows, made two waggons, covered them with cow hides and loaded up their children, their rags and gear of all sorts. The waggons set off at night through the warm, steamy meadows and to the music of prattling children made for the distant places where bread was still to be had.

Jemeljan made a plan. The old man and two of the children had to die. The third child might be got into an orphanage. He would build a waggon, cover it over with Burjonka's hide and flee with his wife from the long outstretched arms. He weighed this plan in his mind for long, as a good father of a family should, and came back always to the same conclusion.

"There's nothing else for it."

He hid his agony of mind. It tugged at his heart and hammered in his temples in short, dull throbs. Jemeljan clenched his teeth and waited for the death of three people and looked at them with angry, longing eyes.

Grandfather still did not die.

They carried him from the passage into the yard, from the yard onto the stove, and back into the passage. They dragged him to and fro like an old rotten log, but he only groaned and huddled himself together. Jemeljan took hold of his swollen legs and when he felt their gruesome deathly chill he rejoiced that his miseries were drawing to an end. Yet the old man opened his heavy eyelids and painfully muttered with black, decayed lips:

"I'm still alive."

Petka lay in his cradle like a corpse dug up out of the grave. Hunger hollowed his eyes and bared ribs as frail and soft as a newly born lamb's. There was nothing left of him but his head on the thin, wobbling neck and his little arms and legs. He did not cry. He only rattled in his throat, gave spasmodic jerks and opened his large famished mouth. Mishka and Serjoshka lay on the floor beside the bed with swollen bellies, incapable of movement. Anna fed them on grass and baked cakes of clay mixed with clover.

Jemeljan repaired the waggon. He made new axles and an awning of Burjonka's hide. It looked like a little house without windows. It was time to be off before winter came.

Pavel Mitrochin joined him in the yard one night and sat on the axle as though at a funeral—no smile on his face.

"Where are you off to?"

"Somewhere or other."

They were silent for a long time.

"Where's there to go?"

"Perhaps I'll get to Siberia."

"You'll never get as far. We'd better go and steal."

Jemeljan shook his head.

"How can I steal? My eyes would betray me."

"Then—die."

Again they said nothing for a long time.

VI

Grandfather died on Friday evening. They carried him to the grave-yard on Saturday. They did not even make a coffin for him. They dug a large, roomy grave, big enough for three.

Jemeljan remembered that two more of his family were due to die soon. He was happier when he left the grave-yard.

"Thank God for that!"

When he got home, Anna took him out to the shed where the horse was dying. It lay on its left side with its neck stretched out, feebly kicking and looking at his master and mistress with wide eyes that understood. Jemeljan knelt down and clasped its head in both hands and burst into tears.

"What are you doing to me?"

VII

That night there was horse-flesh to cook. Jemeljan sat on the bed with reddened, baffled eyes and clenched teeth.

"Where can we go on foot?"

Jelisarov came in with an earthenware plate in his hand and fell on his knees.

"Give me a bone. I'm finished."

They sat him down at the table. He couldn't get his spoon to his mouth without spilling it. He cried and whimpered and then put out his tongue and lapped from the plate like a dog. Then he crawled to the stove.

"Where are you going, Grandfather?"

The old man's eyes went green. He opened his mouth and showed his large, broad teeth.

"I'll stay here. I'll lie here a bit."

"Are you quite crazy?"

"Yes, yes, I'll stay here. I get nothing to eat at home."

VIII

Pavel Mitrochin came into the yard that night and stood for a long time at the window, looking in. He retreated a few steps, returned and fingered the latch of the door.

"Jemeljan, Jemeljan, I'm going to rob you."

It was dark in the passage. The floor cracked softly under his feet. Unseen arms groped after him from every side. Eyes peered from every corner. His feet got entangled in unseen ropes. The pail he overturned in the corner made a clatter. Anna whispered in terror:

"A thief!"

Jemeljan seized an axe and ran out.

"Who's there?"

There was not a sound in the passage. A low moon looked in at the open door. The waggon stood ready in the yard, covered over with Burjonka's hide. The little horns stood out stark in the moonlight. The tail hung behind.

Anna screamed from the passage.

"We've been robbed!"

Jemeljan's mind was a blank. He stood by the waggon, axe in hand, and felt that a whirlwind carried him aloft, that he flew on wings of rage and torment and despair. He did not know whither he flew. Black specks were in front of his eyes. Someone gave him a merciless whack on the side of the head.

IX

Next morning he complained to Pavel: "I've been robbed. On top of all else."

Pavel said grimly:

"I'd have murdered the man."

"Yes, if I could catch him."

"Yes, that's the difficulty."

They said nothing for a long time after this.

"What are we to do to live, Pavel?"

"I'm going to take my boy to the town."

"What's the good of that?"

"I'll leave him there. He'll be fed there."

"Will anyone take him in, then?"

"What else can I do?"

A glimmer of hope. Jemeljan went in.

"Anna, children are given something to eat in the town. I'll take one of ours there."

"And if nobody'll take him?"

"What else can we do? The horse-flesh is nearly finished."

Anna began to cry.

"Which of them?"

"Mishka. I couldn't get Serjoshka so far. Petka will die in any case, perhaps. When I get home again I'll make a little two-wheeled cart."

Mishka was seized with a fit of shivers as Jemeljan's sombre eyes rested on him.

"Little Father, don't take me to the town."

"How can I find food for you here?"

"I won't eat any more. Not another mouthful!"

Jemeljan tried to persuade him:

"You are little, Mishka, you're not old enough to understand. I don't do it of my own free will. Silly child! I have nothing to give you to eat. The cow has been eaten. The horse is nearly eaten up too. What are we to do next? It isn't so bad in the town. You'll be kept alive there. If you miss us we'll come and see you. You needn't be afraid of the town."

Jemeljan sat on the floor and his eyes were kindly and full of sorrow. The children lay beside him. He told them about starvation striding from village to village and about the great town with great houses and his heart warmed with joy. Petka was certain to die. Mishka would find a refuge in the town. He and Anna would put Serjoshka in a little two-wheeled cart and set off, all three, to find a place where there was bread. If Serjoshka could not last out, he would just have to die. The cart would be all the lighter to push without him.

Mishka was shod with Grandfather's bast shoes and Grandfather's cap was pulled down over his head. He stood in the middle of the room, small and listless, with legs thickly wrapped about, and gazed apathetically at his father.

Anna burst into tears.

"Mishenka, son of my heart!"

Jemeljan besought her:

"Don't, Anna. It's bad enough as it is."

When it was time to go, Mishka suddenly sat down on the floor.

"Little Father, don't send me away to the town!"

Pavel came in with a stout stick in his hand.

"Come along. Let's be off!"

Pavel's wife, her eyes dark and sunken, stood in the doorway, looking at her Wolodjka, who was quite wasted away. He tottered, licked his parched, bloodless lips and coughed like an old man.

A huge cloud blew up from the west. Another crept up from the north. Between them there was an arch of clear sky into which puffs of cloud drifted. There was still this green clearing in the sky, but the cloud in the west was piling up slowly. A wind sprang up and soon the cloud filled all the horizon. A few drops pattered down like dried peas. The untrammelled wind of the steppes arose in its might. Jemeljan and Pavel walked on under the great cloud into the darkness and the children staggered after. Mishka was always behind, crying silently. Not a village nor any habitation was to be seen. Only bare fields and the black cloud. Wolodjka clutched his chest.

"Father, stop!"

"What's the matter now?"

"I can't go any farther."

Pavel took a long look at Wolodjka's blackened lips and his sharp famished nose and took him on his back.

"Hold on tight."

Jemeljan encouraged Mishka to keep going.

"Don't hurry. We'll go as slow as you like. We'll eat something at the station. Then the train will come and we'll set off. There's nothing to be afraid of. Are your feet tired?"

"Tired."

"Never mind, Mishka, never mind. Patience, little son!"

The water tower of the wayside station came into sight. The smoke of a passing train streamed past. Mishka cried bitterly.

"I can't go another step."

"Right. Then we'll have a rest. Pavel, wait a bit!"

Mitrochin answered grimly.

"We'll miss the train."

"Get up, Mishka. We'll go on slowly."

Mishka kept repeating piteously:

"I can't go another step."

Jemeljan screamed fiercely at him:

"Oh, hell! Then I'll leave you behind!"

As Pavel had done, he took his son on his back and in a daze plodded on with bent head. Like a horse with a heavy load he plodded on over the slippery, sun-baked earth.

XI

Children, abandoned like stray dogs to their fate, wandered the length of the train. Women lay about in the last stages of exhaustion. The dying gazed out from beneath coarse sheeting. Tears and groans and a cold wind. The devil was regaling himself as never before. Prayers and curses, love and hate, hope and despair—all mixed up together. A peasant, whose face was blotched and black, said:

"I run with death on my heels. We had a black cat. We've eaten it now."

"Eaten it?"

"To the last bone. There's a howling in your ears if you go out into the road—many have gone out of their minds. A neighbour of mine—a little girl of his died—he dragged her body into the cellar and hacked it in pieces with a hatchet."

"He did?"

"Yes, like an ox."

A woman wailed.

"I've been to the town too, been to the town too. And there's nothing, nothing, nothing."

"Is there no food to be had there?"

"Nothing, nothing, nothing, nothing. I put my child down and went away. Put it down and went away. Hid behind a house to see what would happen. Went back. There it lay in its swaddling clothes, looking at me. I picked it up. It was dead."

XII

Jemeljan had no strength left. He set Mishka down in a corner in the station and gave him a bit of horse-flesh. Mishka did not eat it. He licked it, smelt it, rolled it into a ball. Wolodjka lay huddled beside him.

"Mishka, blow on me!"

"Are you cold?"

"I'm hungry!"

"Take a bite! Here!"

"I'll eat it all!"

"Not all. Father'll be cross."

Jemeljan stood near the telegraph office. A long white strip crept on endlessly and just such a long white strip was wound up in his head.

"The train will be here soon."

"They won't take us on board."

"We'll try hard!"

"It's just as bad in the town."

"It's only fools say so. If no one will take the children in, we'll leave them somewhere. It's better than having them under your eyes."

Jemeljan was grieved for Mishka. He was like a nail in his heart. It would hurt to pull it out. And yet it had to be pulled out. Jemeljan lay down. He was done for. His bones were water. His head reeled. He was weary. He put his arm round Mishka and covered him with the flap of his coat.

"Asleep, Mishka?"

"I feel so bad!"

"We'll go to sleep. The train will be here soon."

XIII

The train was late. Pavel gave Jemeljan a shake. Jemeljan looked at him with weak and failing eyes and said after thinking it over:

"I'm dying, brother. I can do no more."

"You'll soon come round."

"No. Take Mishka with you."

"What shall I do with him?"

"Put him in a home for children."

"Can't. My own boy is like a knife in my throat."

XIV

Jemeljan lay for three days in the little station. Mishka went from coach to coach along the train. His eyes were dry, his voice too was gone. He could scarcely stretch out his hands or open his gaping, ghastly mouth.

"Little uncle!"

A wind blew. Rain fell. Jemeljan lay there with black and swollen face. In the peace and relief of delirium he talked to Anna:

"Don't cry. I shan't die. What are you crying for?"

He waited long for Mishka. He groped about him with his hands. For brief intervals he opened his eyes. Mishka did not come. Early one morning he crept out of the station building. Somebody shouted:

"Where are you off to, peasant?"

Jemeljan did not hear. He crept on to the track, sat there for a while and then lay down on his face. The engine whistled shrilly. Anna came to him, the three children too: Mishka, Serjoshka, Petka. Jemeljan pressed them feebly to his warm and throbbing heart and thought tenderly:

"Now we're there."

AND THEN CAME the autumn twilight, bringing to the earth the silence that pervades a room before one goes to sleep. The train travelled through the quiet, rustling the leaves. Now and then small stations, dimly lighted, halted its progress for a few minutes. All at once the Shaturka power-station came into view, its round lights reflected in the artificially raised water. Full of energy, steel masts marched off into the horizon with powerful strides. Their strong legs did not know what it was to be tired.

Evgenia Bart, newspaper woman, was reclining on the upper berth of an old-fashioned car that belonged to the naïve times when there was as yet no division into compartments. In its youth this railway car had shone brightly; illuminated with thick candles, it coursed along the main lines. But now it lumbered slowly on the Kazan railroad, the worst of all lines. Clean and proper like elderly people, garrulous and good-natured, with a woman conductor to tend it like a nurse, it carried engineers and technicians to the different plants and construction enterprises.

Evgenia lay silent. From time to time she said aloud: "But what of it!", or "Well, well, well," or "Now, for a smoke."

She took out a match-box in which green matches with yellow heads huddled together like birds, and she smiled to think how nice they looked. She read the inscription on the box and burst out laughing at the blithe ring of the Latin word.<sup>1</sup>

An elderly engineer, who was sitting below, looked up at her. He did not approve of women smoking, travelling alone, and laughing for no apparent reason.

Genya now stared out of the window and now peered down into the car. Outside, night was coming on. The wind, blowing over the earth, caused the little stations to tremble. From her upper berth Genya could see how heads were beginning to grow bald; but their owners were happily ignorant of it.

"It's now seven o'clock. Soon I'll be seeing Shirokov," she said to herself. "But what of it? I'm only going for a couple of days. I'm a journalist by profession, and I'm going to see the new plant on the Oka where Shirokov is chief engineer. I've been following up the plant and that's why I'm going. And now for a smoke."

Meanwhile the conversation in the lower berths was about bridges and viaducts, about the overflowing of the rivers in spring, when in the city one can see wooden pavements swelling and floating, and, in the country, the willows wear a silver sheen and brooks mirror the turbulent flight of the clouds.

They spoke about ice floes and ice blockages, about their importance for the life of bridges, about the professional conceit of one well-known diver who despised all other trades but was willing to concede that an aviator might be worthy of a diver's friendship.

"One of the intelligentsia, I suppose," said a young electrician.

But the elderly engineer resented this insult and took up the cudgels on behalf of the diver. "That's not so, young man. Diver Brichkin was no intellectual in the rotten sense in which you understand the word. But he was a romantic. Oh, I see you're smiling. Let me tell you, I feel sorry for you all. To surround the work one loves with a pedestal, to raise it on a halo . . ."

"The other way about," they corrected him.

"That's unimportant. That isn't the point. What I'm driving at is that you're incapable of the ardour and the enthusiasm with which we worked, each on his own hook, instead of hiding behind the backs of the brigade. With what ardour and enthusiasm I worked, building my first bridge over the river Dymka!"

Genya pictured the young engineer to herself as a young toreador advancing to meet a bull in the form of the bridge. She had a journalist's quick imagination.

"We were like this both in our work and in our private life," continued the engineer, giving a sharp glance at Genya. "In love we were like the knights of olden times. I remember that once in Persia I rode a horse to death just in order to bring a girl a bouquet."

"You, riding a horse like that," his companions said. "Your name should be put on the blackboard."

But the engineer paid no heed. He flew away at top speed on his Persian steed into the land of past memories. He recalled the quiet provinces covered with a cloth of snow. Winter with the sun, newly burnished, on the horizon. What warm-skinned women awaited there the builders of bridges! What tenderness was in their eyes! Women's charm then was an object of love but now it perishes without attention. Formerly there were engineers, but now there is the I. T. R. (Engineering and Technical Workers). Now romance is a thing of the past. Is there even one person sitting here, he asked, who can appreciate the length of a woman's eyelashes, the swan-like warmth of honey locks or the colour of a woman's cheeks like the colour and the odour of a rose?

At this stage a woman conductor, encased in straps and smelling like a hospital ward, traversed the length of the car with a lantern in her hands.

"The old man is right," Genya mused, "to the extent that this is not an epoch of laughing dimples. The old regime exploited feminine beauty, but we do not. What we need is a good brain, and we are quite indifferent as to the outer shape of the brain box. What we need is keen eyes—who stops to think of the colour of these eyes? And as for these I.T.R.ites—oh, how well I know this martial crew. You won't find your I.T.R.ites studying the length of a woman's eyelashes. Your I.T.R.ite is often brusque and sometimes goes about unshaved. He won't call a woman 'ducky' or 'love.' He'll call her by some other name, sometimes a really terrible name."

Genya recalled one of Shirokov's few letters. "Good old Bullard," wrote Shirokov. "The factory and I are looking forward to you. Come quick."

Eager to discover the meaning of this funny-sounding word, Genya asked an old friend of hers, also an I.T.R.ite, who told her, "A Bullard is a huge six-spindle semi-automatic verticle boring mill."

Forty minutes late, Genya jumped from the car on to the low, wet ground.

The station stood solitary. The living quarters of the plant's workers were not far distant. Genya was encompassed by this strange night filled with the barking of dogs, lighted up with a few lone lamps, so unlike night in great cities, and her heart beat much faster than newspaper women's hearts are supposed to do.

She saw Shirokov. He advanced to meet her, wearing a dogskin coat and Wellington boots. Beneath his cap glittered two Tartar eyes. His face was wreathed in smiles. He was happy and couldn't conceal it.

"So there you are," he said. "Come along. I have a horse waiting. I'm straight from the plant and have had no time to shave. So you'll excuse me, Bullard, won't you?"

They sat in the droshky. An almost-Persian steed drove them recklessly over the unpaved ground full of bottomless puddles. Small houses flew by on both sides. An occasional lantern lit their way.

"Put on speed, Nikifor," shouted Shirokov. "Give our Moscow friend an exhibition of first-class horsemanship."

"For beating the horse, you should be put up on the blackboard," Bullard laughed. She was happy and couldn't conceal it.

"We have the evening to ourselves," Shirokov said, covering Genya with the bottom of his dogskin coat. "You're not cold, are you? To-morrow I'll show you the forge we're building. One hundred and twenty metres long and forty-five metres wide. Quite a large forge. You're not hot, are you? Only somehow we can't put the workers' dining-hall in order. That's my big trouble. By the way, what colour eyes have you, Bullard? I once knew but I've forgotten."

"Hazel, according to a rough estimate, but that's unimportant. It isn't eyes that decide things now . . ."

Just then the right side of the droshky flew upwards like the wing of an airplane, and the left one plunged into the water. Their faces were spattered with mud and their feet all at once were soaked.

"Ai, ai, ai, what's wrong?" asked Bullard.

"The trace broke. There's your 'ai, ai, ai,' for you," answered Shirokov.

The rest of the way the droshky drove smoothly. Shirokov chaffed Nikifor, the plant's driver, about the puddles: "After this I won't be able to bear the sight of you any more. You almost killed our Moscow friend. You're no longer my friend, or a shock-worker. A shock-driver ought to know the road like his own boots—every hole by heart. But you!"

"Yes, I, Peter Efimovitch, I know it by day. But nights . . ."

"Shut up, who stuck up for you when you got dead drunk? Who but I? And you?"

"I'll make up for this wrong I've done you. I'll do something for you too. Really, I promise you."

"The trace broke. Ho, ho, ho. It won't be an easy job making up for such a grievous wrong," said Bullard.

"Never mind, I'll make up for it," Nikifor answered.

Genya and Shirokov climbed up to the second story. The pinewood house, where the I.T.R.ites dwelt, had been built only recently. Warm and cozy like a bed in winter, it smelt like a pine forest and clung to the fingers. From behind one of the walls could be heard a German lullaby. The singer was a Bavarian woman who had come out here with her husband. She was singing her little I.T.R.ite to sleep in its native language, worrying whether he had a fever or had caught cold.

Shirokov and Genya were met by the bashful Vasunin, Shirokov's assistant. The whole evening he had fussed with the samovar, worrying whether it had a fever or had caught cold. And the grateful samovar had gurgled in its native language.

A severe masculine cleanliness ruled the apartment of the Chief Engineer and his assistants. Over the sofa hung the plan of the plant, white on blue. The future forge stood out, ready for the workmen to enter. The plant builders, present and future, were working at top speed, fulfilling the production plan. The workers' dining-hall, spick-and-span as a laboratory, warmed one's heart. The workers thronged into it merrily, carefully wiping their boots at the entrance, and not a single swear word hung in the well-ventilated air. Everything was in its place. Everything ran smoothly.

"How quiet it is," said Bullard, while being shown over the apartment. "No visitors, no telephone going. Just to think of Moscow at this time!"

At this stage there was a knock at the hall door and Vasunin went to open it.

Left alone with Bullard, Shirokov did something that was beneath the dignity of an I.T.R.ite. He took one of Bullard's hands and pressed it to his unshaved cheek.

"Well, come to-morrow," Vasunin was saying in the entry. "Peter Efimovitch is busy just now. He's taking a rest. He has someone to see him. Surely you understand . . . Sh, sh," said Vasunin.

"It's all right, I'm not making a noise. Maybe she's asleep now, dozing you know, for all I can tell. It would be good to try her again. Maybe she'd consent."

"Sh, sh," Vasunin repeated, and from his voice it was clear that he glanced toward the door.

"The beauty of the district, I'm telling you," Nikifor hissed. "And you know what a large district ours is. Such eyes, Sergei Sergeivich, they're beyond words. They reach my very heart. Such shoulders—Oh, boy!"

Nikifor apparently was showing what kind of shoulders she had because something fell down from the hall rack.

Genya looked at Shirokov. He screwed up his eyes and his nostrils distended. Unthinking, he had continued to hold Genya's hand in his. Suddenly he placed it on the table and made a bee-line for the entry.

"Such breasts," Nikifor said at the top of his voice. "She weighs every bit of a hundred kilos. I know his taste all right. Skin like kid."

"Is that you, Peter?" said Vasunin, "I just wanted . . ."

But Shirokov wouldn't listen to him.

"Bring her here, Nikifor," he said. "Hold on there, though, I must have a shave first, otherwise she'll think I'm too rough. Where's our foreign soap? Hold on there. First of all bring me some candy. What's her name, Nikifor?"

"Kovrova Stepanida," Nikifor sang gently.

"And her patronymic?"

"Egorovna," cooed Nikifor.

"Calm, absolutely calm," Bullard reassured herself. "Nothing terrible has happened. A mere misunderstanding. His taste is a hundred kilos and I weigh only forty-five. Who could have foreseen this? To-morrow I leave for Moscow and I shall have forgotten about it the day after."

But in thinking with what difficulty she had squeezed out these two days, these two valuable evenings, Bullard understood that she would not forget it so soon. In order not to hear Shirokov say: "How do you do, my darling," Genya put on the earphones and heard Lenski sing from Moscow: "How long, my foes, has thirst of blood us parted."<sup>2</sup>

"No, not long ago. Only just now," Bullard answered. She covered her face with her hands.

Thus the time passed.

Shirokov entered the room with the air of a conqueror.

"What a Jane!" he exclaimed, drinking down the glass of cold tea in one gulp. "I have been dreaming of such a Jane for half a year. What shoulders. What . . ."

Bullard, all pale, advanced to meet him. "You're rotten, Mister I. T. R.," she said.

"Oh!" said Shirokov.

"You've rotted into your constituent elements: cynicism, profligacy and a cold disregard of human beings. Where's my hat?"

"Oh," said Shirokov. He pressed his lips tightly. Bullard became silent. Her heart froze. Shirokov paced the room and stopped in front of the plan.

"Just try to imagine a seasonal worker going into the dining-hall for the first time," he said. "He finds the floor dirty, the tablecloth sticky and the air greasy. This often happens. The waitress combs her hair with the spoon as she hands him the shchi. To make things worse, Bullard, this seasonal worker chances to see in the kitchen window the leading personage of the place. He sees the cook. And then, Bullard, it becomes clear to the seasonal worker that she, this thin, weak-willed woman with a running nose, is the cause of all the gloom, contamination and dirt. So our seasonal worker, with his mental waverings, pictures himself back on his farm, sitting in the glow of the stove. As a result, his work on the job suffers, and the job, mind you, is no easy one. Then the chief engineer, whose eyes must be all-seeing, takes note of the poor work. He puts himself in the place of the seasonal worker, traversing all his daily paths until he comes to the cook. He sees that what is needed is a jolly, broadshouldered, tidy and skillful woman. He seeks out this woman. He searches high and low for her and at last he finds her, my darling Bullard."

Bullard looked at Shirokov and her heart warmed. Shirokov smiled. His Tartar eyes glistened. He was terribly happy and couldn't conceal it.

EARTH ON THE HANDS

IN SUMMER, when the first days of June have come, if you live in a country town in Russia, you must open the windows first thing in the morning, to let the soft June wind blow through the rooms. Then they will be filled with coolness and the green light from the limes and maples. The wild vine on the terrace smothers the gold of day in its greenery. On such days man and earth are one.

It was on just such a morning that a man sat at his writing table in the corner by the open window opposite the terrace door, buried in his papers and his thoughts, while his wife grubbed about in the golden light of morning in the flower beds among the lilacs. Every now and then she came back onto the terrace, with a scarf round her neck and her hands held away from her body in case she dirtied her dress. Rare, rare and precious, is the joy of being bound in friendship with the earth . . . ! Rare, rare and precious, is the joy of a marriage fortified with love and confidence and loyalty. This joy of friendship, trust and love and fellowship in work, was at home in that house. It is to be found only among people of cultured minds and interests—and these two were good, simple, industrious people:

he was a writer on sociological subjects and she a painter. They had met when he was over thirty-five and she over thirty.

There is nothing like turning over the soil for healthful exercise of the muscles, planting out tobacco and mignonette in the beds and weeding as you go; it is wonderful to think as you bend over the earth that what you plant will thrive and grow. Her husband had been at work on the beds with her before sitting down to his books. Once he got down to them at his desk the familiar trains of thought came back—figures, comparisons, quotations, arguments and formulas. Now work began in earnest and the hours when the eyes of learned men and artists are utterly absent-minded, indifferent and blind to the world that lies outside their books.

While he was in this state of trance Andreieva became aware of a stranger coming through the gate into the courtyard. He was wearing a wide-brimmed hat and carrying a small bag. The intruder came up to the window and said he wanted Anna Andreieva. Without raising his eyes from the paper her husband replied that she was in the garden.

He had no idea how many minutes had gone by when his wife came in through the terrace door, her hands covered with earth, accompanied by the stranger. He did not see his wife's face.

The stranger bowed and said: "If you don't mind I would like to have a few more minutes alone with Anna."

And Anna said: "Yes, I'm taking Sergei into my room, Paul."

Again he did not see his wife's face and again minutes passed during which his eyes saw nothing of the world except the world in his books. Anna came back out of her room. Paul raised vacant eyes and noticed that his wife's hands—covered with earth as before—hung down helplessly and that her eyes were full of helplessness. Paul came back to reality.

Then the stranger began speaking. Anna was standing in the terrace door with her back to them both—the gold light of day touched the edges of the vine and her shoulders.

"Paul Andreievitch," the stranger said and then made a long pause. "Paul Andreievitch, we are no thieves—you and I. It's simply my feelings as a human being." He paused again to collect his thoughts. "I have not seen Anna for thirteen years—but for all these thirteen years I have been dreaming of her and thinking of her. You know that I parted from her in Paris and went as a Russian to fight on the French front. You know that Anna lived with me in her youth—but you know, too, that Anna has nothing to reproach herself with on that account and that you cannot reproach her either. The world is large enough to lose one's way in. I have come back to Anna, and now you two have been married for eight years. We are all getting on in life. I did not know that Anna was married."

Paul saw before him the man whose memory their marriage had kept sacred—Anna's first husband, a man worthy of esteem. An old man now, grey-haired, an artist; in other days when Anna was a girl he had taught her the art of painting and the value of life. The old man's eyes were honest and good; they looked at Paul kindly and disconcertedly. They could not have looked at him in any other way, for in the room was the only woman he loved and if his eyes were good so was he. Paul reflected that he too was grey, grey before his time, aged by the years of the Russian upheavals, and that his eyes too were good and disarmed by a natural goodness of heart.

Two men, the one very like the other, for it was not for nothing that Anna loved them both, confronted each other. Paul remembered Anna's descriptions of Sergei as a young and good-looking artist, warmhearted, brilliant and alive. And the picture she had drawn of him got mixed up with the picture of the man before him, an old man with kindly and tired eyes. A man who had come back out of the jaws of death.

"How you have altered, Sergei—Sergei Ivanovitch," Paul said absently.

The two men smiled, almost unconsciously. Paul put out his hand. And as he grasped the hand of the other man he was aware in his spine, in the nervous tremor in his chest and shoulder-blades, of himself and Anna and the intruder. Anna all her life had loved only these two. She honoured Sergei's memory, and he too honoured it as the memory of a man who had loved Anna, a man whose death certificate was in Anna's hands, sent her from a French infantry regiment, stating that the Russian painter, Sergei Ivanovitch Lavrenjov, private, had fallen "before Verdun." This memory—sacred and secret, and all the more sacred and secret because honoured—lay between them. Not once since he had loved Anna had he questioned her about her feelings for Sergei, and never had he set himself over against him—because he wished above all to guard his memory. Paul held Sergei's hand. And in his spine and from the tremor in his chest he felt that from this moment onwards he could not—even in his thoughts—call Anna his wife; for he too, as Sergei had said, was no—thief.

He held Sergei's hand for a long time. Sergei's eyes did not move. "Yes, Sergei. Yes, you are right. I am no thief."

Anna turned round to them. She walked up to them. Her hands, held far from her body, were turned to stone. Tears were in her eyes. Sergei stretched his hands out towards her, palms upwards—and Anna's eyes fell. Paul knew that this must be a characteristic gesture of Sergei's, which Anna remembered from the days gone by. And he let his eyes fall as people do who let their eyes fall from shame lest they should see what they ought not to see. Anna saw Paul's averted eyes and she put out her hands to him. He did not see and Anna was left with her hands in the air.

"I'll go and wash my hands," she exclaimed.

"Yes, go," Paul said.

"Anna, Paul Andreievitch," Sergei began and his lips grinned in physical pain, "Anna, Annushka, my darling . . . if you wish, I will go away at once and for ever, Annushka . . . Yes, I have aged very much, Paul Andreievitch, I have aged very much."

Anna sank weakly onto the chair at the table and forgot all about her hands.

"No, no. That's nonsense," Paul said. "Anna has always spoken of you with such affection. We have photographs of you and you see—the picture, I mean, I had formed of you . . . Nonsense, Seriosha!" Paul called Sergei by the name he and Anna had always used when he was in their thoughts. "No, listen to me, Seriosha, it is only in comparison with your photograph that you have altered . . ."

Anna stretched her hands out to Paul with the same gesture with which Sergei had stretched his out to her. Anna must, he saw, have picked it up from Sergei. Paul took both her hands in his and kissed the earth on them; he kissed the moist dark earth with all the tenderness he felt for the woman. Wiping the soil from his lips he said: "No, Annushka," (he caught himself calling Anna by the name Sergei had given her) "No, Anna, I am no thief. I know I cannot call you my wife—not unless you call me your husband." Paul again wiped the soil from his lips. "What strange things time hides! Here we are, the three of us, how can I say it? The most wonderful thing in my life—you knew it before me, Seriosha—and I have got to know what was for you the most sacred of all things on earth, your own exclusive mystery. I can find no words for it."

Anna stood up. For a second she stood there motionless. All the strength ebbed from her will. Her neck trembled like a string of an instrument. Her head sank between her shoulders. She went to Sergei—and embraced him. Paul understood: when Anna stretched her hands out to Paul, she defended Sergei—and now when she went to Sergei, she defended Paul. And with her head sunk and her cheek on Sergei's breast Anna said:

"I am afraid, Seriosha—I am afraid, Paul. How I waited for you, Seriosha, when you went to the front! What torments I suffered when here in Russia I got the news of your death! You know how I loved you. Now you have come—and how glad I am! No, that is not the way to express it. You have returned—and I—love you. But—I love Paul too. I have a son. We have a son; he is my only son, and I shall have no more children. I am in great dread. I do not know! Paul, do you hear? . . . I do not know . . ."

Paul went to Anna and put his arms round Sergei and her, leaning his head on Anna's shoulder.

"Annushka," he said—again he called her by Sergei's name for her, but he did not correct himself—"Annushka, darling, you know, darling, you know that Sergei and I, that we think of your happiness and your happiness only . . . You know—that we wait for what you say."

Paul was speechless. The depth of his love for Anna overpowered him, and gratitude for the humanity of her conduct filled him to overflowing. He was silent and let his head fall. He tried to look at Anna's face, but for a moment her features swam before his eyes. The dusk came into the room, the daylight failed outside the windows. The self-forgetfulness, the indifference to the passage of time which came over Paul while he was at work now came over them all. They stood there with their arms about each other and time stood still. The whitish dusk of a white June night in Russia was around them. The earth radiated its gold. The scent of stocks was in the room. Gnats sang in the garden. Anna's face was strengthless and her eyes were shut. Her earth-soiled hands hung on Sergei's shoulders so as not to soil his coat.

"It is night already," Paul said in amazement. "Annushka, go and wash your hands. They are covered with earth."

Paul took hold of Anna's hands. He kissed the earth on her hands tenderly. Anna's face was happy. She walked to the door of her room to wash the earth from her hands. All the windows were open and the green evening air blew through the house. In hours like these man is one with the earth.

A LETTER

Isaac Babel

(1894- )

TRANSLATED BY ALEC BROWN

---

HERE IS A LETTER HOME which I wrote for a lad of our detachment, named Kourdioukov, at his dictation. It deserves recording, I have copied it out without any touching up, and give it, word for word, exactly as it stood.

"My dear Mother, Evdokia Fiodorovna. In the first lines of the present letter in all haste I inform you that, thanks to the Lord, I find myself alive and well, which same I hope to hear from you. Also most humbly I bow down to you, from white face to damp earth. . . . [Here follows a list of all relations, blood and marriage, and spiritual relations—god-fathers, etc. Let us leave them out and pass to the second section.]

"My dear Mother, Evdokia Fiodorovna Kourdioukov. In great haste I write to tell you that I am in Comrade Boudyonny's Cavalry Army, where also is your relation in God Nikon Vassilievich, who at present is a Red Hero. He took me on as his companion for this expedition of the Political Department, where we take literature and newspapers about the front, namely the Moscow Izvestia, the Moscow Pravda and our own newspaper which shows no mercy, The Red Cavalryman, which every single fighter in the advanced positions wants to be able to read, whereupon with heroic spirit he cuts down these scum the Polish squires, and so I'm getting on very first-rate here with Nikon Vassilievich.

"My dear Mother Evdokia Fiodorovna. Please send me whatever you can manage, what you have to send. Will you please kill the young black and white hog and make me up a parcel to the Political Section of Comrade Boudyonny, for Vassili Kourdioukov. Every night I lie down on an empty stomach and without anything to cover myself with, so that I am terrible cold. Write me a letter and tell me about my Steve, is he alive or dead, I beg you please look after him well and write to me about him, does he still over-reach or has he stopped that, and how about the itch in his front feet and have you had him shoed or not? I beg you, my dear Mother Evdokia Fiodorovna, don't fail to wash his front feet with the soap I left, it's behind the eikons, and if Father has used it all up, buy some more in Krasnodar and God will be with you. I can also inform you that it's very poor country in these parts, the peasants take their horses and hide from our red eagles in the woods, there is little corn to be seen and what there is, it's very stunted, we laugh at it. The farmers in these parts sow rye and likewise oats. There are hops too in these parts growing on poles, so that it's all very neat and trim and they make homemade spirits with them.

"And now I write a few more lines to hasten to describe to you about Father, as he cut down my brother Fiodor Timofeich Kourdioukov a year ago today. Our Red Brigade under Comrade Pavlichenko was advancing on the town of Rostov when there was treachery in our ranks. Now at that time Father was in Denikin's army, he was Company Commander. Those who saw them say they were wearing medals and all like in the old days. And as a result of the treachery we were all taken prisoner and so Father saw brother Fiodor Timofeich. And Father he began cutting Fiodia about and calling him a cur and a red scum and a son of a bitch and a lot more and cut him about till dark, until Brother Fiodor Timofeich passed away. I wrote you a letter at the time to tell you how your Fiodia was buried without a cross, but Father caught me with the letter and said you mother's whelps you . . . . . spawn, that whore's, I bellied your mother and I'll belly her again, my life's ruined, I'll bring my seed up the way it should go and a lot more. I suffered at his hands like our Saviour Jesus Christ, only I got away from Father quickly and ran away and got through to my unit under Comrade Pavlichenko.

"Our Brigade then got orders to proceed to the town of Voronezh to fill its ranks and when we got there we did get reinforcements, also horses and haversacks and revolvers and all we needed. As for Voronezh, my dear Mother, Evdokia Fiodorovna, I can tell you that it's a very fine little town, a bit bigger than Krasnodar, and the people are very handsome, with a river capable for bathing. There we received two pounds of bread each a day, half a pound of meat and the sugar we needed, so that when we got up in the mornings we could drink sweetened tea, and sup the same and so we forgot being hungry, and to dinner I used to go to Brother Semyon Timofeich to eat pancakes and roast goose, after which I used to lie down to rest. At that time on account of his desperation the whole regiment wanted Semyon Timofeich for Commander and orders were issued by Comrade Boudyonny and he got two horses, proper uniform, a cart for his gear separately and the order of the Red Banner and I was recognized as his brother. So now if any of the neighbours takes it in his head to get uppish with you, Semyon Timofeich can slit his throat for him proper. Then we began to push General Denikin back, cut down thousands of them and drove them into the Black Sea, only no sign of Father, and Semyon Timofeich looked for him everywhere, because he was very cut up about Brother Fiodia. Only, dear Mother, as you know what our Father's like, what a stubborn man he is, so what did he do—he had the impudence to dye his beard from ginger to black and he was living in the town of Maikop in civvies, so nobody there had any idea that he was nobody else but an old Tsarist mounted gendarme. Only truth will out and Nikon Vassilich caught sight of him one day quite by chance in a cottage and wrote to Semyon Timofeich to tell him. Then he got our horses and covered those hundred and fifty miles in no time, I, Brother Sim and some lads from our outpost who wanted to go with us.

“And what did we find in the town of Maikop? We found that the rear of the armies was all out of sympathy with the front lines and in that town there was treachery all over, and large numbers of Jews, like under the Tsar. And Semyon Timofeich in Maikop had a stand-up row with those Jewboys, because they wouldn't let Father out of their hands, but locked him up in the prison and said there were orders from Comrade Trotsky that no prisoners were to be killed; we'll try him ourselves, they said, you keep calm, he'll get his deserts. Only, Semyon Timofeich had his own way and proved that he was Commander of a Regiment and had all the Orders of the Red Banner from Comrade Boudyonny, and threatened to cut down anybody who stood out for Father's person and refused to give him up, and all the boys stood for Semyon Timofeich. Only when Semyon Timofeich got hold of Father he began flogging Father and all the boys were paraded in the courtyard in proper formation. And then Sim splashed some water on Father Timofey Rodionich's beard and the dye ran out of it. And Sim asked Timofey Rodionich:

“‘Do you feel all right in my hands, Father?’

“‘No,’ said Father, ‘rotten.’

“Then Sim asked:

“‘And when you cut Fiodia up did he feel all right, in your hands?’

“‘No,’ said Father, ‘rotten.’

"Then Sim asked:

"'And, Father, did you never think you'd feel rotten some day too?'

"'No,' Father said, 'I never thought I'd feel rotten.'

"Then Sim turned right round to the crowd there and said, 'Whereas I do think that if I get into the hands of your people there'll be no mercy for me. And now, Father, we're going to put an end to you. . . .'

"And Timofey Rodionich then began insolently cursing Sim and swearing at him, . . . his mother and the Virgin, and hitting Sim in the jaws, and Sim sent me out of the yard, so, dear Mother, Evdokia Fiodorovna, I cannot give you any description of how they finished off Father, because I was sent out of the yard.

"After that we were stationed in Novorossiysk. As for this town, I can tell you that the dry land ends there, and further on there's nought but water, the Black Sea, and we stayed there right through till May, when we came out on the Polish front, where we're knocking the stuffing out of the Polish squires. . . .

"I remain your Loving Son, Vassili Timofeich Kourdioukov. Mother, do keep your eye on my Stevie and God will be with you. . . ."

There is Kourdioukov's letter, not a word in it changed. When I had finished writing it, he took it and tucked it away under his shirt, next to his skin.

"Kourdioukov," I asked the lad, "your father was a tyrant, was he?"

"My father was a devil," he said sullenly.

"And your mother's better?"

"Mother's all right. If you'd like, here's our family . . ."

He handed me a dog-eared photograph. It showed Timofey Kourdioukov, a broad-shouldered mounted gendarme, wearing his uniform cap and with well combed-out beard, stolid, high-cheekboned, with a harsh glint in his stupid, colourless eyes. Beside him, in a basket chair, was a frail little peasant woman with loose-hanging blouse and a consumptive, clear-skinned, timorous face. And behind, against the wall, one of those miserable country-photographer back-cloths with flowers and pigeons, were two tall lads, monstrously stalwart and stupid-looking, standing stiff and gawky—with broad faces and staring eyes, as if being drilled—the two other sons, Fiodor and Semyon.

MONGOLIA is a wild beast, and a gloomy one! Its stone is a wild beast, and its water is a wild beast; even its ladybird watches for an opportunity to bite.

No one knows the heart of the Mongolian—he walks about in skins, he looks like a Chinaman and, very remote from the Russians, across the desert of Nor-Koi, he has made his home. And it is said that he will go beyond China into India, into the unknown blue lands on the seven shores. . . .

Many Kirghis who had left Irtish during the Russian war and trekked to Mongolia, had pitched their tents near the Russians. Their heart is well-known—it can be seen through and through. They wandered here in no undue haste—and they brought their beasts and their children, and even their sick.

The Russians were being driven hither without mercy—but then they were moujiks, and sturdy fellows. On the mountain stones they left their superfluous weakness—here one fellow died, there another was beaten to death. The families and the tools and the domestic beasts had been left to the Whites. The moujiks were malignant like wolves during the spring. They lay in their tents and thought about the steppe, about Irtish. . . .

There were about fifty of them. Sergey Selivanov acted as their head, and the detachment was called: “The partisan detachment of the Red Guard of Comrade Selivanov.”

They were bored.

While they were being driven across the mountains, their hearts had been in fear of the black stoniness over which they had to pass. They reached the steppe—and they found it tedious here; because the steppe was like their own Irtish steppe: there was sand, harsh grass, a hard-forged sky. Everything was alien, not one’s own, and the land was unploughed and wild.

And it was hard without women.

At night they sat around and told soldiers’ tales about women, and when it became unbearable they saddled their horses and caught Kirghis women in the steppe.

And the Kirghis women submitted to their Russian captors.

It was loathsome to take them, for they were still and never opened their tightly closed eyes. It was as if you had sinned with domestic cattle.

The Kirghis feared the moujiks, and would wander away further into the steppe. When they saw a Russian they threatened him with a rifle or with a sling; they raised whoops, but they did not shoot. Perhaps, they couldn't? . . .

II

The paymaster of the detachment, Afanasy Petrovitch, was tearful, like an infant. And his face was like an infant's: it was small, hairless and rosy. But his legs were long and strong, like a camel's.

When he mounted a horse, he was forbidding. His face seemed hidden, and he sat there looking grey, angry and terrifying.

On Trinity day three men were ordered out into the steppe to find good meadows. They were Selivanov himself, paymaster Afanasy Petrovitch, and secretary Drevesinin.

The sand rose in the sun like a cloud of smoke.

From on high the wind blew. While from the earth, toward the tremulous sky, the warmth rose. The bodies of the men and the beasts were hard and heavy, like stones. It was tedious.

And Selivanov hoarsely said:

"What sort of meadows are there out there? . . ."

The others knew: he was speaking of Irtysh. But the beardless faces were mute. It was as if the sun had burnt out their hair, as it burns out the grass in the steppe. Their narrow eyes, like wounds from a fish-hook, were inflamed red. It was hot.

Afanasy Petrovitch responded at last in a lamenting voice:

"Surely everything hasn't dried up there too?"

His slender voice was tearful, but there were no tears on his face. Only the horse under him, tired and panting, showed a trickle in its great long eyes.

Thus, one after the other, along paths traced by wild goats, the partisans rode into the steppe. . . .

The sand glowed hot, in endless monotony. A stifling wind blew. The sweat struggled within the body, unable to break through the dry skin. . . .

Towards evening, just as they were issuing out of a valley, Selivanov said, pointing to the west:

"Look! There are riders out there!"

It was true: on the remote horizon rosy clouds of sand could be seen.

"It must be Kirghis."

A dispute arose. Drevesinin said that the Kirghis wandered afar and dared not approach Selivanov's camp. Afanasy Petrovitch said, it was certainly Kirghis. It was the sort of thick dust the Kirghis usually raised.

But when they got nearer to the dust, they all decided:

"Strangers . . . unknown folk. . . ."

From the voices of their riders the horses sniffed something strange in the air. They pricked up their ears, and fell to the earth long before the command. They lay there, in the hollows, these grey and yellow horses, still as corpses. They were helpless and laughable, with their legs as thin as poles. Was it from shame, then, they closed their large frightened eyes and breathed panting?

Selivanov and paymaster Afanasy Petrovitch lay beside their horses. The paymaster, his nose sniffing, was crying. To make it easier for him, Selivanov always placed him by his side, and from this childish crying the heavy moujik's heart felt almost cheered and incited to mischief.

The pathway was lost in the dust. The beat of wheels was audible. The long black manes of horses could be seen wavering in the dust.

Selivanov said with assurance:

"Russians. . . . Officers."

Two persons in hats with red bands were sitting in the new plaited waggon. Their faces were invisible through the dust. It was as if the red bands shimmered in a yellow cloud. The muzzle of a gun could be seen thrust upward each time a hand with a whip was flung out above the dust.

Drevesinin reflected and said:

"Officers . . . on business, of course. An expedition is on foot. . . . That's clear."

He winked an insolent eye, and added:

"We'll prescribe for them, won't we, Selivanchik?"

The waggon with its passengers firmly goes on. They have good horses. Merrily they go on, and behind them, as with a foxen tail, the waggon hides its traces under the falling Mongolian dust.

Afanasy Petrovitch drawled in his lachrymose way:

"It's not necessary, brothers. . . . Better put them in prison. . . . Wait before you must beat them."

"Aren't you sorry for your own head . . . d'you want a beating?"

Selivanov grew angry and snapped at him:

"It is not necessary to cry here, paymaster!"

What, above all, provoked them to anger was that the officers should have ventured to appear alone, without a convoy. It was as if their strength was considered as nothing, as if death were to be meted out to the moujiks as a matter of course. At that moment one officer actually had risen to his height and was looking round the steppe; but it was hard for him to see:

there was the dust; there was the evening wind on the red burned grass; there were the two stones by two hollows in the ground resembling corpses of horses. . . . What sort of stones were they? . . . Were these corpses? . . .

The waggon, the wheels, the passengers, their thoughts. . . . They ride on in the red dust.

The men in ambush fired their rifles. . . . They raised a whoop. Then again fired.

At the same moment the two hats, one hitting against the other, fell into the waggon.

The reins had suddenly been dropped. . . .

The horses tore forward . . . fell. There was white froth at their manes . . . Their muscles trembling, they lowered their heads, and rose to their feet.

Afanasý Petrovitch said:

"They must be dead. . . ."

The moujiks walked up, looked in.

The two passengers with the red bands in their hats were dead. They were sitting shoulder to shoulder, their heads thrown back. One of the dead was a woman. Her hair had fallen apart; her military tunic outlined her high woman's breasts.

"It's odd," said Drevesinin. "She has herself to blame. She had no right to wear that hat. Who wants to kill a woman? . . . Women are necessary to society."

Afanasý Petrovitch spat.

"Don't go so fast," Selivanov interrupted them. "We're not robbers, we must write it all down—it's all national property now. Give me some paper."

The first thing they saw among other articles of "national property" was a light-eyed, fair-haired infant, lying in a plaited Chinese basket. In his small hand he tightly clutched a corner of the brown blanket. A suckling, he was tiny and he squealed in a slender voice.

With much feeling, Afanasý Petrovitch said:

"So there . . . he's got to have his say . . . and all about it."

They took pity on the woman and did not deprive her of her clothes, but the man they buried naked in the sand.

III

Afanasý Petrovitch journeyed back in the seized waggon, he held the infant in his arms and, rocking him, he sang quietly:

<sup>1</sup>A bourgeois.

The nightingale bird
Sings its sad song . . .
The canary bird
Too . . . how my heart's wrung . . .

He remembered the small village Lebiajy—his native home; the droves of cattle; his family; the little children—and he cried in subdued tones.

The infant also cried.

The heated sand, dry and friable, also seemed to cry subduedly, as the wagon ran over it. The partisans rode on their low, firm-fleshed Mongolian horses. Their faces were burning and their souls were burning.

Near the pathways stifled by the sun there were stretches of wormwood, resembling sand—very fine and almost invisible to the eye.

And the sand is wormwood, fine and bitter.

Oh, pathways, goat pathways! Oh, sands, bitter sands! Mongolia is a wild beast, and a gloomy one! . . .

They examined the officer's property. There were books, a box containing tobacco, and gleaming steel instruments. One of these was a small four-cornered brass case standing on three long legs and divided into several compartments.

The partisans examined the various objects, felt them with their hands, again and again tried their weight.

The moujiks smelt of sheep's fat—from sheer tedium they ate a great deal, and the fat had gotten on to their clothes. Big-cheek-boned and thin-lipped, they had come from a Cossack village on the Don; with long black hair and dark faces, they had known the lime mines. And they all had bow-legs and guttural steppe voices.

Afanasy Petrovitch lifted the brass-topped tripod and said:

"It's a telescope. . . ." And he half closed his eyes. "It's a good telescope, must cost more than a million. They've looked at the moon through it, fellows, and they've found gold sand on it. . . . It isn't necessary to wash it. . . . It pours like flour, and all of it the purest gold. All you've got to do is to pour it into a sack. . . ."

One of the others, who had lived in a town, roared with laughter.

"A cock and bull story. . . ."

Afanasy Petrovitch got angry.

"A cock and bull story, is it, you filthy carrion? . . . Just wait. . . ."

"Wait for whom?"

Afanasy Petrovitch seized a revolver.

"Sh-h!" Selivanov quieted them.

They shared the tobacco, and they handed over the instrument to Afanasy Petrovitch—as paymaster he would wait for an opportunity to give it in exchange for something from the Kirghis.

He placed the instrument before the infant.

"Here's something to play with. . . ."

The infant paid no attention to the offering. He was crying. Afanasy Petrovitch tried this and that, even worked himself into a sweat; but the infant, unappeased, went on whimpering.

The cooks brought in dinner. There was a thick odour of butter, of gruel, of cabbage-soup. Huge wooden spoons were drawn from the boot-legs. The grass had been stamped down by the campers. Higher up, on the cliffs, the sentinel shouted:

"Hurry up! . . . I want some grub. . . . Send up a fellow to take my place!"

They had their dinner, then remembered: the infant wanted food. He had not ceased crying.

Afanasy masticated a mouthful of bread. He thrust a bit of the wet bread into the open tiny mouth, to the accompaniment of:

"Pp-i-pi . . . little fellow . . . get it down, young 'un. . . . It's tasty."

But the infant turned away his head and shut his mouth—he simply wouldn't have any of it. He was whimpering through his nose, in low but piercing tones.

The moujiks came up, surrounding them. Heads looked above heads at the infant. All were silent.

It was hot. The cheeks and the lips looked greasy from the mutton they had eaten. The shirts were open. The feet were bare, yellow—like the Mongolian soil.

One of the moujiks proposed:

"Try the cabbage-soup on him. . . ."

They cooled the soup. Afanasy Petrovitch dipped a finger into it and stuck it into the infant's mouth. The good fat cabbage-soup ran down from his lips on to his little rose-coloured shirt and baize blanket.

He refused it. He went on whimpering.

"A puppy is more clever—he'll eat off your finger. . . ."

"One's a dog, the other a human being. . . ."

"Thinking won't help here! . . ."

There was no cow's milk in the camp. They thought of feeding the infant on mare's milk. That too was impossible. The child might die.

The moujiks scattered among their carts. Disturbed, they talked it over in groups. Afanasy Petrovitch wandered among the carts, a torn under-tunic over his shoulders, his small eyes also looking ragged. His voice was thin, perturbed, like a child's; it was as if the infant himself was running about, complaining.

"What's to come of it? . . . What's the way out, moujiks? . . . There must be a way out, eh? . . . Can't you think up something, you sons of dogs? . . ."

They stood about, these broad-shouldered, mighty fellows, and looked helpless.

"It's a woman's business. . . ."

"To be sure. . . ."

"From a woman's hands he would have eaten a whole sheep. . . ."

"That's how it is."

Selivanov collected a crowd and announced:

"It's impossible to let the little Christian fellow die like a beast. Let's say, the father was a boorjoy, but the baby—what about him? He's not to blame."

The moujiks agreed.

"It's nothing to do with the child. He's innocent."

Drevesinin broke into a loud laugh:

"Let the child grow up! He'll grow up with us—and he'll fly up to the moon. . . . To pick up the golden dust. . . ."

The moujiks did not laugh. Afanasy Petrovitch raised a fist and shouted:

"You're an ignorant dog—that's what you are! The only one in camp that makes mock!"

He stamped his feet, waved his arms, then suddenly raised the piercing cry:

"A cow. . . . A cow is what we want for him!"

They responded in one voice:

"Without a cow it means death. . . ."

"We must have a cow. . . ."

"Without a cow he'll die!"

Afanasy Petrovitch said with decision:

"Fellows, I intend going for a cow. . . ."

Drevesinin insolently interrupted him:

"Are you going to Irtish, to the Lebiajy village? . . ."

"It's no good my going to Irtish, unspeakable monster! I'm going to the Kirghis!"

"You'll exchange the telescope for a cow, I s'pose! Go, then, benefactor!"

Afanasy Petrovitch turned on him and cried savagely:

"You carrion! D'you want to smell my fist?"

The chairman of the gathering, Selivanov, called for order:

"Enough!"

A vote was taken. It was decided that Drevesinin, Afanasy Petrovitch and three others should mount their horses and go to a Kirghis village, in the steppe, and drive back a cow. With luck, they might bring two or five cows, as the cooks were complaining that their meat supply was becoming exhausted.

They attached rifles to their saddles, and donned caps of fox fur, so as to give the appearance at a distance of being Kirghis.

They wound the blanket round the baby and put it in the shadow under a cart. A young moujik sat at his side, and for his own amusement and the baby's fired intermittently into a bush of wormwood.

IV

Oh, sands—joyless, Mongolian! Oh, stone—blue, unhappy! The hands here are deep in the soil, evil!

The Russians ride on the sands. It is night.

The sands smell of heat, of wormwood.

The dogs in the acol<sup>2</sup> bark at the wolf, at the darkness.

The wolves howl in the darkness at hunger, at death.

The Kirghis ran to escape death.

Will the droves of cattle escape death?

The Kirghis village smelt of sour milk. Lean and hungry children sat by bonfires. Near them were several bare-ribbed, sharp-muzzled dogs. The tents looked like hay-ricks. Beyond the tents was a lake and rushes. Suddenly, shots rang out, from the rushes, aimed at the bonfires. There were cries: "O-o-a-at! . . ."

The Kirghis all at once rushed from their felt huts. They raised cries of fear. They sprang on their horses. The horses were kept bridled day and night. They trampled on their tents. They trampled on the steppe. Wild cries came from the rushes:

"Ai-ai, the Reds—the Whites—Russians—ai-ai. . . ."

One grey-bearded fellow fell from his horse, his head landing in the huge boiling kettle, which was upset. Scalded, he whimpered in a thick voice. Its tail between its legs, a hungry, shaggy dog cautiously dipped its muzzle into the hot milk.

The mares neighed shrilly. Frightened, as if they were threatened by wolves, the sheep in the fold were panicky. The cows panted.

The Kirghis women, seeing the Russians, humbly submitted to them.

Drevesinin laughed lewdly:

"We are stallions, then, are we? . . . We shan't always . . ."

Quickly filling his flat Austrian flask with milk and, cracking his whip, he drove some cows and calves towards a tent. The calves, loosed from their leash, made at once for the cows' udders, and joyously, with their large soft lips, seized the teats.

"They look mighty hungry, I say . . ."

And Drevesinin fired his revolver at the calves.

Afanasy Petrovitch made a circuit of the village and was about to follow Drevesinin on his horse, when he suddenly remembered:

"Why, we must have a sucking-bottle. The deuce take it, we've almost forgotten it!"

He rushed in and out of the tents in search of a sucking-bottle. The fires in the tents were almost extinguished. Afanasy Petrovitch seized a firebrand and, flourishing it so that the sparks flew, and coughing from the smoke, he searched for a sucking-bottle. In one hand the firebrand crackled, in the other he held a revolver. He could find no sucking-bottle. The submissive Kirghis women sprawled about on their beds of felt. The children were bawling.

Afanasy Petrovitch grew angry and, in one tent, he shouted at a young Kirghis woman:

"A sucking-bottle, you good-for-nothing, I want a sucking-bottle!"

The Kirghis woman wept and began to undo her silk caftan . . . At her side cried an infant, wrapped in rags.

At that moment Afanasy Petrovitch seized her breast and pressed it. He whistled and cried joyously:

"Woh . . . A sucking-bottle! Ah, a good one! . . . Don't make that noise! It's a good one!"

And he seized the woman by the hand and dragged her after him.

In the darkness he placed the woman in the saddle, and from time to time he felt her breast until he brought her to Selivanov's camp.

"I've found what I wanted," he said, overjoyed, and there were tears in his eyes. "When I say I'll find a thing, I'll find it if I have to dig in the earth for it."

v

Once in camp, Afanasy Petrovitch discovered that, in the darkness, the Kirghis woman had managed to bring her own child with her.

"Never mind," the moujiks said. "There'll be enough milk for both. There are cows, and she's a healthy wench."

The Kirghis woman was taciturn and strict, and she fed the infants when no one was looking on. The two of them lay on the felt bed in the tent—one of them all white, the other a little yellow fellow—and they whimpered in one voice.

In the course of a week, at the common gathering, Afanasy Petrovitch complained:

"Comrades, I don't like this hiding game. The Kirghis woman is cheating us. She's giving all her milk to her own. As for ours, she sometimes lets him have a drop or two. Brothers, I know, for I've peeped. Just have a look for yourselves . . ."

The moujiks went and looked. The infants were like all infants. One was a little white fellow, the other a yellow, like a ripe melon. But it was clearly to be seen that the Russian was meagre compared to the Kirghis.

Afanasy Petrovitch gesticulated with his hands.

"I've given him a name—Vaska. . . . But when you take a look at him . . . Cheating, I call it!"

Then spoke Drevesinin, without his usual smile:

"Oh, you Vaska, you look as if you had a foot in the other world. . . ."

They found a stick, and they arranged it on a waggon shaft to make sure that one half did not outweigh the other.

They suspended the infants, one at either end, to see which outweighed the other.

The infants tied in hanging rags whimpered. The faint odour of babies came from them. The Kirghis woman was standing near the waggon and, understanding nothing, was crying.

The moujiks were silently looking on.

"Let it go!" said Selivanov. "We'll see what the scales say!"

Afanasy Petrovitch removed his hands from the stick, and immediately the Russian youngster rose high.

"Oh, you yellow-mouthed wretch!" said Afanasy Petrovitch wrathfully.

He lifted a sheep's skull lying on the ground and placed it on the Russian child's side of the scales. The two infants were then even.

The moujiks raised a din.

"She has overfed her own by a whole sheep's head, eh?"

"No one's watched her!"

"What a beast! Not to have fed ours!"

"Who's watched her?"

"There're other things to do besides watching her!"

A few of the more sedate moujiks confirmed this view:

"How's one to watch her!"

"Besides—she's the other babe's mother. . . ."

Afanasy Petrovitch stamped his feet, and shouted:

"I s'pose you think a Russian human being must perish for some sort of foreign trash. . . . Is my Vaska to perish then? . . ."

They looked at Vaska. He was lying there, looking pale and meagre.

The moujiks felt perturbed.

Said Selivanov to Afanasy Petrovitch:

"Why don't you get rid of him . . . of the other, I mean. God be with him, let him die . . . the little Kirghis fellow. We've beat up a lot of them. And what's one more or less to answer for?"

The moujiks gave a look at Vaska and, without another word, went their ways.

Afanasy Petrovitch took the little Kirghis and put him into a torn sack.

The mother began to weep. Afanasy Petrovitch hit her lightly on her jaw and went to the steppe.

VI

Two days later the moujiks stood on their tip-toes near the tent and, looking over each other's shoulder, peeped inside, where on the felt bed the Kirghis woman was feeding the white child.

The woman had a submissive face with narrow eyes, like seeds of oats; she wore her purple silk caftan and boots of morocco leather.

The infant had his face snuggled against her breast, and he played with his hands on the caftan, while his legs pranced about with ridiculous awkwardness.

The moujiks looked on and laughed uproariously.

And more tender than anyone else was Afanasy Petrovitch. Sniffing, he said in a tearful voice:

"Ain't he a fine youngster!"

Beyond the linen tent there ran, no one knew whither: dales, cliffs, the steppe, alien Mongolia.

No one knew whither ran Mongolia—a wild beast, and a gloomy one.

---

N<sup>A</sup>DEZHDA ALEXEYEVNA was going to the Smolensky Market. She held a basket covered with oil-cloth, and a little folding-stool.

Both the girls were staying at home. She would lock them in. It couldn't be helped . . . the flat was full of every kind of rabble.

Nathalie, the elder, said nothing, looking on with wide, anxious eyes.

Vera was pestering her: "Will you buy some bread to-day? Do buy as much as you can."

"There is some dough-cake left and a little milk. Have it when you feel hungry," said Nadezhda Alexeyevna.

Nathalie made up her mind to ask, almost in a whisper: "And when will you be back, mummy?"

"Don't be afraid. I'll try to be back early to-day."

"Do buy some bread!"

The key clicked. "Like little birds in a cage," thought Nadezhda Alexeyevna as she made her way through the foul-smelling, bespitted passage. "Poor darlings! Why must it be?" It was a question she was always asking lately. But who was there to answer it? She believed in God, she went to Church, she taught her children to pray, but what had all that to do with her present circumstances, with the girls having to remain the whole day alone, among strange, unkind people? What had it to do with the fact that she, who had been spoilt, used to wearing bracelets and silk underclothes, had now to drag herself through the rain to the Smolensky Market, her skirts spattered with mud? Even when she did pray to God for help, it was rather through habit. Only a miracle could help them. Like the miracle of Arisha, the nanny, who used to say: "My purse is never empty. Nicholas the Miracle-worker sees to that." But Nadezhda Alexeyevna did not believe in miracles. Nor did Arisha for that matter. She simply humbugged her employers.

Nadezhda Alexeyevna had her own permanent place at the Market, but she dared not be late, or the bookseller would spread his books over it.

Already there was a crowd in the Square. The Princess, Nadezhda Alexeyevna's invariable neighbour, a stately old woman who looked elegant even in her rags, was seated on a stool, and had spread out on her knees and on the ground near her all her goods—a pair of mother-of-pearl opera-glasses, a heavy silver bowl, a bundle of ostrich feathers, some ribbons, a few bronze knick-knacks. Several chains, a lorgnette, an ivory rosary hung round her neck.

"You're late to-day," she said. Her low voice was a little husky with the dampness of the autumn morning. "I had to fight for your place."

The old bookseller, a professional, looked at them disapprovingly. In his opinion they had no business to be there at all, and he didn't care whose fault it was that they had been brought to this plight.

"Well, did you sell your statuette yesterday?" Nadezhda Alexeyevna asked.

"I did. To that one-eyed man. Nobody offered more."

"Cigarettes . . . in packets and loose! Cigarettes!" shouted a boy as he passed along the rows of sellers.

"Seeds! Roasted seeds! Anyone want seeds?"

"Give some here."

The fat peasant-woman emptied a glass of sunflower seeds into the bookseller's bulging pocket.

"Want some more?"

"That'll do."

"Want much for that tray?" asked a man in a shabby military tunic, of the Princess, as he passed.

In an edifying tone she corrected him: "It's not a tray, it's a vase."

Every word of theirs was a shock to her, she could not accustom herself to this new society.

"What do I care about that? How much d'you want for it?"

"It costs fifty thousand."

"This —," he added an unprintable word. "Take twenty-five. . . ."

A handsome young woman passed by, a luxurious fur coat thrown over her shoulders. A leather-jacketed individual tugged with both hands at the beaver collar.

"How much?"

"Three million."

"Three 'lemons' . . . what for?"

"For the coat."

"And how much what's inside?"

The people round them laughed.

Opposite Nadezhda Alexeyevna sat an old nurse selling her masters' things. She wore a white kerchief, printed with black birdseyes and a yellow border, and over it a bowler hat which she could not manage to sell. From time to time all sorts of remarks were made about it but she refused to take it off; it could better be seen as it was.

"Things don't seem to be going well to-day," said Nadezhda Alexeyevna.

The Princess looked at her watch. "It's still early. You'll have time. Your little ones are locked in so that nobody can do them any harm."

They had long since told each other the mirthless tales of their lives and griefs. There were no joys. Where would joys come from?

"Why haven't you brought your Lembrandt to-day?" asked the Princess of the nurse, imitating her pronunciation.

"The master said he'll take it to the antique dealer."

"What master? There aren't any masters left," said the cigarette boy, trying to ingratiate himself with the militiaman.

"Take your things out of the road," ordered the latter.

"Shall I hold them between my teeth then?" shouted back the nurse.

"Go on. Quick. No talking!"

They all hurried to collect their things. The bookseller alone did not move. He had a permit.

The militiaman passed on, and once more the goods were displayed.

"How much for a slice of bread, citizen?" asked a hungry-looking man in a long-coated soldier's uniform.

"Five roubles," replied the short, sturdy sandwich-seller, "only you can't have it without the sausage."

The other man's eyes flared.

"And how much sausage d'ye give?"

"You pay separately for the sausage, my dear fellow," explained the seller imperturbably.

The uniformed man moved off.

Several country girls with tin milk-cans surrounded the Princess. They had sold their milk and were buying new clothes for themselves.

"Look, Pollie, that blue one doesn't look bad."

"Oh, what a nice jacket!"

She took the silk knitted jacket and tried to pull it on. It was much too tight.

"Mind you don't tear it," said the Princess. The girl dragged the jacket over her fat stomach and turned round in front of her friends. They all thought it fitted her to perfection.

"How much?"

"Seventy-five thousand."

"Good heavens!" was the horrified rejoinder. "Why, the jacket's no good. Will you take less?"

"No."

The girl pulled it off, threw it on to the rest of the goods, and walked away, consulting her friends.

"Très-distinguées." The Princess laughed maliciously. "They smell of dung but they adorn their fingers with rings."

Nadezhda Alexeyevna had sold nothing so far. She felt peculiarly restless. All the time she fancied that something was wrong at home. She had forgotten to hide the matches when she came away. Vera always tried to play with them. Suppose a fire should break out and they were locked in! Nobody came to buy, as though on purpose. She was willing to sell her things for a song. And Nathalie was so fond of opening the window. What if she fell out? How terrible! Nadezhda Alexeyevna made the sign of the Cross by force of habit, and whispered: "Lord have mercy on us."

"You don't look your usual self. Don't you feel well?" the Princess asked.

"I am afraid for the girls."

"Don't be afraid. There is no need."

"I wish I could sell something so that I should have enough to buy some bread. I'd go immediately then. I feel more anxious than I have ever done before."

The Princess looked at her with earnest sympathy.

"Wait . . . those girls will come and buy the jacket, and then I'll give you half the money and you can go. You can give it back to me tomorrow."

"Oh no, thanks."

"Nonsense!" said the Princess severely. "If it's a premonition you must go. A mother's heart never lies."

"Anybody want seeds? Roasted seeds!"

"Come here, dearie."

A gloomy Tartar stopped in front of Nadezhda Alexeyevna.

"Is the trousers dear?" He took the trousers, unfolded them, held them up against the light.

"I can't sell them separately, it's a whole suit."

"And where's the coat? Shabby. How much d'you want?"

"Five hundred thousand."

"Too much. Will you take two hundred?"

"Don't let him have it," whispered the Princess.

"Take the money," said the Tartar fetching a fat purse from under his coat.

"Four hundred and fifty."

"I pay you two hundred."

"All right, four hundred."

Next to the Tartar, Nadezhda Alexeyevna suddenly saw a pale-faced lady dressed in poor and slovenly fashion.

"How much are you asking?" the lady enquired in a strangely hurried tone. It was obvious that she was anxious to buy the suit and was afraid of letting it go.

"Four hundred and fifty . . . but I'll let you have it for four hundred."

"I'll give you four hundred and fifty. But I haven't got the money on me. Could you come with me?"

"I am giving you two hundred. Here's the money," said the Tartar.

"It's quite near," went on the lady beseechingly. "I'll be back in a moment. I must buy some bread. Will you wait for me?"

"Don't go with her," the Princess whispered. "Better sell it to that Tartar."

Nadezhda Alexeyevna looked at the lady. Her face, too pale, seemed to bear the traces of an old and deep-rooted grief. Her grey restless eyes were so wide open that their whites could be seen all round the iris. The finely shaped mouth was restless, too, and twitched all the time.

"All right, I'll wait for you," said Nadezhda Alexeyevna.

"Merci," and the lady hurried away.

"You shouldn't, you shouldn't, how could you?" said the Princess. "Didn't I tell you to refuse?"

"But why?"

"How could you? Going to a young woman you know nothing about! She's lying, I feel certain. Where should she get all that money from? She's dressed worse than you and I."

Nadezhda Alexeyevna's heart beat so that she could hardly breathe. Four hundred and fifty thousand! It would feed the three of them for a week and pay off her debts.

"Give it to that Tartar! There he is! Call him!" the Princess insisted.

Nadezhda Alexeyevna said nothing, and waited for the lady as the dying man awaits the priest.

"She won't come, you'll see," the Princess said angrily. "It'll be all to the good. At least she won't lure you into a trap. Did you notice? She has the eyes of an adventuress."

Time passed. The lady did not come back. Nadezhda Alexeyevna was in despair, soon the whistle would be blown, and she had no money even to buy bread.

The milk girls came back for the jacket. The one who bought it unwrapped the money from her handkerchief and handed it out note by note, saying: "There, hold on to it."

As soon as they had gone, the Princess offered the money to Nadezhda Alexeyevna.

"Take it please, and go to your children. I'll tell her that you waited for her and then went."

"Thank you, but I think I had better wait a little longer."

The Princess felt offended. Without looking at Nadezhda Alexeyevna she began packing her things into a yellow travelling bag.

The whistle went.

"She hasn't come!" thought Nadezhda Alexeyevna, horrified, and in that moment saw the lady hurrying towards her. She was not carrying anything. "She said she would go and buy some bread," thought Nadezhda Alexeyevna, and was unpleasantly struck because it had turned out to be a lie. But she hastened to re-assure herself.

"I was afraid you would be gone," said the lady. "My husband has been intending to buy a suit for a long time and I am so glad I have managed to find one that would fit."

Nadezhda Alexeyevna remembered that the lady had hardly seen it.

"Would you like to have another look at it?" she asked.

"Oh no, what's the good? I have seen it. It will fit him all right. Provided that the trouser-legs aren't too short. My husband is very tall."

"This was made for a tall man."

"Splendid! Let's go. Is your maman coming with us?"

"This lady isn't my mother." Nadezhda Alexeyevna smiled. The customer obviously did not mind maman going with them, and this reassured her.

She leaned towards the Princess and whispered: "Don't be cross, see you to-morrow," and, taking up her stool and the basket on her arm, followed the lady.

"May I help you?" asked the latter, kindly.

"Oh no, don't bother. Thank you."

"Why not? Please. I do understand your position," said the lady with what seemed to Nadezhda Alexeyevna real and sincere emotion. "I was in the same position until quite recently. Heavens! It's terrible to think about what one has to go through." Her eyes grew still wider, and their whites showed even more clearly. "What a blessing it's all over! Have you any children?"

"Two girls."

"And I have a little boy . . . eighteen months old. He's called Leo. . . . You'll see him . . . with fair curls. Such a darling!"

It would have been ridiculous to be afraid of this kind and loving mother whose face brightened up the very moment she began to talk of her Leo.

"My husband has a very good job now," she continued, "and we have everything we want. Everything. But before this it was a nightmare. When Leo had dysentery . . . no doctor . . . nothing to feed him on. . . ."

Her mobile face constantly changed its expression. When she referred to the past she felt so strongly that one would have thought she was referring to the present. When she spoke of the present, on the other hand, it was as though she were talking of a long-forgotten, happy dream. Nadezhda Alexeyevna was not actually conscious of this, but she somehow sensed it unpleasantly.

"Is there far to go still?" she asked. They had passed several streets already.

"No, no, we're almost there. One more turning and then straight on. My husband will be delighted. He wanted a dinner jacket and striped trousers. It's very smart. And not expensive either. I am glad that Tartar hadn't bought it of you."

"So am I," said Nadezhda Alexeyevna. The lady's obvious sincerity disarmed her.

"We'll be there in a moment, you'll sit with us for a while and have a rest. . . ."

"No, I can't. I am in a hurry to get back to my children."

"Never mind. You can always stop for a cup of tea or coffee. My husband will try it on in the meantime. You'll see how comfortable it is at our place."

They turned off several times, and Nadezhda Alexeyevna did not know the streets along which they were walking. The houses were all alike, two-storeyed, wooden. She was terribly tired and, despite her sympathy for her companion, felt vaguely anxious. She tried to persuade herself that she was afraid simply because the lady's husband might refuse to take the suit; but she was afraid of something else. She could not have named it, but her fear was such that her hands shook and her feet felt weak.

"What a long way it is!"

"It only seems a long way to you. We haven't been walking more than ten minutes."

Through all her anxiety and worry Nadezhda Alexeyevna realised clearly that they had been walking for at least half an hour. The lady's strange, unnecessary lying added to her anxiety. By now it was almost dark. They turned off again.

"Here we are!" said the lady, stopping in front of the only four-storeyed brick house in the whole street. She opened the door and let Nadezhda Alexeyevna pass in first. Then she came in and slammed the door behind her. The staircase was not lit up, and Nadezhda Alexeyevna stretched out her hands in front of her. For a moment she thought: "Back I go!" but she at once remembered her little girls who were awaiting her, hungry.

"For some reason they haven't switched on the light to-day," said the lady. "Usually there is a light. Let me go on in front."

She ran up the stairs, and Nadezhda Alexeyevna, noticing the agility with which she found her way in the darkness, suspected that she had once more lied, this time about the light.

Gropingly, she began mounting the stairs, clutching the cold iron railings. When she reached the top landing, the lady had already opened the door and lit a small oil lamp. The wick was badly trimmed. A narrow strip of flame licked at the glass and smoked.

"Please come in and take off your things," said the lady in the amiable tones of a hostess who invites guests into a cosy, brightly-lit room.

Nadezhda Alexeyevna felt immediately that the flat was damp and unheated. By now she could hardly control the fear which almost impelled her to rush out of the room.

From the hall which was encumbered with trunks, the lady passed into a corridor and from there into a long narrow room with one uncurtained window. Nadezhda Alexeyevna followed her.

The hostess put the unshaded tin lamp on the table. It was an ordinary bare kitchen table. There was nothing on it apart from an ash-tray with a few cigarette stumps. The walls were bare, no pictures, no photographs. The furniture consisted of a couple of bentwood chairs and a shabby sofa.

Nadezhda Alexeyevna remembered "It's comfortable at our place," and stood rigid with horror.

Something stirred in a corner. A dishevelled white lap-dog with long body and short legs came out. Old age had caused it to lose all the prettiness proper to its breed. It had melancholy, bleary eyes. Inordinately long teeth protruded over its hanging lip. The hair on its face was brown as though tobacco-stained. It stopped in front of Nadezhda Alexeyevna and looked at her sadly, without barking, as if to say: "You see, this is rather a miserable place."

"Go to your place, Fleurette," said the hostess without raising her voice, as if talking to a human being. The dog turned and went back to its rug in the corner. Looking there, Nadezhda Alexeyevna saw a perambulator, almost hidden behind the door. She felt relieved. This time the lady had not lied.

"I'll just tell them to put on the samovar," said the lady, going into the corridor and closing the door behind her.

The fact that she did not go to the perambulator seemed again unnatural, terrifying. The perambulator itself, in the corner behind the door, was terrifying. In a flash, she thought that it might contain the solution of the whole puzzle. A terrible solution. "It's just nerves," she thought, trying to reassure herself.

The lamp still smoked. Nadezhda Alexeyevna reduced the flame, but then it was too dark. She turned it up again and it smoked. The hostess came in.

"Tea will be brought in a moment."

"But where is your husband?" asked Nadezhda Alexeyevna.

Her words strayed about the empty room, finding nowhere to lodge.

"He is not back from his office yet," said the hostess in a carefree voice. "He'll be here presently."

For some reason she would not sit down, moving about the room all the time, noiselessly and suddenly changing her direction, like a bat. Not once did she go near the perambulator.

Fleurette still lay huddled on the rug.

With hideous slowness time dragged on.

"I can't wait any longer," said Nadezhda Alexeyevna at last, and rose resolutely. She felt that something irreparable would happen if she stayed a moment longer. She thought neither of the children nor of the money. She had but one idea . . . to get away.

"Oh please," said the lady, taking her gently by the shoulders and looking into her face, "you will offend me by not staying to tea."

Her words, in themselves so ordinary and pleasant, seemed now incongruous and frightening. "No tea, no servants" flashed through Nadezhda Alexeyevna's mind.

"No, I can't!" she said, extricating herself impatiently from the embrace.

The other suddenly put her finger to her lips—the studied gesture of a bad actress.

"Hush! I think he's here. Fleurette, come and meet your master," she said, again addressing the dog as though it were a human being, and running lightly to the door.

The dog rose slowly, reluctantly, and crawled after her. They both went into the passage.

Nadezhda Alexeyevna went suddenly to the perambulator, wheeled it from the corner and turned it to the light. Contrary to her expectations it was not empty. A child, thickly wrapped up, its head covered with a cap, lay so that its face could not be seen.

For a second, Nadezhda Alexeyevna hesitated. Then something snapped in her mind. With a shudder she seized the child, turned it face upwards, and started back. Among the clothes which she had unwrapped lay a yellow Teddy bear.

Backing away from the perambulator as though it contained a dead child, she leant against the wall.

Something scratched the floor. Fleurette stood in front of her licking her rusty face with her pale tongue. "Didn't you realise?" asked her tired, old, knowing eyes.

Suddenly her mistress came into the room, alone. She looked towards the corner where Nadezhda Alexeyevna stood. There seemed to be nothing but whites to her eyes. A pitiful, guilty smile crept into them and vanished.

"Yes, you see . . . we are alone with him," she said in a new, weary voice, no longer unnaturally gay. "Alone, we two . . . and Fleurette. Nobody knew little Leo besides us, and we all three loved him." She went up to Nadezhda Alexeyevna and took her timidly by the shoulders. There was nothing affected now in her embrace. She wiped her eyes with the palm of her hand. Then she took the Teddy bear carefully from the perambulator and wrapped him up.

"Do you remember Leo? Do you remember how he used to call you Teddy?"

She sat on a chair with it and began to rock slowly to and fro, singing a lullaby in an undertone.

* Fleurette went up to her, put her front paws on her knees and stared at her with old, tired, knowing eyes.

Nadezhda Alexeyevna picked up her things quietly, as though afraid of wakening a child, stole into the hall, leapt on to the landing and rushed downstairs.

A SUNDAY'S STROLL in the public gardens is the very thing to show what a man's good for.

Pashka Kokushkin began his Sunday's stroll in the Fresh Ponds at six in the evening. First of all he went to the open-air Mosselprom Pavilion and drank a bottle of beer. That at once showed a proper attitude to life and also his moderation.

Then he bought two packets of roasted sunflower seeds from a woman and walked at a leisurely pace along the main avenue. On the way he spoke to a gipsy.

"Let me read your hand, my fine young gentleman. I'll tell you all the truth. I'll tell you what your heart is set on and I'll tell you what's on your mind. I'll tell you it all and hide nothing, and you've only to give the old gipsy ten kopeks for the pleasure it'll be to you. If I tell your fortune, all will be well with you. If I don't, you'll be sorry."

Pashka thought it over.

"Fortune telling is rubbish and—a silly superstition. All the same, here's a copper for you. You can carry on, though you'll only tell a pack of lies."

The gipsy put the coin in the pocket of her garish skirt and showed her black teeth.

"There's a pleasant meeting in store for you, young man, and because of this meeting your heart will have sorrow. An old man stands in your way, but don't fear anything. Fear only the knife. The knife will cause you a lot of trouble. Don't fear your friends—fear your enemies, and the green parrot will bring you luck. Go on your way with a brave heart!"

The gipsy bent her lean body forward and walked away with dignity, shuffling the soles of her dusky feet over the ground.

"Lies well, the rascal," Pashka said, winked, laughed out loud and went on his way.

As he went he sampled all the pleasures life had to offer. First he weighed himself on a rickety weighing machine; it registered a hundred and seventy-five pounds. Then he tried his strength and, nearly sinking to his knees with the exertion, he made the quivering pointer reach "strong man." After this he strolled on for a while and tested his nerves with electricity. He grasped the brass rod with both hands; there was a tingling in his wrists and a tickling as of ants, his wrists filled with soda water, his palms stuck to the brass rod—but his nerves were proved to be strong.

Finally he sat on a chair in front of a back-cloth suspended from a tree and displaying the Kremlin as seen from the Stone Bridge, crossed his legs, made a very fierce face and had his photograph taken. In ten minutes Pashka received the still wet print and gazed upon it for a long time with great satisfaction: his check cap, his own familiar nose, his Apache shirt with open collar, his coat—all faultless—pleased him well. It was not easy to believe that this strikingly handsome fellow and himself were one and the same.

"Not bad," he said as he carefully rolled up the sticky photograph and marched off to the landing stage.

To exhaust the stock of Sunday delights Pashka had now only to ogle some girls as they passed and take them for a row. Meanwhile he walked on and arrived at an unusually popular booth. A crowd blocked its wide-open doors. The ring of metal and loud laughter could be heard from within.

"What's going on here?" Pashka asked an undersized Red Guardsman who was pushing his way in.

"Throwing rings. It's a game. If you throw straight you get a samovar."

Pashka peered inquisitively into the brilliantly lighted interior over the heads of the crowd. The whole of the back wall was hung with red cotton. In front of it were three tiers of knives stuck on end. Among the knives enticing prizes were displayed. On the lowest tier—boxes, sweetmeats, cakes; on the middle one—alarum clocks, casseroles, caps; and on the top one, just below the roof in semi-darkness, particularly seductive articles—two balalaikas, a Tula samovar, yellow elastic-sided boots, an Italian concertina, a cuckoo-clock and a gramophone. You threw the rings and if you got one over a knife you won the article lying beside it. But it was almost impossible to throw a ring over a knife, for the knives were very flexible and the rings rebounded from them. Most amusing!

Pashka elbowed his way into the booth. A little old man with silver spectacles on his nose stood behind the counter, giving out the rings, forty throws for twenty-five kopeks. A heated young man with a moist shock of hair was laughing uproariously as he threw his last five rings. His coat flapped, the metal rings flew from his clumsy fingers, struck against the knives and fell with a clatter into the sack hanging beneath. The gaping throng laughed. The young fellow's face flushed. The knives rang and vibrated in ever-widening circles as the rings struck them.

"To hell with the knives and the rings too," the fellow cried out at last. "There's a ruble and a half chucked away. I might at least have got a Balaev cake!" And he vanished crestfallen among the crowd.

"Last Sunday someone won a pair of boots," said a youth in patched trousers, "and spent ten rubles to get them."

"Let me have a go," Pashka said, pushing his way up to the counter. "Just for the fun of the thing."

The old man handed him the rings.

"Now then," Pashka asked prosily, "if you hit a knife at the bottom, you win a Balaev cake. Is that it?"

"That's so," the old man said with indifference.

"And next row, an alarum clock?"

The old man nodded.

"Fine. And for a samovar, I suppose, you have to aim right under the roof?"

"Get your cake first. Then you can start talking," someone in the crowd remarked impatiently. "Get on! Make a start!"

Pashka put his photograph down on the counter, pushed the crowd aside with his elbows, took his stance, aimed—but suddenly the ring flew from his grasp, fell on its side and rolled away. Pashka had turned to stone. On a chair beside the shelves, with her hands demurely folded in her lap, sat a young, smartly-dressed girl, whose beauty was such that his eyes were blinded. The girl got up quickly from her chair, picked up the ring and handed it back to Pashka without raising her eyes; but at the last moment she smiled faintly and stealthily, only with the corners of her mouth—and Pashka was a lost man.

"Now then, what's up with you? Get on and win your samovar," the eager onlookers shouted behind him.

Pashka awoke and began to sling the rings one after the other, seeing nothing but the girl's lowered eyelids and her little mouth arched in the middle like a cherry. When he had thrown all forty rings she collected them and put them silently on the counter. But this time she did not smile. She only raised her grey eyes to Pashka and stroked back an ash-blond lock that had fallen forward from behind her ear. Pashka paid another twenty-five kopeks. The rings flew at random. The gaping crowd laughed and surged at his back. The knives hummed like bees. The old man scratched his nose in complete indifference with a hooked forefinger.

When he had squandered a ruble and not made a single hit Pashka forlornly left the crowd and walked under the lime trees along by the water which was dyed a rosy pink with the sunset. A light mist lay over the pond. The air was cool about his ears. The lights of a cinema were reflected as pillars of flame in the tinted water. Girls in twos with short-cropped heads and green and blue combs in their hair and their arms round each other's waists passed Pashka and nudged each other and turned round to giggle at him, "Isn't he too lovely, that boy." But Pashka went on without paying any attention and hummed to himself in a dream:

"The gipsy told your fortune, the gipsy told your fortune, the gipsy told your fortune, gazing on your hand."

Before the night was over he had lost his heart finally and irrevocably.

For a whole month Pashka went to the booth every Sunday to throw the rings. He threw half his earnings away. He did not take his holiday—he had quite forgotten it was his turn. He became quite crazy. The girl handed him the rings with lowered eyes as before. Only sometimes she smiled as if to herself. And sometimes when she suddenly caught sight of Pashka in the crowds she blushed so deeply that even her shoulders through the thin muslin seemed to glow like dark-cheeked peaches. In spite of all he could do, Pashka never succeeded in having a private word with her; either people got in the way or else the old man was watching them over his spectacles with angry eyes, scratching his nose at the same time with his hooked finger, as though threatening and warning Pashka: "Keep your hands off the girl. She is not for you. Get out of it." But once Pashka did succeed in speaking to her for one second. There were not many people there and the old man had just run round to the back of the booth with a birch to chase away the ragged children.

"Pardon me," Pashka said and his heart stood still, "what is your name?"

"Ludmilla," the girl whispered quickly with glowing cheeks. "I know you well. You once left your photograph behind on the counter and I've kept it. I've lost my heart completely—it's so beautiful."

She put one finger to her neck and pointed to the corner of the crumpled print against her collar bone. When she looked up she was blushing like a rose. "And what's your name?"

"Pashka. Won't you come to the Coliseum with me? It's quite a good piece: The Woman With the Millions."

"I couldn't. Father never lets me out of his sight."

"Come all the same."

"God forbid! If I went out he would never let me in again. And Mother is even worse. She has a stall at Sucharev Market in her own name. It's horrible how strict parents are. Simply frightful. We live in the Sretenka, Prosvirin Street, not far from here, number two, in the yard to the left as you go in."

"What are we to do, then, Ludmillotchka?"

"We can't do anything. Quick, throw your rings. Father's coming."

Pashka had hardly begun throwing when her father came in with the birch in his hand. He gave his daughter an angry look. So Pashka went away without having come to any arrangement. And when he went the Sunday after—the booth was shut and barred. On the signboard was: "Champion American Quoits, 40 throws 25 kopeks." A green parrot with a red tail was painted on a blue background. In his beak he held a ring, and the wind blew the yellow leaves of the lime trees past the parrot and whirled them all round the booth; the flowerbeds were over and done, not a soul was to be seen. Autumn had come.

Then Pashka remembered the gipsy's words: "An old man stands in your way . . . the knife will cause you a lot of trouble . . . the green parrot will bring you luck"—and the fury of rage he got into with the old crone passes description. He shook his fist at the parrot and went on through the dreary, yellowing gardens in a gusty wind that blew from all sides at once. He went to the Sretenka and found Prosvirin Street. It was a sombre day, grey and autumnal. Number two—there it was, green and white, with a small, poverty-stricken church opposite. Pashka entered the courtyard and turned to the left. But he had no idea where to go next. Then a street organ began to play in the middle of the yard; on it was perched a green parrot with a red tail, and it looked at Pashka out of round, unabashed and heavily lidded eyes. Then a little window opened on the second floor. A delicate little hand emerged and threw a coin wrapped in paper into the yard below. Through the double window over the padding of felt, decorated with gaily coloured snippets of wool, between the curtains and the pot-plants, Pashka caught sight of Ludmilla. She looked joyfully down at him, caressed the window with her pretty cheeks, made signs with her dainty little fingers, extended her arms, shook her head, nodded—there was no making head or tail of what she meant. Pashka too began to talk with his hands: "Come down, never mind your parents; I cannot live without you," but then a fat, moustachio'd woman in a Turkish shawl blotted Ludmilla out, shut the window with a bang and menaced Pashka with her finger.

Pashka dragged himself home, spent two weeks of torment, prowled round Prosvirin Street by night and terrified passers-by, who took him for a thief, got into desperate straits; and on the third Sunday cleaned his coat and trousers with cold tea, put on a pink tie, polished his shoes and went straight to beard the lion in his den—to offer his heart and hand.

Ludmillotchka herself opened the door, gasped with astonishment and clutched at her heart; but Pashka marched straight past her into the room where her parents were drinking tea with milk after their devotions and said:

"Bon appetit and your pardon, little Father, and yours, little Mother, but I cannot live without Ludmillotchka. I was lost the moment I set eyes on her. Do as you please—here I am, master smith of the 6th class, plus bonuses, member of the union since 1917, drink no spirits, pay alimony to nobody, so there's no trouble in that way either."

"I am no little Father to you," the old man screamed in an inhuman voice, "and my wife is not your little Mother. Do you understand that?"

"And what do you mean by listening to the street organ in the yard under the windows and bursting in on strangers in their own house?" the wife added in a bass voice. "So take that. The idea! We have very different suitors in mind. Think of it, 6th class! Last year even a house-owner from Miasnitzkya spoke for Ludmilla and we turned him down. Kindly leave the house, comrade! And the girl—under lock and key is well enough. We want no smiths here, not to mention Reds."

"I make up to a thousand rubles in hard cash by the Champion Quoits alone in the season," the father put in pugnaciously, "and the prizes alone are worth four hundred rubles. Ludmillotchka wants a husband with capital to extend the business. So—good day. Do you hear?"

"Then you won't let me have her?" Pashka asked in a voice of despair.

"No," the old man squealed.

"Very well," Pashka said threateningly. "If it's a matter of capital to extend the business, that puts the stopper on it. But you haven't heard the last of me. I'll lead you a dance yet. Good-bye, Ludmillotchka, hold on and—wait!"

Ludmillotchka, however, was sitting in the passage on a chest, wringing her hands.

Pashka set his teeth and went to Sucharev Market and bought himself a sharp kitchen knife. When he got home he shut himself up. Winter came and went. The ice was removed on sledges from the Fresh Ponds. Pashka went deliberately to work. Not an hour was given up to frivolity; at nights he lay low at home and his neighbours heard a subdued ringing noise proceeding from his room. Perhaps he was learning to play the guitar. No one could say. The river rose. The sun got warmer, the trees budded and put on their greenery, the rowing boats were transported on lorries to the Fresh Ponds. The photographers hung their Kremlins and moonlit nights in the walks. Of an evening the gardens were frequented by strolling couples.

Pashka went regularly Sunday by Sunday to see whether the booth was open yet. It was shut. The green parrot with a red tail sat against its blue weathered background, holding a ring in its beak, and the fresh green of the lime trees waved above it. Pashka was lean and sombre. One fine Sunday the booth was open. The gaping crowd surged round the entrance. The lights shone brightly within, the ring of metal and bursts of laughter could be heard.

Pashka shouldered his way through the crowd and stepped politely up to the counter. His eyes shone like steel above his strong cheek bones. Ludmilla was collecting the rings. No sooner had he entered than all the colour left her face and she went a transparent white. Her eyes were dark and her little mouth no longer resembled a cherry. Her father adjusted his spectacles and took a step back.

"By your leave, friends," Pashka said gruffly, shouldering a fellow aside who was throwing his rings, and without a glance at the old man he made a sign to the girl. She handed him the rings as though she were nearly fainting. He touched her cold fingers and tossed a three rouble piece down on the counter.

"You ought to have hired a cart, friend, for the samovar." There was a titter at his back.

Without turning round, Pashka took hold of the ring and flung it negligently. A brief tinkle was heard. The ring had fallen over the knife without so much as touching it. The old man scratched his nose hurriedly and uneasily put a box of Balaev sweetmeats down in front of Pashka. Pashka pushed it aside and threw his second ring as casually as he had the first. It fell just as easily and surely over the second blade. The old man scarcely had time to trot to the shelves before three more rings lightly skimmed the air and with scarcely a sound encircled three more knives. The crowd was dumb.

The old man turned his little face to Pashka and blinked. A dark drop of sweat stood out like a wart on his forehead. His trousers slipped down a little and bagged out. Pashka stood leaning elegantly on the counter with feet crossed and jingled his handful of rings.

"Well, Papa, what about Ludmillotchka now?" he asked quietly, looking aside with an air of indifference.

"I won't let you have her," her father answered in his treble pipe.

"You won't," Pashka said sleepily. "Right. Hey, you," he called out to a boy, "run to the Pokrovski gate for a cart and you shall have the samovar. Out of the way, Papa."

Pashka's face went steely. The veins stood out and branched on his brow. He braced himself and lightly raised his arm. Sparks shot from his finger tips. The knives quivered and sang under the assault of the rings. The crowd roared and raged and grew to a mob. People ran to the booth from all sides. Pashka scarcely troubled to take aim. He was frightful to look upon. Not a ring fell into the sack. In five minutes all was over. Pashka wiped his forehead with his sleeve. The crowd made way. The cart was drawn up outside the booth.

"Load up," Pashka said.

"What do you mean to do?" the old man asked in agony, hopping from one foot to another round the shelves.

"Do? Nothing. Chuck 'em all into the pond and have done with it."

"Yes, but why, comrade?" the old fellow whimpered like a woman. "The goods alone are worth four hundred rubles, let alone the business."

"To hell with it—even if they were worth a thousand. The plunder belongs to me. I haven't stolen it. I won it honestly. The people here are my witnesses. I practised all winter and not a wink of sleep have I had. I do what I like. If I like, I keep the loot. If I don't like, I chuck it into the water."

"That's quite right," the crowd roared enthusiastically. "Take your oath on it! But not the gramophone. Don't chuck that in too."

Volunteers soon had the cart loaded to the very top.

"Off you go," Pashka commanded.

"Where are you going?" the old man blubbered. "I shan't dare show my nose at my home again after this. . . . Are you really going to sink the lot?"

"Yes," Pashka said. "Drive onto the landing stage."

"Have you no shame in the sight of God?"

"God—that's a survival of the dark ages, Papa, a painted effigy like that green parrot. But this here is—fact," and he braced his brawny arm.

The cart moved off surrounded by a living ring of cheering people and did not stop until it reached the landing stage. Pashka took the leather boots from the top of the pile and threw them into the water. The crowd gasped.

"Stop," the old man cried in a voice not his own. "Don't throw them in the water."

Pashka laid his hand on top of the loot and said quietly, lowering his eyes:

"For the last time, Papa, I speak to you frankly, as man to man. Let all here bear me witness. Give me the girl and you can have your junk and I'll never again come within a hundred yards of your booth as long as I live. But otherwise I'll blow your whole show sky-high, Papa. I cannot live a day longer without Ludmillotchka."

"Take her!" the old man squealed. "Curse you—take her!"

"Ludmillotchka," Pashka said as he left the cart. His face was pale.

She stood beside him, hiding her face in her sleeve in her embarrassment. Even her little hands were red with shame.

"The show is over, comrades. You can go," Pashka said, taking the girl by the arm as carefully as if she were made of porcelain.

The scent of lilac filled the whole gardens. Lilac was everywhere, lilac petals in the hair, lilac petals in the water. The moon, high in the dark violet-blue of the sky above the lime trees, was as sharp as a knife. And its new-born light broke in reflections on the water, melting into rings large and small, just like gold wedding rings, come to life.

I: THE COMEDY

AND DON'T BETRAY ME," Mario Malvolto told his two friends. "Let them think I am coming back."

"You're not coming back?"

"I must go home. I've a headache. No, the truth is, I want to be alone."

"To reflect on your triumph. Good-night, you happy poet."

"You'll never sleep."

"Who knows? Good-night."

The other two went in. Mario Malvolto stood for a moment at the top of the stairs. At his back the noise of the banquet held in his honour died away. To left and right of him a gold-braided lackey bowed low. Holding his slight figure erect he went step by step down the rich, pale stair-carpet between the gilded rails.

"I must roll these vanities on the tongue," he thought as he went. "In there I was too much taken up with my part. Now I am master of the situation."

"Where are we driving to, Signore Malvolto?" the coachman asked.

"To Settignano."

"Why did he ask? Did he think I was going to Mimi—now? Oh, Mimi, you flapping silken flag! Fluttering now round one neck, now round another. I have kissed it whenever it came to my turn, even embroidered romance upon it. Yes, Mimi, you little cocotte of fleeting impulses, but without a trace of greatness in your sensuality, I have endowed you with passions you never had, given you, to my own satisfaction, out of vanity, out of desire, a whole life to live, as puppets are twitched into grandiloquent attitudes. You were only a girl. Adieu, Mimi.

"We want more, something stronger. A thing like Mimi can be loved in the intervals of writing a tragedy. It takes so little of the heart. My tragedy won the prize tonight. Yes, I am strong. But it is time to shun for good and all the little satisfactions that tend to weakness, and that you, who from my study wall challenge me with a look over your iron shoulder, forbid."

Would the cramping streets of Florence never come to an end? He suddenly felt a violent longing for the air of the hills, the air that shimmered with the glitter of olive trees, that was spiced with bay and left softly pungent kisses on his lips. Still the narrow streets echoed in the silence of the night and still the shadow of horse and coachman climbed up and down the walls. Then the houses of the suburbs came into view. The moonlight shone out over the first gardens.

"I have conquered that hill over there on which my house stands. And not only it—I have conquered all these hills."

His hand made a half-circle; it moved over the distant shape of a hill as over a woman's breast.

"The whole of this country, all its towns, every house to the very last of them I have had to conquer. For nothing of it all belonged to me. No hidden path in any corner of the land knew me from my start. Consider this today. You were born at sea of a mother of a foreign race. With your art as a maker of tragedies you have striven for this country, for every furrow of it, like an eager pilgrim in a coat of mail who sheds his blood in his fervour.

"Now I have a footing. Everyone in Italy knows in what village and on what table the sheet of paper lies which I cover with the written word. This evening the defeated passed me in procession, a whole theatreful, whom I had overthrown. What have I to reckon? Eleven calls. Spoken to by the Queen. Shaken hands with by the Count of Turin. Then the banquet. The two deputies, the Minister's telegram. The Mayor's speech. My rivals consoling themselves with ironical comments. What else? Nothing. There were no women at the banquet. No women—so what good is all the rest?"

Leaning out of the carriage, chin in hand, Mario Malvolto watched the blossoming trees swim far and near in pale moonlight. Before Ponte a Mensola he thought he caught a glimpse of another carriage high up ahead of his own. It vanished again instantly. Its hood was up. His coachman had seen nothing and who could be on the road at that time of night?

"Do women really know that at bottom everything is done for them alone? Many behave as though they believed in the intellect—the intellect, that helpless child, which can neither stand nor walk without the senses. We have only our sensuality; and to what purpose is it, what is its chief reward? The hours spent at the writing-table are hours squandered in the pursuit of women, a night dedicated to the Muses is a barren night of love. Do they know it? Why ask? Their distrust of talent says all and their preference for the dolt who belongs only to them, not to the book. The woman and the book are foes.

"A poet of twenty, as I well remember, has too much to say to them—that is why he is clumsy, silent, tongue-tied by his passion. This does not suit the creatures who know no delights but those of vanity. In those days each one of them set me dreaming as they sat in a salon or drove along the Corso. I would have thrown myself at the feet of her who rewarded me with a glance, at any cost, with a fanatic's resolution. They are not so foolish. Not one of them is tempted to console our neurasthenic extravagances of feeling. They are never drawn to our self-centred rhapsodies: it is success that inevitably attracts them. They rally to it; that is their métier. Fulfilling their function without a thought, they look on while we love-stricken ones perish for them. But they are the indestructible part of humanity. And I pray to them because I pray for strength!

"Then suddenly I gave my shyness of those days the slip—I and the little Princess Nora. What a surprise! A tutor of no position whatever, whom the ladies did not even give a parcel to carry! That desperate deed at once exalted me above them one and all. An elopement with Princess Gallipoli—where was the woman before whom I need drop my eyes? Ah, but I still had the old inclination to look to the ground. Since then there is no audacity with women I have not dared; but I have had to force myself to it every time.

"I am accused of callousness, of something worse than audacities. A man in society declined to fight a duel with me and a court of honour upheld him. The fools, they little dream that my callousness proceeds from my fear of my own tenderness. I suffer from excess of understanding, from too much reflection, too keen a foreknowledge of another's sorrow. I have every disposition to end up as a victim. What compulsion I had to put on myself to abandon little Princess Nora, to leave her dishonoured and outcast. Even today when I meet her in Rome in the higher circles of the demi-monde, I feel a sort of anguish. . . .

"Do I not often feel anguish over Tina, great tragic actress though she is, who suffers on my account?"

Mario Malvolto leant back again in the seat and scanned the top of a distant hill, where a villa rose moon-grey from the moon-grey billows of foliage. A light, a small light, like a needle or a thought, pierced the crown of a tree and transformed it to a burnished cloud.

"Where in the world is she now? How long I have been without news of her. It is bad this time, now that she declined to create the part of my Arachne tonight. Have I ever caused her a pain I have not suffered at her hands? Who can hold a candle to us two in hurting and being hurt? We know that we never work so well, are never such artists as we are in and for each other. And in spite of all angry words, all satiety and all hate we always rush together again. There is not a comedy in the world to match our love. Behind all our passions—fantastic emanations of our love—art is ambushed in the wings, ironically smiling and intent only on picking up a hint for a new part.

"From time to time one of us divines that the other is merely playing a comedy. And suddenly we are nauseated and fly apart. But four months later we meet again at a rehearsal. That is an accident of our profession. It has nothing to do with love—not with the love for whose sake in youth one toils all night and longs for fame. For I should like to know of what use fame is if it does not bring love with it. . . . Ah, it too is a phantom. The more hotly it is pursued the farther it retreats. When I was utterly unknown it had a corporal form: a king who poised a wreath of gold. Now that I have bought it up bit by bit and know of what it consists, what feelings can it any longer inspire? Celebrity is a gilded lie about myself that I myself have disseminated far and wide. It answers to someone who is not me. No one may know the truth about me.

"People have got to say: Malvolto has his way with women and life too; his reputation is not of the best. He's a man of steel, a realist and there you have the core of his work. The greatness and the strength of the race have come to life in a poet. He shows that even a slight frame can bear their weight. The Renaissance has returned, fully armed. . . . That is how people must talk; they must not have the faintest suspicion of my dark fears and of the diffidence that every woman, every great work of art, every robust man inspires in me; they must not dream that if my pages pulsate with life I pay for them with days of depression and hours of physical exercise. I do not wish them to dream it. Pain stands, chisel in hand, behind every perfected beauty. Have I not the right to be proud?

"I feel the melancholy pride that comes of work done not by strength but by merely willing it; of a life without native vigour that reaches up only in urgent desire, as a Niobe raises her arms. After all I have had, still today I yearn after women. I dream of them as I did when I was twenty—only more hopelessly. For I have put them to the proof since then and learn that they are no companions for the player. They are too like me—what have they to offer me or I them? They too wish for applause. They wish to be paid in the coin of passion: they cost me too much. I need my feelings—for my public. I have to harvest my soul so that others may drink the vintage. The more life I share out the poorer my own must be.

"But that rare Phoenix among women, who simply gives herself in reckless passion; who doubts nothing, demands nothing, not approbation, not martyrdom; who rolls up all her life and without a quaver, without a thought for the world or reputation or the future, casts it into mine, breathes with my breath and goes under in my doom—such a woman naturally is not for me. Even if she were to come in at my door in bodily form the miracle would be incomplete. For there would be no room for her in me and my daily life: she would be too large and too strong. There is room only for the longing she inspires.

"I longed for her again tonight—on the stage, through the hole in the curtain behind which I belong! I longed for all of them!"

Mario Malvolto laid his head back with a groan and plumbed the pale flood of the stars.

"I knew them nearly all. A few had been mine, a few more might be if I chose. What good would it be? Am I to use them for my sentimental education or my social advancement, as I did the little Princess Nora, or as studies for twenty different parts, as I have Tina, the tragedy actress? Or are they to be poor lifeless puppets like Mimi for me to dress up in fancied passions which are as false to them as they are to me? Or are they in the long run to find me out and send me away with a flea in my ear? . . . You get tired of plucking the stars up there with your eyes, one after one, and in the end your hands are empty. . . .

"That is how they shone in the circle tonight."

He looked at a large ripe star.

"The Linozzo. Long, flat Egyptian nose, long eyes close together. Black gleaming waves of hair just above her eyebrows. Wide soft mouth, moist, sinuous, darkly painted. She is desirable above all when she holds a gleaming fan to the corner of her mouth or when with her head thrust back she smiles over her shoulder out of the corner of her eyes. . . . She never took her eyes off me all the time I was in the Queen's box. She is ambitious—I could have her."

His eyes were caught by another luminary.

"The Borgofinale. A full profile, with rounded chin, staring out wild-eyed from a luxuriant mass of auburn hair above the sumptuous ermine collar of her cloak. She was one of the first to set me on fire. Her distracted face calls up a whole train of bogus emotions. But was she virtuous perhaps?

"An impossible one—the Lancredoni. Lean swarthy-skinned princess. Her small, Gorgon head with the fleeting lines of nose and forehead is borne on the stiff stalk of her neck. Her lace sleeve leaves her sloping shoulder, fragile and pure as porcelain, bare. The Princess yawns beneath the cold gleam of her tiara. . . . And tonight from behind my curtain I prevailed upon her! I gloried over her, knowing that I had more delight in her than he who held her every night in his arms! What is left to me? Perhaps a few lines that will appear in print. But for me, in my soul? . . .

"Then the young girls! There they sat, just in front of me, peering bright-eyed out of a world into which no path leads. The Cantoggi caught my eye once in the hole in the curtain. I started back at this look she shot without knowing where it found its mark.

"Which of them will come and take me by the hand and lead me home-wards into that country of hers where one is strong with the strength of innocent emotion?

"Not one. For they have nothing more pressing to do than to learn their parts in the comedy. Gemma Cantoggi, a child, fresh from the country, is to marry Lanti, a voluptuary past his prime. Charming!

"Suppose I asked of one of them the boon of self-oblivion—probably I should not be allowed to know anything of her either. There was a foreigner in the stalls, a strong and beautiful profile beneath the velvet knot of her large hat. A billowy scarf enveloped her to the lips in rosy chiffon. . . ."

Mario Malvolto dreamed on as he turned into the piazza of Settignano. The low, flatly curving gable of the church was powdered blue by the moon. A single lamp twinkled feebly in the wide starry night, in the midst of which, on its hill, the little town was sleeping.

Mario Malvolto heard a faint sound and saw a dark object moving at the end of the long narrow street. It could only be the carriage he had seen just now; its hood was up. A moonbeam fell suddenly across it; something white leant out. Where in the neighbourhood did that vehicle belong? Nowhere, the coachman replied. It vanished into the shadow.

They emerged from the narrow street and drove downhill for a short way. Mario Malvolto got out, walked for a few yards between two hedges and up eleven steps to his door. It was open and his servant lay asleep in front of it.

Mario Malvolto stepped over him and taking the lamp from a table in the hall went up the steps into his study. The busts of women on the bookcase in their close-fitting dresses of a long-past day smiled whitely from the sharp confines of their dreams; the large threaded pearls that encircled their foreheads seemed to quiver in the light of the moon.

It was so light in the room that Malvolto put out the lamp. He leaned against the open terrace door. How white the garden! All the dense, dark foliage over the whole ridge of the hill and right down to the wall with its ilex canopy shone in pale enchanted loveliness. The wistaria hung in a silver mantle round the bleached dead cypress. And even the camellias bloomed only as ghosts.

He looked into the room again and gave a start. For a moment it seemed to him that the more than life-size man there on the brightly lighted wall had brandished his sword in the air. Mario Malvolto, speaking in thought, addressed the man whose portrait was the only picture that looked down daily on his work:

"So we meet again. When I left you this evening I was eager for battle, strung up for resounding victory or for crushing defeat. It is victory. Wine and speeches swelled it out. I left them to it—secure in my triumph. I only need to draw it from my breast and look upon it, you see. And on my way home, moonstruck with ghostly musings, I found it a defeat—oh yes, a pale stillness of defeat, a worse one than if I had been whistled noisily off the stage.

"Have you too ever known a victory turn suddenly to defeat and elude your grasp at the moment when it rang loudest in your ears? War and art, they are both the same superhuman exaggeration. Do you know the nausea after an orgy? Answer, Pippo Spano!

"There you stand, erect, your iron legs astride, your gigantic blade athwart them in your hands of bronze. Your limbs are agile, ready alike for the assault, the chase, for hot embrace and thrust of cold steel, ready for wine and for blood. In the very sound of your name there is the whistle of a brandished blade and then a cleaving blow. Iron is arched over your broad chest and a golden girdle encircles your slender hips over the joyous blue of your doublet. You have a short, forked beard, your mouth stands out brutally in your lean face and dull blond locks of hair hang about it. You look over your shoulder with head thrown back and blazing eyes, alert and terrible. On closer scrutiny, a smile can be seen: a smile born of an excess of ruthless self-confidence; a smile that refuses to be questioned; the mere hint of a smile that causes a profound dismay, overwhelms with sudden dread, rivets the eyes, excites defiance and at last extorts respect.

"Since you know so unutterably how to triumph, how fearfully you must often have known defeat! Yes, how you must have suffered, you and the painter of your portrait, who was as strong as you. Great works of art—your life or your portrait—only rise to such glamorous heights because they have known the abyss. Ah, you smiter of the Turks, don't try to deceive me—I hear your shout of rage when a blow got home. I see you bleed when a friend betrayed you. I can almost imagine the orgy of pain you suffered whenever a woman dug into your heart with her sharp finger-tips."

Mario Malvolto folded his arms. Still with his eyes on the condottiere's face he drew nearer and said in a whisper:

"You see, I pine for such orgies too. I am too fragile for them and too diffident, that is why I create characters who are otherwise. That is why you stand there to be my conscience, my compulsion to greatness. You are to give me a loathing of the measured joys, of that economy in suffering with which we poor moderns content ourselves. Our art represents the bourgeoisie of the soul. Paltry neurasthenics live out their seventy years of humdrum life, indulging daily in a pennyworth of pain and six pennyworth of comfort. The artist burrows laboriously in his constipated soul, in his own exclusively, and proudly displays the sorry stuff he brings to light. Rancorously he shuts his eyes to all that has strength or vivid colour.

"But I mean to live! I want to be lavish; in my brief span my art shall make me a second, mightier life. I will know nothing of the weakling that I am; I know enough of him already. I will experience alien beauties, alien pains. Really alien. Women who die for love, exquisites of exorbitant desires, sculptors who chip their hearts out on a block of marble. They dig the phantoms of hell out of the rock and their pain is the whirlwind that blows souls through the purple gloom. . . . To such as these I will go out, who do not play eavesdropper to their own peevish moods, whose destiny is not chained to the poverty of their own blood. No, they are called to battle in the world outside them and they must fling themselves into the fray!

"I will force my way into their life, as though it were encompassed with a quick-set hedge, a prouder, more impulsive world, where violence and the intoxication of surrender reign, where unutterable defeat is drunk to the dregs and splendours without a name, where life is lived to the full and death comes once for all.

"And the woman whom you, Pippo Spano, could love, she is the goal of all my longing. She comes to meet me as the sum and end out of the world I conjure up. Is it not so——"

And Mario Malvolto, forgetting himself, spoke louder:

"Is it not so, she comes to meet me? Do you believe it, Pippo Spano! She comes——"

He broke off: there she stood.

She stood on the threshold of the little white drawing room, whose shadows were suddenly illumined by the moon. She herself was white and clothed in moonlight. Her pale face, short nose, vigorous lips were framed in heavy black coils of hair. At every breath she took embroidered silver flowers were shed from her small slight figure, from her shoulders and her neck; her life was in her breathing. She lifted her arms to the curtain of the door and her sleeves, made entirely of the petals of the flowers, fell in a shower of pale leaves. Her arm, the pistil within them, shimmered in the moon.

Mario Malvolto had drawn back. He clasped his forehead. A hallucination? He had drunk a lot of wine and even more deeply of rhapsody. But his heart beat quietly and firmly, his spirit was unusually clear and unencumbered. Would that spectre never go? . . . He took two quick steps towards it. But it held its ground, it even spoke.

The girl said quietly and simply:

"Mario Malvolto, I love you. I am here for us to love each other."

II: THE MIRACLE

THEN HE RECOGNISED Gemma Cantoggi.

"You—here! But a word, Contessa, would have sufficed," he stammered. "I would have hastened to you."

"Yes, but I have come to you instead," she replied.

"But you compromise yourself."

"Oh, no. We have a house quite near. They think I am spending the night there. I often leave our town house at night when the mood takes me. My maid came with me. She is in the secret."

He looked dubiously at her. This was the Cantoggi who was to marry Lanti, the voluptuary who was past his prime; one of those unusually beautiful women whom in their day all men desire and all women hate; for whom a boy takes his life; who for twenty years dance in the van of fashion and who when their day is done have promised happiness to a thousand and kept their promise to six or seven, and left a lingering and intoxicating fragrance behind them in the memory of a few old gentlemen. What were they in themselves? What did their lives mean? He knew: the influence they exercised, the martyrdom of the man and the applause of the crowd.

Was she here as a colleague, the actress to the playwright? Did she seek advice how to reach the pinnacle of success? He had scarcely grasped and did not believe one word of what she had said.

"But what brings you here?" he asked in agitation.

"Love of you, Mario Malvolto," she replied, and her voice trembled slightly.

"Contessina, you are a child. If you love me why did you not ask some friend of yours to introduce me to you? I should have fallen at your feet."

"We should have had no freedom at home. We should have had to marry in order to love each other."

"Ah!"

He felt a wicked satisfaction.

"The Contessina Cantoggi would not want me for a husband!"

"You would have engaged yourself to me, Mario," she said without understanding what he meant, "before you knew what I was like. You would have sworn you loved me and perhaps it would have been a pretence. As soon as I saw it, all would have been over. I want us to love each other without anyone's knowing. You are not to flatter yourself: I am loved by the beautiful Cantoggi and all Florence knows it. Do you hear? You are not to do that."

"Do you think I am so sunk in vanity?" he muttered.

"No, I do not. Forgive me. I am jealous in advance. I want to shut you up here."

She crossed the threshold into his study and went impulsively up to him.

"And I could not bear it if we saw each other before strangers and had to speak to each other with reserve. I want to be always—— Listen, I love you!"

She suddenly opened her arms, casting off a last shred of modesty:

"I want to be always naked with you!"

A wave of emotion swept over him; he took her in his arms.

"If I could believe that you were really in my arms!"

He groaned, with his mouth in her hair. The Phoenix of a woman who wished to make him rich with reckless passion: there she was, there was the miracle. One of those young girls who peered out clear-eyed from their world into which no path led: there she was, there was the miracle.

"If I could believe it!"

"You feel me," she said quivering. "And you must surely feel that I love you."

"I do feel it," he said, in pity more for himself than her.

"And you will love me?"

"I will, I will indeed!" he cried in pain.

With her face buried in his neck she asked: "Have you ever thought me beautiful before? Would you have wanted me?"

"You—only you."

And he knew he lied and yet was honest. He had desired all women and would always desire them. But did he not now hold them all in this one girl? Perhaps, perhaps.

"I too," she said, looking up with wide eyes. "You—only you."

"Then you knew that you caught an eye through the hole in the curtain tonight and whose eye it was?"

"No."

"Not? Have you not often caught sight of me in a box? And tonight on the stage when I was called before the curtain?"

"No. I didn't really know you by sight. I trembled when you came on to the stage. It might have been someone else, a friend of yours."

He was speechless.

"We have lived so long in San Gimignano," she explained. "I have only lived here since my father died and my brother was in garrison in Florence."

"Then you came because I am famous."

"Famous? I don't know. Perhaps I've heard people talking a lot of nonsense about you; but I didn't know it was you they meant. I had read your books, but I never noticed the name."

Mario Malvolto thought: So much for fame.

"There were people in them I could understand. I said to myself: I should have behaved and felt like that, if——"

"If——"

"If I came across that man. With my fiancé, I knew, I could never experience anything of the sort."

"Yes, you are engaged."

"I was. I broke it off before coming to you."

"I don't understand all that."

"It's so simple. Tonight in your play I saw the same people living and dying as those I knew in your books. They were more vivid than the people with whom I dine and drive in the Corso. They did not smile so much and I could believe them—because they died!"

"Because they died."

"When I got home I looked at the name of the author of the novels. It was yours. Then I drove up here."

He was enchanted. How trusting, how resolute a passion! To think that it was before his eyes, within his grasp! But he bethought himself: she wanted more of him. He had suddenly to repress a pang.

"Do you suppose then that I resemble my creations? Perhaps I make them so because I am otherwise."

"But you have made them. You must have carried them in your heart. . . . It is so simple; tonight I suddenly saw it all so clearly. If the people we might love do not exist in our world, if they do not exist anywhere at all—still we seek them in the heart of him who has created them! Why don't women do that? It would be too silly not to come to you."

"I am not so strong. . . ."

It seemed to him as though he wrestled with this seventeen-year-old girl, as though his life were at stake.

"Your betrothed, Contessina, is a hero compared to me. I know he has the show of vigour rather than the reality, more of the swordsman's alertness than nerve and muscle. But judging from his looks, at least, I'm sure he is no backward cavalier. You have much to expect from him, after all."

"I know pretty well what I have to expect," she said with a shrug of her shoulders. She sat down at his table in the chair he sat in when he worked. She played with his pen, threw a notebook to the floor and propped her chin on her hands.

"When he used to visit me at San Gimignano, when I walked with him on the crumbling watch-tower, high amidst the ivy with the blue landscape beneath—do you know what he reminded me of? Of an Englishman taking photographs of it. Do you suppose he had the haziest notion of all I had felt there, all one can feel in sixteen years in those ivied turrets, on those warm ruinous walls among the ilex trees? I would have been ashamed to utter one word of it . . . but to you——"

"To me?" Mario Malvolto said, stretching out his hands with a sense of guilt for the gift she offered.

"To you I can tell it all."

And she sprang to her feet.

"Or rather, you know it already. You have felt it too, it is from you I learnt it!"

He flinched away from her.

"We writers drive a shady trade. We procure you pleasures, but that does not mean that our . . ."

"You're being modest. You're playing the coquette." And when he made a deprecating gesture: "Or else you don't believe me."

They both stretched out their arms simultaneously.

"Not believe you!"

That was not possible. Her breath, her look, and the very lines of her body were truth itself. The tender lines of her body, a soul incarnate, swept through him, vibrant with passion. He throbbed with them; he wished with all his heart they might enwrap his heart and break it together with every artifice within it; overpower it and enslave it. Never to feel anything but her! That was his goal—a goal to reach in swoon.

"Listen," he begged, hoarse with torment, "you are deceived in me. I am not so honest as you. I cannot be."

"Would you say so if you were not?"

"I am trying to be at this moment. But you must not try me too far. Believe me—your betrothed, he may be cold—but even so he has more good feeling than I have. He is, after all, nearer to you."

And when she denied it with a look:

"He may not be able to look backward into your childhood's dreams. Be glad that he cannot. He will be able to love you all the more truthfully as you are if he lacks the gift of imputing to you what never was, or is no longer."

She walked away and sat down on the ottoman and folding her arms over the cushion leant her breast against it.

"I know more about him than that," she said slowly, looking far away into the moonlight. "His mistress has told me about him."

"The Traffetti?" he asked quickly.

"I went to her. Does that surprise you? She is a great singer and a beautiful woman. I considered how little reason she could have to withhold the truth. And she was the only person who could tell it me. . . . Well, he is weak, he . . . can do very little. How can I put it? . . ."

He started back: "Does she take me for a bull?" She read his gesture.

"I am not a child. I can make up my own mind. He needs artificial stimulus and expedients, he asks things of his mistresses that—that the Traffetti had to explain to me."

"Oh—oh—she explained all that to you?"

He thought: "A young girl going to a whore to be put right about the capacities of her betrothed— No, I should never have imagined that. Who could?"

She looked at him wide-eyed.

"And you—you don't need that."

"No," he admitted in astonishment.

She went on with vehemence:

"You suspected me just now of base desires. Yes, I know you did. Don't deny it. You little know me . . . The worst is not his lack of robustness, but that he has no love. The Traffetti loves him. She cried when she told me about him."

"But he fought a duel on your account the other day," Malvolto said without thinking.

"I don't want anyone to fight for me as he did. He held his ground calmly and coldly the whole time, keeping his opponent's fury at a distance—his eye always on the other's sword-point—until at last he could pass his guard. . . . A man who avenges an insult to his beloved does not look so! There is no love in him, I tell you."

Very well, Malvolto thought and gave up the defence of her bridegroom. He watched her as she undid her tightly fitting bodice. A brooch rolled on to the carpet. He caught a glimpse of blue-veined flesh shimmering through the lace. She was behaving like a child who had got home, tired and happy, after a long day.

"I shall never get to feel his soul. Yours I have often felt. I bring you mine."

She stood up.

"And my body."

He rushed to her, fell on his knees, rained kisses on her arms and her hands. All at once he was warmed through and through by the sense of her soul that for months had thought of his and now had freed itself from captivity, from alien toils; feeling its way, a passionate somnambulist, through the moonlit woods of its own profound premonition—to him! She had come—she had stepped out of the white parlour in a shaft of moonlight. There she stood, created for him and, without him, incomprehensible. There she lay on his breast to release him, to induct him into the sacredness of life, to fill his lungs with her breath and teach him how in forgetfulness of all else to feel and live with strength!

"I love you, Gemma!"

She only smiled with her hands on his hair.

"But I believe," he cried out within himself. "The miracle has come to me. I am strong enough to believe it and find salvation in it."

He jumped up and put his arm round her. . . . Suddenly his blood ran cold. "Yes, you believe, you actor. And first thing tomorrow morning you will be wondering what artistic use to make of your moment of belief!

"But I love her," he protested to his adversary, "and she me. Am I not a human being?

"No, you are not. You only play at being one. Forego your effect for once, just this once out of pity for a child. Think——

"Oh, I know and I am afraid. This is not just a romantic episode to take up and drop as soon as one is tired of it. It is not a house with two entrances. It is a defile and once within it there is no issue but there where the torrent pours over the rock."

Reluctantly he let go of her. His eyes, distraught with pain, wandered round the walls and suddenly met those of Pippo Spano. Pippo Spano was smiling now. His terrible smile, inscrutable hitherto, now said in so many words:

"Is this the strength which I, your conscience, was to wring from you? A woman throws herself at your feet. You go to her on the current of your blood. And are you going to allow the pale cast of thought to show that life the door? Do so—but never again seek to smuggle yourself out of the world of weaklings into mine, where men love and rob and, if it must be, die."

Mario Malvolto snatched Gemma from the floor. All his blood rushed to his head and, like a warrior whose booty clasps his neck with her white arms, he carried her into his bedroom.

III: BELIEF

MARIO MALVOLTO stood alone on his terrace and watched the sun come up. Gemma had gone. He listened to the last echoes of the storm of joy she had aroused in him. Soon it would have died away. If she came back that evening still in the same glory of passion, how would she find him? He did not know. Twenty hours might sweep him far away. He would make an effort to get back to her. Perhaps he would succeed.

"No, no. We'll part at once. I will not see her again. That is the strong thing to do, for I still desire her and ever shall. . . . I will write to her. She will suffer. It will be a clean cut, as swift as our happiness. Unless one died of it, it is bound to pass. If I gave way to pity now and tried to deceive her, I should only be opening the way to long anguish, quivering resuscitations of what must die in the end."

He went down the steps into the garden and as he walked along the paths between the trees and bushes he wrote in his head:

"My adored Gemma!

"I still have the right to call you so today. If you came back again tonight, it would perhaps already have become a lie—the first of all the many lies with which I should seek to reprove our love. I will not have that. We were too strong and too happy. I want to repay the truth of your feeling with the utmost truth that is in me. Listen, my Gemma.

"You love me still, I know. You are convinced that you love me for ever. And you would consider a feeling null and void that foresaw its own death. But that, Gemma, is the case with mine. Oh, it is not that in the years to come I shall not wish you here as ardently as I do now at this moment! But if you came in two hours, perhaps even so you would come too late. Perhaps, beloved, even in the closeness of your embraces last night I was already untrue to you. Who knows whether I may not have sought out words with which to describe them? Art is your rival, Gemma, and one you may not lightly challenge.

"Sometimes you would find me clasped to her hard breast when you came with open arms into my room."

Mario Malvolto watched a tress of wistaria slip through the hollow of his hand and wondered: "Hard breast? Has art a hard breast?" He let it pass for the moment.

"You do not understand me, I know. You think one can drop one's occupations when a woman comes in. Lanti, if you married him, would send his horse away the moment you asked. A stockbroker would finish with his clients. Money is a passion that seldom holds its ground against a woman. With art, Gemma, it is another matter. It alone and war and power are superhuman exaggerations that claim the body and soul. But art is the most ravenous of the three, it engrosses the other two. It alone so hollows out its victim that he is left forever incapable of a genuine feeling, of frank surrender. Think—the whole world to me is only raw material for a phrase. All you see and enjoy—those walls of San Gimignano, over which your childish dreams ran like squirrels, would be no joy to me unless they evoked the words that mirrored them. Every golden evening, every weeping friend, all my feelings and even my pain over their decay are all only matter for words. And so would you be too. Gemma, that is intolerable.

"I shall never sit with my wife and be happy in the sight of her. I should be thinking how her features could best be described, how and in what original way they had to be looked at to take me by surprise and compel the arresting word. When I had your wonderful flesh—I use a really banal word, wonderful—when I felt it within my hands, I should be seeking out a better, a word that captured the essence of your flesh and yours alone.

"I should be assiduous enough: you would often see me in a fever of uncontrollable emotion. Do not mistake that for love. It is essential to me to cheat myself into states of feeling in order that I may be able to represent them. I have to enter into people who are strong and beautiful as you are, vibrate with their nerves, riot in their pleasures, be damned with their damnation and share their downfall. I cannot know people out of myself, for I am not a person: I am a player.

"Think of all the women you meet in society and with whom you exchange a word or a smile; think of each single one and know that I have already been unfaithful to you with her and will be so again—in my heart. And yet nothing ought to go on in it but you! But there is worse still: I shall be unfaithful to you with yourself, with a counterfeit Gemma.

"Those creations of mine you love, for whose sake you threw yourself into my arms, Gemma, they were all once real people. I have falsified them to gain my artistic ends. I shall falsify you too. I am on the way to it already. This letter is the first of the artistic uses I shall put you to."

Mario Malvolto had tears in his eyes. He was genuinely suffering; but it was to his advantage to suffer. "My letter will be good," he told himself.

"You, Gemma, are a woman and there would of necessity be times when you were moody, sick and sad at heart; you would come to your beloved for consolation. I would lavish it on you, do not doubt. From selfishness—to learn more of life. Your sufferings and my sympathy would both serve my turn. . . . Yes, if you died, my beautiful Gemma, I would despair, you may be sure. But even before you had breathed your last, your death and my despair would furnish me with two characters for a play.

"Do not hate me for it! I live condemned to loneliness behind the glare of the footlights that separate me from all spontaneous, unexploited feelings. How I should love it to be otherwise—and that the heart-throbs that beset me in the intoxication of your warm blood were not a substitute for the agitations that rise from an ink-pot.

"If I could but give myself to you utterly, once and for all! Renounce all I have won, all that the long pursuit of art has made of me, and lay it all on your knees! No more would be known of me but that I had vanished for love of a woman. And I would make of the whole country as far as my fame has gone only one single laurel-grove for your little feet!

"All my desire is to be numbered with the strong ones who could do thus, those condottieri of life who gulp their whole lives in a single hour and die happy. Instead of facing this forlorn parting, we ought to have died together, Gemma, this very dawn!"

Mario Malvolto broke off.

"And why not tonight?" he cried out as he stood in the sun-flecked shadows of two rose bushes. "Why not the day after tomorrow or any other day when we were happy?"

"Mark, my friend, what a shabby commonplace trick you are playing! You would like in due course to be quit of the girl you have enjoyed; you uncover her little secrets, which are your concern alone. You have no right to. Now that you have once taken her with a high hand, now that you have carried her off as plunder to your bed—do your duty and be strong to the end. She came to you as to an artist of other days who gave two women their due, one on canvas and one in bed. At bottom you are afraid that one or the other may prove too much for you. Then die of her. The miracle has happened. This miracle called woman arose from a prouder, more impulsive world conjured up by your longing and stepped into your room. You gave it welcome; now believe it. Now believe it your release. And if you are too weak to believe, then die for it notwithstanding, as a martyr is nailed in silence even though without conviction to the cross."

Mario Malvolto took his resolve. He tore the letter he had written in his head to pieces. Then he went in and stood with folded arms in front of the portrait of Pippo Spano. No, Pippo Spano did not smile. Or perhaps he did? But his smile had never been so inscrutable.

Gemma came to her lover that night and the next night and every night.

It seemed to him that belief was within his grasp. You had to go through the motions, live in its rites, follow its dietetic prescriptions. At last it came. The problem was to conquer art that pressed a mask upon the face of love, to wrench one's own spirit round as though it were a horse, to turn away one's creative curiosity from all the world and concentrate it on a woman with the sole ambition of fashioning within oneself a perfect love.

"Occasional excesses," he told himself, "are not so dangerous to the state of mind required for artistic effort as the slow flooding of the system with small doses of alcohol. From now onwards I will drink wine every day.

"I will go visiting at the hours when I might be working and I will choose the houses of the least intelligent people."

"It was a mistake," he confessed a few days later, "for I had time, the way they talked there, to think out a story between two of their remarks."

But he returned just as dissatisfied from houses of greater pretensions.

"These two weeks of idleness have given me a frightful alertness. Everything that an artist experiences in society touches me to the quick: the prick of conscience at the sight of beauty, the exasperation at the least sign of indifference, the discouragement caused by the success of talented mediocrity, the paeon that greets a woman's friendly glance and the deep melancholy if he fails to please. My sensibilities react instantaneously to all that provokes the busy instincts of us artists—our vindictiveness, our urge to put a bridle on nature, to impose ourselves on the world, our ostentation and our thirst for self-glorification.

"I will stay at home."

He tried reading a book for the sake of its contents. Up to now he had opened one only to appropriate something as his own. The experiment prostrated him with unutterable boredom. So he went for walks.

He laid it down as a law that the hazy line of the hills on the horizon had no name; that no words corresponded to the silver eyes the olive yards opened when the sunlight flitted over them. Mostly he lay down in the open country beneath a tree and closed his eyes, as a sick man who hopes to gain courage from the measured breathing of nature and who must not be exposed to the shock of its light and stir. "Nature will heal me. I am a sick man, obsessed by art."

If ever he ventured to look on nature, it seemed to him to have a new tenderness. The kindly earth gave herself shyly to him again as to a convalescent. Never had he encountered her so calmly, so undemandingly as now; never since, when he was a boy, the fearful desire had seized him to wrestle with her and bend her beneath the yoke of words. Now at last this fear relaxed, daily a little more. The earth would no longer be conquered; the distant scene nodded kindly and that grassy mound pressed him as a friend to its breast.

Once in mid June he was standing in the pinewood above Settignano on a stony track, brown with pine needles, looking down into a valley over which a sudden artillery of clouds shot beams of light. Now a river sparkled out on the edge of the dark arable; now an impetuous green flame leapt at the steep wall of a wood; now a house blazed white from the massed shadow of cypresses. Mario Malvolto savoured the pleasure of being allowed to see it all without having to depict it in words.

Suddenly the light that leapt a distant meadow and caught a flock of sheep, a rock, a man, suddenly the light became a figure and the figure drew nearer. It was white and nimble. It hastened between the dry branches at the bottom of the wood from which Malvolto looked down. His heart beat faster: he knew who it was. It was she now who lived in the coppices where for so long only words had roosted! Her limbs flashed in the stream; that flickering flight of birds bore the desire of her on to love's horizon.

"The earth is full of her! My senses encounter nothing that does not breathe with her breath. And I clothe her, not in a garment of words but in kisses. She brings no masterpiece to birth in me—only love. I love her, I love her!"

He ran home, thinking he would find her there also.

"I'm a fool. She has only just gone."

Nevertheless he leant over the garden wall, keeping a look out for her. And there she was. She sprang white and nimbly from a thicket, caught in a noose of light, as he had seen her just a moment before far away between the fields in the valley. She was chasing a fledged nestling that fluttered on to a branch behind the well. She jumped up on to the narrow rim of the deep well and ran round it without so much as a glance at her feet. The wind of her sleeve made the branch quiver and the light that shot from the clouds seemed to run with her. She was herself a feathered creature balanced in air and the garden enticed her to all its secret haunts. She was just stretching out her hand to catch the little siskin . . . but Mario saw her danger and was alarmed; she heard his shout and looked round, shading her eyes with one hand. She gave a choking cry of joy, the cry of an upspringing bird, and jumped down from the well. She ran with flying skirt to the wall, caught his hand, felt with her feet for the footholds between the stones and so reached his kisses. They curled up together like two squirrels on the warm wide top of the wall and their kisses were playful and impulsive. Gemma, mute and fierce, bit her lover in the neck and all the while her eyes, darkly wavering with passion, looked back into the garden. Her desire drew her there and she let herself down and pulled him after into her lawless realm, among bushes laden with crimson flowers that nodded and bled as the lovers sank entwined between them.

Mario Malvolto felt that he had embraced a woman for the first time. He, and the whole world with him, had been for the first time entirely consumed by a woman, translated body and soul into the strength of a woman's being. And from these seconds of boundless life it was bitter to turn back; it was as though he left years of vigorous and lavish life behind him. Still—he had loved. Gemma had made a man of a player. She had led him with her light and noiseless tread so far back into nature that new horizons dawned. He to whom life had ever been but a pretext, who had merely experimented with all that causes suffering or joy, who had believed in nothing and attached himself to nothing; he who had sat in the next room without presentiment while his mother died—it was to him that Gemma had called from afar. He could not assess his gratitude: there were no words to describe his happiness. He sought for none and had none—only the name he suddenly found for her, Santa Venere.

She had come to announce very good news: her brother had been ordered on manoeuvres. He was leaving in three days and perhaps they would be left alone for months together. Gemma was now moving into her villa near by and she had put off all possible visitors by saying that she would always be out for long walks. What bliss opened before them! Suddenly they looked down a magic avenue of days whose green, luxuriant perspective was shot with gold; and, far down the black marble galleries of the nights ahead, gleamed delight.

When she had gone, all at once he felt empty; he came back bitter and empty out of another life. He wandered aimlessly from room to room. Here lay one of her gloves, there some flowers, picked and thrown down. A book of pictures lay on its crumpled face in a corner. One of the Florentine ladies of a past century wore a huge collar round her neck that was now once more the latest fashion. Malvolto put on his hat as though he were in a café or in any other place where by chance he had an hour to while away. He was no longer at home; the house was hers, that alien creature of lawless energies who came on wings, embraced and flew away. She had leagued herself with Pippo Spano to introduce love's martial law within his walls. Pippo Spano drew himself up against the crimson arras, resolute and alert. Mario Malvolto did not feel equal to this perpetual battle-alarm. He gave a sad look into the devastation of his bedroom and into the bathroom, where the taps were dripping. Only the little white drawing room where she had first appeared to him in the moonlight was undisturbed. She never entered it—it was too fragile and soft for her. Tina, his great tragedienne, used to sit there when she came and when they roamed hand in hand as friends through long days devoted to the Muses. "Yes—she left me time to work. In fact, we loved each other in order to work. Was that so very awful, after all?"

With a sigh he unlocked the drawer of his writing-table where the manuscript of the work he had been busy upon lay hidden. This was the only spot in the whole room on which Gemma had not yet laid her despotic little hand.

"My God, how long since I wrote! I cannot imagine now how I ever wrote this at all. I couldn't write a page more of it now. My talent has gone!"

He held his head in his hands.

"When we've done with each other, this girl and I—we must after all be done some day—what months of hygiene, what a regime of boredom I shall need to get me up to scratch again. I wonder whether she has the faintest notion that she has already cost me half a novel? She is expensive; but it's incredible the value women put upon themselves, what they accept without a thought. It's well known, of course; only moments come when the discovery is made afresh. Oh, well. No doubt the affair will give my mind a lot to feed on. Perhaps I was in need of a strong dose of real life; otherwise art is left to fertilize itself. I shall find out later what use the girl has been to me. Later . . .”

He tossed the manuscript back into the drawer and went out on to the terrace, forgetting the key for the first time. He drew a deep breath. Already he desired her again.

Next day a letter came in place of her. She said she was moving house and her brother was giving her a lot to do before he left. Three days more!

Mario Malvolto spent those three days in his room doing nothing, ever on the alert. She might be meaning to take him by surprise. Any moment a twig might snap down there in the garden as she pushed her way in at the secret little gate. But the days had run out before she came. She laughed slyly. “How the waiting must have sharpened your appetite . . . and mine!” she said frankly, as her arms quivered round his neck.

She had had an idea since seeing him last.

“Tell me, do you ever work?”

He drew back.

“No, but I want to know. Whenever I’ve come you’ve just been waiting. Or roaming the country. You look very well, better than at first. But I have never found you at your desk. You don’t think I want to keep you from it?”

He understood. She wanted him altogether and everywhere—even at his writing-table. “She’s afraid I write in secret and live a double life. If she only knew how mistaken she was!”

She had observed the key in the lock of the drawer and fell upon it and took out his manuscript.

“Now I’ve got you! So you’ve never shown me this. And something so precious!”

It was the first time he had seen her touch any object with reverence. She put the pages carefully on the table without disarranging them.

“Sit down!”

“I am to write? Gemma, what are you thinking of? I have been longing for you for three days!”

“I don’t want you—unless you write!”

He obeyed. Confusedly he turned the written pages and recalled with an effort the next sentence he had had ready in his head. He wrote it down and could not get any further. When he looked up Gemma stood there naked, holding her arms level with her shoulders.

“Now write,” she said softly and with a menace in her softness.

He sat upright and changed colour and bit his lip. She began to dance; he felt her wafted about him like a large, very white flower, stirred by a hot breeze.

“I want your genius to live in me,” she whispered.

She gazed past him. All the blood rushed to his head. Visions of unimagined creations came to birth in him, a true primeval forest of the spirit, glowing with petals, succulent with sap, howling with wild beasts, and impenetrable. He saw that he was helpless; he could not master a single feeling, carve one clear-cut image, light on one word. "It will all come later. Later . . ."

He caught sight of her facing him on the threshold of the terrace. Her outline was touched with pink and a lustre of gold veiled her body. She was a shell precious for its rarity; her hair fell about her like seaweed.

She was a nymph who flitted past him like a beam of light, too swift for recognition, peeping for a moment slyly and wildly over his shoulder and the next moment nothing was left of her but the faint fragrance lingering as the echo of a fairy dream.

"Unless you write——" she said at last.

He wrote the first words that came into his head. She approached inquisitively and sat on the arm of his chair and looked over his shoulder. He saw the muscles of her graceful legs ripple and wrote on. What did it matter? He rode for a fall with a thrill of satisfaction. He felt he was far beyond all that once he had prized most highly. Art? The sheer loneliness of art? Art one drained one's life blood to nourish, for which one beggared oneself, for whose sake one put off the man and put on the player? Ah—now he was playing a comedy. But his work, his work at his desk, art itself was the comedy and he played it for love to see!

Now Gemma took his head in her arms and bent it back, just as though she took a child home who had played about long enough. It had all been only the battle between the woman and the book. "How I love her for having won!"

She let herself slowly down upon him in eager, full and deep-red kisses that smelt of iris, her native perfume. When he shut his eyes it seemed that the great blue petals closed over him for ever.

She had to go home. A moment later he gave a start. "I see her at this moment as distinctly as if she had never gone. My brain and all my blood are so full of her body, of her flower-coloured arm round my neck, of her long, softly rounded thighs, of her danced caresses. I am brim full of her every movement! I, my house, my garden, this hill—everything is charged with her life. It lies littered about as flowering branches torn from the tree and I see them and seize them and inhale their scent! Poetry is dumb—I have only living images of incarnate beauty."

When she came back in the evening he took her to the long loggia on the shadowed side of the house, on whose walls Orpheus, young and lean, strode between slim and scarcely budding trees and Galatea poised bright limbs over a deep blue sea. The olive yard intruded its pale clouds of leaves almost under the arches.

"It is not impossible that Pan may be watching from the field out there. No one else."

"Let's hope not," she said lightly with a smile.

"The peasant only comes out to work in the cool of the evening and his vineyard is locked. In the garden there is not a spot overlooked from any house near by. It is your people I am anxious about. How do you explain your long absences?"

"I? I don't. That is my companion's business. She can surely think of some place where I might be."

And the girl's passion that threw prudence to the winds and scorned all stratagem struck him in the face with the force of a tornado. His heart stopped.

The sun was just rising when they woke. The first sharp beams pierced the open window and were shivered to gold-dust in the long peacock-blue curtains. Gemma held out her hand to catch it. She jumped out of bed and climbed with the thin cloud of her nightdress floating about her impetuous limbs on to the foot-end of the bed and stood there in an aureole of blue-green light. It was the light on the floor of fabulous seas. The whole room, tiled floor, walls and furniture, was sea-green, and on the bed, chest, cupboard and mirror in the severe style of Renaissance Siena the gilded carved work took on a fitful shimmer, while all the space between was dim. Only in the corner of the window the one picture was splashed with the red of dawn.

"What is that?"

And Gemma raised her arm in the light that came seeping through—a mermaid rising from the deep to ask about a marvel far across the water. "I have never seen that before."

"Because you were never here until sunrise before. That picture only strikes the eye at dawn."

"I see a semicircular colonnade and from its two gateways swarm a troop of genii with ghostly wings and serpents' tails, little dragons, monsters that blow out their bellies and women, tall women with their hair full of ripe, dark fruit or with forked locks—women with long narrow breasts like udders. They dance a weird dance, wreathing garlands of flesh, no, of lustrous flowers amid the bright clouds of their robes, whirling discs of green air, while an owl looks on. . . . I'd like to have a dream like that," Gemma said. "And there at the back of the colonnade is a couch where the dreamer lies!"

"That is me, Gemma. For I am the only one to feel the charm of this picture. The original hangs unnoticed in a gallery somewhere. I am vain of the pictures no one else has eyes for: they belong exclusively to me! . . . How often," Malvolto said starting up and speaking to himself, "how often I used to wake up at dawn to interview my dreams and found them all ushered in and ordered by that picture."

Gemma gave a cry and fled for refuge into her lover's arms.

"Horrible—oh, how horrible! A mask—a mask with a huge nose, and red, it might be alive; and it's made of skin, the skin of a human face!"

After a moment, still shuddering, she asked: "What is it?"

"I have always taken it to be a symbol of art," he replied. "The flayed skin that still boasts the features of the vanished body and is still miraculously coloured by the blood that has long since ceased to pulse—that to me is art. I grope behind the skin whose nostrils still expand as though informed with life and whose eyelids still wink; I grope for the body behind, for life itself. It was never there—not for me. . . . But now I have it in my arms!"

And he drew her to him. Gemma went up to the picture again.

"It is really horrible. But I want it. I'll have a mask made like it to frighten you with. You must make a copy of it for me. Quick—get some paper."

They ran into his study and hunted about in the drawers and came on the manuscript.

"There doesn't seem to be anything else here," Gemma said, hesitating.

He took a page of it and pressed it so tightly against her face that her nose broke through.

"What are you doing?"

"Don't you see what that is? It is the skin—the skin beneath which the blood seems to course. There is your mask!"

She held the torn paper in her hand. He lit a wax taper and let the flame creep up and devour the written lines. When it got near her fingers he took the sheet from her and put it in the hearth.

He went back for another sheet. She had gone white. She divined, without fully realizing, her last, decisive victory.

"What are you doing?" she asked again. "You surely don't mean to burn your story, your precious story? You were going to go on with it—later."

"Later? When?"

She did not know.

"For us, Gemma, there is no later. We love each other and then comes death."

She trembled. She threw her arms round his neck. With his face against hers, he said:

"My dreams are over. The dreams in that picture have all vanished down the dark perspective of the colonnade whence they issued. Instead of dreams I have you. You are the substance behind them all, the goal of all my longing. You have pulled me over into your life——"

"Yes!"

She kissed him without comprehending what he went on to say:

"—into a prouder, more impulsive world encompassed by a quick-set hedge, where violence and the intoxication of surrender reign, where unutterable defeat is drunk to the dregs and splendours without a name, where life is lived to the full and death comes once for all."

"And death comes once for all," she echoed with wide eyes. She had only heard the final words fall from his lips and uttered them as her own. "Yes, I feel it—I feel it coming," she said.

She slowly took a page, let it flame up and put it on the hearth. She took another and another; the flames rose higher and their reflections danced on her white skin and ran along the narrow folds of her nightdress. As her small hands made a funeral pyre of thoughts, perceptions, aspirations and wrestlings for the truth, her lips wore a two-edged smile, sweet and cruel.

Mario Malvolto stood with folded arms. He said to himself with suicidal joy:

"I believe."

IV: THE DEED

HE SAT WAITING for her in the dusk. She had gone home for an hour or so to speak to her companion, whom she had sent to the town on an errand.

The summer was over; a cool breath came from the garden; the withered cypress stood up bared and menacing, stripped of its veil of wistaria. Malvolto lay on his face, his face in his hands and thought of Gemma, in a mood of incomprehensible gloom.

Suddenly he knew that she had come. She was silhouetted in the pale frame of the open terrace door.

She approached slowly—he took a breath at each step she took—and came to a stop between his knees without touching him, her arms hanging at her sides. He saw her face hover above his, remotely shimmering in the dusk of the evening, an evening that clutched at his heart with the dread that no dawn would ever follow it. And her two eyes above him, large and dark, blinded by night and hot with banked fire—he took them for two craters gaping over him. They came slowly nearer, so near that they became one crater over whose rim he bent, dizzy yet allured. Then Gemma's cheek touched his and she whispered:

"Darling, we must die."

He only pressed his cheek a little closer to hers in reply. She had said nothing new. He had felt her words coming all the way from her house to his. No, they came from even further back: from the first night when she gave herself to him! They had both known long ago that after their embraces nothing was left them but to die. From the very beginning death was enfolded in their love. They had said "for ever" and to that "ever" death alone could give a name.

She clasped him round the shoulders and he her. They felt themselves rocked, drowned and dissolved away in the enchantment of a deathly sea. All around them the forms and colours that a day had lent to things dissolved away.

Malvolto fought his way to the surface of a flood of blackness. He asked: "But why? What has happened?"

Gemma smiled; she walked away and said lightly:

"Well, we've been photographed."

"We——"

"Yes. It's all over the town. It's an excellent likeness, I'm told. I am standing on the terrace and you are lying at my feet."

"You are—naked?"

"And you, poor dear, have not much on."

"Appalling! This is appalling. And I made absolutely certain that the terrace could not be overlooked from any single point in the whole neighbourhood! It must have been taken from the garden. It can only have been my servant, Niccolo—or else your companion. I'll——"

And he made for the door. But Gemma seized him by the arm.

"What does it matter who did it? Some passer-by or other. Don't let's waste time that is better spent on love."

He came back, suddenly calmed.

"You are right. How did you find out?"

"My companion saw it in a friend's house and also in a shop where she was not known. It's being sold on the sly and having a great sale, I hear. You can imagine it, I, the Cantoggi and you, Mario Malvolto . . ."

He felt a fleeting vanity, but instantly he was overwhelmed with shame and rage at himself. He flung himself at her feet.

"You, Gemma—all your hidden beauties that have seen the light for my eyes alone are now hawked round and shown in drawing-rooms and clubs and in the wings of theatres—yes, we must die. It is intolerable."

"I could tolerate that," she said, still smiling.

"I have destroyed your reputation. Everyone in the town calls me a lucky fellow, everyone envies me. It's unspeakable."

He struck his forehead with his fists.

"We must die!"

"Not for that," she said gently. "I don't mind about all that. But they would separate us."

"They would——"

He stood up.

"Does your brother know? Has he come back?"

"Not until next week. But he might hear about it any day."

"They won't tell him."

"Not if he were my husband," Gemma said and her smile died away. Malvolto bowed his head.

"You are right. They will tell a brother."

Suddenly he drew himself up.

"Then I'll fight him!"

Gemma shook her head.

"You mean he'll kill me?" he shouted. "Four months ago perhaps. I'm a practised swordsman now."

"If you did kill him, I have other relations and they will separate us. I'm only seventeen."

And when he made no reply she went on in a colourless tone: "And then, you see, we should still have to die. Why should you kill my poor brother first? Better die now—at once."

Malvolto gave a rapid glance about him: no, there was no other way out. Gemma, standing there, her slender figure hazily outlined, her face floating like a water-lily on the night and her eyes that were darker even than it—Gemma had now become a childlike Judith and round one of her flowerlike fingers she wound a lock of hair and by it hung a head and that head was his.

But she died with him—he maligned her: she walked to her death in the strength of martyrdom, coolly and with courageous step, whereas he, for whose sake she went, still sought for a way of escape. He took her in his arms.

"Gemma—the world's only lover—your strength and calm raises me up. It is I who kill you. Do you not hate me for it?"

"Hate you?" she exclaimed with the first trace of emotion. "I feel I love you for the first time. When I came in just now and you were there in the dusk and I stood between your knees and we looked at each other—yes, we looked at each other. Had you ever looked at me like that before? I never had at you. I should never have believed it was possible to be happier than we have been. Now there is something there that makes me happier still. . . . Let us taste it," she whispered with her eyes closed.

He caught her up as wildly as on the first night. Yes, she had all desire at her command: she drove him on all through her proud, impulsive realm to the last thicket where the utmost joy was hidden. Stung by the lash of death he carried her into the bedroom.

The moon had risen when they came back. They leaned together, their arms round each other, their temples touching, their feet weary. As they stepped into the sharp band of light that fell across the room from the terrace door they started as though at a cold shower and separated. Gemma went to the door and leaning against the frame pressed her forehead on it. She heard Mario restlessly pacing the carpet. He looked about him. How the room had altered. It belonged to love no longer; this very room was to see them die. The wide couch offered itself no longer to their embraces; it looked like an operation table. Gemma turned abruptly and said:

"Do it."

He stopped short in sudden anguish.

"I—have I got to?"

"Yes. Do you expect me to?"

They looked each other straight in the eyes and saw a gleam of enmity flame up in their depths. The next moment they ran to each other with open arms. They felt each other's tears on their cheeks.

"We who still have a life to live——"

"And we must kill each other."

"Was anyone ever so unhappy as we——"

They remained for a long time motionless. Then Gemma sobbed.

"I shall never embrace you again—never again."

"I shall never kiss your thighs again," Mario said, "and never measure their little hollows again with my lips. Never bury my face again in your hair or on your knees——"

He clung to her in an agony of devotion. He filled the delicate pink shell of her ear for the last time with the burden of his whispered desires; arraigned her, limb by limb, because she betrayed him and had no more joys to lavish on him.

At last she freed herself and going with her gliding step to the couch lay down upon it and said with a smile: "I am ready."

He passed his hand over his forehead and then walked quickly to his writing-table. She looked away. She heard the ring of steel. He came up to her, one hand behind his back.

"Your murderer is here," he stammered. "He is stealing upon you."

He collapsed when he reached her, his forehead on her knees.

"I can't do it, Gemma. You are the stronger."

He held the dagger out to her.

"You do not love me as I do you—to the last quiver of my hand."

"I love you so much," she said, folding his head once more in her arms, "that the only happiness left me is to die by your hand! Think—death alone gives you to me altogether. It makes us inseparable. Kiss me—kiss me while you stab."

But he tore himself loose.

"You must live," he cried. "What does my fate matter to you? I am content and I—I thank you!"

She fell in his arms—deathly pale.

"What are you thinking of? You want to leave me alone? How can you?"

And she sobbed bitterly.

"Your coat is torn, your shirt too. Good God, you're bleeding!"

"Only a scratch," he muttered. "That way is barred."

"Be good to me," she whispered as she drew him to her on the couch as though asking an embrace. "All good, all light of the sun has come to me only from you. Don't you know what it was I dreamt of as a child on my ivied walls at San Gimignano? Of you, my dearest."

She laid her head dreamily back with a tremulous smile of desire and guided the dagger in his shuddering grasp to the place where he was to plunge it in, and since her loveliness so lusted after death the most heroic gesture of her life was also the most lascivious. He stabbed with tight-shut eyes, in a spasm of horror, against his will and before she expected it. She cried out.

When he opened his eyes he was in a daze. Where was she? He could not find her head. It was lolling over the edge of the couch. He put it back on the cushion. A piece of white flesh fell on his knee. What was it? A finger. He had cut off one of her fingers. He leapt up, pierced with terror. The weapon clattered to the floor.

"What have I done? Did I do that? I? There she lies—blood on her lips, what is all this—she is contorted, writhing. Why? My God, her breast gapes! . . . Gemma!"

He bent over her, weeping aloud. She looked in his eyes with a forlorn and questioning look. Suddenly he understood. She wanted him now to plunge the blade into his own breast. He stood up swaying on his feet, and a cold shudder swept through him. A gulf had abruptly opened between her and him; the abyss that parted the living, who had all before him, and her, whom death left no more choice, yawned before his eyes. "What part have I in this dying woman?" And he remembered with a dull throb of memory how a few moments ago he had said to her: "What does my fate matter to you?" And he had tried to rescue her and turned the dagger against himself. And now there she lay. . . .

He bent down for the dagger and her quivering eyes followed him.

No! If he did do it—he would not be dying with her. Their deaths were too unequal. Dying, for her, was a simple, easy matter. She died as a child. What did she know? What had she ever doubted? No disillusionments riveted her to the martyrdom of living. She had appeared on the earth at the beck of a single passion. All her life, all her brief years had led—down a short avenue, where at the end a Hermes stood—to him, to him and that moonlit night when she flung herself into his arms. Between that full moon and this in which she died lay all that gave her meaning, all she was capable of feeling, all of her. Dying now, dying with him she left nothing behind, had nothing to regret.

But he—oh, he! He had broken out this very moment from a tangled and luxuriant garden and saw again the wide world before him. What joys and sufferings and what goals beckoned him! Women and words and warfares rang out a clarion note. He seethed with new ideas. Now his art could illumine the visions which had shot up in him in tropical profusion when Gemma, a little naked Muse, danced about him. She had fulfilled her mission as love's ambassador and now returned where she belonged. And her death—of what use was it if he was to make no more of her?

But her eyes were on him; the whites were turned up, leaving only a narrow strip of the pupils.

"What am I thinking of? What am I doing? I'm out of my mind. How can I look on and watch her suffer and do nothing?"

He turned away and rang the bell in a panic. He ran to the door. The dying girl struggled for breath. With a piercing scream she cried out: "Murderer—you murderer!"

He whipped round, white and wide-eyed as she, and met her full gaze once more.

There were steps outside. Old Niccolo stood in the doorway, uttered a loud cry and turned and ran. The door was left open and sounds came from the house.

Mario Malvolto was still gazing into Gemma's dying eyes. "Murderer," he muttered with blanched lips. "You are right. I stole upon you, I stole my way into your life, the life of the strong. I wanted to live to the full, to love regardlessly, to be a man at last. I wanted, too, to die as the strong die—once and for all. Forgive me: it was a mistake. I did not deceive you. I did not know until my life was demanded of me that it was play-acting, like all the rest. Forgive me, darling girl. It is not mere cowardice; it is only that one does not really kill oneself in the last act of a comedy."

But then he picked up the dagger from the floor.

"I'll do it all the same. Look, I am going to do it!"

He tore his shirt open and showed her the point on his chest.

"Do you see it? And realize what I am doing? I do it because you are watching and only for you!"

But he saw that her eyes were glazed.

"You are dead? But we were to die together and now you forsake me? Now when I am ready, now when I sacrifice all to you, not just the one life you sacrifice for me but all the hundreds of uncreated lives within me—do you vanish now? Have you gone for ever? Then—what am I doing? What is left me to do? I know nothing any more."

He raised his arms and let them fall again. His eyes wandering distractedly round encountered the eyes of Pippo Spano.

"You! What would you do now? Did such defeat ever come your way? It is your strength that seduced me. You were my conscience. It is your fault. What am I to do?"

Pippo Spano smiled. Etched by the moonlight, his smile, born of an excess of ruthless self-confidence, fascinated Mario Malvolto and at the same time overwhelmed him with sudden dread. He stood transfixed. He questioned it with all the strength of his being; he supplicated it with folded hands, swaying on his feet, gasping for breath, now in a fever, now in a cold sweat, distraught and plunged in misery—a player on whom the curtain would not fall.

OLD ROGAUM AND HIS THERESA

Theodore Dreiser

(1871- )

IN ALL BLEECKER STREET was no more comfortable doorway than that of the butcher Rogaum, even if the first floor was given over to meat market purposes. It was to one side of the main entrance, which gave ingress to the butcher shop, and from it led up a flight of steps, at least five feet wide, to the living rooms above. A little portico stood out in front of it, railed on either side, and within was a second or final door, forming, with the outer or storm door, a little area, where Mrs. Rogaum and her children frequently sat of a summer's evening. The outer door was never locked, owing to the inconvenience it would inflict on Mr. Rogaum, who had no other way of getting upstairs. In winter, when all had gone to bed, there had been cases in which belated travelers had taken refuge there from the snow or sleet. One or two newsboys occasionally slept there, until routed out by Officer Maguire, who, seeing it half open one morning at two o'clock, took occasion to look in. He jogged the newsboys sharply with his stick, and then, when they were gone, tried the inner door, which was locked.

"You ought to keep that outer door locked, Rogaum," he observed to the phlegmatic butcher the next evening, as he was passing, "people might get in. A couple o' kids was sleepin' in there last night."

"Ach, dot iss no difference," answered Rogaum pleasantly. "I haf der inner door locked, yet. Let dem sleep. Dot iss no difference."

"Better lock it," said the officer, more to vindicate his authority than anything else. "Something will happen there yet."

The door was never locked, however, and now of a summer evening Mrs. Rogaum and the children made pleasant use of its recess, watching the rout of street cars and occasionally belated trucks go by. The children played on the sidewalk, all except the budding Theresa (eighteen just turning), who, with one companion of the neighborhood, the pretty Kenrihan girl, walked up and down the block, laughing, glancing, watching the boys. Old Mrs. Kenrihan lived in the next block, and there, sometimes, the two stopped. There, also, they most frequently pretended to be when talking with the boys in the intervening side street. Young "Connie"

Almerting and George Goujon were the bright particular mashers who held the attention of the maidens in this block. These two made their acquaintance in the customary bold, boyish way, and thereafter the girls had an urgent desire to be out in the street together after eight, and to linger where the boys could see and overtake them.

Old Mrs. Rogaum never knew. She was a particularly fat, old German lady, completely dominated by her liege and portly lord, and at nine o'clock regularly, as he had long ago deemed meet and fit, she was wont to betake her way upward and so to bed. Old Rogaum himself, at that hour, closed the market and went to his chamber.

Before that all the children were called sharply, once from the doorstep below and once from the window above, only Mrs. Rogaum did it first and Rogaum last. It had come, because of a shade of lenience, not wholly apparent in the father's nature, that the older of the children needed two callings and sometimes three. Theresa, now that she had "got in" with the Kenrihan maiden, needed that many calls and even more.

She was just at that age for which mere thoughtless, sensory life holds its greatest charm. She loved to walk up and down in the as yet bright street where were voices and laughter, and occasionally moonlight streaming down. What a nuisance it was to be called at nine, anyhow. Why should one have to go in then, anyhow. What old fogies her parents were, wishing to go to bed so early. Mrs. Kenrihan was not so strict with her daughter. It made her pettish when Rogaum insisted, calling as he often did, in German, "Come you now," in a very hoarse and belligerent voice.

She came, eventually, frowning and wretched, all the moonlight calling her, all the voices of the night urging her to come back. Her innate opposition due to her urgent youth made her coming later and later, however, until now, by August of this, her eighteenth year, it was nearly ten when she entered, and Rogaum was almost invariably angry.

"I vill lock you oudt," he declared, in strongly accented English, while she tried to slip by him each time. "I vill show you. Du sollst come ven I say, yet. Hear now."

"I'll not," answered Theresa, but it was always under her breath.

Poor Mrs. Rogaum troubled at hearing the wrath in her husband's voice. It spoke of harder and fiercer times which had been with her. Still she was not powerful enough in the family councils to put in a weighty word. So Rogaum fumed unrestricted.

There were other nights, however, many of them, and now that the young sparks of the neighborhood had enlisted the girls' attention, it was a more trying time than ever. Never did a street seem more beautiful. Its shabby red walls, dusty pavements and protruding store steps and iron railings seemed bits of the ornamental paraphernalia of heaven itself. These lights, the cars, the moon, the street lamps! Theresa had a tender eye for the dashing Almerting, a young idler and loafer of the district, the son of a stationer farther up the street. What a fine fellow he was, indeed! What a handsome nose and chin! What eyes! What authority! His cigarette was always cocked at a high angle, in her presence, and his hat had the least suggestion of being set to one side. He had a shrewd way of winking one eye, taking her boldly by the arm, hailing her as, "Hey, Pretty!" and was strong and athletic and worked (when he worked) in a tobacco factory. His was a trade, indeed, nearly acquired, as he said, and his jingling pockets attested that he had money of his own. Altogether he was very captivating.

"Aw, whaddy ya want to go in for?" he used to say to her, tossing his head gayly on one side to listen and holding her by the arm, as old Rogaum called. "Tell him yuh didn't hear."

"No, I've got to go," said the girl, who was soft and plump and fair—a Rhine maiden type.

"Well, yuh don't have to go just yet. Stay another minute. George, what was that fellow's name that tried to sass us the other day?"

"Theresa!" roared old Rogaum forcefully. "If you do not now come! Ve vill see!"

"I've got to go," repeated Theresa with a faint effort at starting. "Can't you hear? Don't hold me. I haf to."

"Aw, whaddy ya want to be such a coward for? Y' don't have to go. He won't do nothin' tuh yuh. My old man was always hollerin' like that up tuh a coupla years ago. Let him holler! Say, kid, but yuh got sweet eyes! They're as blue! An' your mouth——"

"Now stop! You hear me!" Theresa would protest softly, as, swiftly, he would slip an arm about her waist and draw her to him, sometimes in a vain, sometimes in a successful effort to kiss her.

As a rule she managed to interpose an elbow between her face and his, but even then he would manage to touch an ear or a cheek or her neck—sometimes her mouth, full and warm—before she would develop sufficient energy to push him away and herself free. Then she would protest mock earnestly or sometimes run away.

"Now, I'll never speak to you any more, if that's the way you're going to do. My father don't allow me to kiss boys, anyhow," and then she would run, half ashamed, half smiling to herself as he would stare after, or if she lingered, develop a kind of anger and even rage.

"Aw, cut it! Whaddy ya want to be so shy for? Dontcha like me? What's gettin' into yuh, anyhow? Hey?"

In the meantime George Goujon and Myrtle Kenrihan, their companions, might be sweeting and going through a similar contest, perhaps a hundred feet up the street or near at hand. The quality of old Rogaum's voice would by now have become so raucous, however, that Theresa would have lost all comfort in the scene and, becoming frightened, hurry away. Then it was often that both Almerting and Goujon as well as Myrtle Kenrihan would follow her to the corner, almost in sight of the irate old butcher.

"Let him call," young Almerding would insist, laying a final hold on her soft white fingers and causing her to quiver thereby.

"Oh, no," she would gasp nervously. "I can't."

"Well, go on, then," he would say, and with a flip of his heel would turn back, leaving Theresa to wonder whether she had alienated him forever or no. Then she would hurry to her father's door.

"Muss ich all my time spenden calling, mit you on de streeuds oudt?" old Rogaum would roar wrathfully, the while his fat hand would descend on her back. "Take dot now. Vy don'd you come ven I call? In now. I vill show you. Und come you yussed vunce more at dis time—ve vill see if I am boss in my own house, aber! Komst du vun minute nach ten to-morrow und you vill see vot you vill get. I vill der door lock. Du sollst not in kommen. Mark! Oudt sollst du stayen—oudt!" and he would glare wrathfully at her retreating figure.

Sometimes Theresa would whimper, sometimes cry or sulk. She almost hated her father for his cruelty, "the big, fat, rough thing," and just because she wanted to stay out in the bright streets, too! Because he was old and stout and wanted to go to bed at ten, he thought every one else did. And outside was the dark sky with its stars, the street lamps, the cars, the tinkle and laughter of eternal life!

"Oh!" she would sigh as she undressed and crawled into her small neat bed. To think that she had to live like this all her days! At the same time old Rogaum was angry and equally determined. It was not so much that he imagined that his Theresa was in bad company as yet, but he wished to forefend against possible danger. This was not a good neighborhood by any means. The boys around here were tough. He wanted Theresa to pick some nice sober youth from among the other Germans he and his wife knew here and there—at the Lutheran Church, for instance. Otherwise she shouldn't marry. He knew she only walked from his shop to the door of the Kenrihans and back again. Had not his wife told him so? If he had thought upon what far pilgrimage her feet had already ventured, or had even seen the dashing Almerding hanging near, then had there been wrath indeed. As it was, his mind was more or less at ease.

On many, many evenings it was much the same. Sometimes she got in on time, sometimes not, but more and more "Connie" Almerding claimed her for his "steady," and bought her ice-cream. In the range of the short block and its confining corners it was all done, lingering by the curbstone and strolling a half block either way in the side streets, until she had offended seriously at home, and the threat was repeated anew. He often tried to persuade her to go on picnics or outings of various kinds, but this, somehow, was not to be thought of at her age—at least with him. She knew her father would never endure the thought, and never even had the courage to mention it, let alone run away. Mere lingering with him at the adjacent street corners brought stronger and stronger admonishments—even more blows and the threat that she should not get in at all.

Well enough she meant to obey, but on one radiant night late in June the time fled too fast. The moon was so bright, the air so soft. The feel of far summer things was in the wind and even in this dusty street. Theresa, in a newly starched white summer dress, had been loitering up and down with Myrtle when as usual they encountered Almering and Goujon. Now it was ten, and the regular calls were beginning.

"Aw, wait a minute," said "Connie." "Stand still. He won't lock yuh out."

"But he will, though," said Theresa. "You don't know him."

"Well, if he does, come on back to me. I'll take care of yuh. I'll be here. But he won't though. If you stayed out a little while he'd letcha in all right. That's the way my old man used to try to do me but it didn't work with me. I stayed out an' he let me in, just the same. Don'tcha let him kidja." He jingled some loose change in his pocket.

Never in his life had he had a girl on his hands at any unseasonable hour, but it was nice to talk big, and there was a club to which he belonged, The Varick Street Roosters, and to which he had a key. It would be closed and empty at this hour, and she could stay there until morning, if need be or with Myrtle Kenrihan. He would take her there if she insisted. There was a sinister grin on the youth's face.

By now Theresa's affections had carried her far. This youth with his slim body, his delicate strong hands, his fine chin, straight mouth and hard dark eyes—how wonderful he seemed! He was but nineteen to her eighteen but cold, shrewd, daring. Yet how tender he seemed to her, how well worth having! Always, when he kissed her now, she trembled in the balance. There was something in the iron grasp of his fingers that went through her like fire. His glance held hers at times when she could scarcely endure it.

"I'll wait, anyhow," he insisted.

Longer and longer she lingered, but now for once no voice came.

She began to feel that something was wrong—a greater strain than if old Rogaum's voice had been filling the whole neighborhood.

"I've got to go," she said.

"Gee, but you're a coward, yuh are!" said he derisively. "What 'r yuh always so scared about? He always says he'll lock yuh out, but he never does."

"Yes, but he will," she insisted nervously. "I think he has this time. You don't know him. He's something awful when he gets real mad. Oh, Connie, I must go!" For the sixth or seventh time she moved, and once more he caught her arm and waist and tried to kiss her, but she slipped away from him.

"Ah, yuh!" he exclaimed. "I wish he would lock yuh out!"

At her own doorstep she paused momentarily, more to soften her progress than anything. The outer door was open as usual, but not the inner. She tried it, but it would not give. It was locked! For a moment she paused, cold fear racing over her body, and then knocked.

No answer.

Again she rattled the door, this time nervously, and was about to cry out.

Still no answer.

At last she heard her father's voice, hoarse and indifferent, not addressed to her at all, but to her mother.

"Let her go, now," it said savagely, from the front room where he supposed she could not hear, "I vill her a lesson teach."

"Hadn't you better let her in now, yet?" pleaded Mrs. Rogaum faintly.

"No," insisted Mr. Rogaum. "Nefer! Let her go now. If she vill always stay oudt, let her stay now. Ve vill see how she likes dot."

His voice was rich in wrath, and he was saving up a good beating for her into the bargain, that she knew. She would have to wait and wait and plead, and when she was thoroughly wretched and subdued he would let her in and beat her—such a beating as she had never received in all her born days.

Again the door rattled, and still she got no answer. Not even her call brought a sound.

Now, strangely, a new element, not heretofore apparent in her nature but nevertheless wholly there, was called into life, springing in action as Diana, full formed. Why should he always be so harsh? She hadn't done anything but stay out a little later than usual. He was always so anxious to keep her in and subdue her. For once the cold chill of her girlish fears left her, and she wavered angrily.

"All right," she said, some old German stubbornness springing up, "I won't knock. You don't need to let me in, then."

A suggestion of tears was in her eyes, but she backed firmly out onto the stoop and sat down, hesitating. Old Rogaum saw her, lowering down from the lattice, but said nothing. He would teach her for once what were proper hours!

At the corner, standing, Almering also saw her. He recognized the simple white dress, and paused steadily, a strange thrill racing over him. Really they had locked her out! Gee, this was new. It was great, in a way. There she was, white, quiet, shut out, waiting at her father's doorstep.

Sitting thus, Theresa pondered a moment, her girlish rashness and anger dominating her. Her pride was hurt and she felt revengeful. They would shut her out, would they? All right, she would go out and they should look to it how they would get her back—the old curmudgeons. For the moment the home of Myrtle Kenrihan came to her as a possible refuge, but she decided that she need not go there yet. She had better wait about awhile and see—or walk and frighten them. He would beat her, would he? Well, maybe he would and maybe he wouldn't. She might come back, but still that was a thing afar off. Just now it didn't matter so much. "Connie" was still there on the corner. He loved her dearly. She felt it.

Getting up, she stepped to the now quieting sidewalk and strolled up the street. It was a rather nervous procedure, however. There were street cars still, and stores lighted and people passing, but soon these would not be, and she was locked out. The side streets were already little more than long silent walks and gleaming rows of lamps.

At the corner her youthful lover almost pounced upon her.

"Locked out, are yuh?" he asked, his eyes shining.

For the moment she was delighted to see him, for a nameless dread had already laid hold of her. Home meant so much. Up to now it had been her whole life.

"Yes," she answered feebly.

"Well, let's stroll on a little," said the boy. He had not as yet quite made up his mind what to do, but the night was young. It was so fine to have her with him—his.

At the farther corner they passed Officers Maguire and Delahanty, idly swinging their clubs and discussing politics.

"'Tis a shame," Officer Delahanty was saying, "the way things are run now," but he paused to add, "ain't that old Rogaum's girl over there with young Almerding?"

"It is," replied Maguire, looking after.

"Well, I'm thinkin' he'd better be keepin' an eye on her," said the former. "She's too young to be runnin' around with the likes o' him."

Maguire agreed. "He's a young tough," he observed. "I never liked him. He's too fresh. He works over here in Myer's tobacco factory, and belongs to The Roosters. He's up to no good, I'll warrant that."

"Teach 'em a lesson, I would," Almerding was saying to Theresa as they strolled on. "We'll walk around a while an' make 'em think yuh mean business. They won't lock yuh out any more. If they don't let yuh in when we come back I'll find yuh a place, all right."

His sharp eyes were gleaming as he looked around into her own. Already he had made up his mind that she should not go back if he could help it. He knew a better place than home for this night, anyhow—the club room of the Roosters, if nowhere else. They could stay there for a time, anyhow.

By now old Rogaum, who had seen her walking up the street alone, was marveling at her audacity, but thought she would soon come back. It was amazing that she should exhibit such temerity, but he would teach her! Such a whipping! At half-past ten, however, he stuck his head out of the open window and saw nothing of her. At eleven, the same. Then he walked the floor.

At first wrathful, then nervous, then nervous and wrathful, he finally ended all nervous, without a scintilla of wrath. His stout wife sat up in bed and began to wring her hands.

"Lie down!" he commanded. "You make me sick. I know vot I am doing!"

"Is she still at der door?" pleaded the mother.

"No," he said. "I don't tink so. She should come ven I call."

His nerves were weakening, however, and now they finally collapsed.

"She vent de stread up," he said anxiously after a time. "I vill go after."

Slipping on his coat, he went down the stairs and out into the night. It was growing late, and the stillness and gloom of midnight were nearing. Nowhere in sight was his Theresa. First one way and then another he went, looking here, there, everywhere, finally groaning.

"Ach, Gott!" he said, the sweat bursting out on his brow, "vot in Teufel's name iss dis?"

He thought he would seek a policeman, but there was none. Officer Maguire had long since gone for a quiet game in one of the neighboring saloons. His partner had temporarily returned to his own beat. Still old Rogaum hunted on, worrying more and more.

Finally he bethought him to hasten home again, for she must have got back. Mrs. Rogaum, too, would be frantic if she had not. If she were not there he must go to the police. Such a night! And his Theresa— This thing could not go on.

As he turned into his own corner he almost ran, coming up to the little portico wet and panting. At a puffing step he turned, and almost fell over a white body at his feet, a prone and writhing woman.

"Ach, Gott!" he cried aloud, almost shouting in his distress and excitement. "Theresa, vot iss dis? Wilhelmina, a light now. Bring a light now, I say, for himmel's sake! Theresa hat sich umgebracht. Help!"

He had fallen to his knees and was turning over the writhing, groaning figure. By the pale light of the street, however, he could make out that it was not his Theresa, fortunately, as he had at first feared, but another and yet there was something very like her in the figure.

"Um!" said the stranger weakly. "Ah!"

The dress was gray, not white as was his Theresa's, but the body was round and plump. It cut the fiercest cords of his intensity, this thought of death to a young woman, but there was something else about the situation which made him forget his own troubles.

Mrs. Rogaum, loudly admonished, almost tumbled down the stairs. At the foot she held the light she had brought—a small glass oil-lamp—and then nearly dropped it. A fairly attractive figure, more girl than woman, rich in all the physical charms that characterize a certain type, lay near to dying. Her soft hair had fallen back over a good forehead, now quite white. Her pretty hands, well decked with rings, were clutched tightly in an agonized grip. At her neck a blue silk shirtwaist and light lace collar were torn away where she had clutched herself, and on the white flesh was a yellow stain as of one who had been burned. A strange odor reeked in the area, and in one corner was a spilled bottle.

"Ach, Gott!" exclaimed Mrs. Rogaum. "It iss a vooman! She haf herself gekilt. Run for der police! Oh, my! oh, my!"

Rogaum did not kneel for more than a moment. Somehow, this creature's fate seemed in some psychic way identified with that of his own daughter. He bounded up, and jumping out his front door, began to call lustily for the police. Officer Maguire, at his social game nearby, heard the very first cry and came running.

"What's the matter here, now?" he exclaimed, rushing up full and ready for murder, robbery, fire, or, indeed, anything in the whole roster of human calamities.

"A vooman!" said Rogaum excitedly. "She haf herself umgebracht. She iss dying. Ach, Gott! in my own doorstep, yet!"

"Vere iss der hospital?" put in Mrs. Rogaum, thinking clearly of an ambulance, but not being able to express it. "She iss gekilt, sure. Oh! Oh!" and bending over her the poor old motherly soul stroked the tightened hands, and trickled tears upon the blue shirtwaist. "Ach, vy did you do dot?" she said. "Ach, for vy?"

Officer Maguire was essentially a man of action. He jumped to the sidewalk, amid the gathering company, and beat loudly with his club upon the stone flagging. Then he ran to the nearest police phone, returning to aid in any other way he might. A milk wagon passing on its way from the Jersey ferry with a few tons of fresh milk aboard, he held it up and demanded a helping.

"Give us a quart there, will you?" he said authoritatively. "A woman's swallowed acid in here."

"Sure," said the driver, anxious to learn the cause of the excitement. "Got a glass, anybody?"

Maguire ran back and returned, bearing a measure. Mrs. Rogaum stood looking nervously on, while the stocky officer raised the golden head and poured the milk.

"Here, now, drink this," he said. "Come on. Try an' swallow it."

The girl, a blonde of the type the world too well knows, opened her eyes, and looked, groaning a little.

"Drink it," shouted the officer fiercely. "Do you want to die? Open your mouth!"

Used to a fear of the law in all her days, she obeyed now, even in death. The lips parted, the fresh milk was drained to the end, some spilling on neck and cheek.

While they were working old Rogaum came back and stood looking on, by the side of his wife. Also Officer Delahanty, having heard the peculiar wooden ring of the stick upon the stone in the night, had come up.

"Ach, ach," exclaimed Rogaum rather distractedly, "und she iss oudt yet. I could not find her. Oh, oh!"

There was a clang of a gong up the street as the racing ambulance turned rapidly in. A young hospital surgeon dismounted, and seeing the woman's condition, ordered immediate removal. Both officers and Rogaum, as well as the surgeon, helped place her in the ambulance. After a moment the lone bell, ringing wildly in the night, was all the evidence remaining that a tragedy had been here.

"Do you know how she came here?" asked Officer Delahanty, coming back to get Rogaum's testimony for the police.

"No, no," answered Rogaum wretchedly. "She vass here alretty. I vass for my daughter loog. Ach, himmel, I haf my daughter lost. She iss away."

Mrs. Rogaum also chattered, the significance of Theresa's absence all the more painfully emphasized by this.

The officer did not at first get the import of this. He was only interested in the facts of the present case.

"You say she was here when you come? Where was you?"

"I say I vass for my daughter loog. I come here, und der vooman vass here now alretty."

"Yes. What time was this?"

"Only now yet. Yussed a half-hour."

Officer Maguire had strolled up, after chasing away a small crowd that had gathered with fierce and unholy threats. For the first time now he noticed the peculiar perturbation of the usually placid German couple.

"What about your daughter?" he asked, catching a word as to that.

Both old people raised their voices at once.

"She haf gone. She haf run away. Ach, himmel, ve must for her loog. Quick—she could not get in. Ve had der door shut."

"Locked her out, eh?" inquired Maguire after a time, hearing much of the rest of the story.

"Yes," explained Rogaum. "It was to schkare her a liddle. She vould not come ven I called."

"Sure, that's the girl we saw walkin' with young Almerding, do ye mind? The one in the white dress," said Delahanty to Maguire.

"White dress, yahl!" echoed Rogaum, and then the fact of her walking with some one came home like a blow.

"Did you hear dot?" he exclaimed even as Mrs. Rogaum did likewise. "Mein Gott, hast du das gehoert?"

He fairly jumped as he said it. His hands flew up to his stout and ruddy head.

"Whaddy ya want to let her out for nights?" asked Maguire roughly, catching the drift of the situation. "That's no time for young girls to be out, anyhow, and with these toughs around here. Sure, I saw her, nearly two hours ago."

"Ach," groaned Rogaum. "Two hours yet. Ho, ho, ho!" His voice was quite hysteric.

"Well, go on in," said Officer Delahanty. "There's no use yellin' out here. Give us a description of her an' we'll send out an alarm. You won't be able to find her walkin' around."

Her parents described her exactly. The two men turned to the nearest police box and then disappeared, leaving the old German couple in the throes of distress. A time-worn old church-clock nearby now chimed out one and then two. The notes cut like knives. Mrs. Rogaum began fearfully to cry. Rogaum walked and blustered to himself.

"It's a queer case, that," said Officer Delahanty to Maguire after having reported the matter of Theresa, but referring solely to the outcast of the doorway so recently sent away and in whose fate they were much more interested. She being a part of the commercialized vice of the city, they were curious as to the cause of her suicide. "I think I know that woman. I think I know where she came from. You do, too—Adele's, around the corner, eh? She didn't come into that doorway by herself, either. She was put there. You know how they do."

"You're right," said Maguire. "She was put there, all right, and that's just where she come from, too."

The two of them now tipped up their noses and cocked their eyes significantly.

"Let's go around," added Maguire.

They went, the significant red light over the transom at 68 telling its own story. Strolling leisurely up, they knocked. At the very first sound a painted denizen of the half-world opened the door.

"Where's Adele?" asked Maguire as the two, hats on as usual, stepped in.

"She's gone to bed."

"Tell her to come down."

They seated themselves deliberately in the gaudy mirrored parlor and waited, conversing between themselves in whispers. Presently a sleepy-looking woman of forty in a gaudy robe of heavy texture, and slippers in red, appeared.

"We're here about that suicide case you had tonight. What about it? Who was she? How'd she come to be in that doorway around the corner? Come, now," Maguire added, as the madam assumed an air of mingled injured and ignorant innocence, "you know. Can that stuff! How did she come to take poison?"

"I don't know what you're talking about," said the woman with the utmost air of innocence. "I never heard of any suicide."

"Aw, come now," insisted Delahanty, "the girl around the corner. You know. We know you've got a pull, but we've got to know about this case, just the same. Come across now. It won't be published. What made her take the poison?"

Under the steady eyes of the officers the woman hesitated, but finally weakened.

"Why—why—her lover went back on her—that's all. She got so blue we just couldn't do anything with her. I tried to, but she wouldn't listen."

"Lover, eh?" put in Maguire as though that were the most unheard-of thing in the world. "What was his name?"

"I don't know. You never can tell that."

"What was her name—Annie?" asked Delahanty wisely, as though he knew but was merely inquiring for form's sake.

"No—Emily."

"Well, how did she come to get over there, anyhow?" inquired Maguire most pleasantly.

"George took her," she replied, referring to a man-of-all-work about the place.

Then little by little as they sat there the whole miserable story came out, miserable as all the wilfulness and error and suffering of the world.

"How old was she?"

"Oh, twenty-one."

"Well, where'd she come from?"

"Oh, here in New York. Her family locked her out one night, I think."

Something in the way the woman said this last brought old Rogaum and his daughter back to the policemen's minds. They had forgotten all about her by now, although they had turned in an alarm. Fearing to interfere too much with this well-known and politically controlled institution, the two men left, but outside they fell to talking of the other case.

"We ought to tell old Rogaum about her some time," said Maguire to Delahanty cynically. "He locked his kid out tonight."

"Yes, it might be a good thing for him to hear that," replied the other. "We'd better go round there an' see if his girl's back yet. She may be back by now," and so they returned but little disturbed by the joint miseries.

At Rogaum's door they once more knocked loudly.

"Is your daughter back again?" asked Maguire when a reply was had.

"Ach, no," replied the hysterical Mrs. Rogaum, who was quite alone now. "My husband he haf gone oudt again to loog vunce more. Oh, my! Oh, my!"

"Well, that's what you get for lockin' her out," returned Maguire loftily, the other story fresh in his mind. "That other girl downstairs here tonight was locked out too, once." He chanced to have a girl-child of his own and somehow he was in the mood for pointing a moral. "You oughtn't to do anything like that. Where d'yuh expect she's goin' to if you lock her out?"

Mrs. Rogaum groaned. She explained that it was not her fault, but anyhow it was carrying coals to Newcastle to talk to her so. The advice was better for her husband.

The pair finally returned to the station to see if the call had been attended to.

"Sure," said the sergeant, "certainly. Whaddy ya think?" and he read from the blotter before him:

"Look out for girl, Theresa Rogaum. Aged 18; height, about 5, 3; light hair, blue eyes, white cotton dress, trimmed with blue ribbon. Last seen with lad named Almerding, about 19 years of age, about 5, 9; weight 135 pounds."

There were other details even more pointed and conclusive. For over an hour now, supposedly, policemen from the Battery to Harlem, and far beyond, had been scanning long streets and dim shadows for a girl in a white dress with a youth of nineteen,—supposedly.

Officer Halsey, another of this region, which took in a portion of Washington Square, had seen a good many couples this pleasant summer evening since the description of Theresa and Almerding had been read to him over the telephone, but none that answered to these. Like Maguire and Delahanty, he was more or less indifferent to all such cases, but idling on a corner near the park at about three a.m., a brother officer, one Paisly by name, came up and casually mentioned the missing pair also.

"I bet I saw that couple, not over an hour ago. She was dressed in white, and looked to me as if she didn't want to be out. I didn't happen to think at the time, but now I remember. They acted sort o' funny. She did, anyhow. They went in this park down at the Fourth Street end there."

"Supposing we beat it, then," suggested Halsey, weary for something to do.

"Sure," said the other quickly, and together they began a careful search, kicking around in the moonlight under the trees. The moon was leaning moderately toward the west, and all the branches were silvered with light and dew. Among the flowers, past clumps of bushes, near the fountain, they searched, each one going his way alone. At last, the wandering Halsey paused beside a thick clump of flaming bushes, ruddy, slightly, even in the light. A murmur of voices greeted him, and something very much like the sound of a sob.

"What's that?" he said mentally, drawing near and listening.

"Why don't you come on now?" said the first of the voices heard. "They won't let you in any more. You're with me, ain't you? What's the use cryin'?"

No answer to this, but no sobs. She must have been crying silently.

"Come on. I can take care of yuh. We can live in Hoboken. I know a place where we can go tonight. That's all right."

There was a movement as if the speaker were patting her on the shoulder.

"What's the use cryin'? Don't you believe I love yuh?"

The officer who had stolen quietly around to get a better view now came closer. He wanted to see for himself. In the moonlight, from a comfortable distance, he could see them seated. The tall bushes were almost all about the bench. In the arms of the youth was the girl in white, held very close. Leaning over to get a better view, he saw him kiss her and hold her—hold her in such a way that she could but yield to him, whatever her slight disinclination.

It was a common affair at earlier hours, but rather interesting now. The officer was interested. He crept nearer.

"What are you two doin' here?" he suddenly inquired, rising before them, as though he had not seen.

The girl tumbled out of her compromising position, speechless and blushing violently. The young man stood up, nervous, but still defiant.

"Aw, we were just sittin' here," he replied.

"Yes? Well, say, what's your name? I think we're lookin' for you two, anyhow. Almerding?"

"That's me," said the youth.

"And yours?" he added, addressing Theresa.

"Theresa Rogaum," replied the latter brokenly, beginning to cry.

"Well, you two'll have to come along with me," he added laconically. "The Captain wants to see both of you," and he marched them solemnly away.

"What for?" young Almerding ventured to inquire after a time, blanched with fright.

"Never mind," replied the policeman irritably. "Come along, you'll find out at the station house. We want you both. That's enough."

At the other end of the park Paisly joined them, and, at the station house, the girl was given a chair. She was all tears and melancholy with a modicum possibly of relief at being thus rescued from the world. Her companion, for all his youth, was defiant if circumspect, a natural animal defeated of its aim.

"Better go for her father," commented the sergeant, and by four in the morning old Rogaum, who had still been up and walking the floor, was rushing stationward. From an earlier rage he had passed to an almost killing grief, but now at the thought that he might possibly see his daughter alive and well once more he was overflowing with a mingled emotion which contained rage, fear, sorrow, and a number of other things. What should he do to her if she were alive? Beat her? Kiss her? Or what? Arrived at the station, however, and seeing his fair Theresa in the hands of the police, and this young stranger lingering near, also detained, he was beside himself with fear, rage, affection.

"You! You!" he exclaimed at once, glaring at the impeturbable Almerding, when told that this was the young man who was found with his girl.

Then, seized with a sudden horror, he added, turning to Theresa, "Vot haf you done? Oh, oh! You! You!" he repeated again to Almerding angrily, now that he felt that his daughter was safe. "Come not near my tochter any more! I vill preak your effery pone, du teufel, du!"

He made a move toward the incarcerated lover, but here the sergeant interfered.

"Stop that, now," he said calmly. "Take your daughter out of here and go home, or I'll lock you both up. We don't want any fighting in here. D'ye hear? Keep your daughter off the streets hereafter, then she won't get into trouble. Don't let her run around with such young toughs as this." Almerding winced. "Then there won't anything happen to her. We'll do whatever punishing's to be done."

"Aw, what's eatin' him!" commented Almerding dourly, now that he felt himself reasonably safe from a personal encounter. "What have I done? He locked her out, didn't he? I was just keepin' her company till morning."

"Yes, we know all about that," said the sergeant, "and about you, too. You shut up, or you'll go downtown to Special Sessions. I want no guff out o' you." Still he ordered the butcher angrily to be gone.

Old Rogaum heard nothing. He had his daughter. He was taking her home. She was not dead—not even morally injured in so far as he could learn. He was a compound of wondrous feelings. What to do was beyond him.

At the corner near the butcher shop they encountered the wakeful Maguire, still idling, as they passed. He was pleased to see that Rogaum had his Theresa once more. It raised him to a high, moralizing height.

"Don't lock her out any more," he called significantly. "That's what brought the other girl to your door, you know!"

"Vot iss dot?" said Rogaum.

"I say the other girl was locked out. That's why she committed suicide."

"Ach, I know," said the husky German under his breath, but he had no intention of locking her out. He did not know what he would do until they were in the presence of his crying wife, who fell upon Theresa, weeping. Then he decided to be reasonably lenient.

"She vass like you," said the old mother to the wandering Theresa, ignorant of the seeming lesson brought to their very door. "She vass loog like you."

"I vill not vip you now," said the old butcher solemnly, too delighted to think of punishment after having feared every horror under the sun, "aber, go not oudt any more. Keep off de streads so late. I von't haf it. Dot loafer, aber—let him yussed come here some more! I fix him!"

"No, no," said the fat mother tearfully, smoothing her daughter's hair. "She wouldn't run away no more yet, no, no." Old Mrs. Rogaum was all mother.

"Well, you wouldn't let me in," insisted Theresa, "and I didn't have any place to go. What do you want me to do? I'm not going to stay in the house all the time."

"I fix him!" roared Rogaum, unloading all his rage now on the recreant lover freely. "Yussed let him come some more! Der penitentiary he should haf!"

"Oh, he's not so bad," Theresa told her mother, almost a heroine now that she was home and safe. "He's Mr. Almerding, the stationer's boy. They live here in the next block."

"Don't you ever bother that girl again," the sergeant was saying to young Almerding as he turned him loose an hour later. "If you do, we'll get you, and you won't get off under six months. Y' hear me, do you?"

"Aw, I don't want 'er," replied the boy truculently and cynically. "Let him have his old daughter. What'd he want to lock 'er out for? They'd better not lock 'er out again though, that's all I say. I don't want 'er."

"Beat it!" replied the sergeant, and away he went.

(1872- )

I UNPACKED MY THINGS and went down to await luncheon.

It was good to be here again in this little old sleepy hostel by the sea. Hostel I say, though it spelt itself without an s and even placed a circumflex above the o. It made no other pretension. It was very cosy indeed.

I had been here just a year before, in mid-February, after an attack of influenza. And now I had returned, after an attack of influenza. Nothing was changed. It had been raining when I left, and the waiter—there was but a single, a very old waiter—had told me it was only a shower. That waiter was still here, not a day older. And the shower had not ceased.

Steadfastly it fell on to the sands, steadfastly into the iron-grey sea. I stood looking out at it from the windows of the hall, admiring it very much. There seemed to be little else to do. What little there was I did. I mastered the contents of a blue hand-bill which, pinned to the wall just beneath the framed engraving of Queen Victoria's Coronation, gave token of a concert that was to be held—or rather, was to have been held some weeks ago—in the Town Hall, for the benefit of the Life-Boat Fund. I looked at the barometer, tapped it, was not the wiser. I glanced at a pamphlet about Our Dying Industries (a theme on which Mr. Joseph Chamberlain was at that time trying to alarm us). I wandered to the letter-board.

These letter-boards always fascinate me. Usually some two or three of the envelopes stuck into the cross-garterings have a certain newness and freshness. They seem sure they will yet be claimed. Why not? Why shouldn't John Doe, Esq., or Mrs. Richard Roe, turn up at any moment? I do not know. I can only say that nothing in the world seems to me more unlikely. Thus it is that these young bright envelopes touch my heart even more than do their dusty and sallow seniors. Sour resignation is less touching than impatience for what will not be, than the eagerness that has to wane and wither. Soured beyond measure these old envelopes are. They are not nearly so nice as they should be to the young ones. They lose no chance of sneering and discouraging. Such dialogues as this are only too frequent:

A VERY YOUNG ENVELOPE: Something in me whispers that he will come to-day!

A VERY OLD ENVELOPE: He? Well, that's good! Ha, ha, ha! Why didn't he come last week, when you came? What reason have you for supposing he'll ever come now? It isn't as if he were a frequenter of the place. He's never been here. His name is utterly unknown here. You don't suppose he's coming on the chance of finding you?

A. V. Y. E.: It may seem silly, but—something in me whispers—

A. V. O. E.: Something in you? One has only to look at you to see there's nothing in you but a note scribbled to him by a cousin. Look at me! There are three sheets, closely written, in me. The lady to whom I am addressed—

A. V. Y. E.: Yes, sir, yes; you told me all about her yesterday.

A. V. O. E.: And I shall do so to-day and to-morrow and every day and all day long. That young lady was a widow. She stayed here many times. She was delicate, and the air suited her. She was poor, and the tariff was just within her means. She was lonely, and had need of love. I have in me for her a passionate avowal and strictly honourable proposal, written to her, after many rough copies, by a gentleman who had made her acquaintance under this very roof. He was rich, he was charming, he was in the prime of life. He had asked if he might write to her. She had flutteringly granted his request. He posted me to her the day after his return to London. I looked forward to being torn open by her. I was very sure she would wear me and my contents next to her bosom. She was gone. She had left no address. She never returned. . . . This I tell you, and shall continue to tell you, not because I want any of your callow sympathy—no, thank you!—but that you may judge how much less than slight are the chances that you yourself—

But my reader has overheard these dialogues as often as I. He wants to know what was odd about this particular letter-board before which I was standing. At first glance I saw nothing odd about it. But presently I distinguished a handwriting that was vaguely familiar. It was mine. I stared, I wondered. There is always a slight shock in seeing an envelope of one's own after it has gone through the post. It looks as if it had gone through so much. But this was the first time I had ever seen an envelope of mine eating its heart out in bondage on a letter-board. This was outrageous. This was hardly to be believed. Sheer kindness had impelled me to write to "A. V. Laider, Esq.," and this was the result! I hadn't minded receiving no answer. Only now, indeed, did I remember that I hadn't received one. In multitudinous London the memory of A. V. Laider and his trouble had soon passed from my mind. But—well, what a lesson not to go out of one's way to write to casual acquaintances!

My envelope seemed not to recognise me as its writer. Its gaze was the more piteous for being blank. Even so had I once been gazed at by a dog that I had lost and, after many days, found in the Battersea home. "I don't know who you are, but whoever you are, claim me, take me out of this!" That was my dog's appeal. This was the appeal of my envelope.

I raised my hand to the letter-board, meaning to effect a swift and lawless rescue, but paused at sound of a footstep behind me. The old waiter had come to tell me that my luncheon was ready. I followed him out of the hall, not, however, without a bright glance across my shoulder to reassure the little captive that I should come back.

I had the sharp appetite of the convalescent, and this the sea-air had whetted already to a finer edge. In touch with a dozen oysters, and with stout, I soon shed away the unreasoning anger I had felt against A. V. Laider. I became merely sorry for him that he had not received a letter which might perhaps have comforted him. In touch with cutlets, I felt how sorely he had needed comfort. And anon, by the big bright fireside of that small dark smoking-room where, a year ago, on the last evening of my stay here, he and I had at length spoken to each other, I reviewed in detail the tragic experience he had told me; and I fairly revelled in reminiscent sympathy with him. . . .

A. V. LAIDER—I had looked him up in the visitors' book on the night of his arrival. I myself had arrived the day before, and had been rather sorry there was no one else staying here. A convalescent by the sea likes to have some one to observe, to wonder about, at meal-time. I was glad when, on my second evening, I found seated at the table opposite to mine another guest. I was the gladder because he was just the right kind of guest. He was enigmatic. By this I mean that he did not look soldierly nor financial nor artistic nor anything definite at all. He offered a clean slate for speculation. And thank heaven! he evidently wasn't going to spoil the fun by engaging me in conversation later on. A decently unsociable man, anxious to be left alone.

The heartiness of his appetite, in contrast with his extreme fragility of aspect and limpness of demeanour, assured me that he, too, had just had influenza. I liked him for that. Now and again our eyes met and were instantly parted. We managed, as a rule, to observe each other indirectly. I was sure it was not merely because he had been ill that he looked interesting. Nor did it seem to me that a spiritual melancholy, though I imagined him sad at the best of times, was his sole asset. I conjectured that he was clever. I thought he might also be imaginative. At first glance I had mistrusted him. A shock of white hair, combined with a young face and dark eyebrows, does somehow make a man look like a charlatan. But it is foolish to be guided by an accident of colour. I had soon rejected my first impression of my fellow-diner. I found him very sympathetic.

Anywhere but in England it would be impossible for two solitary men, howsoever much reduced by influenza, to spend five or six days in the same hostel and not exchange a single word. That is one of the charms of England. Had Laider and I been born and bred in any other land we should have become acquainted before the end of our first evening in the small smoking-room, and have found ourselves irrevocably committed to go on talking to each other throughout the rest of our visit. We might, it is true, have happened to like each other more than any one we had ever met. This off-chance may have occurred to us both. But it counted for nothing as against the certain surrender of quietude and liberty. We slightly bowed to each other as we entered or left the dining-room or smoking-room, and as we met on the widespread sands or in the shop that had a small and faded circulating library. That was all. Our mutual aloofness was a positive bond between us.

Had he been much older than I, the responsibility for our silence would of course have been his alone. But he was not, I judged, more than five or six years ahead of me, and thus I might without impropriety have taken it on myself to perform that hard and perilous feat which English people call, with a shiver, "breaking the ice." He had reason, therefore, to be as grateful to me as I to him. Each of us, not the less frankly because silently, recognised his obligation to the other. And when, on the last evening of my stay, the ice actually was broken no ill-will rose between us: neither of us was to blame.

It was a Sunday evening. I had been out for a long last walk and had come in very late to dinner. Laider left his table almost immediately after I sat down to mine. When I entered the smoking-room I found him reading a weekly review which I had bought the day before. It was a crisis. He could not silently offer, nor could I have silently accepted, sixpence. It was a crisis. We faced it like men. He made, by word of mouth, a graceful apology. Verbally, not by signs, I besought him to go on reading. But this, of course, was a vain counsel of perfection. The social code forced us to talk now. We obeyed it like men. To reassure him that our position was not so desperate as it might seem, I took the earliest opportunity to mention that I was going away early next morning. In the tone of his "Oh, are you?" he tried bravely to imply that he was sorry, even now, to hear that. In a way, perhaps, he really was sorry. We had got on so well together, he and I. Nothing could efface the memory of that. Nay, we seemed to be hitting it off even now. Influenza was not our sole theme. We passed from that to the aforesaid weekly review, and to a correspondence that was raging therein on Faith and Reason.

This correspondence had now reached its fourth and penultimate stage—its Australian stage. It is hard to see why these correspondences spring up; one only knows that they do spring up, suddenly, like street crowds. There comes, it would seem, a moment when the whole English-speaking race is unconsciously bursting to have its say about some one thing—the split infinitive, or the habits of migratory birds, or faith and reason, or what-not. Whatever weekly review happens at such a moment to contain a reference, however remote, to the theme in question reaps the storm. Gusts of letters blow in from all corners of the British Isles. These are presently reinforced by Canada in full blast. A few weeks later the Anglo-Indians weigh in. In due course we have the help of our Australian cousins. By that time, however, we of the Mother Country have got our second wind, and so determined are we to make the most of it that at last even the Editor suddenly loses patience and says "This correspondence must now cease.—Ed." and wonders why on earth he ever allowed anything so tedious and idiotic to begin.

I pointed out to Laider one of the Australian letters that had especially pleased me in the current issue. It was from "A Melbourne Man," and was of the abrupt kind which declares that "all your correspondents have been groping in the dark" and then settles the whole matter in one short sharp flash. The flash in this instance was "Reason is faith—faith reason—that is all we know on earth and all we need to know." The writer then inclosed his card and was, etc., "A Melbourne Man." I said to Laider how very restful it was, after influenza, to read anything that meant nothing whatsoever. Laider was inclined to take the letter more seriously than I, and to be mildly metaphysical. I said that for me faith and reason were two separate things, and (as I am no good at metaphysics, however mild) I offered a definite example, to coax the talk on to ground where I should be safer. "Palmistry, for example," I said. "Deep down in my heart I believe in palmistry."

Laidar turned in his chair. "You believe in palmistry?"

I hesitated. "Yes, somehow I do. Why? I haven't the slightest notion. I can give myself all sorts of reasons for laughing it to scorn. My common sense utterly rejects it. Of course the shape of the hand means something—is more or less an index of character. But the idea that my past and future are neatly mapped out on my palms—" I shrugged my shoulders.

"You don't like that idea?" asked Laidier in his gentle, rather academic voice.

"I only say it's a grotesque idea."

"Yet you do believe in it?"

"I've a grotesque belief in it, yes."

"Are you sure your reason for calling this idea 'grotesque' isn't merely that you dislike it?"

"Well," I said, with the thrilling hope that he was a companion in absurdity, "doesn't it seem grotesque to you?"

"It seems strange."

"You believe in it?"

"Oh, absolutely."

"Hurrah!"

He smiled at my pleasure, and I, at the risk of re-entanglement in metaphysics, claimed him as standing shoulder to shoulder with me against "A Melbourne Man." This claim he gently disputed. "You may think me very prosaic," he said, "but I can't believe without evidence."

"Well, I'm equally prosaic and equally at a disadvantage: I can't take my own belief as evidence, and I've no other evidence to go on."

He asked me if I had ever made a study of palmistry. I said I had read one of Desbarrolles' books years ago, and one of Heron-Allen's. But, he asked, had I tried to test them by the lines on my own hands or on the hands of my friends? I confessed that my actual practice in palmistry had been of a merely passive kind—the prompt extension of my palm to any one who would be so good as to "read" it and truckle for a few minutes to my egoism. (I hoped Laidier might do this.)

"Then I almost wonder," he said, with his sad smile, "that you haven't lost your belief, after all the nonsense you must have heard. There are so many young girls who go in for palmistry. I am sure all the five foolish virgins were 'awfully keen on it' and used to say 'You can be led, but not driven,' and 'You are likely to have a serious illness between the ages of forty and forty-five,' and 'You are by nature rather lazy, but can be very energetic by fits and starts.' And most of the professionals, I'm told, are as silly as the young girls."

For the honour of the profession, I named three practitioners whom I had found really good at reading character. He asked whether any of them had been right about past events. I confessed that, as a matter of fact, all three of them had been right in the main. This seemed to amuse him. He asked whether any of them had predicted anything which had since come true. I confessed that all three had predicted that I should do several things which I had since done rather unexpectedly. He asked if I didn't accept this as at any rate a scrap of evidence. I said I could only regard it as a fluke—a rather remarkable fluke.

The superiority of his sad smile was beginning to get on my nerves. I wanted him to see that he was as absurd as I. "Suppose," I said, "suppose for sake of argument that you and I are nothing but helpless automata created to do just this and that, and to have just that and this done to us. Suppose, in fact, we haven't any free will whatsoever. Is it likely or conceivable that the Power that fashioned us would take the trouble to jot down in cipher on our hands just what was in store for us?"

Laidier did not answer this question, he did but annoyingly ask me another. "You believe in free will?"

"Yes, of course. I'll be hanged if I'm an automaton."

"And you believe in free will just as in palmistry—without any reason?"

"Oh, no. Everything points to our having free will."

"Everything? What, for instance?"

This rather cornered me. I dodged out, as lightly as I could, by saying "I suppose you would say it was written in my hand that I should be a believer in free will."

"Ah, I've no doubt it is."

I held out my palms. But, to my great disappointment, he looked quickly away from them. He had ceased to smile. There was agitation in his voice as he explained that he never looked at people's hands now. "Never now—never again." He shook his head as though to beat off some memory.

I was much embarrassed by my indiscretion. I hastened to tide over the awkward moment by saying that if I could read hands I wouldn't for fear of the awful things I might see there.

"Awful things, yes," he whispered, nodding at the fire.

"Not," I said in self-defence, "that there's anything very awful, so far as I know, to be read in my hands."

He turned his gaze from the fire to me. "You aren't a murderer, for example?"

"Oh, no," I replied, with a nervous laugh.

"I am."

This was a more than awkward, it was a painful, moment for me; and I am afraid I must have started or winced, for he instantly begged my pardon. "I don't know," he exclaimed, "why I said it. I'm usually a very reticent man. But sometimes——" He pressed his brow. "What you must think of me!"

I begged him to dismiss the matter from his mind.

"It's very good of you to say that; but—I've placed myself as well as you in a false position. I ask you to believe that I'm not the sort of man who is 'wanted' or ever was 'wanted' by the police. I should be bowed out of any police-station at which I gave myself up. I'm not a murderer in any bald sense of the word. No."

My face must have perceptibly brightened, for "Ah," he said, "don't imagine I'm not a murderer at all. Morally, I am." He looked at the clock. I pointed out that the night was young. He assured me that his story was not a long one. I assured him that I hoped it was. He said I was very kind. I denied this. He warned me that what he had to tell might rather tend to stiffen my unwilling faith in palmistry, and to shake my opposite and cherished faith in free will. I said "Never mind." He stretched his hands pensively toward the fire. I settled myself back in my chair.

"My hands," he said, staring at the backs of them, "are the hands of a very weak man. I dare say you know enough of palmistry to see that for yourself. You notice the slightness of the thumbs and of the two 'little' fingers. They are the hands of a weak and over-sensitive man—a man without confidence, a man who would certainly waver in an emergency. Rather Hamlet-ish hands," he mused. "And I'm like Hamlet in other respects, too: I'm no fool, and I've rather a noble disposition, and I'm unlucky. But Hamlet was luckier than I in one thing: he was a murderer by accident, whereas the murders that I committed one day fourteen years ago—for I must tell you it wasn't one murder, but many murders that I committed—were all of them due to the wretched inherent weakness of my own wretched self.

"I was twenty-six—no, twenty-seven years old, and rather a nondescript person, as I am now. I was supposed to have been called to the Bar. In fact, I believe I had been called to the Bar. I hadn't listened to the call. I never intended to practise, and I never did practise. I only wanted an excuse in the eyes of the world for existing. I suppose the nearest I have ever come to practising is now at this moment: I am defending a murderer. My father had left me well enough provided with money. I was able to go my own desultory way, riding my hobbies where I would. I had a good stableful of hobbies. Palmistry was one of them. I was rather ashamed of this one. It seemed to me absurd, as it seems to you. Like you, though, I believed in it. Unlike you, I had done more than merely read a book or so about it. I had read innumerable books about it. I had taken casts of all my friends' hands. I had tested and tested again the points at which Desbarolles dissented from the gypsies, and—well, enough that I had gone into it all rather thoroughly, and was as sound a palmist as a man may be without giving his whole life to palmistry.

"One of the first things I had seen in my own hand, as soon as I had learned to read it, was that at about the age of twenty-six I should have a narrow escape from death—from a violent death. There was a clean break in the life-line, and a square joining it—the protective square, you know. The markings were precisely the same in both hands. It was to be the narrowest escape possible. And I wasn't going to escape without injury, either. That is what bothered me. There was a faint line connecting the break in the life-line with a star on the line of health. Against that star was another square. I was to recover from the injury, whatever it might be. Still, I didn't exactly look forward to it. Soon after I had reached the age of twenty-five, I began to feel uncomfortable. The thing might be going to happen at any moment. In palmistry, you know, it is impossible to pin an event down hard and fast to one year. This particular event was to be when I was about twenty-six; it mightn't be till I was twenty-seven; it might be while I was only twenty-five.

"And I used to tell myself that it mightn't be at all. My reason rebelled against the whole notion of palmistry, just as yours does. I despised my faith in the thing, just as you despise yours. I used to try not to be so ridiculously careful as I was whenever I crossed a street. I lived in London at that time. Motor-cars had not yet come in, but—what hours, all told, I must have spent standing on curbs, very circumspect, very lamentable! It was a pity, I suppose, that I had no definite occupation—something to take me out of myself. I was one of the victims of private means. There came a time when I drove in four-wheelers rather than in hansoms, and was doubtful of four-wheelers. Oh, I assure you, I was very lamentable indeed.

"If a railway-journey could be avoided, I avoided it. My uncle had a place in Hampshire. I was very fond of him and of his wife. Theirs was the only house I ever went to stay in now. I was there for a week in November, not long after my twenty-seventh birthday. There were other people staying there, and at the end of the week we all travelled back to London together. There were six of us in the carriage: Colonel Elbourn and his wife and their daughter, a girl of seventeen; and another married couple, the Blakes. I had been at Winchester with Blake, but had hardly seen him since that time. He was in the Indian Civil, and was home on leave. He was sailing for India next week. His wife was to remain in England for some months, and then join him out there. They had been married five years. She was now just twenty-four years old. He told me that this was her age.

"The Elbourns I had never met before. They were charming people. We had all been very happy together. The only trouble had been that on the last night, at dinner, my uncle asked me if I still went in for 'the gypsy business,' as he always called it; and of course the three ladies were immensely excited, and implored me to 'do' their hands. I told them it was all nonsense, I said I had forgotten all I once knew, I made various excuses; and the matter dropped. It was quite true that I had given up reading hands. I avoided anything that might remind me of what was in my own hands. And so, next morning, it was a great bore to me when, soon after the train started, Mrs. Elbourn said it would be 'too cruel' of me if I refused to do their hands now. Her daughter and Mrs. Blake also said it would be 'brutal'; and they were all taking off their gloves, and—well, of course I had to give in.

"I went to work methodically on Mrs. Elbourn's hands, in the usual way, you know, first sketching the character from the backs of them; and there was the usual hush, broken by the usual little noises—grunts of assent from the husband, cooings of recognition from the daughter. Presently I asked to see the palms, and from them I filled in the details of Mrs. Elbourn's character before going on to the events of her life. But while I talked I was calculating how old Mrs. Elbourn might be. In my first glance at her palms I had seen that she could not have been less than twenty-five when she married. The daughter was seventeen. Suppose the daughter had been born a year later—how old would the mother be? Forty-three, yes. Not less than that, poor woman!"

Laider looked at me. "Why 'poor woman,' you wonder? Well, in that first glance I had seen other things than her marriage-line. I had seen a very complete break in the lines of life and of fate. I had seen violent death there. At what age? Not later, not possibly later, than forty-three. While I talked to her about the things that had happened in her girlhood, the back of my brain was hard at work on those marks of catastrophe. I was horribly wondering that she was still alive. It was impossible that between her and that catastrophe there could be more than a few short months. And all the time I was talking; and I suppose I acquitted myself well, for I remember that when I ceased I had a sort of ovation from the Elbourns.

"It was a relief to turn to another pair of hands. Mrs. Blake was an amusing young creature, and her hands were very characteristic, and prettily odd in form. I allowed myself to be rather whimsical about her nature, and having begun in that vein, I went on in it—somehow—even after she had turned her palms. In those palms were reduplicated the signs I had seen in Mrs. Elbourn's. It was as though they had been copied neatly out. The only difference was in the placing of them; and it was this difference that was the most horrible point. The fatal age in Mrs. Blake's hands was—not past, no, for here she was. But she might have died when she was twenty-one. Twenty-three seemed to be the utmost span. She was twenty-four, you know.

"I have said that I am a weak man. And you will have a good proof of that directly. Yet I showed a certain amount of strength that day—yes, even on that day which has humiliated and saddened the rest of my life. Neither my face nor my voice betrayed me when in the palms of Dorothy Elbourn I was again confronted with those same signs. She was all for knowing the future, poor child! I believe I told her all manner of things that were to be. And she had no future—none, none in this world—except—

"And then, while I talked, there came to me suddenly a suspicion. I wondered it hadn't come before. You guess what it was? It made me feel very cold and strange. I went on talking. But, also, I went on—quite separately—thinking. The suspicion wasn't a certainty. This mother and daughter were always together. What was to befall the one might anywhere—anywhere—befall the other. But a like fate, in an equally near future, was in store for that other lady. The coincidence was curious, very. Here we all were together—here, they and I—I who was narrowly to escape, so soon now, what they, so soon now, were to suffer. Oh, there was an inference to be drawn. Not a sure inference, I told myself. And always I was talking, talking, and the train was swinging and swaying noisily along—to what? It was a fast train. Our carriage was near the engine. I was talking loudly. Full well I had known what I should see in the Colonel's hands. I told myself I had not known. I told myself that even now the thing I dreaded was not sure to be. Don't think I was dreading it for myself. I wasn't so 'lamentable' as all that—now. It was only of them that I thought—only for them. I hurried over the Colonel's character and career; I was perfunctory. It was Blake's hands that I wanted. They were the hands that mattered. If they had the marks—Remember, Blake was to start for India in the coming week, his wife was to remain in England. They would be apart. Therefore—

"And the marks were there. And I did nothing—nothing but hold forth on the subtleties of Blake's character. There was a thing for me to do. I wanted to do it. I wanted to spring to the window and pull the communication-cord. Quite a simple thing to do. Nothing easier than to stop a train. You just give a sharp pull, and the train slows down, comes to a standstill. And the Guard appears at your window. You explain to the Guard.

"Nothing easier than to tell him there is going to be a collision. Nothing easier than to insist that you and your friends and every other passenger in the train must get out at once. . . . There are easier things than this? Things that need less courage than this? Some of them I could have done, I daresay. This thing I was going to do. Oh, I was determined that I would do it—directly.

"I had said all I had to say about Blake's hands. I had brought my entertainment to an end. I had been thanked and complimented all round. I was quite at liberty. I was going to do what I had to do. I was determined, yes.

"We were nearing the outskirts of London. The air was grey, thickening; and Dorothy Elbourn had said, 'Oh, this horrible old London! I suppose there's the same old fog!' And presently I heard her father saying something about 'prevention' and 'a short act of Parliament,' and 'anthracite.' And I sat and listened and agreed and—" Laidler closed his eyes. He passed his hand slowly through the air.

"I had a racking headache. And when I said so, I was told not to talk. I was in bed, and the nurses were always telling me not to talk. I was in a hospital. I knew that. But I didn't know why I was there. One day I thought I should like to know why, and so I asked. I was feeling much better now. They told me, by degrees, that I had had concussion of the brain. I had been brought there unconscious, and had remained unconscious for forty-eight hours. I had been in an accident—a railway accident. This seemed to me odd. I had arrived quite safely at my uncle's place, and I had no memory of any journey since that. In cases of concussion, you know, it's not uncommon for the patient to forget all that happened just before the accident; there may be a blank of several hours. So it was in my case. One day my uncle was allowed to come and see me. And somehow, suddenly at sight of him, the blank was filled in. I remembered, in a flash, everything. I was quite calm, though. Or I made myself seem so, for I wanted to know how the collision had happened. My uncle told me that the engine-driver had failed to see a signal because of the fog, and our train had crashed into a goods-train. I didn't ask him about the people who were with me. You see, there was no need to ask. Very gently my uncle began to tell me, but—I had begun to talk strangely, I suppose. I remember the frightened look of my uncle's face, and the nurse scolding him in whispers.

"After that, all a blur. It seems that I became very ill indeed, wasn't expected to live. However, I live."

There was a long silence. Laidier did not look at me, nor I at him. The fire was burning low, and he watched it.

At length he spoke. "You despise me. Naturally. I despise myself."

"No, I don't despise you; but——"

"You blame me." I did not meet his gaze. "You blame me," he repeated.

"Yes."

"And there, if I may say so, you are a little unjust. It isn't my fault that I was born weak."

"But a man may conquer weakness."

"Yes, if he is endowed with the strength for that."

His fatalism drew from me a gesture of disgust. "Do you really mean," I asked, "that because you didn't pull that cord, you couldn't have pulled it?"

"Yes."

"And it's written in your hands that you couldn't?"

He looked at the palms of his hands. "They are the hands of a very weak man," he said.

"A man so weak that he cannot believe in the possibility of free will for himself or for any one?"

"They are the hands of an intelligent man, who can weigh evidence and see things as they are."

"But answer me: Was it fore-ordained that you should not pull that cord?"

"It was fore-ordained."

"And was it actually marked in your hands that you were not going to pull it?"

"Ah, well you see, it is rather the things one is going to do that are actually marked. The things one isn't going to do—the innumerable negative things—how could one expect them to be marked?"

"But the consequences of what one leaves undone may be positive?"

"Horribly positive," he winced. "My hand is the hand of a man who has suffered a great deal in later life."

"And was it the hand of a man destined to suffer?"

"Oh, yes. I thought I told you that."

There was a pause.

"Well," I said, with awkward sympathy. "I suppose all hands are the hands of people destined to suffer."

"Not of people destined to suffer so much as I have suffered—as I still suffer."

The insistence of his self-pity chilled me, and I harked back to a question he had not straightly answered. "Tell me: Was it marked in your hands that you were not going to pull that cord?"

Again he looked at his hands, and then, having pressed them for a moment to his face, "It was marked very clearly," he answered, "in their hands."

Two or three days after this colloquy there had occurred to me in London an idea—an ingenious and comfortable doubt. How was Laider to be sure that his brain, recovering from concussion, had remembered what happened in the course of that railway-journey? How was he to know that his brain hadn't simply, in its abeyance, invented all this for him? It might be that he had never seen those signs in those hands. Assuredly, here was a bright loop-hole. I had forthwith written to Laider, pointing it out.

This was the letter which now, at my second visit, I had found miserably pent on the letter-board. I remembered my promise to rescue it. I arose from the retaining fireside, stretched my arms, yawned, and went forth to fulfil my Christian purpose. There was no one in the hall. The "shower" had at length ceased. The sun had positively come out, and the front door had been thrown open in its honour. Everything along the sea-front was beautifully gleaming, drying, shimmering. But I was not to be diverted from my errand. I went to the letter-board. And—my letter was not there! Resourceful and plucky little thing—it had escaped! I did hope it would not be captured and brought back. Perhaps the alarm had already been raised by the tolling of that great bell which warns the inhabitants for miles around that a letter has broken loose from the letter-board. I had a vision of my envelope skimming wildly along the coast-line, pursued by the old but active waiter and a breathless pack of local worthies. I saw it out-distancing them all, dodging past coast-guards, doubling on its tracks, leaping breakwaters, unluckily injuring itself, losing speed, and at last, in a splendour of desperation, taking to the open sea. But suddenly I had another idea. Perhaps Laider had returned?

He had. I espied afar on the sands a form that was recognisably, by the listless droop of it, his. I was glad and sorry—rather glad, because he completed the scene of last year; and very sorry, because this time we should be at each other's mercy: no restful silence and liberty, for either of us, this time. Perhaps he had been told I was here, and had gone out to avoid me while he yet could. Oh weak, weak! Why palter? I put on my hat and coat, and marched out to meet him.

"Influenza, of course?" we asked simultaneously.

There is a limit to the time which one man may spend in talking to another about his own influenza; and presently, as we paced the sands, I felt that Laidar had passed this limit. I wondered that he didn't break off and thank me now for my letter. He must have read it. He ought to have thanked me for it at once. It was a very good letter, a remarkable letter. But surely he wasn't waiting to answer it by post? His silence about it gave me the absurd sense of having taken a liberty, confound him. He was evidently ill at ease while he talked. But it wasn't for me to help him out of his difficulty, whatever that might be. It was for him to remove the strain imposed on myself.

Abruptly, after a long pause, he did now manage to say, "It was—very good of you to—to write me that letter." He told me he had only just got it, and he drifted away into otiose explanations of this fact. I thought he might at least say it was a remarkable letter; and you can imagine my annoyance when he said, after another interval, "I was very much touched indeed." I had wished to be convincing, not touching. I can't bear to be called touching.

"Don't you," I asked, "think it is quite possible that your brain invented all those memories of what—what happened before that accident?"

He drew a sharp sigh. "You make me feel very guilty."

"That's exactly what I tried to make you not feel!"

"I know, yes. That's why I feel so guilty."

We had paused in our walk. He stood nervously prodding the hard wet sand with his walking-stick. "In a way," he said, "your theory was quite right. But—it didn't go far enough. It's not only possible, it's a fact, that I didn't see those signs in those hands. I never examined those hands. They weren't there. I wasn't there. I haven't an uncle in Hampshire, even. I never had."

I too, prodded the sand. "Well," I said at length, "I do feel rather a fool."

"I've no right even to beg your pardon, but——"

"Oh, I'm not vexed. Only—I rather wish you hadn't told me this."

"I wish I hadn't had to. It was your kindness, you see, that forced me. By trying to take an imaginary load off my conscience, you laid a very real one on it."

"I'm sorry. But you, of your own free will, you know, exposed your conscience to me last year. I don't yet quite understand why you did that."

"No, of course not. I don't deserve that you should. But I think you will. May I explain? I'm afraid I've talked a great deal already about my influenza, and I shan't be able to keep it out of my explanation. Well, my weakest point—I told you this last year, but it happens to be perfectly true that my weakest point—is my will. Influenza, as you know, fastens unerringly on one's weakest point. It doesn't attempt to undermine my imagination. That would be a forlorn hope. I have, alas! a very strong imagination. At ordinary times my imagination allows itself to be governed by my will. My will keeps it in check by constant nagging. But when my will isn't strong enough even to nag, then my imagination stampedes. I become even as a little child. I tell myself the most preposterous fables, and—the trouble is—I can't help telling them to my friends. Until I've thoroughly shaken off influenza, I'm not fit company for any one. I perfectly realise this, and I have the good sense to go right away till I'm quite well again. I come here usually. It seems absurd, but I must confess I was sorry last year when we fell into conversation. I knew I should very soon be letting myself go, or rather, very soon be swept away. Perhaps I ought to have warned you; but—I'm a rather shy man. And then you mentioned the subject of palmistry. You said you believed in it. I wondered at that. I had once read Desbarrolles' book about it, but I am bound to say I thought the whole thing very great nonsense indeed."

"Then," I gasped, "it isn't even true that you believe in palmistry?"

"Oh, no. But I wasn't able to tell you that. You had begun by saying that you believed in palmistry, and then you proceeded to scoff at it. While you scoffed I saw myself as a man with a terribly good reason for not scoffing; and in a flash I saw the terribly good reason; I had the whole story—at least I had the broad outlines of it—clear before me."

"You hadn't ever thought of it before?" He shook his head. My eyes beamed. "The whole thing was a sheer improvisation?"

"Yes," said Laider, humbly, "I am as bad as all that. I don't say that all the details of the story I told you that evening were filled in at the very instant of its conception. I was filling them in while we talked about palmistry in general, and while I was waiting for the moment when the story would come in most effectively. And I've no doubt I added some extra touches in the course of the actual telling. Don't imagine that I took the slightest pleasure in deceiving you. It's only my will, not my conscience, that is weakened after influenza. I simply can't help telling what I've made up, and telling it to the best of my ability. But I'm thoroughly ashamed all the time."

"Not of your ability, surely?"

"Yes, of that, too," he said with his sad smile. "I always feel that I'm not doing justice to my idea."

"You are too stern a critic, believe me."

"It is very kind of you to say that. You are very kind altogether. Had I known that you were so essentially a man of the world—in the best sense of that term—I shouldn't have so much dreaded seeing you just now and having to confess to you. But I'm not going to take advantage of your urbanity and your easy-going ways. I hope that some day we may meet somewhere when I haven't had influenza and am a not wholly undesirable acquaintance. As it is, I refuse to let you associate with me. I am an older man than you, and so I may without impertinence warn you against having anything to do with me."

I deprecated this advice, of course; but, for a man of weakened will, he showed great firmness. "You," he said, "in your heart of hearts don't want to have to walk and talk continually with a person who might at any moment try to bamboozle you with some ridiculous tale. And I, for my part, don't want to degrade myself by trying to bamboozle any one—especially one whom I have taught to see through me. Let the two talks we have had be as though they had not been. Let us bow to each other, as last year, but let that be all. Let us follow in all things the precedent of last year."

With a smile that was almost gay he turned on his heel, and moved away with a step that was almost brisk. I was a little disconcerted. But I was also more than a little glad. The restfulness of silence, the charm of liberty—these things were not, after all, forfeit. My heart thanked Laidier for that; and throughout the week I loyally seconded him in the system he had laid down for us. All was as it had been last year. We did not smile to each other, we merely bowed, when we entered or left the dining-room or smoking-room, and when we met on the widespread sands or in that shop which had a small and faded, but circulating, library.

Once or twice in the course of the week it did occur to me that perhaps Laidier had told the simple truth at our first interview and an ingenious lie at our second. I frowned at this possibility. The idea of any one wishing to be quit of me was most distasteful. However, I was to find reassurance. On the last evening of my stay, I suggested, in the small smoking-room, that he and I should, as sticklers for precedent, converse. We did so, very pleasantly. And after a while I happened to say that I had seen this afternoon a great number of sea-gulls flying close to the shore.

"Sea-gulls?" said Laidier, turning in his chair.

"Yes. And I don't think I had ever realised how extraordinarily beautiful they are when their wings catch the light."

"Beautiful?" Laidier threw a quick glance at me and away from me. "You think them beautiful?"

"Surely."

"Well, perhaps they are, yes; I suppose they are. But—I don't like seeing them. They always remind me of something—rather an awful thing—that once happened to me. . . ."

It was a very awful thing indeed.

WHEN YOU THINK of the lives some people have to live, lives of nothing but want and care, destitute of all joy, without a moment's repose, without beauty and almost without hope, it makes you wonder why they do not simply go out, like flames with nothing to feed them. Man is a patient creature, born to suffering, and what he endures is often out of all proportion to the resources nature has endowed him with. And many endure it without even grumbling. Is it because they do not know that others have a different lot, or are they too much preoccupied by their own fate? What is it prevents them from resigning themselves in silent passivity to the dark, inevitable end, and taking the path to the grave—to death which they understand as little as they do their wretched existence?

Christine Schierling grew up in the grimy back streets of a large town and had never known father or mother. She began her life in an orphanage; then her guardian took her to live with him; then her guardian died; then she had to go into service with a rent-collector. She had to carry water, wash clothes, light fires, look after children, scrub floors—that was her life from early in the morning until late at night.

Innumerable were the houses in which she toiled, the families whose bread she ate, the stairs she ran up and down, the scoldings she was given by her mistresses. She was always changing situations, not because of the hardships she suffered, for these she could not escape wherever she went, but because every now and then the thought came to her that she might better herself.

But this turned out to be an illusory hope. The mistress of a prosperous household looked askance at a girl who came from a poor one and so she always had to seek refuge again with lower class people. Sometimes they were good people, sometimes bad, just as it might happen. Sometimes her wages were in arrear, sometimes she was half-starved. In one place there were ill-natured children who tormented and persecuted her, in others lodgers who took liberties when they came home at night. In one place the wife was in poor health, in another she was a termagant, for whom you could do nothing right; and sometimes the husband was a drunkard, who deceived his wife with other women and there was everlasting quarrelling and bickering.

She got to know every sort of person and every sort of family life. She knew the shamefaced brand of poverty which is slovenly, and the industrious brand which defies every assault of fate. She had seen love under the piteous ruins of lost happiness and hate that infests the air with its pestilence, hate between father and son, between man and wife, between brother and sister. She knew the language of envy, the poison of scandal, the rage of despair, tongue-tied melancholy and the horrors that bring crime to birth. She had been with a confectioner, a shoemaker, a procuress, a bankrupt manufacturer, a midwife, a woman who kept a tobacconist's shop, a retailer of brandy. She often dreamed of the houses in which she had sojourned, but she did not see them one after the other, or now one and now another, but all at once in a nightmare conglomeration—like the cells of a honeycomb. She saw steps without end and innumerable doors. She smelt a smell of beds, fat and bad coffee. She heard a ceaseless noise, noise everywhere, singing, whistling, hammering, shouting and laughing; the crying of children, the barking of dogs, thumping and shovelling, cursing and groaning. And all without a sun and without a sky.

She had only rarely slept in a bed, usually on a sack of straw or a mattress beside the kitchen fire. Vermin crawled over her hands and face as soon as it was dark. It was only when she was with the manufacturer that she had a room to herself, but it was a cupboard in the attic where the wind blew in and on cold nights she froze to the marrow of her bones.

Between her twentieth and twenty-first year she was with a Major. He was addressed as Major, but in reality he was a dilapidated old man who made his living out of petty agencies eked out with a scanty pension. As long as he was well she never had a kind word from him, but when he was taken bad and Christine had to look after him he got down in the mouth and as soon as she left the room he whined until she came back. Christine heard his moans and complaints and saw that it was all up with him. When he felt that he was at death's door he called the girl to his bedside and said: "May God reward you for all you have done for me. I cannot. But, so that you shan't go away empty-handed from my deathbed, I will give you the amulet my mother, now with God, hung round my neck when I went to fight against the Italians. Perhaps it will bring you better luck than it has me." Saying this he felt under his woollen nightshirt and after undoing the catch he brought out a steel chain with a coin attached to it. It was as large as a florin piece and the colour of verdigris. Christine thanked him. Immediately afterwards the Major breathed his last.

Ever after she always wore the chain round her neck. Ten years later she at last reached a higher station in life: she went into service with a Jewish couple. The man's name was Simon Laubeseder and he had originally been a rag-and-bone man; then he started an old clothes shop in the outskirts of the town, where he supplied the artisans with cheap clothing, and it was not long before he opened a business in the Stiflgasse, which boasted the name of Warehouse of the Emperor of Austria. They were a childless couple and the work was not too hard; also they were quiet people and Christine learnt from them what decent ways were. But the most important thing of all was that she had a bedroom of her own.

She decorated the bare walls with illustrations from newspapers. There were the Crown Prince Rudolph, Prince Bismarck with his dog, Tyras, and a picture of the battle of Trafalgar; the pictures were tacked up and fir twigs and dried flowers were stuck in behind them. The photograph of the Major hung over her bed; it showed him as a young lieutenant and it likewise was framed in foliage. A long-legged table, covered with a tablecloth displayed in loving array all kinds of mementoes and presents collected during her past life—a wax peach, a thimble in a red silk case, a china dwarf crouching under a toadstool, a prayer book with a gilt cross and a necklace of glass beads. Sometimes when she went out shopping she met a soldier in the passage or on the stairs, a corporal of the German Masters of the Teutonic Order. He had a black, turned-up moustache, thick lips, a close-shaven round chin and a merry gleam in his eye. The second time she encountered him he gave her a salute; the third time he laughed; the fourth time he entered into conversation and she learned that he was paying a visit to his sister who lived in the house and was married to Grieshacker, the haulage contractor. The corporal's name was Kalixtus Zoff and he had got himself put on the active list of his regiment and hoped soon to be promoted sergeant major.

By degrees Christine became friendly with him and they agreed to go for a walk together one Sunday. They took the train to Sievering, walked through the Frühlingswald to Weidling and returned on foot to the town as dusk was falling. The corporal was going to meet his sister and her husband and they went to a small public house and sat down at a table at which eight or ten people were already seated. Christine knew Frau Grieshacker by sight and she sat down beside her and shyly said good evening. The corporal soon began to talk big and got into a violent argument with Grieshacker about whether the Salzburg express stopped at Neulengbach or not.

Kalixtus Zoff gave Christine his arm on the way home and made a few clumsy advances under cover of the darkness. But Christine was tired. It was the first time in years she had been for a long walk. Her eyes were dropping before she got in, and when the corporal asked for a kiss as he said good night she complied without thinking much about it. She kissed him on his thick lips and his moustache tickled her under her nose. Frau Grieshacker laughed and the lorryman whistled meaningly.

Christine kept company with the corporal for a long time without giving way to him, as, of course, it was his object she should; and she resisted not because she was afraid or because she set any value on her surrender, but because she had little inclination for what to him seemed so desirable.

Kalixtus Zoff was annoyed; he said she was making a fool of him and threatened to break with her. Yet he always came back, armed each time with new weapons of attack. He boasted of his manly vigour, hinted at secret advantages of which he was the possessor and spoke contemptuously of other men who had only the outward appearance of virility. When Christine assured him that she believed him and yet remained unmoved, he got wild and placing his right hand on the breast of his tunic and his left on the hilt of his side arm, he swore that unless she would be his he would put a bullet through himself and her as well.

She displayed great calm when he raved and this impressed him. He had formed the opinion that her obstinacy must be due to her earlier experiences with men and he did everything possible to convince her that he was quite an exception to the common run of males. Hence his astonishment was unbounded when he was forced to see his mistake and learned that her past was not at all what he had supposed it.

It was on a summer evening and they were walking from Kahlenberg over the hills towards Nussdorf. There were other loving couples walking in front of them and behind them; some were singing, some whispering and sometimes a couple left the road and disappeared from view. The voices of Sunday holiday makers resounded from the woods and from the edges of the vineyards and the numerous wayside inns. The moon rose above the town and the air was sultry. As they walked along, Christine by degrees began to talk. Her tongue was loosened and her dulled senses escaped from the shackles which since her childhood had never relaxed their grip. She told him the story of her life and all the places she had been and how hard a time she had had of it. Kalixtus Zoff listened at first with indulgent condescension, but when that part of the story he was waiting for never came he decided to come to the rescue of his own impatience and her forgetfulness with a plain question. She answered with a shake of her head that nothing of that sort had ever occurred. He was so taken aback that he stood still and looked at her with his mouth open, for the very idea of such a thing was not only new to him but at the first flush incomprehensible; so incomprehensible that he tried to combat it with a contemptuous gesture; and only the sombre melancholy of her demeanour and her voice prevented him giving more energetic expression to his incredulity.

She again couldn't understand his astonishment. She was not aware of ever having told a lie or made herself out other than she was. "Oh, yes," she went on, "you see more than enough, more than you want to, and all feeling for it goes."

That's how it was with her. She had seen too much; and her "Oh yes" said everything. In the houses she had been in the walls were thin, the bed springs rusty and nobody felt any shame in the eyes of another; sanctity was sunk in brute necessity, the most intimate tenderness in grim compulsion. When they lay in each other's arms, their wretchedness still pursued them; and when one night raised them above the drab level, how friendless they were all the nights after! Marriage was like death, the veil was lifted; childbirth a terror. Money—everybody squabbled over, clutched at, sold their souls for money. Without money—hunger, horror, despair and murder. Once a prostitute, who had managed to save a hundred crowns, was stabbed near the kitchen where Christine slept. She saw the murdered woman's face. Nobody's resources for love could be great enough not to be beggared of all hope, of every innocent anticipation and secretly treasured belief after a sight like that. It was the opened sewer of the underworld; inevitable, incarnate doom.

Christine told him all this too in her own simple words; and how she had to give evidence afterwards in court; and how her evidence told against her mistress, the procuress. In consequence of this two pimps enticed her one night on to a derelict building plot and beat her and she lay there until midnight in a pool of blood.

Kalixtus Zoff gradually began to feel small. He detected the ring of truth in her words and, further, it was borne in upon him that this girl was altogether incapable of untruth. The suspicion came to him that she was as far above him as he, up to now, had imagined himself to be above her and, in spite of his martial prowess, he felt overawed.

His silence touched Christine, for she guessed the cause of it. "I don't want to go home yet," she begged of a sudden and looked round about her. Absorbed in their talk, they had got off the road and now they were all by themselves. The moon had glided behind a bank of clouds and far down in the plain of the Danube the lights of the town gleamed dimly, veiled in mist. Christine sank down on the grass, Kalixtus sat down beside her and began softly whistling a tune.

"How well you whistle," Christine said.

"Yes, I can whistle," he replied as he leaned his head on her breast.

Christine was able to conceal her pregnancy until about Christmas time. Frau Laubeseder gave her a good talking to when she noticed her condition, but Christine was obstinately dumb. She admitted what there was no denying, but little else could be dragged out of her. She didn't know where she meant to go when her time came and she didn't want any well-meant advice.

The people in the house and the street looked at her inquisitively: she read pity in some faces, scorn in others. Kalixtus Zoff was a little disconcerted at first, but when Christine neither reproached him nor pulled a long face, nor asked him for money, he worried no more and was honestly grateful to her for behaving in a way that excused him from the necessity of making even the show of a bad conscience.

One night in March Christine gave birth to a boy. That evening, when she felt the first pains, she went to a midwife in the neighbourhood with whom she had made arrangements some days before. She had to pay fifteen crowns the moment she arrived and then she was allowed to stay there and the woman made a bed ready for her.

She lay in bed for four days and then the midwife said she was well enough to get up. She got up, but she still felt very weak. She had to leave the infant with the midwife for the time; she was to come back on Sunday and then they would discuss what was to be done with the child. "What are you going to call him?" the midwife asked. Christine replied that he was to be called Joseph.

Through the midwife she heard of a woman at Erdberg who was prepared to take the child in return for a small payment. The midwife took him there herself and on the next Sunday Christine went to Erdberg with the corporal to make sure that the baby was in good hands. The woman whose charge he was in was a laundress and Christine was not at all pleased with her. She had four small children of her own and the house was dirty and dark.

Two days later Christine went out to Erdberg again and, without making many words of it, demanded to have the child given up to her and took him to the Laubeseders'. But he cried piteously half the night and Simon Laubeseder's sleep was disturbed and he forbade her to keep the child in the house. And so Christine had to look about for another home for him and she remembered the widow of a gardener, whom she had got to know in one of her former places and who had done her a few kindnesses. She went to her and she agreed to mother the child in return for a moderate sum. The child was christened, the court appointed a guardian for him and Kalixtus Zoff would have had to pay for his maintenance, but he had no money and so Christine had to take it all on herself.

As the gardener's widow lived near by, Christine often ran along in the evenings to see how Joseph was getting on. As far as she could see and from what the woman said, the child had nothing to complain of, but every time Christine saw him her heart stood still: he looked so bad and his skin was yellow and his eyes big. When a year had gone by and the child was still sickly, she put him in charge of a woman who kept a dairy in Hetzendorf, a certain Frau Tomasek, and there he stayed, for she was better than her predecessors and had some little love for the homeless creature.

The corporal took Christine out every Sunday just as he had before, but now they did not often go out into the country, though this was what Christine liked best. Instead they paid Joseph a visit and then Zoff headed for a pub in the newly built outskirts of the town, where it was his custom to meet his friend, Polivka, who was a barber.

Polivka and Zoff had got to know one another in a dance bar at Prater not long before. They had had a quarrel over a girl, as Kalixtus made no bones about telling Christine; but then they came to the conclusion that the girl was no great catch and went off together; and as they strolled along late at night they opened their hearts to one another.

Polivka the barber was always dinning it into the corporal's ears that he ought to give up the army; and for this reason Christine, who at first could not put up with the man, began by degrees to look on him more favourably. Polivka's contention was debated at great length, but Kalixtus Zoff was deaf to the voice of reason.

He kept saying that he was born to be a soldier and that his heart and soul were in it. Polivka, who had the reputation among his acquaintances of being a well-read and educated fellow and whose command of words fully bore out his reputation, maintained on the other hand that times being what they were, a soldier's life was merely idleness and folly and that a man of Kalixtus Zoff's physical and mental gifts—and here Polivka winked slyly at Christine, who was listening with all her ears—could show up to greater advantage in any other line of life and even make a comfortable position for himself.

"All that's a lot of nonsense," Kalixtus Zoff replied. "I wear the Emperor's uniform and that's the end of it. If the Emperor did not need soldiers he would let us know it himself. Why should I sweat my guts out all the week for a few lousy crowns? I have my bed and board, my drink and my uniform and, over and above that, there's something else to be taken into account. There's not a man so smart and well turned out as one of us when he leaves barracks to walk out with his girl." He put his arm roughly round Christine's shoulders and pinched her arm so hard that she cried out.

"And what about you, Polivka?" he asked, turning to the barber. "You don't do so mighty well even though you have supped up wisdom with a spoon."

"That's true," Polivka said, looking somewhat nettled, as he swept his barbered locks from his forehead. "But that is up to me personally, to put it that way. If I were no more than a barber I should long since have had my saloon in the Ringstrasse with half-a-dozen assistants and a wife. But I was born for something better. I have my ambitions. Fortune did not put the shaving brush and razor in my cradle." He rested his chin in his hand and his little twinkling boot-button eyes gazed sadly into space.

Christine did not understand what he was talking about. But she felt sure that she was destined to know him better. During the next week but one she received a rosy pink note with his signature, in which he invited her and her friend Kalixtus to a dramatic performance to be given by "The Blackbirds" on the following Sunday. They were going to give "The Robbers" and Polivka was taking the part of Karl. Christine and Kalixtus betook themselves to the "Golden Pear" at the hour appointed. She had never been to a theatre before and the auditorium and all the lights and the well-dressed people and the painted curtain made a deep impression on her. When the curtain went up and the performance began and a space hitherto invisible, was revealed, where strangely dressed and strangely speaking persons moved about, she involuntarily seized Kalixtus's arm and sighed and marvelled and felt afraid.

It was some time before she formed a clear idea of what was going on. By degrees she got hold of the story and as she held her breath in rapt attention her heart went out to the unhappy and magnificent Karl Moor. When he came on the stage in his might, wearing a hat with nodding plume, his eyes darting lightning, his arms waving like the sails of a wind-mill; when he stormed against mankind in a voice that made the air quiver, Kalixtus Zoff gave Christine a nudge and whispered: "There he is. That's Polivka."

Christine could hardly believe it. Yet doubt and amazement ran into one in the stress of her emotion and towards the end of the piece she could no longer restrain her tears and sobbed so loudly that people turned round and looked at her and the corporal felt embarrassed. She felt strangely happy as her grief welled out; it came dimly to her mind how seldom she had cried; in fact, she could not remember having ever done so and it gave her a feeling of luxury and joy.

"Well, now we'll go and fetch Polivka," Kalixtus Zoff said in a loud voice at the end of the fifth act, getting up and gazing proudly round to let all the world know that he was a friend of the much-admired actor. "He made a proper job of it. Grand! Why, a general might envy him lungs like that!"

Christine wanted to go home. She said in excuse that she felt bad and when Kalixtus Zoff got annoyed she pleaded with him and looked at him with imploring eyes. He shrugged his shoulders and left her. He turned with his noisy cheeriness to a group of Polivka's friends and a moment later Polivka himself joined them, clad once more in his everyday clothes and with his face clean of paint and rather pale. He shook hands all round and laughed conceitedly.

Christine was glad to have seen him after all and then she hurried away. A cold wind swept along in the street, but she did not feel it. She was warmed within by veneration, and fortified by aspirations she had never known before.

Polivka observed Christine's altered demeanour, but he put a wrong construction on it.

"What's the matter with Christine? What is she cross with me for?" he enquired of Kalixtus Zoff one day.

"Christine? You turned her head with your play-acting," the corporal answered. "She's been up in the air ever since, I tell you."

The barber then saw how the land lay. And he took a closer look at Christine. She was not bad, even if she was thirty-three. Her way of dressing and behaving was certainly unpretentious and too modest by far, but her face, her soft lips and her sad eyes were more attractive than was usual in girls of her station. Polivka felt the desire to fulfil expectations of which his person, idolised even by himself, was the object. With pleasing tremors he pictured himself as lord and master of the poor servant girl and while he lathered his clients' stubbly chins he closed his eyes in a poetic dream. He no longer felt any scruples about having to go behind his friend in order to win Christine.

Hence his mortification was great when the first advance he made met with an insulting rebuff. She gazed at him with astonishment and he was completely cowed.

Next Sunday Kalixtus Zoff greeted him with a friendly dig in the ribs and shouted out with a laugh: "Polivka, you're a dirty dog."

The barber went green and yellow with embarrassment and annoyance and racked his brains what to do next. The corporal seemed to be confidently sure of the girl and she instantly rose in his estimation now that he found she was far from being so willing as he had supposed. He therefore lay in ambush and resolved to go to work with more circumspection.

He had offended Christine by his clumsy overtures. There was a contradiction in her feelings for Polivka: she had a vision of him in her own mind that awed and affected her; when she thought of him her breast expanded and her soul warmed; but in his actual presence she was shocked and disillusioned and she looked in vain for the other Polivka of whom she dreamed. In all this the idea of being untrue to Kalixtus never entered her head. She considered herself bound to him for good, or until he himself cast her off. She knew that he was not so particular, but she did not pass judgment on him for that; she did not take it on herself to judge him. She regarded herself as his property, of which he could dispose as he saw fit or even as his fancy dictated.

Meanwhile the time came when the Emperor, as Kalixtus had said, found a use for his soldiers. The archduke and heir to the throne was murdered and the Serbs challenged the Empire and challenged the whole world. Russia mobilised, England rose up in menace and countries where peace had long been at home shuddered in anticipation of slaughter without end.

Even Polivka had to realise at last what a soldier was and what he was good for. Everyone else realised it likewise and put all his trust in the defenders of his property. The soldier, too, now became conscious of his destiny and prepared in the time-honoured manner to welcome war as a glorious adventure. It had never of course entered his head that things would come to such a pass and he did not grasp the full seriousness of it yet.

It was the women who were filled with apprehension; the shadow of the future already fell on their hearts. Pain and astonishment took possession of them and unconsciously they sundered their daily activities from those of the men, which seemed to them mysterious and atrocious.

Many a man became a hero who had little foreseen such a transformation and many a love became new again which had seemed staled by custom. Christine sat up for the whole of one night mending the clothes Kalixtus was taking with him on active service. There was haste, for the regiment was marching to the station to entrain on the following day. She would have liked to do a great deal more for him and, if loving care could have made her sewing any firmer, his shirts and handkerchiefs would have been imperishable. Yes, she was filled with apprehension and her heart was overshadowed; yet she thought with tenderness of the man to whose fate her own was bound and who was going to war, perhaps never to return.

She too had never connected his profession, even remotely, with danger. So easy a life, so untroubled, so leisurely; and hers, in comparison, so hard, so full of drudgery and toil. She had had it against him that he laughed his way through life and refused to take any thought for the morrow, and now he had to pay the price. From one day to another it might be all over with him and the bullet that might hit him was already cast. How good and right it was, then, that no sorrows had so far darkened his existence.

She told herself ten times over that she would be true to him. Why? She had no guilty thought when she said it. She was not afraid of herself. She said it only to give herself the assurance and him peace of mind. Her fond longing was far away from her: Karl Moor beckoned only on the farthest outskirts of her dreams. She was staid and unruffled; awed and stilled by the dread disaster of a whole world's collapse. And yet the mysterious evolution of a human destiny embraces, is already embraced by, all that lies merely as an embryo within it.

Kalixtus Zoff was able to snatch half an hour early in the morning and pay the boy a visit with her. He was four years old by this time. His face was yellow and when his father gave him a piece of chocolate he had brought for him his eyes lit up greedily. Frau Tomasek said he was never satisfied and Kalixtus Zoff laughed, but Christine felt a stab of doubt when she heard it. The neglected child went to her heart, the word mother sounded so strange on his lips; and she wondered how she could contrive to take the child into her own keeping. At midday she went to the station and the barber escorted her. With a frown of uneasiness he studied the calling-up notices on the walls.

"Keep your heart up, Zoff," he said to Kalixtus by way of good-bye.

"Servus, Polivka, you old froth-blower," the corporal replied cheerily and turned to Christine and, opening his eyes very wide, he said in a severe tone: "Good-bye, Tiny, and see you're true to me."

"And you, see you keep safe," she stammered and looked at him and looked away again, and then lost sight of him in the crowd of soldiers.

Polivka, as a man bent on profit, lost no time in trying to occupy the place Kalixtus Zoff had left vacant, in so far at least as he laid claim to the superfluous victuals from the kitchen which the corporal had had the enjoyment of. Every evening he came to the door at the time when Christine went out to the grocer's and approached his goal by the winding paths of eloquence, by playful and poetical allusions, as though his stomach were the keeper of his heart and the guardian angel of the absent.

There was no occasion for all this with Christine. She saw no need for mystery or cunning. She had saved the eatables she had given Kalixtus from what she was allowed for herself and she would never have thought of taking advantage of her master and mistress by thieving and pilfering. She ate sparingly, even more so now than before. He who cooks himself is soon satisfied. But she would never have ventured to offer the barber what the corporal had for so long enjoyed; he seemed to her too superior and too proud for that, and when he raised the question she was surprised, though she gladly consented.

Polivka was a dainty feeder. Meat had not to be too fat, nor too lean either; bread he despised and liked only crisp pastries. Sausage and cheese were beneath his notice.

One day he asked Christine for a loan of forty crowns. His business had fallen off owing to the war. Receipts diminished week by week.

He knew from Kalixtus Zoff that Christine had saved about five hundred crowns. But he knew also that the corporal, easygoing though he was, had made it a point of honour to keep his fingers off her hard-earned savings. Polivka was less scrupulous. At the best of times he always had his eye out for anything that might add to his enjoyment of life and, now that he was in want, he was even greedier and more ruthless.

Christine was too good-natured to distrust him and, so far from meeting his haughty demand with a point-blank refusal, she did not even think twice about it. When she handed out the money he crumpled up the two notes and stuffed them into his waistcoat pocket just as though he were being paid a debt which was long overdue.

The date when the loan was to be repaid passed by and instead of keeping his word he asked for a further sum of twenty crowns. The sixty soon became a hundred, then three hundred, and so it went on until he had cleaned her out. It had taken her fifteen years to amass her capital: it only took four months to dispose of it. There was always some fresh circumstance which compelled Polivka to come down upon her: taxes were due, his landlord would wait no longer, the tailor was going to sell him up. At first he was in real need of the money, but when he found how easy it was to get possession of Christine's savings he fancied the source must be inexhaustible and spent what she gave him in riotous living.

He was one of the regular patrons of the lottery and spoke of the winning ticket he was soon going to draw with the same confidence as he might have of money in the bank. Also he told her about a sick but miserly uncle in Bohemia, who had sacks of gold buried in his cellar and whose death might be expected any day. He drew a glowing picture of the fine life he would then lead and one Sunday he even took Christine to see over a villa in Hietzing and smacked his lips as he said that he had long had his eye on the place and would buy it as soon as his uncle in Bohemia was off the hooks.

Christine believed it all; that is to say, she believed as people do when they are afraid of the truth. When she had handed over the greater part of her fortune to Polivka she had a pretty good notion what his promises and solemn oaths were worth. She saw that he did no work and that things were going from bad to worse with him. He spent his nights drinking and his days in bed.

When she became a mother Christine began for the first time to rejoice in her savings; it was her dearest thought that one day the money would be of use to Joseph and ease his first steps on the hard road of life. How could she look the boy in the face if he wanted clothes and shoes and books and she had nothing to give him and was as poor as a mouse? What would she say to him, what would the boy think of her and what would become of him?

She did not upbraid Polivka. He was still the object of her deep veneration, owing to a law of her nature and by virtue of a secret steadfastness in her very soul. Once she had received the vision of higher things in a moment of uplifted happiness she could not let it go. Against this even the loss of her money could not prevail, bitter as it was. She lulled herself with the idea that Kalixtus would recover the money for her when he came back; Polivka would not have the face to brazen it out then and he would have to pay her back.

Meanwhile, Kalixtus only added to her cares, for though he had promised to write regularly she had not had a single word from him. Her letters remained unanswered. Many wounded soldiers were to be seen in the streets. They all looked tired and sad. Often she longed to question one of them, but she was afraid to. Disquieting rumours were abroad and at the grocer's in the evenings people said openly that things were going badly at the front; and when she talked to Polivka about it he made a face, which suggested that he received the most important despatches every morning from the General Staff, and remarked with Austrian relish of misfortune that it would all end badly.

She searched the dim future in her dread and prayed at night that Kalixtus might be spared. Her heart beat dully when she thought of him, as though she already half gave him up for lost. If ever her despondence lifted, the thought of Joseph filled her heart to overflowing and she hastened to Frau Tomasek to see the child. Instead of the rickety, pale and cowed little boy he actually was, she saw in him a flower of promise; the one living being on whom her hopes could rest, who was incontestably and utterly her own, and suddenly she loved him with a boundless love.

She now resolved to speak to Polivka once more about the money. She went to see him one afternoon in December when a moist grey mist shrouded the streets. Polivka's shop was shut and she went next door where the barber lived in a basement room.

She entered and found Polivka lying dressed on his bed, smoking. The walls were covered with photographs of actors and actresses. Empty beer bottles and coffee cups, a lamp with a broken chimney and a pair of dirty boots littered the table.

Polivka raised his head inquisitively and asked what she had come for. Christine's courage failed her and she said nothing about the money. He clasped his hands behind his head and stared at the ceiling. "Kalixtus is dead," he said abruptly.

Christine felt as if all the blood was drained from her brain. Frau Grieshacker had told him so, Polivka said, and she had had the news from a platoon sergeant in the same regiment. He sighed and shut his eyes.

Christine did not move. After a while she turned round and silently left the room. Polivka jumped up from his bed, tore the door open and called after her.

She came back and stood with limp arms.

"Now you belong to me," he said.

She did not answer and went away.

The Grieshackers had moved and now lived at Meidling. Christine went out there that night. Frau Grieshacker welcomed her very kindly. Her husband too was at the front and she had had no news of him for a long time. As for Kalixtus she could only repeat what the sergeant had told her. She sat down at the table and buried her face in her apron and wept.

Then she asked where the child was and how he was getting on. When Christine only looked sadly in front of her, she said she could bring him to her. Christine promised she would.

At this very hour Kalixtus Zoff was lying out on a battlefield in Poland. A shell splinter had torn off his right arm. The field dressing a wounded comrade had bound round him had not stopped the bleeding. Tortured with throbbing pain he lay in a wet hollow, waiting to be picked up and taken to a dressing station. The guns were silent. All around him he heard groans and cries of pain.

He thought of Vienna where he had led such a jolly and careless life; of Christine and their walks together and of his little son with his enormous head and great staring eyes. But the thought of Christine crowded out all else. He saw her as clearly and vividly as if he had been talking to her an hour before. She had never been so near to him during all the six months since he left her as now when he lay in the mud, unable to move.

She looked at him with reproachful eyes which frightened him. It came over him that he had behaved badly to her, but just how and why he could not make out.

When night fell he lifted his head and saw dim figures against the overcast sky. They were stretcher-bearers. He tried to shout and could not. They went past. His forehead broke out in a cold sweat.

The wound began to pulse more feverishly. He touched it with his left hand and his fingers were soaked in blood. What will happen to me, he thought. And what will happen to her? His heart was suddenly filled with a tenderness for Christine he had never known before.

With an effort he raised his head once more. It was a dreary scene. Pale moonlight glimmered over the river through the drifting clouds. Then an unwieldy lump came shuffling over the ground, a lump that breathed stertorously, snuffled loudly and grunted hoarsely and greedily.

It was a black pig, as large as a bear, with pendulous chops, stark bristles and savagely gleaming eyes. Probably it had been starving in its sty and had broken out to seek for food on the field of battle.

The clumsy brute came panting up to him. Kalixtus Zoff felt hot breath in his face. Its snuffling sounded gleeful and impatient. The smell of fresh blood had an intoxicating effect on it. Kalixtus was transfixed with horror as he wondered how to defend himself. None of the battles in which he had fought had roused him to this pitch of terror.

What does it all mean, he thought. Why must I lie here and perish like a beast? Why is my arm torn away? I am a cripple, a cripple for the rest of my days. What is the meaning of all this frightful misery that has suddenly come down on the world?

He made a movement of his shoulders. The pig started. Then it came on again more savagely. He moved again and it grunted angrily and stuck its snout in his face. Then with a grisly noise it began to lap the blood; in a moment it would dig its tusks in his flesh. Nausea and despair roused Kalixtus to a last effort. He felt along his side with his left hand and grasped his yataghan and drawing it from the scabbard plunged the steel deep into the animal's belly.

The beast uttered a piercing shriek. It was a shriek that filled the silence of the night and the whole vault of the sky. It sounded like a frantic scream of the demon who held all humanity in his claws. Kalixtus Zoff swooned, but the doctor and his orderlies, hearing the noise, crossed the narrow stream at once, found the animal writhing in its death throes and the unconscious body of the wounded man.

Christine kept her promise and took Joseph to Frau Grieshacker and he remained in her charge. Frau Tomasek was very angry and suddenly demanded to be paid back for all kinds of expenses she pretended she had incurred. Christine had to argue for a long time until at last the woman contented herself with a part of her unjust demands and, as she seemed to have a genuine affection for her foster child, Christine asked Frau Grieshacker to allow her to visit the child on Sundays.

Frau Grieshacker was glad to take the child and said he was like Kalixtus. She had a sister living with her, Frau Wandl by name, a lean and silent person, who did a great deal for the boy with the air of being unable to endure him.

When the four women sat together and talked they kept their eyes on the boy all the time as he played on the floor, each with different feelings. Sometimes Polivka was there too, but he was no longer the gay spark of other days. He brooded darkly within his soul or picked up Herr Grieshacker's concertina and gave musical expression to his bad temper and his pessimism. Then he urged Christine to go with him to the public house and when she refused he went off by himself in a rage.

Once she followed him and begged him not to go. He asked malignantly what life had to offer him except the public house. If she wanted him to give up anything for her sake she ought to do something for his sake. Christine said he was not to start on that again when she was in such sorrow and he ought to think of poor Kalixtus. Oh, said he, dead was dead, and once under the ground no one came back. If she kept on refusing him, what could he do but drink? Christine was tired of all this talk and she asked herself why she made so much of a matter of no importance. Who was any the better? Ought she to think such a lot of herself and put on airs when the man was desperate and had set his whole heart on it?

Sensing her change of mind, Polivka took hold of her arm and his voice became cajoling. But in his words there was the cynical indifference of a wastrel, who had no aim and no belief left and made the common plight of humanity merely an excuse for poaching the small game of sensual indulgence.

Christine went with him to his dirty room and lay down in his dirty bed. She gave herself to him as a martyr and her heart was heavy, for the ideal longing he had once inspired in her went pale and vanished away as she did it. And when she left the man, she felt a gnawing uneasiness take hold of her on Joseph's account. She felt she had done the child a mortal harm. Her thoughts became confused and she had no sleep and no peace of mind left. She no longer ventured to enter the house where he was; every day she set out, but when she got near she turned back. She was afraid of reading in his face all the sufferings and privations that haunted her mind; she lost all joy in her work and things got so bad that Frau Laubeseder, for all her patience, gave her notice; and on the top of that she discovered to her horror that she was pregnant.

The day before her notice expired Frau Laubeseder, who was sorry for her, said that she could stay on until she found a new situation. But Christine replied that she was not going to take another place. She was going to have Joseph to live with her. She did not say how she proposed to do so if she was not earning anything and probably she did not know herself.

Next morning she packed up her possessions in her wooden boxes; clothes, aprons, underclothes and stockings, the pictures on the wall, the wax peach, the red silk case containing the thimble, the china dwarf, the prayer book and the beads. Then she took her wages and said good-bye to her master and mistress, who had been so good to her, and called to the porter's son to help her down with her boxes. He asked her where she was going and she said to Polivka, the barber.

Polivka was not at all sorry to see her, as she brought some money with her, not to mention her few possessions, which were of sufficient value to pawn.

He kept his ears open for what she might say, for he was determined not to put up with good advice or reproaches.

When she got to work at once tidying up the dirt and confusion of his room, he watched her with disapproving eyes.

That evening Christine told him that she was going to fetch Joseph from Frau Grieshacker's. He flared up and said he would not have the bastard in the house. Christine went pale and replied quietly that she would have to go somewhere else with Joseph in that case. Polivka was silenced by this and a little later he asked her how much she had in cash. Christine said she had thirty-five crowns and a few coppers. He seemed to be taken aback and asked again whether that was all. She nodded. Well, anyway, he said, she could lend him the money for the rent. She made no objection.

"Curse it, curse it, what'll become of us!" the barber muttered.

Oh, that night, side by side, want by want! That frosty, damp, leaden, endless night!

"Curse it, curse it," Polivka muttered again before he fell asleep, as he scratched his abundant locks. But Christine looked at her red hands and thought of all the work they had got through already and could still get through. Then she did not feel so frightened.

At six in the morning she got up silently, but Polivka heard her and seized her roughly by the arm. Why the devil couldn't she leave her bastard where he was? Christine glanced round and answered with passion that she would rather die than leave the child another day in the hands of strangers.

She washed and dressed and when she was ready to go she said she had slaved all her life for strangers and now she would have a try and see what it was like slaving for her own flesh and blood for a change. As she said this her face lit up with a glow of tenderness.

Polivka, however, was already asleep again.

It was eight o'clock when she entered Frau Grieshacker's room. Frau Grieshacker met her with the news that Kalixtus had unexpectedly returned. And she sat down at the table and cried into her apron, as she had done before, when she had had to announce the news of his death.

Her tears were not due to excess of joy. Her expression betrayed something other than joy over her brother's return.

When she had recovered she told Christine that there had been a ring at the door at about seven the night before, and there he was. He had asked at once where Christine was. A friend he had sent to the Laubeseiders' had told him she was no longer in service with them. He was now going there himself. Perhaps the porter could tell him where she was.

Christine who up to now had stood like a stone began to tremble and had to hold onto the wall. Frau Grieshacker went on to say that he had spent five months in a hospital on the frontier. He had not wanted anyone to write for him and he could not write himself. She sighed. It was not a pleasant sigh.

Suddenly Christine cried out: "Joseph!" and again: "Joseph!"

The boy appeared in the doorway. He had an abnormally large head and his expression as he looked at his mother was stupid.

Christine knelt down and flung her arms round him. Then she picked him up and looked wildly round and, before Frau Grieshacker could ask her where she was off to or get between her and the door, she was out of the room and out of the house with the boy in her arms.

Only to get away, away out of this life, out of this world. That was the one thought in her seething brain.

When she got back to Polivka the landlord had just been. Polivka had paid the rent with the money Christine had given him the night before. He was sitting in his pants at the table with the newspaper in front of him, reading the latest army orders, which meant that he too would be conscripted at last.

He had been fearing this for weeks. Now it had come; and he thought of the monotonous and fatiguing life in barracks and of the grim fate against which there was no appeal: he would be sent to the front and killed. He had got an old rusty revolver out of a drawer and put it on the table beside the newspaper.

He looked gloomily at Christine as she came hurriedly in with the boy on her arm. He was going to abuse her for going out without seeing to his breakfast, but she got in first and what she said in a hoarse voice smote him dumb.

For a while he stared blankly at her and then he said it was a lie. He had it on the best authority that Kalixtus was dead. Christine shook him by the shoulder with her free hand and breathlessly told him what she had heard from Frau Grieshacker. Her agitation, her dismay and the agony she was obviously in would have convinced him if her words had not. The corporal's revenge was a thing to fear. A man who had seen all the blood flow that he had seen would not think twice about adding one more dead man to the list.

"Get up—get up—we must go," Christine said, wild-eyed. She added that Kalixtus might come in at the door any moment. The porter at the Laubeseders' knew where she was.

While Polivka was getting ready Christine took the revolver and put it in the pocket of her dress.

Soon they were in the street. Christine still carried the boy, although her arm ached. Polivka bought some bread and bacon at a grocer's and ate as he walked.

When they got to the edge of the town Christine could carry the child no longer. She put him down and led him by the hand. Polivka asked gruffly what the hurry was. She gave him no answer. He followed her because he had no idea what he would do on his own and because her stronger will imposed on his cowardice and indecision. He hated her, but he did not dare to cross her. He told her she had made life a weariness to him and brought him to ruin; and yet when she walked even faster he quickened his pace likewise.

Christine sank down exhausted in a meadow near the Steinhof. The day was drawing in, rain fell from a grey March sky, Joseph cried himself to sleep, Polivka lay down in the shelter of a stack of wood near by.

Despair took hold of Christine's soul and swept through her like a storm, like a blazing fire. She looked in the face of her boy and shuddered at the life she saw in it. All that had been rose again before her eyes and she shuddered at the black hopelessness that streamed from it. It seemed to her as though devouring jaws opened over the boy's head and this vision was so distinct that she cried out. Taking the revolver from her pocket, she tried cocking it and suddenly a shot rang out.

The bullet had hit her. Blood trickled from her left ear. Polivka leapt to his feet. She was seized with a frantic terror that she might die before she had done her child the last service love could do and took hold of the revolver as she had held it before. Before Polivka could reach her, she had put the muzzle to the boy's temple and a second shot rang out.

Polivka snatched the revolver from her grasp. She spread her arms over the boy's body and fainted away. But even while she was unconscious, she knew that Joseph was dead. When she came round and opened her eyes she saw the pale child beside her in spite of the darkness. Polivka stood there weeping. She only said: "We must bury him."

Polivka looked at her in fright and replied that he would have nothing to do with it. He was going back to tell the police.

But it appeared that he was still spellbound by her. He said that he was innocent and that she would have to swear it. Meanwhile she dug a hole with a piece of wood in the moist leaf mold. She laid the child in it and covered him with earth and leaves. Then she prayed with folded hands and when she got up she wondered that she was still alive.

They left the wood and came to a spring. There Christine washed the blood from her cheek. The thought of the murder drove them both back to mankind. They reached the inner town at dawn and went into a small coffee house to refresh themselves. Then they got up again and went to Franz-Joseph's Land and aimlessly traversed the Prater water meadows without exchanging a word. They bought some bread and cheese. Christine could eat nothing. They spent the night in the open and in the morning they wandered wretchedly on. So it went on for five days and nights. On the fifth night they took shelter in a barn. A dog barked. The farmer found them and was going to fetch the constable, so they hurried off as fast as they could go.

Christine fell down. She felt at that moment that the child in her womb lived no longer, and now she knew what it was that had kept her alive since Joseph's death. She could not get up. Polivka looked at her and did not stir a finger.

"Do you call yourself a man?" she groaned.

He was seized with senseless rage and beat her with his fists. She screamed and screamed and at last he stopped and helped her up. When they got back to the town he led her to the steps of a shop and told her to sit down and wait for him. He went away and never came back.

Christine was in great pain. An old labouring man stopped and asked her what was wrong. She asked him to help her into the tram. As they went along he told her that he had had two sons killed at the front.

With a superhuman effort she got to the house in which the Grieshackers lived, and then collapsed.

She was asked while she was delirious where her child was and in her delirium she confessed what had happened to him.

Frau Grieshacker informed the police.

Why not end her story here? Can any ray of hope lighten such darkness? No spirits watch over her fate, the stars circle cold and strange above it. And yet a light, almost of another world, is shed about its final moments. Ghosts and goblins flee in terror before it, as though Justice uncovered her face and spat flames at them.

Christine lay in the prison hospital and when she opened her eyes after days of deathly trance she saw a man in uniform, who had only one arm, sitting by her bed. She saw that it was Kalixtus Zoff. There was a grave look in his face which had never been there before. His cheeks were no longer plump, his chin was no longer round and shining and his moustache no longer twirled in the air. He was pale and he wore a look of puzzled surprise, as if an unfathomable mystery yawned between him and the Kalixtus Zoff of other days.

Christine felt shyly for his hand. Her lips quivered and she looked at him as at the Judge on the Day of Judgment.

"Keep still," Kalixtus Zoff said. "I know all about it." All the colour left her face; it went as white as the pillow on which it lay. Raising her right hand she pointed ghostily upwards. Kalixtus Zoff nodded. "Don't worry yourself, Tiny," he said. "I know all about it." His voice did not sound the same.

She searched his eyes in dread and trembled beneath the bedclothes.

He bent down to her and went on: "I'm going to be good to you again."

She trembled more violently and clasped his hand in both of hers.

"I'm going to be good to you again," he said. "And when you've done your time I'll marry you."

Christine's head fell back. A glow of holiness, of sweetness and warmth suffused her.

They were the first words of human kindness she had heard, the first human goodness she had experienced, the first pure happiness she had tasted. It made it worth while to have lived and suffered as she had lived and suffered. Now a new state of being began.

But as she knew that her death was near she took the amulet she had worn all these years round her neck and gave the coin and the chain to Kalixtus with a look of grateful tenderness and the smile of a woman who, if only at death's door, has been touched at last by the ray of love.

CAVALRY PATROL

(1874-1929)

TRANSLATED BY BASIL CREIGHTON

---

ON THE 22ND OF JULY, 1848, between five and six in the morning, the second squadron of Wallmoden cuirassiers, one hundred and seven strong, under the command of Captain Baron Rofrano, left the Casino San Alessandro on a reconnaissance and rode towards Milan. An indescribable stillness lay over the gleaming, open country; the clouds of morning rose in smoke drifts into the radiant sky from the peaks of the distant mountains; the maize stood motionless and farmhouses and churches shone out amidst groups of trees that looked as if they had been freshly washed. The patrol had scarcely gone a mile beyond the last outposts when it was fired on from the cover of the maize-fields and the advance guard reported enemy foot soldiers. The squadron formed line along the side of the road and a hail of bullets that made a peculiarly loud noise whizzed over their heads. Then they charged across the open and drove a party armed with miscellaneous firearms before them as if they were quail. They belonged to the Legion Manaras and wore strange headgear. The prisoners were put in charge of a corporal and eight men and sent back. The advance guard next reported suspicious figures in front of a fine country house approached by an avenue of cypresses. The squadron sergeant-major, Anton Lerch, dismounted and posted twelve men armed with carbines to cover all the windows and took prisoner eighteen students belonging to the Pisan Legion, well-educated and good-looking young fellows with white hands and long hair. Half an hour later the squadron captured a man, dressed as a native of Bergamo, whose exaggeratedly simple and unassuming air aroused suspicion. The man had detailed plans of the utmost importance, concerning the raising of volunteers in the Giudicaria and their co-operation with the Piedmontese Army, sewn into the lining of his coat. At about ten o'clock in the morning a herd of cattle fell into their hands. Immediately after this they were engaged by a strong party of the enemy, who opened fire on the advance guard from behind the wall of a cemetery. The leading troopers under Lieutenant Count Trautsohn leapt the low wall and charging across the graves fell on the panic-stricken enemy, most of whom escaped into the church and from there by the door of the sacristy into a dense wood. The twenty-seven prisoners said they were Neapolitan irregulars under Papal officers. The squadron lost one man killed. A party composed of Lance-corporal Wotrubek and Troopers Holl and Haindl rode round the wood and came upon a light howitzer drawn by two cart horses; they fell upon the gun-team, seized the horses by their bridles and turned them round. Lance-corporal Wotrubek, who was slightly wounded, was sent back to headquarters with a report of the encounters with the enemy and the other incidents of the day; the prisoners were marched off to the rear likewise, but the howitzer accompanied the squadron, which after supplying escorts for the prisoners was still seventy-eight strong.

As all the prisoners were emphatic in declaring that Milan had been entirely abandoned by enemy troops, both regulars and irregulars, and was also denuded of artillery and military stores, the captain himself, let alone the squadron, found the temptation to ride through this large, fine town lying defenceless in their path too strong to resist. The clocks struck twelve as the four trumpeters blared out the regimental call into the brazen glare of the sky, making a thousand windows rattle and flashing back on eight and seventy cuirasses and eight and seventy erect and naked blades; streets to right and streets to left became a turmoil of scurrying feet and astonished faces; blanched faces vanished with a curse into doorways, drowsy windows were thrown open by the bare arms of beauty, as on they rode past Santa Babila, San Fedele, San Carlo, past the world-famous marble Duomo, past San Satiro, San Giorgio, San Lorenzo, San Eustorgio, whose ancient west doors, all wide open, gave glimpses of candle-lighted altars through a haze of incense, of silver saints and bright-eyed Madonnas robed in silk brocade; from a thousand attics, sombre doorways and tiny cabins a shot might have rung out and still they saw nothing but half-grown girls and children, with white teeth and black hair; on they rode at the trot looking out on all this with eyes shining in a mask of blood and dust; in at the Porta Venezia, out by the Porta Ticinese the beautiful squadron rode through Milan.

Not far from the last-mentioned gateway, where a glacis extended, shadowed by some fine plane trees, Sergeant-major Anton Lerch thought he caught sight of a woman's face he knew at the ground-floor window of a newly built, bright yellow house. He turned round in the saddle to take another look; at the same moment his horse seemed to him to go lame in one of his fore feet, as if he had just got a stone in his shoe, and as he was bringing up the rear and could fall out without breaking the ranks he decided to dismount, but not before he had reined his horse half-way into the passage of the house in question. He had scarcely picked up the second of his bay's white stockinged feet to examine the hoof when a door in the passage near the entrance opened and a buxom young woman in rather dishevelled morning attire appeared. Through the open door the sergeant-major caught a glimpse of a sun-lit room with windows on to a garden; also of some pots of basil and red geraniums on the window sill and, further, a mahogany cupboard and a mythological group in biscuit porcelain. At the same moment a pierglass revealed the opposite wall to his sharp eyes; its whole extent was occupied by a large white bed and a wallpapered door, through which a corpulent, clean-shaven elderly man was in the act of retreating.

Meanwhile, the woman's name came back into his head and with it a lot else: that she was the widow or divorced wife of a Croat paymaster-sergeant; that nine or ten years before in Vienna he had spent evenings with her, often until late at night, in the company of another man, who was at that time her lover; and while he thought of all this he tried to see beneath her present fullness of figure the slender luxuriance it used to have. But she, as she stood there, only smiled at him as if flattered and her Slay smile drove the blood into his strong neck and up to his eyes, while a certain coyness in her way of accosting him, as well as her morning attire and his glimpse into the bedroom, made him confused. Just then his dulled eyes fell on a large fly crawling over the comb in her hair and just as he was consciously thinking of nothing but how his hand, after flicking away the fly, would come to rest on the warm white coolness of the nape of her neck, the thought of the day's fights and other happenings rushed through him and he pulled her head clumsily forward and said: "Vuic,"—her name had never once passed his lips for ten years and her Christian name he had entirely forgotten—"in a week we're moving in and then my billet will be there," and he pointed to the half-open door. As he spoke he heard several doors in the house shutting and then felt a mute pull on the reins, which became a strong tug as his horse neighed loudly after its companions. He mounted and trotted after the squadron without having had from Vuic any answer but an embarrassed smile as her head was bent back on her neck. But he had said enough to make his meaning plain.

As the sergeant-major rode, now at a slower pace, beside the column beneath the oppressive metallic glare of the sky with his eyes blinded by the cloud of dust that accompanied them, his fancy dwelt more and more closely on the room with the mahogany furniture and the pot of basil and, at the same time, he conjured up an atmosphere of civil life with just a dash or tinge of military service, an atmosphere of comfort and pleasant brutality without duties, a slippered existence, with the basket hilt of his sabre protruding from the left pocket of his dressing-gown. The clean-shaven, corpulent man, who had vanished through the wallpapered door, a cross between a priest and a pensioned-off butler, played an important part in this dream, almost more important than the lovely broad bed and Vuic's beautiful white skin. First the clean-shaven man took the part of an obsequious friend on a confidential footing, who retailed society tittle-tattle and was sent out for tobacco and capons; next he was pushed to the wall, forced to pay hush-money, mixed up in every sort of intrigue, a Piedmontese agent, a popish cook, a go-between, an owner of suspicious houses with dark rooms giving onto gardens, where conspirators hatched their plots, and grew like a sponge to gigantic proportions, a barrel of a man in whom you could pierce twenty bung-holes and draw off gold instead of blood.

The patrol met with no adventures during the afternoon and there was nothing to interfere with the sergeant-major's day-dreaming. He was obsessed by a thirst for unforeseen windfalls, for gratuities, for pockets bulging with unawaited ducats. For the thought of the moment when for the first time he was to set foot in the room with the mahogany furniture was the prick in his flesh that set him tingling with a thousand wishes and covetous desires.

Towards evening, when after a halt to feed and partly rest the horses the column swung round with the intention of pressing on to Lodi and the Adda bridge, where, however, there was good reason to expect that they would make contact with the enemy, the sergeant-major caught sight of a village, with a half-ruinous church tower, lying off the road in a hollow already shadowed by the dusk. It aroused his suspicions so enticingly that he beckoned to Troopers Holl and Scarmolin to follow him and, leaving the squadron's line of march, made for the village, hoping to drop right on an enemy general and his handful of men, to make a surprise attack, or in some way or another to earn a quite exceptional reward: such was the heated state of his imagination. When he was close to the wretched and apparently deserted little place he ordered Scarmolin to skirt the houses to the right and Holl those to the left, while he himself, pistol in hand, proposed to gallop straight through the middle of it. But soon, finding himself on hard flagstones, over which, to make it worse, some sort of slippery grease had been spilt, he had to rein his horse in to a walk. The village was as still as death: not a child, not a bird, not a breath of air. To right and left were dirty hovels, whose walls had shed their plaster, and on the naked bricks obscenities were scabbled in charcoal; and looking through the bare door-posts the sergeant-major saw now and then a comatose, half-naked form prostrate on a bed or limping across the room as though with a hip out of joint. His horse moved with difficulty, bringing his hind legs forward as heavily as if they were of lead. He turned in the saddle to look down at the shoes of its hind feet and just as he straightened himself again a female, whose face he could not see, passed immediately in front of his horse. She was only half clothed; her torn and dirty skirt of flowered silk trailed in the gutter, her bare feet were in dirty slippers; she passed so close in front of the horse that the breath of its nostrils stirred the greasily shining knot of hair that hung over her bare neck under an old straw hat; and yet she did not quicken her pace or get out of the horseman's way. From under a door sill on the left of the road two bleeding rats, with their teeth gripped in one another, rolled into the middle of the street, and the under one gave such a piercing scream that the horse stopped and with ears pricked stared snorting at the ground. The sergeant-major urged it on with a pressure of his knees and by this time the woman had vanished into the passage of a house without giving him time to see her face. A dog ran hurriedly out of the house next door with its head in the air, dropped a bone in the middle of the street and tried to bury it in a crevice between the paving stones. It was a white unclean bitch with hanging teats; she scratched at the ground with the fury of the damned, then seized the bone in her teeth and carried it a little way further. As she was beginning to dig again three other dogs joined her: two of them were puppies, with weak joints and flabby skin; unable to bark or bite, they pulled at each other's lips with their blunt teeth. The third was a light-fawn greyhound, whose body was so blown out that it could hardly drag itself along on its four thin legs. Its head looked far too small for its body, which was distended as tightly as a drum; in its small restless eyes there was a terrible expression of pain and uneasiness. The next moment two more dogs came running up: one was lean and white; it had a hideous look of insensate greed in its inflamed eyes, which had trickles of black running from them; the other was a mongrel dachshund on long legs. It raised its head and looked at the sergeant-major. Its eyes were unutterably tired and sad. The bitch meanwhile ran hither and thither in front of the horse in senseless haste; the two puppies snapped with feeble jaws at the horse's fetlocks and the greyhound dragged its horrible carcass at his heels. The bay was now almost at a standstill. But when his master, after trying to fire his pistol at one of the curs and finding it misfire, touched him with his spurs, he lurched heavily on. After a few paces, however, he came to a stop, for a cow, which a yokel was tugging along on a rope to the slaughter-house, barred the way. The cow, starting back in terror at the smell of blood and the sight of the freshly flayed hide of a black calf nailed up at the doorway, planted her feet firmly and blowing out her nostrils took a deep breath of the hazy sunset air. The yokel gave a tug at the rope and applied his stick, but before he got the beast to go on, she turned her mournful eyes and snatched a mouthful of the hay tied to the sergeant-major's saddle bow. The sergeant-major was now at the end of the village street; there were low, crumbling walls on each side of the road and he could see it stretching on beyond a stone bridge that crossed an apparently dry channel, but his mount moved so leadenly, as though scarcely able to put one foot before another, that every inch of the walls to right and left and every one of the millepedes and woodlice upon them moved past him at a laborious crawl; and it seemed to him that it had taken whole centuries to ride through this abhorrent village. Just then he heard a hollow, laboured gasp, which came from his horse's chest; but, as he could not at first believe it was his horse that made this strange noise, he looked all around him for the cause of it, first near at hand and then in the distance, and saw on the far side of the bridge and, as it happened, at the same distance from it as he was himself, a cuirassier of his own regiment advancing towards him, a sergeant-major mounted on a bay with white socks to its fore feet. Now he knew very well that in the whole squadron there was only one such horse, and that was the one that he himself bestrode at that very moment. He was still too far off to recognise the other rider, so he dug his spurs impatiently into his horse's sides and put him to a brisk trot; whereupon the other came on at the very same pace until only a stone's throw parted them, and now as the two horses, from opposite sides, each at the same moment, each with white stockinged fore feet, set foot on the bridge, the sergeant-major, seeing in a glassy stare that the other was himself, reined in his horse in a frenzy and put up his right hand with outspread fingers to ward the apparition off. Whereupon the other, checking his horse and raising his hand in the same manner, suddenly vanished; and as Troopers Holl and Scarmolin emerged unconcernedly from the dry ditch on either side, the squadron's trumpeter could be distinctly heard sounding the charge at no great distance across the pastures. The sergeant-major put his horse to a headlong gallop and breasting a rise saw the squadron already charging at the gallop towards a wood from which enemy horsemen, armed with pikes, were hurriedly deploying; saw, as he gathered up the four loose reins in his left hand and wound the sword-knot round his right, the fourth section detach itself from the squadron and check its speed; found himself suddenly amidst the thunder of hoofs, then in a cloud of dust, then face to face with the enemy; struck at a blue arm that levelled a pike at him; saw the captain's face close beside him with staring eyes and teeth grimly bared and next moment was wedged in among nothing but enemy faces and strange colours; dived into a mêlée of brandished steel, ran the nearest man through the neck and thrust him from the saddle, saw Trooper Scarmolin at his side laughing as he cleft the bridle-hand of one of the enemy with a blow that lodged deep in the horse's neck, felt the press about him give way and was suddenly alone at the edge of a small stream behind an enemy officer mounted on a grey horse. The officer put his horse at the stream, but the horse refused. He pulled him round with a jerk and, as he turned his young and very pale face, and also the mouth of a pistol, to the sergeant-major, he was run through the gullet by a sabre which had the whole weight of a galloping horse behind its small sharp-point. The sergeant-major withdrew his sabre and seized the bridle rein of the grey at the very place where it had been grasped by the fingers of the fallen rider; and the horse stepped over his dying master as lightly and gracefully as a deer.

As the sergeant-major rode back with his beautiful prize, the sun, sinking to the horizon in thick haze, cast an unearthly glow over the pastures. Even where not a hoof-mark was to be seen there seemed to be whole pools of blood. There was a red light on the white uniforms and laughing faces; cuirasses and saddlecloths shone in the glow and brightest of all shone three small fig trees, on whose soft leaves the troopers wiped the blood from their swords. The captain halted near the red-stained trees and the trumpeter at his side put the trumpet, which seemed to have been dipped in a red juice, to his lips and blew the rally. The sergeant-major rode from troop to troop and found that the squadron had not lost a man and had captured nine horses. He rode up to the captain to make his report, still leading the grey, who threw up his head and capered and sniffed the air, like the beautiful, vain young animal he was. The captain scarcely listened to the report. He beckoned to Lieutenant Count Trautsohn, who thereupon dismounted and, taking with him six troopers, also on foot, unharnessed the captured light howitzer, which was halted behind the squadron's front. The gun was then hauled to one side by the six men and submerged in a small marshy backwater of the stream. The lieutenant then mounted again after giving the two team horses, who were now no longer needed, a slap on the hindquarters with the flat of his sword and silently resumed his position in front of the first troop. Meanwhile the squadron, which was drawn up in two ranks, showed signs, without any actual breach of discipline, of being affected by the excitement of four victorious engagements in one day; there were outbursts of smothered laughter and remarks were exchanged in undertones. The horses too were restless, particularly those between which the horses captured as booty from the enemy were standing. After the adventures of the day they all felt it cramping to be drawn up in parade order; their minds were on the victorious charge and they longed to ride again helter skelter upon a new enemy with drawn swords and to capture more horses as booty. At this moment Captain Baron Rofrano rode close along the squadron's front and raising his heavy eyelids from his rather sleepy blue eyes gave the order, clearly but without raising his voice: "All led horses to be let go." The squadron sat as though carved in stone. Only the grey at the sergeant-major's side stretched out his head until his nostrils almost touched the forehead of the horse on which the captain sat. The captain returned his sword and took one of his pistols from the holster; wiping a speck of dust from the shining barrel with the back of his bridle hand, he repeated the order in a louder voice and followed it up by counting: "One—two——" After counting two he fixed his heavy-lidded eye on the sergeant-major, who sat motionless in his saddle and stared him in the face. While Anton Lerch's steady and unblinking gaze, in which only now and then something doglike and submissive flickered up and vanished again, might express a sort of trust and devotion born of many years of military service, he was almost completely unconscious of the tremendous tension of this critical moment; for his consciousness was flooded by visions of luxury and ease quite foreign to his life and, from depths utterly unknown even to himself, there rose an animal rage against the man before him, who wanted to take away his horse. His face, his voice, his bearing, his whole being aroused a rage so terrible that it could only have ripened in secret from long years of close and daily association. But whether the captain experienced anything of the sort or whether this moment of stubborn insubordination seemed to him to condense the silent and pervasive danger inherent in all critical situations cannot be said. He raised his arm with a casual almost foppish air and, as he contemptuously lifted his upper lip and counted three, the shot rang out and the sergeant-major, hit in the forehead, reeled over on his horse's neck and fell to the ground between the bay and the grey.

But before his body hit the ground, all ranks, with a shake of the reins or the kick of a boot, had got rid of their prizes, and the captain, quietly restoring his pistol to the holster as he observed the quiver that ran through the squadron after his lightning stroke, could now put himself at its head again; for the enemy, as far as could be made out at that distance in the failing light, appeared to be rallying. The enemy, however, did not venture on a fresh attack and soon afterwards, when night had fallen, the patrol reached the southern outpost of their own army.

HE WAS A SMALL MAN with a beard and was very nervous. I remember how the cords of his neck were drawn taut.

For years he had been trying to cure people of illness by the method called psychoanalysis. The idea was the passion of his life. "I came here because I am tired," he said dejectedly. "My body is not tired but something inside me is old and worn-out. I want joy. For a few days or weeks I would like to forget men and women and the influences that make them the sick things they are."

There is a note that comes into the human voice by which you may know real weariness. It comes when one has been trying with all his heart and soul to think his way along some difficult road of thought. Of a sudden he finds himself unable to go on. Something within him stops. A tiny explosion takes place. He bursts into words and talks, perhaps foolishly. Little side currents of his nature he didn't know were there run out and get themselves expressed. It is at such times that a man boasts, uses big words, makes a fool of himself in general.

And so it was the doctor became shrill. He jumped up from the steps where we had been sitting, talking and walked about. "You come from the West. You have kept away from people. You have preserved yourself—damn you! I haven't—" His voice had indeed become shrill. "I have entered into lives. I have gone beneath the surface of the lives of men and women. Women especially I have studied—our own women, here in America."

"You have loved them?" I suggested.

"Yes," he said. "Yes—you are right there. I have done that. It is the only way I can get at things. I have to try to love. You see how that is? It's the only way. Love must be the beginning of things with me."

I began to sense the depths of his weariness. "We will go swim in the lake," I urged.

"I don't want to swim or do any damn plodding thing. I want to run and shout," he declared. "For a while, for a few hours, I want to be like a dead leaf blown by the winds over these hills. I have one desire and one only—to free myself."

We walked in a dusty country road. I wanted him to know that I thought I understood, so I put the case in my own way.

When he stopped and stared at me I talked. "You are no more and no better than myself," I declared. "You are a dog that has rolled in offal, and because you are not quite a dog you do not like the smell of your own hide."

In turn my voice became shrill. "You blind fool," I cried impatiently. "Men like you are fools. You cannot go along that road. It is given to no man to venture far along the road of lives."

I became passionately in earnest. "The illness you pretend to cure is the universal illness," I said. "The thing you want to do cannot be done. Fool—do you expect love to be understood?"

We stood in the road and looked at each other. The suggestion of a sneer played about the corners of his mouth. He put a hand on my shoulder and shook me. "How smart we are—how aptly we put things!"

He spat the words out and then turned and walked a little away. "You think you understand, but you don't understand," he cried. "What you say can't be done can be done. You're a liar. You cannot be so definite without missing something vague and fine. You miss the whole point. The lives of people are like young trees in a forest. They are being choked by climbing vines. The vines are old thoughts and beliefs planted by dead men. I am myself covered by crawling creeping vines that choke me."

He laughed bitterly. "And that's why I want to run and play," he said.

"I want to be a leaf blown by the wind over hills. I want to die and be born again, and I am only a tree covered with vines and slowly dying. I am, you see, weary and want to be made clean. I am an amateur venturing timidly into lives," he concluded. "I am weary and want to be made clean. I am covered by creeping crawling things."

A woman from Iowa came here to Chicago and took a room in a house on the west-side. She was about twenty-seven years old and ostensibly she came to the city to study advanced methods for teaching music.

A certain young man also lived in the west-side house. His room faced a long hall on the second floor of the house and the one taken by the woman was across the hall facing his room.

In regard to the young man—there is something very sweet in his nature. He is a painter but I have often wished he would decide to become a writer. He tells things with understanding and he does not paint brilliantly.

And so the woman from Iowa lived in the west-side house and came home from the city in the evening. She looked like a thousand other women one sees in the streets every day. The only thing that at all made her stand out among the women in the crowds was that she was a little lame. Her right foot was slightly deformed and she walked with a limp. For three months she lived in the house—where she was the only woman except the landlady—and then a feeling in regard to her began to grow up among the men of the house.

The men all said the same thing concerning her. When they met in the hallway at the front of the house they stopped, laughed and whispered. "She wants a lover," they said and winked. "She may not know it but a lover is what she needs."

One knowing Chicago and Chicago men would think that an easy want to be satisfied. I laughed when my friend—whose name is LeRoy—told me the story, but he did not laugh. He shook his head. "It wasn't so easy," he said. "There would be no story were the matter that simple."

LeRoy tried to explain. "Whenever a man approached her she became alarmed," he said. Men kept smiling and speaking to her. They invited her to dinner and to the theatre, but nothing would induce her to walk in the streets with a man. She never went into the streets at night. When a man stopped and tried to talk with her in the hallway she turned her eyes to the floor and then ran into her room. Once a young drygoods clerk who lived there induced her to sit with him on the steps before the house.

He was a sentimental fellow and took hold of her hand. When she began to cry he was alarmed and arose. He put a hand on her shoulder and tried to explain, but under the touch of his fingers her whole body shook with terror. "Don't touch me," she cried, "don't let your hands touch me!" She began to scream and people passing in the street stopped to listen. The drygoods clerk was alarmed and ran upstairs to his own room. He bolted the door and stood listening. "It is a trick," he declared in a trembling voice. "She is trying to make trouble. I did nothing to her. It was an accident and anyway what's the matter? I only touched her arm with my fingers."

Perhaps a dozen times LeRoy has spoken to me of the experience of the Iowa woman in the west-side house. The men there began to hate her. Although she would have nothing to do with them she would not let them alone. In a hundred ways she continually invited approaches that when made she repelled. When she stood naked in the bathroom facing the hallway where the men passed up and down she left the door slightly ajar. There was a couch in the living room downstairs, and when men were present she would sometimes enter and without saying a word throw herself down before them. On the couch she lay with lips drawn slightly apart. Her eyes stared at the ceiling. Her whole physical being seemed to be waiting for something. The sense of her filled the room. The men standing about pretended not to see. They talked loudly. Embarrassment took possession of them and one by one they crept quietly away.

One evening the woman was ordered to leave the house. Someone, perhaps the drygoods clerk, had talked to the landlady and she acted at once. "If you leave tonight I shall like it that much better," LeRoy heard the elder woman's voice saying. She stood in the hallway before the Iowa woman's room. The landlady's voice rang through the house.

LeRoy the painter is tall and lean and his life has been spent in devotion to ideas. The passions of his brain have consumed the passions of his body. His income is small and he has not married. Perhaps he has never had a sweetheart. He is not without physical desire but he is not primarily concerned with desire.

On the evening when the Iowa woman was ordered to leave the west-side house, she waited until she thought the landlady had gone downstairs, and then went into LeRoy's room. It was about eight o'clock and he sat by a window reading a book. The woman did not knock but opened the door. She said nothing but ran across the floor and knelt at his feet. LeRoy said that her twisted foot made her run like a wounded bird, that her eyes were burning and that her breath came in little gasps. "Take me," she said, putting her face down upon his knees and trembling violently. "Take me quickly. There must be a beginning to things. I can't stand the waiting. You must take me at once."

You may be quite sure LeRoy was perplexed by all this. From what he has said I gathered that until that evening he had hardly noticed the woman. I suppose that of all the men in the house he had been the most indifferent to her. In the room something happened. The landlady followed the woman when she ran to LeRoy, and the two women confronted him. The woman from Iowa knelt trembling and frightened at his feet. The landlady was indignant. LeRoy acted on impulse. An inspiration came to him. Putting his hand on the kneeling woman's shoulder he shook her violently. "Now behave yourself," he said quickly. "I will keep my promise." He turned to the landlady and smiled. "We have been engaged to be married," he said. "We have quarrelled. She came here to be near me. She has been unwell and excited. I will take her away. Please don't let yourself be annoyed. I will take her away."

When the woman and LeRoy got out of the house she stopped weeping and put her hand into his. Her fears had all gone away. He found a room for her in another house and then went with her into a park and sat on a bench.

Everything LeRoy has told me concerning this woman strengthens my belief in what I said to the man that day in the mountains. You cannot venture along the road of lives. On the bench he and the woman talked until midnight and he saw and talked with her many times later. Nothing came of it. She went back, I suppose, to her place in the West.

In the place from which she had come the woman had been a teacher of music. She was one of four sisters, all engaged in the same sort of work and, LeRoy says, all quiet capable women. Their father had died when the eldest girl was not yet ten, and five years later the mother died also. The girls had a house and a garden.

In the nature of things I cannot know what the lives of the women were like but of this one may be quite certain—they talked only of women's affairs, thought only of women's affairs. No one of them ever had a lover. For years no man came near the house.

Of them all only the youngest, the one who came to Chicago, was visibly affected by the utterly feminine quality of their lives. It did something to her. All day and every day she taught music to young girls and then went home to the women. When she was twenty-five she began to think and to dream of men. During the day and through the evening she talked with women of women's affairs, and all the time she wanted desperately to be loved by a man. She went to Chicago with that hope in mind. LeRoy explained her attitude in the matter and her strange behavior in the west-side house by saying she had thought too much and acted too little. "The life force within her became decentralized," he declared. "What she wanted she could not achieve. The living force within could not find expression. When it could not get expressed in one way it took another. Sex spread itself out over her body. It permeated the very fibre of her being. At the last she was sex personified, sex become condensed and impersonal. Certain words, the touch of a man's hand, sometimes even the sight of a man passing in the street did something to her."

Yesterday I saw LeRoy and he talked to me again of the woman and her strange and terrible fate.

We walked in the park by the lake. As we went along the figure of the woman kept coming into my mind. An idea came to me.

"You might have been her lover," I said. "That was possible. She was not afraid of you."

LeRoy stopped. Like the doctor who was so sure of his ability to walk into lives he grew angry and scolded. For a moment he stared at me and then a rather odd thing happened. Words said by the other man in the dusty road in the hills came to LeRoy's lips and were said over again. The suggestion of a sneer played about the corners of his mouth. "How smart we are. How aptly we put things," he said.

The voice of the young man who walked with me in the park by the lake in the city became shrill. I sensed the weariness in him. Then he laughed and said quietly and softly, "It isn't so simple. By being sure of yourself you are in danger of losing all of the romance of life. You miss the whole point. Nothing in life can be settled so definitely. The woman—you see—was like a young tree choked by a climbing vine. The thing that wrapped her about had shut out the light. She was a grotesque as many trees in the forest are grotesques. Her problem was such a difficult one that thinking of it has changed the whole current of my life. At first I was like you. I was quite sure. I thought I would be her lover and settle the matter."

LeRoy turned and walked a little away. Then he came back and took hold of my arm. A passionate earnestness took possession of him. His voice trembled. "She needed a lover, yes, the men in the house were quite right about that," he said. "She needed a lover and at the same time a lover was not what she needed. The need of a lover was, after all, a quite secondary thing. She needed to be loved, to be long and quietly and patiently loved. To be sure she is a grotesque, but then all the people in the world are grotesques. We all need to be loved. What would cure her would cure the rest of us also. The disease she had is, you see, universal. We all want to be loved and the world has no plan for creating our lovers."

LeRoy's voice dropped and he walked beside me in silence. We turned away from the lake and walked under trees. I looked closely at him. The cords of his neck were drawn taut. "I have seen under the shell of life and I am afraid," he mused. "I am myself like the woman. I am covered with creeping crawling vine-like things. I cannot be a lover. I am not subtle or patient enough. I am paying old debts. Old thoughts and beliefs—seeds planted by dead men—spring up in my soul and choke me."

For a long time we walked and LeRoy talked, voicing the thoughts that came into his mind. I listened in silence. His mind struck upon the refrain voiced by the man in the mountains. "I would like to be a dead dry thing," he muttered looking at the leaves scattered over the grass. "I would like to be a leaf blown away by the wind." He looked up and his eyes turned to where among the trees we could see the lake in the distance. "I am weary and want to be made clean. I am a man covered by creeping crawling things. I would like to be dead and blown by the wind over limitless waters," he said. "I want more than anything else in the world to be clean."

THE OTHER WOMAN

I AM IN LOVE with my wife," he said—a superfluous remark, as I had not questioned his attachment to the woman he had married. We walked for ten minutes and then he said it again. I turned to look at him. He began to talk and told me the tale I am now about to set down.

The thing he had on his mind happened during what must have been the most eventful week of his life. He was to be married on Friday afternoon. On Friday of the week before he got a telegram announcing his appointment to a government position. Something else happened that made him very proud and glad. In secret he was in the habit of writing verses and during the year before several of them had been printed in poetry magazines. One of the societies that give prizes for what they think the best poems published during the year put his name at the head of its list. The story of his triumph was printed in the newspapers of his home city and one of them also printed his picture.

As might have been expected he was excited and in a rather highly strung nervous state all during that week. Almost every evening he went to call on his fiancée, the daughter of a judge. When he got there the house was filled with people and many letters, telegrams and packages were being received. He stood a little to one side and men and women kept coming up to speak to him. They congratulated him upon his success in getting the government position and on his achievement as a poet. Everyone seemed to be praising him and when he went home and to bed he could not sleep. On Wednesday evening he went to the theatre and it seemed to him that people all over the house recognized him. Everyone nodded and smiled. After the first act five or six men and two women left their seats to gather about him. A little group was formed. Strangers sitting along the same row of seats stretched their necks and looked. He had never received so much attention before, and now a fever of expectancy took possession of him.

As he explained when he told me of his experience, it was for him altogether abnormal time. He felt like one floating in air. When he got into bed after seeing so many people and hearing so many words of praise his head whirled round and round. When he closed his eyes a crowd of people invaded his room. It seemed as though the minds of all the people of his city were centred on himself. The most absurd fancies took possession of him. He imagined himself riding in a carriage through the streets of a city. Windows were thrown open and people ran out at the doors of houses. "There he is. That's him," they shouted, and at the words a glad cry arose. The carriage drove into a street blocked with people. A hundred thousand pairs of eyes looked up at him. "There you are! What a fellow you have managed to make of yourself!" the eyes seemed to be saying.

My friend could not explain whether the excitement of the people was due to the fact that he had written a new poem or whether, in his new government position, he had performed some notable act. The apartment where he lived at that time was on a street perched along the top of a cliff far out at the edge of his city, and from his bedroom window he could look down over trees and factory roofs to a river. As he could not sleep and as the fancies that kept crowding in upon him only made him more excited, he got out of bed and tried to think.

As would be natural under such circumstances, he tried to control his thoughts, but when he sat by the window and was wide awake a most unexpected and humiliating thing happened. The night was clear and fine. There was a moon. He wanted to dream of the woman who was to be his wife, to think out lines for noble poems or make plans that would affect his career. Much to his surprise his mind refused to do anything of the sort.

At a corner of the street where he lived there was a small cigar store and newspaper stand run by a fat man of forty and his wife, a small active woman with bright grey eyes. In the morning he stopped there to buy a paper before going down to the city. Sometimes he saw only the fat man, but often the man had disappeared and the woman waited on him. She was, as he assured me at least twenty times in telling me his tale, a very ordinary person with nothing special or notable about her, but for some reason he could not explain, being in her presence stirred him profoundly. During that week in the midst of his distraction she was the only person he knew who stood out clear and distinct in his mind. When he wanted so much to think noble thoughts he could think only of her. Before he knew what was happening his imagination had taken hold of the notion of having a love affair with the woman.

"I could not understand myself," he declared, in telling me the story. "At night, when the city was quiet and when I should have been asleep, I thought about her all the time. After two or three days of that sort of thing the consciousness of her got into my daytime thoughts. I was terribly muddled. When I went to see the woman who is now my wife I found that my love for her was in no way affected by my vagrant thoughts. There was but one woman in the world I wanted to live with and to be my comrade in undertaking to improve my own character and my position in the world, but for the moment, you see, I wanted this other woman to be in my arms. She had worked her way into my being. On all sides people were saying I was a big man who would do big things, and there I was. That evening when I went to the theatre I walked home because I knew I would be unable to sleep, and to satisfy the annoying impulse in myself I went and stood on the sidewalk before the tobacco shop. It was a two-story building, and I knew the woman lived upstairs with her husband. For a long time I stood in the darkness with my body pressed against the wall of the building, and then I thought of the two of them up there and no doubt in bed together. That made me furious.

"Then I grew more furious with myself. I went home and got into bed, shaken with anger. There are certain books of verse and some prose writings that have always moved me deeply, and so I put several books on a table by my bed.

"The voices in the books were like the voices of the dead. I did not hear them. The printed words would not penetrate into my consciousness. I tried to think of the woman I loved, but her figure had also become something far away, something with which I for the moment seemed to have nothing to do. I rolled and tumbled about in the bed. It was a miserable experience.

"On Thursday morning I went into the store. There stood the woman alone. I think she knew how I felt. Perhaps she had been thinking of me as I had been thinking of her. A doubtful hesitating smile played about the corners of her mouth. She had on a dress made of cheap cloth and there was a tear on the shoulder. She must have been ten years older than myself. When I tried to put my pennies on the glass counter, behind which she stood, my hand trembled so that the pennies made a sharp rattling noise. When I spoke the voice that came out of my throat did not sound like anything that had ever belonged to me. It barely arose above a thick whisper. 'I want you,' I said. 'I want you very much. Can't you run away from your husband? Come to me at my apartment at seven tonight.'

"The woman did come to my apartment at seven. That morning she didn't say anything at all. For a minute perhaps we stood looking at each other. I had forgotten everything in the world but just her. Then she nodded her head and I went away. Now that I think of it I cannot remember a word I ever heard her say. She came to my apartment at seven and it was dark. You must understand this was in the month of October. I had not lighted a light and I had sent my servant away.

"During that day I was no good at all. Several men came to see me at my office, but I got all muddled up in trying to talk with them. They attributed my rattle-headedness to my approaching marriage and went away laughing.

"It was on that morning, just the day before my marriage, that I got a long and very beautiful letter from my fiancée. During the night before she also had been unable to sleep and had got out of bed to write the letter. Everything she said in it was very sharp and real, but she herself, as a living thing, seemed to have receded into the distance. It seemed to me that she was like a bird, flying far away in distant skies, and that I was like a perplexed bare-footed boy standing in the dusty road before a farm house and looking at her receding figure. I wonder if you will understand what I mean?

"In regard to the letter. In it she, the awakening woman, poured out her heart. She of course knew nothing of life, but she was a woman. She lay, I suppose, in her bed feeling nervous and wrought up as I had been doing. She realized that a great change was about to take place in her life and was glad and afraid too. There she lay thinking of it all. Then she got out of bed and began talking to me on the bit of paper. She told me how afraid she was and how glad too. Like most young women she had heard things whispered. In the letter she was very sweet and fine. 'For a long time, after we are married, we will forget we are a man and woman,' she wrote. 'We will be human beings. You must remember that I am ignorant and often I will be very stupid. You must love me and be very patient and kind. When I know more, when after a long time you have taught me the way of life, I will try to repay you. I will love you tenderly and passionately. The possibility of that is in me or I would not want to marry at all. I am afraid but I am also happy. O, I am so glad our marriage time is near at hand!'

"Now you see clearly enough what a mess I was in. In my office, after I had read my fiancée's letter, I became at once very resolute and strong. I remember that I got out of my chair and walked about, proud of the fact that I was to be the husband of so noble a woman. Right away I felt concerning her as I had been feeling about myself before I found out what a weak thing I was. To be sure I took a strong resolution that I would not be weak. At nine that evening I had planned to run in to see my fiancée. 'I'm all right now', I said to myself. 'The beauty of her character has saved me from myself. I will go home now and send the other woman away.' In the morning I had telephoned to my servant and told him that I did not want him to be at the apartment that evening and I now picked up the telephone to tell him to stay at home.

"Then a thought came to me. 'I will not want him there in any event,' I told myself. 'What will he think when he sees a woman coming in my place on the evening before the day I am to be married?' I put the telephone down and prepared to go home. 'If I want my servant out of the apartment it is because I do not want him to hear me talk with the woman. I cannot be rude to her. I will have to make some kind of an explanation,' I said to myself.

"The woman came at seven o'clock, and, as you may have guessed, I let her in and forgot the resolution I had made. It is likely I never had any intention of doing anything else. There was a bell on my door, but she did not ring, but knocked very softly. It seems to me that everything she did that evening was soft and quiet, but very determined and quick. Do I make myself clear? When she came I was standing just within the door where I had been standing and waiting for a half hour. My hands were trembling as they had trembled in the morning when her eyes looked at me and when I tried to put the pennies on the counter in the store. When I opened the door she stepped quickly in and I took her into my arms. We stood together in the darkness. My hands no longer trembled. I felt very happy and strong.

"Although I have tried to make everything clear I have not told you what the woman I married is like. I have emphasized, you see, the other woman. I make the blind statement that I love my wife, and to a man of your shrewdness that means nothing at all. To tell the truth, had I not started to speak of this matter I would feel more comfortable. It is inevitable that I give you the impression that I am in love with the tobacconist's wife. That's not true. To be sure I was very conscious of her all during the week before my marriage, but after she had come to me at my apartment she went entirely out of my mind.

"Am I telling the truth? I am trying very hard to tell what happened to me. I am saying that I have not since that evening thought of the woman who came to my apartment. Now, to tell the facts of the case, that is not true. On that evening I went to my fiancée at nine, as she had asked me to do in her letter. In a kind of way I cannot explain the other woman went with me. This is what I mean—you see I had been thinking that if anything happened between me and the tobacconist's wife I would not be able to go through with my marriage. 'It is one thing or the other with me,' I had said to myself.

"As a matter of fact I went to see my beloved on that evening filled with a new faith in the outcome of our life together. I am afraid I muddle this matter in trying to tell it. A moment ago I said the other woman, the tobacconist's wife, went with me. I do not mean she went in fact. What I am trying to say is that something of her faith in her own desires and her courage in seeing things through went with me. Is that clear to you? When I got to my fiancée's house there was a crowd of people standing about. Some were relatives from distant places I had not seen before. She looked up quickly when I came into the room. My face must have been radiant. I never saw her so moved. She thought her letter had affected me deeply, and of course it had. Up she jumped and ran to meet me. She was like a glad child. Right before the people who turned and looked inquiringly at us, she said the thing that was in her mind. 'O, I am so happy,' she cried. 'You have understood. We will be two human beings. We will not have to be husband and wife.'

"As you may suppose everyone laughed, but I did not laugh. The tears came into my eyes. I was so happy I wanted to shout. Perhaps you understand what I mean. In the office that day when I read the letter my fiancée had written I had said to myself, 'I will take care of the dear little woman.' There was something smug, you see, about that. In her house when she cried out in that way, and when everyone laughed, what I said to myself was something like this: 'We will take care of ourselves.' I whispered something of the sort into her ears. To tell you the truth I had come down off my perch. The spirit of the other woman did that to me. Before all the people gathered about I held my fiancée close and we kissed. They thought it very sweet of us to be so affected at the sight of each other. What they would have thought had they known the truth about me God only knows!

"Twice now I have said that after that evening I never thought of the other woman at all. That is partially true but, sometimes in the evening when I am walking alone in the street or in the park as we are walking now, and when evening comes softly and quickly as it has come to-night, the feeling of her comes sharply into my body and mind. After that one meeting I never saw her again. On the next day I was married and I have never gone back into her street. Often however as I am walking along as I am doing now, a quick sharp earthy feeling takes possession of me. It is as though I were a seed in the ground and the warm rains of the spring had come. It is as though I were not a man but a tree.

"And now you see I am married and everything is all right. My marriage is to me a very beautiful fact. If you were to say that my marriage is not a happy one I could call you a liar and be speaking the absolute truth. I have tried to tell you about this other woman. There is a kind of relief in speaking of her. I have never done it before. I wonder why I was so silly as to be afraid that I would give you the impression I am not in love with my wife. If I did not instinctively trust your understanding I would not have spoken. As the matter stands I have a little stirred myself up. To-night I shall think of the other woman. That sometimes occurs. It will happen after I have gone to bed. My wife sleeps in the next room to mine and the door is always left open. There will be a moon to-night, and when there is a moon long streaks of light fall on her bed. I shall awake at midnight to-night. She will be lying asleep with one arm thrown over her head.

"What is it that I am now talking about? A man does not speak of his wife lying in bed. What I am trying to say is that, because of this talk, I shall think of the other woman to-night. My thoughts will not take the form they did during the week before I was married. I will wonder what has become of the woman. For a moment I will again feel myself holding her close. I will think that for an hour I was closer to her than I have ever been to anyone else. Then I will think of the time when I will be as close as that to my wife. She is still, you see, an awakening woman. For a moment I will close my eyes and the quick, shrewd, determined eyes of that other woman will look into mine. My head will swim and then I will quickly open my eyes and see again the dear woman with whom I have undertaken to live out my life. Then I will sleep and when I awake in the morning it will be as it was that evening when I walked out of my dark apartment after having had the most notable experience of my life. What I mean to say, you understand, is that, for me, when I awake, the other woman will be utterly gone."

EARLY SORROW

THE PRINCIPAL DISH at dinner had been croquettes made of turnip greens. So there follows a trifle, concocted out of one of those dessert powders we use nowadays, that taste like almond soap. Xaver, the youthful manservant, in his outgrown striped jacket, white woollen gloves, and yellow sandals, hands it round, and the "big folk" take this opportunity to remind their father, tactfully, that company is coming to-day.

The "big folks" are two, Ingrid and Bert. Ingrid is brown-eyed, eighteen and perfectly delightful. She is on the eve of her exams; and will probably pass them, if only because she knows how to wind masters, and even headmasters, round her finger. She does not, however, mean to use her certificate once she gets it; having leanings towards the stage, on the ground of her ingratiating smile, her equally ingratiating voice, and a marked and irresistible talent for burlesque. Bert is blond and seventeen. He intends to get done with school somehow, anyhow, and fling himself into the arms of life. He will be a dancer, or a cabaret actor, possibly even a waiter—but not a waiter anywhere else save at "Cairo," the night club, whither he has once already taken flight, at five in the morning, and been brought back crest-fallen. Bert bears a strong resemblance to the youthful manservant, Xaver Kleinsgutl, of about the same age as himself; not because he looks common —in features he is strikingly like his father, Professor Cornelius—but by reason of an approximation of types, due in its turn to far-reaching compromises in matters of dress and bearing generally. Both lads wear their heavy hair very long on top, with a cursory parting in the middle; and give their heads the same characteristic toss to throw it off the forehead. When one of them leaves the house, by the garden gate, bareheaded in all weathers, in a blouse coquettishly girt with a leather strap, and sheers off bent well over with his head on one side; or else mounts his push-bike—Xaver makes free with his employers', of both sexes, or even, in acutely irresponsible mood, with the professor's own—Dr. Cornelius from his bedroom window cannot, for the life of him, tell whether he is looking at his son or his servant. Both, he thinks, look like young moujiks. And both are impassioned cigarette-smokers; though Bert has not the means to compete with Xaver, who smokes as many as thirty a day, of a brand named after a popular cinema star. The big folk call their father and mother the "old folk"—not behind their backs, but as a form of address and in all affection: "Hullo, old folks," they will say; though Cornelius is only forty-seven years old and his wife eight years younger. And the professor's parents, who lead in his household the humble and hesitant life of the veritably old, are on the big folk's lips the "ancients." As for the "little folk," Ellie and Snapper, who take their meals upstairs with blue-faced Ann—so-called because of her prevailing facial hue—Ellie and Snapper follow their mother's example and address their father by his first name, Abel. Unutterably comic it sounds, in its pert, confiding familiarity; particularly on the lips, in the sweet accents, of five-year-old Eleanor, who is the image of Frau Cornelius' baby pictures, and whom the professor loves above everything else in the world.

"Darling old thing," says Ingrid affably, laying her large but shapely hand on his, as he presides in proper middle-class style over the family table, with her on his left and the mother opposite: "Parent mine, may I ever so gently jog your memory, for you have probably forgotten: this is the afternoon we were to have our little jollification, our turkey-trot with eats to match. You haven't a thing to do but just bear up and not funk it; everything will be over by nine o'clock."

"Oh—ah!" says Cornelius, his face falling. "Good!" he goes on, and nods his head to show himself in harmony with the inevitable. "I only meant—is this really the day? Thursday, yes. How time flies! Well, what time are they coming?"

"Half-past four they'll be dropping in, I should say," answers Ingrid, to whom her brother leaves the major rôle in all dealings with the father. Upstairs, while he is resting, he will hear scarcely anything, and from seven to eight he takes his walk. He can slip out by the terrace if he likes.

"Tut!" says Cornelius deprecatingly, as who should say, "You exaggerate." But Bert puts in: "It's the one evening in the week Wanja doesn't have to play. Any other night he'd have to leave by half-past six, which would be painful for all concerned."

Wanja is Ivan Herzl, the celebrated young leading man at the Stadt-theater. Bert and Ingrid are on intimate terms with him, they often visit him in his dressing-room and have tea. He is an artist of the modern school, who stands on the stage in strange and, to the Professor's mind, utterly affected dancing attitudes, and shrieks lamentably. To a professor of history, all highly repugnant; but Bert has entirely succumbed to Herzl's influence, blackens the lower rim of his eyelids—despite painful but fruitless scenes with his father—and with youthful carelessness of the ancestral anguish declares that not only will he take Herzl for his model if he becomes a dancer, but in case he turns out to be a waiter at "Cairo" he means to walk precisely thus.

Cornelius slightly raises his brows and makes his son a little bow—indicative of the unassumingness and self-abnegation befitting his age. You could not call it a mocking bow, or suggestive in any special sense. Bert may refer it to himself, or equally to his so talented friend.

"Who else is coming?" next inquires the master of the house. They mention various people, names all more or less familiar, from the city, from the suburban colony, from Ingrid's school. They still have some telephoning to do, they say. They have to phone Max. This is Max Hergesell, an engineering student; Ingrid utters his name in the nasal drawl which according to her is the traditional intonation of all the Hergesells. She goes on to parody it in the most abandonedly funny and life-like way, and the parents laugh until they nearly choke over the wretched trifle. For even in these times when something funny happens people have to laugh.

From time to time the telephone bell rings in the Professor's study, and the big folk run across knowing it is their affair. Many people had to give up their telephones, the last time the price rose; but so far the Corneliuses have been able to keep theirs, just as they have kept their villa, which was built before the war, by dint of the salary Cornelius draws as Professor of History—a million marks, and more or less adapted to the chances and changes of post-war life. The house is comfortable, even elegant, though sadly in need of repairs that cannot be made for lack of materials, and at present disfigured by iron stoves with long pipes. Even so, it is still the proper setting of the upper middle class, though they themselves look odd enough in it, with their worn and turned clothing and altered way of life. The children, of course, know nothing else; to them it is normal and regular, they belong by birth to the "villa proletariat." The problem of clothing troubles them not at all. They and their like have evolved a costume to fit the time, by poverty out of taste for innovation: in summer it consists of scarcely more than a belted linen smock and sandals. The middle-class parents find things rather more difficult.

The big folks' table napkins hang over their chair-backs, they talk with their friends over the telephone. These friends are the invited guests who have rung up to accept or decline or arrange: and the conversation is carried on in the jargon of the clan, full of slang and high spirits, of which the old folk understand hardly a word. These consult together meantime about the hospitality to be offered to the impending guests. The Professor displays a middle-class ambitiousness: he wants to serve a sweet—or something that looks like a sweet—after the Italian salad and brown bread sandwiches. But Frau Cornelius says that would be going too far. The guests would not expect it, she is sure—and the big folk, returning once more to their trifle, agree with her.

The mother of the family is of the same general type as Ingrid, though not so tall. She is languid, the fantastic difficulties of the housekeeping have broken and worn her. She really ought to go and take a cure, but feels incapable; the floor is always swaying under her feet, and everything seems upside down. She speaks of what is uppermost in her mind: the eggs, they simply must be bought to-day. Six thousand marks apiece they are, and just so many are to be had on this one day of the week at one single shop fifteen minutes' journey away. Whatever else they do, the big folk must go and fetch them immediately after luncheon, with Danny, their neighbour's son, who will soon be calling for them; and Xaver Kleinsgutl will don civilian garb and attend his young master and mistress. For no single household is allowed more than five eggs a week; therefore the young people will enter the shop singly, one after another, under assumed names, and thus wring twenty eggs from the shopkeeper for the Cornelius family. This enterprise is the sporting event of the week for all participants, not excepting the moujik Kleinsgutl, and most of all for Ingrid and Bert, who delight in misleading and mystifying their fellow-men, and would revel in the performance even if it did not achieve one single egg. They adore impersonating fictitious characters; they love to sit in a bus and carry on long life-like conversations in a dialect which they otherwise never speak, the most commonplace dialogue about politics and people and the price of food, while the whole bus listens open-mouthed to this incredibly ordinary prattle, though with a dark suspicion all the while that something is wrong somewhere. The conversation waxes ever more shameless, it enters into revolting detail about these people who do not exist. Ingrid can make her voice sound ever so common and twittering and shrill as she impersonates a shop girl with an illegitimate child, said child being a son with sadistic tendencies, who lately out in the country treated a cow with such unnatural cruelty that no Christian could have borne to see it. Bert nearly explodes at her twittering, but restrains himself and displays a grisly sympathy; he and the unhappy shop girl entering into a long stupid, depraved and shuddery conversation over the particular morbid cruelty involved; until an old gentleman opposite, sitting with his ticket folded between his index finger and his seal ring, can bear it no more and makes public protest against the nature of the themes these young folk are discussing with such particularity. He uses the Greek plural: "themata." Whereat Ingrid pretends to be dissolving in tears, and Bert behaves as though his wrath against the old gentleman was with difficulty being held in check and would probably burst out before long. He clenches his fists, he gnashes his teeth, he shakes from head to foot; and the unhappy old gentleman, whose intentions had been of the best, hastily leaves the bus at the next stop.

Such are the diversions of the big folk. The telephone plays a prominent part in them: they ring up any and everybody—members of government, opera singers, dignitaries of the Church—in the character of shop assistants, or perhaps as Lord or Lady Doolittle. They are only with difficulty persuaded that they have the wrong number. Once they emptied their parents' card-tray and distributed its contents among the neighbours' letter-boxes, wantonly, yet not without enough impish sense of the fitness of things to make it highly upsetting, God only knowing why certain people should have called where they did.

Xaver comes in to clear away, tossing the hair out of his eyes. Now that he has taken off his gloves you can see the yellow chain-ring on his left hand. And as the Professor finishes his watery eight-thousand-mark beer and lights a cigarette, the little folk can be heard scrambling down the stair, coming, by established custom, for their after-dinner call on Father and Mother. They storm the dining-room, after a struggle with the latch, clutched by both pairs of little hands at once; their clumsy small feet twinkle over the carpet, in red felt slippers with the socks falling down on them. With prattle and shoutings each makes for his own place: Snapper to Mother, to climb on her lap, boast of all he has eaten, and thump his fat little tum; Ellie to her Abel, so much hers because she is so very much his; because she consciously luxuriates in the deep tenderness—like all deep feeling, concealing a melancholy strain—with which he holds her small form embraced; in the love in his eyes as he kisses her little fairy hand or the sweet brow with its delicate tracery of tiny blue veins.

The little folk look like each other, with the strong undefined likeness of brother and sister. In clothing and hair-cut they are twins. Yet they are sharply distinguished after all, and quite on sex lines. It is a little Adam and a little Eve. Not only is Snapper the sturdier and more compact, he appears consciously to emphasise his four-year-old masculinity in speech, manner and carriage, lifting his shoulders and letting the little arms hang down quite like a young American athlete, drawing down his mouth when he talks and seeking to give his voice a gruff and forthright ring. But all this masculinity is the result of effort rather than natively his. Born and brought up in these desolate, distracted times, he has been endowed by them with an unstable and hypersensitive nervous system, and suffers greatly under life's disharmonies. He is prone to sudden anger and outbursts of bitter tears, stamping his feet at every trifle; for this reason he is his mother's special nursling and care. His round, round eyes are chestnut brown, and already inclined to squint, so that he will need glasses in the near future. His little nose is long, the mouth small—the father's nose and mouth they are, more plainly than ever since the Professor shaved his pointed beard and goes smooth-faced. The pointed beard had become impossible—even professors must make some concession to the changing times.

But the little daughter sits on her father's knee, his Eleonorchen, his little Eve, so much more gracious a little being, so much sweeter-faced than her brother—and he holds his cigarette away from her while she fingers his glasses with her minute and dainty hands. The lenses are divided for reading and distance, and each day they tease her curiosity afresh.

At bottom he suspects that his wife's partiality may have a firmer basis than his own: that Snapper's refractory masculinity perhaps is solider stuff than his own little girl's more explicit charm and grace. But the heart will not be commanded, that he knows; and once and for all his heart belongs to the little one, as it has since the day she came, since the first time he saw her. Almost always, when he holds her in his arms, he remembers that first time: remembers the sunny room in the Women's Hospital, where Ellie first saw the light, twelve years after Bert was born. He remembers how he drew near, the mother smiling the while, and cautiously put aside the canopy of the diminutive bed that stood beside the large one. There lay the little miracle among the pillows: so well-formed, so encompassed, as it were, with the harmony of sweet proportions, with little hands that even then, though so much tinier, were beautiful as now; with wide-open eyes blue as the sky and brighter than the sunshine—and almost in that very second he felt himself captured and held fast. This was love at first sight, love everlasting: a feeling unknown, un hoped for, unexpected—in so far as it could be a matter of conscious awareness; it took entire possession of him, and he understood, with joyous amazement, that this was for life.

But he understood more. He knows, does Dr. Cornelius, that there is something not quite right about this feeling, so unaware, so undreamed of, so involuntary. He has a shrewd suspicion that it is not by accident it has so utterly mastered him and bound itself up with his existence; that he had—even subconsciously—been preparing for it, or, more precisely, been prepared for it. There is, in short, something in him which at a given moment was ready to issue in such a feeling; and this something, highly extraordinarily to relate, is his essence and quality as a professor of history. Dr. Cornelius, however, does not actually say this, even to himself; he merely realises it, at odd times, and smiles a private smile. He knows that history professors do not love history because it is something that comes to pass, but only because it is something that has come to pass; that they hate a revolution like the present one, because they feel it is lawless, incoherent, irrelevant, in a word unhistoric; that their hearts belong to the coherent, disciplined, historic past. For the temper of timelessness, the temper of eternity—thus the scholar communes with himself, when he takes his walk by the river, before supper—that tempers brood over the past; and it is a temper much better suited to the nervous system of a history professor than are the excesses of the present. The past is immortalised, that is to say it is dead; and death is the root of all godliness and all abiding significance. Dr. Cornelius, walking alone in the dark, has a profound insight into this truth. It is this conservative instinct of his, his sense of the eternal, that has found in his love for his little daughter a way to save itself from the wounding inflicted by the times. For father love, and a little child on its mother's breast—are not these timeless, and so very, very holy and beautiful? Yet Cornelius, pondering there in the dark, describes something not perfectly right and good in his love. Theoretically, in the interests of science, he admits it to himself. There is something ulterior about it, in the nature of it: that something is hostility, hostility against the history of to-day, which is still in the making and thus not history at all, in behalf of the genuine history that has already happened, that is to say, death. Yes, passing strange though all this is, yet it is true; true in a sense, that is. His devotion to this priceless little morsel of life and new growth has something to do with death, it clings to death as against life; and that is neither right nor beautiful—in a sense. Though only the most fanatical ascetism could be capable, on no other ground than such casual scientific perception, of tearing this purest and most precious of feelings out of his heart.

He holds his darling on his lap and her slim rosy legs hang down. He raises his brows as he talks to her, tenderly, with a half-teasing note of respect, and listens enchanted to her high, sweet little voice calling him Abel. He exchanges a look with the mother, who is caressing her Snapper and reading him a gentle lecture. He must be more reasonable, he must learn self-control; to-day again, under the manifold exasperations of life, he has given way to rage and behaved like a howling dervish. Cornelius casts a mistrustful glance at the big folk now and then, too; he thinks it not unlikely they are not unaware of those scientific preoccupations of his evening walks. If such be the case they do not show it. They stand there, leaning their arms on their chair-backs, and, with a benevolence not untinged with irony, look on at the parental happiness.

The children's frocks are of a heavy, brick-red stuff, embroidered in modern "arty" style. They once belonged to Ingrid and Bert and are precisely alike, save that little knickers come out beneath Snapper's smock. And both have their hair bobbed. Snapper's is a streaky blond, inclined to turn dark. It is bristly and sticky, and looks for all the world like a droll, badly-fitting wig. But Ellie's is chestnut brown, glossy and fine as silk, as pleasing as her whole little personality. It covers her ears—and these ears are not a pair, one of them being the right size, the other distinctly too large. Her father will sometimes uncover this little abnormality and exclaim over it as though he had never noticed it before, which both makes Ellie giggle and covers her with shame. Her eyes are now golden-brown, set far apart and with sweet gleams in them—such a clear and lovely look! The brows above are blond; the nose still unformed, with thick nostrils and almost circular holes; the mouth large and expressive, with a beautifully arching and mobile upper lip. When she laughs, dimples come in her cheeks, and she shows her teeth like loosely strung pearls. So far she has lost but one tooth, which her father gently twisted out with his handkerchief after it had grown very wobbling. During this small operation she had paled and trembled very much. Her cheeks have the softness proper to her years; but they are not chubby; indeed they are rather concave, due to her facial structure, with its somewhat prominent jaw. On one, close to the soft fall of her hair, is a downy freckle.

Ellie is not too well pleased with her looks—a sign that already she troubles about such things. Sadly she thinks it is best to admit it once for all, her face is “homely”; though the rest of her, “on the other hand,” is not bad at all. She loves expressions like “on the other hand”; they sound choice and grownup to her, and she likes to string them together, one after the other: “very likely,” “probably,” “after all.” Snapper is self-critical too, though more in the moral sphere: he suffers from remorse for his attacks of rage, and considers himself a tremendous sinner. He is quite certain that heaven is not for such as he; he is sure to go to “the bad place” when he dies, and no persuasions will convince him to the contrary—as that God sees the heart and gladly makes allowances. Obstinate he shakes his head, with the comic, crooked little peruke, and vows there is no place for him in heaven. When he has a cold he is immediately quite choked with mucus; rattles and rumbles from top to toe if you even look at him; his temperature flies up at once and he simply puffs. Nursey is pessimistic on the score of his constitution: such fat-blooded children as he might get a stroke any minute. Once she even thought she saw the moment at hand: Snapper had been in one of his berserker rages, and in the ensuing fit of penitence stood himself in the corner with his back to the room. Suddenly Nurse noticed that his face had gone all blue, far bluer, even, than her own. She raised the alarm, crying out that the child’s all-too-rich blood had at length brought him to his final hour; and Snapper, to his vast astonishment, found himself, so far from being rebuked for evil-doing, encompassed in tenderness and anxiety—until it turned out that his colour was not caused by apoplexy but by the distempering on the nursery wall, which had come off on his tear-wet face.

Nursey has come downstairs too, and stands by the door, sleek-haired, owl-eyed, with her hands folded over her white apron, and a severely dignified manner born of her limited intelligence. She is very proud of the care and training she gives her nurslings and declares that they are “enveloping wonderfully." She has had seventeen suppurated teeth lately removed from her jaws, and been measured for a full set of symmetrical yellow ones in dark rubber gums; these now embellish her peasant face. She is obsessed with the strange conviction that these teeth of hers are the subject of general conversation, that, as it were, the sparrows on the house-tops chatter of them. "Everybody knows I've had a false set put in," she will say; "there has been a great deal of foolish talk about them." She is much given to dark hints and veiled innuendo: speaks for instance of a certain Dr. Bleifuss, whom every child knows, and "there are even some in the house who pretend to be him." All one can do with talk like this is charitably to pass it over in silence. But she teaches the children nursery rhymes: gems like "Puff, puff, here comes the train!

Puff, puff, toot, toot, Away it goes again."

or that gastronomical jingle, so suited, in its sparseness, to the times, and yet seemingly with a blitheness of its own:

"Monday we begin the week,
Tuesday there's a bone to pick.
Wednesday we're half way through,
Thursday what a great to-do!
Friday we eat what fish we're able,
Saturday we dance round the table.
Sunday brings us pork and greens—
Here's a feast for kings and queens!"

Also a certain four-line stanza with a romantic appeal, unutterable and unuttered:

"Open the gate, open the gate
And let the carriage drive in.
Who is it in the carriage sits?
A lordly sir with golden hair."

Or, finally, that ballad about golden-haired Marianne who sat on a, sat on a, sat on a stone, and combed out her, combed out her, combed out her hair; and about bloodthirsty Rudolph, who pulled out a, pulled out a, pulled out a knife—and his ensuing direful end. Ellie enunciates all these ballads charmingly, with her mobile little lips, and sings them in her sweet little voice—much better than Snapper. She does everything better than he does, and he pays her honest admiration and homage, and obeys her in all things except when visited by one of his attacks. Sometimes she teaches him, instructs him upon the birds in the picture-book and tells him their proper names; "This is a chaffinch, Buddy, this is a bullfinch, this is a cowfinch."

He has to repeat them after her. She gives him medical instruction too, teaches him the names of diseases, such as infammation of the lungs, infammation of the blood, infammation of the air. If he does not pay attention and cannot say the words after her, she stands him in the corner. Once she even boxed his ears, but was so ashamed that she stood herself in the corner for a long time. Yes, they are fast friends, two souls with but a single thought, and have all their adventures in common. They come home from a walk and relate as with one voice that they have seen two moollies and a teenty-weenty baby calf. They are on familiar terms with the kitchen, which consists of Xaver and the ladies Hinterhofer, two sisters once of the lower middle class, who, in these evil days, are reduced to living "au pair" as the phrase goes and officiating as cook and housemaid for their board and keep. The little ones have a feeling that Xaver and the Hinterhofers are on much the same footing with their father and mother as they are themselves. At least sometimes, when they have been scolded, they go downstairs and announce that the master and mistress are cross. But playing with the servants lacks charm, compared with the joys of playing upstairs. The kitchen could never rise to the height of the games their father can invent. For instance there is "four gentlemen taking a walk." When they play it Abel will crook his knees until he is the same height with themselves, and go walking with them, hand in hand. They never get enough of this sport; they could walk round and round the dining-room a whole day on end, five gentlemen in all, counting the diminished Abel.

Then there is the thrilling cushion game. One of the children, usually Ellie, seats herself, unbeknownst to Abel, in his seat at table. Still as a mouse she awaits his coming. He draws near with his head in the air, descanting, in loud, clear tones, upon the surpassing comfort of his chair; and sits down on top of Ellie. "What's this, what's this?" says he. And bounces about, deaf to the smothered giggles exploding behind him. "Why have they put a cushion in my chair? And what a queer, hard, awkward-shaped cushion it is!" he goes on. "Frightfully uncomfortable to sit on!" And keeps pushing and bouncing about more and more on the astonishing cushion, and clutching behind him into the rapturous giggling and squeaking, until at last he turns round, and the game ends with a magnificent climax of discovery and recognition. They might go through all this a hundred times without diminishing by an iota its power to thrill.

To-day is no time for such joys. The imminent festivity disturbs the atmosphere, and besides there is work to be done, and, above all, the eggs to be got. Ellie has just time to recite "Puff, puff," and Cornelius to discover that her ears are not mates, when they are interrupted by the arrival of Danny, come to fetch Bert and Ingrid. Xaver, meantime, has exchanged his striped livery for an ordinary coat, in which he looks rather rough-and-ready, though as brisk and attractive as ever. So then Nursey and the children ascend to the upper regions, the Professor withdraws to his study to read, as always after dinner, and his wife bends her energies upon the sandwiches and salad that must be prepared. And she has another errand as well. Before the young people arrive she has to take her shopping basket and dash into town on her bicycle, to turn into provisions a sum of money she has in hand, which she dares not keep lest it lose all value.

Cornelius reads, leaning back in his chair, with his cigar between his middle and index fingers. First he reads Macaulay on the origin of the English public debt at the end of the seventeenth century: then an article in a French periodical on the rapid increase in the Spanish debt towards the end of the sixteenth. Both these for his lecture on the morrow. He intends to compare the astonishing prosperity which accompanied the phenomenon in England with its fatal effects a hundred years earlier in Spain, and to analyse the ethical and psychological grounds of the difference in results. For that will give him a chance to refer back from the England of William III, which is the actual subject in hand, to the time of Philip II and the counter-Reformation, which is his own special field. He has already written a valuable work on this period; it is much cited and got him his professorship. While his cigar burns out and gets strong, he excogitates a few pensive sentences in a key of gentle melancholy, to be delivered before his class next day: about the practically hopeless struggle carried on by the belated Philip against the whole trend of history: against the new, the kingdom-disrupting power of the Germanic ideal of freedom and individual liberty. And about the persistent, futile struggle of the aristocracy, condemned by God and rejected of man, against the forces of progress and change. He savours his sentences; keeps on polishing them while he puts back the books he has been using; then goes upstairs for the usual pause in his day's work, the hour with drawn blinds and closed eyes, which he so imperatively needs. But to-day, he recalls, he will rest under disturbed conditions, amid the bustle of preparations for the feast. He smiles to find his heart giving a mild flutter at the thought. Disjointed phrases on the theme of black-clad Philip and his times mingle with a confused consciousness that they will soon be dancing down below. For five minutes or so he falls asleep.

As he lies and rests he can hear the sound of the garden gate and the repeated ringing at the bell. Each time a little pang goes through him, of excitement and suspense, at the thought that the young people have begun to fill the floor below. And each time he smiles at himself again—though even his smile is slightly nervous, is tinged with the pleasurable anticipations people always feel before a party. At half-past four—it is already dark—he gets up and washes at the wash-hand stand. The basin has been out of repair for two years. It is supposed to tip, but has broken away from its socket on one side, and cannot be mended because there is nobody to mend it, neither replaced because no shop can supply another. So it has to be hung up above the vent and emptied by lifting in both hands and pouring out the water. Cornelius shakes his head over this basin, as he does several times a day—whenever, in fact, he has occasion to use it. He finishes his toilet with care, standing under the ceiling light to polish his glasses till they shine. Then he goes downstairs.

On his way to the dining-room he hears the gramophone already going, and the sound of voices. He puts on a polite, society air; at his tongue's end is the phrase he means to utter: "Pray don't let me disturb you," as he passes directly into the dining-room for his tea. "Pray don't let me disturb you"—it seems to him precisely the mot juste: towards the guests cordial and considerate, for himself a very bulwark.

The lower floor is lighted up, all the bulbs in the chandelier are burning save one that has burned out. Cornelius pauses on a lower step and surveys the entrance hall. It looks pleasant and cosy in the bright light, with its copy of Marée over the brick chimney-piece, its wainscoted walls—wainscoted in soft wood—and red-carpeted floor, where the guests stand in groups, chatting, each with his tea-cup and slice of bread-and-butter spread with anchovy paste. There is a festal haze, faint scents of hair and clothing and human breath come to him across the room, it is all characteristic, and familiar, and highly evocative. The door into the dressing-room is open, guests are still arriving.

A large group of people is rather bewildering at first sight. The Professor takes in only the general scene. He does not see Ingrid, who is standing just at the foot of the steps, in a dark silk frock with a pleated collar falling softly over the shoulders, and bare arms. She smiles up at him, nodding and showing her lovely teeth.

"Rested?" she asks, for his private ear. With a quite unwarranted start he recognises her, and she presents some of her friends.

"May I introduce Herr Zuber?" she says. "And this is Fräulein Plaichinger."

Herr Zuber is insignificant. But Fräulein Plaichinger is a perfect Germania, blonde and voluptuous, arrayed in floating draperies. She has a snub nose, and answers the Professor's salutation in the high, shrill pipe so many stout women have.

"Delighted to meet you," he says. "How nice of you to come! A classmate of Ingrid's, I suppose?"

And Herr Zuber is a golfing partner of Ingrid's. He is in business; he works in his uncle's brewery. Cornelius makes a few jokes about the thinness of the beer and professes to believe that Herr Zuber could easily do something about the quality if he would. "But pray don't let me disturb you," he goes on, and turns toward the dining-room.

"There comes Max," says Ingrid. "Max, you sweep, what do you mean by rolling up at this time of day?" For such is the way they talk to each other, offensively to an older ear: of social forms, of hospitable warmth, there is no faintest trace. They all call each other by their first names.

A young man comes up to them out of the dressing-room, and makes his bow: he has an expanse of white shirt-front and a little black string tie. He is as pretty as a picture, dark, with rosy cheeks, clean-shaven of course, but with just a sketch of side-whisker. Not a ridiculous or flashy beauty, not like a gypsy fiddler, but just charming to look at, in a winning, well-bred way, with kind dark eyes. He even wears his dinner-jacket a little awkwardly.

"Please don't scold me, Cornelia," he says; "it's the idiotic lectures." And Ingrid presents him to her father as Herr Hergesell.

Well, and so this is Herr Hergesell. He knows his manners, does Herr Hergesell, and thanks the master of the house quite ingratiatingly for his invitation, as they shake hands. "I certainly seem to have missed the bus," says he, jocosely. "Of course I have lectures to-day up to four o'clock; I would have; and after that I had to go home to change." Then he talks about his pumps, with which he has just been struggling in the dressing-room.

"I brought them with me in a bag," he goes on. "Mustn't tramp all over the carpet in our brogues—it's not done. Well, I was ass enough not to fetch along a shoe-horn, and I find I simply can't get in! What a sell! They are the tightest I've ever had, the numbers don't tell you a thing, and all the leather to-day is just cast iron. It's not leather at all. My poor finger"—he confidently displays a reddened digit and once more characterises the whole thing as a "sell," and a putrid sell into the bargain. He really does talk just as Ingrid said he did, with a peculiar nasal drawl, not affectedly in the least, but merely because that is the way of all the Hergesells.

Dr. Cornelius says it is very careless of them not to keep a shoe-horn in the dressing-room, and displays proper sympathy with the mangled finger. "But now you really must not let me disturb you any longer," he goes on. "Auf wiedersehen!" And he crosses the hall into the dining-room.

There are guests there too, drinking tea, the family table is pulled out. But the Professor goes at once to his own little upholstered corner with the electric light bulb above it: the nook where he usually drinks his tea. His wife is sitting there talking with Bert and two other young men, one of them Herzl, whom Cornelius knows and greets; the other a typical "Wandervogel" named Möller, a youth who obviously neither owns nor cares to own the correct evening dress of the middle classes (in fact there is no such thing any more), nor to ape the manners of a gentleman (and, in fact, there is no such thing any more either). He has a wilderness of hair, horn spectacles, and a long neck, and wears golf stockings and a belted blouse. His regular occupation, the Professor learns, is banking, but he is by way of being an amateur folk-lorist, and collects folk songs from all localities and in all languages. He sings them, too, and at Ingrid's command has brought his guitar; it is hanging in the dressing-room in an oiled-cloth case. Herzl the actor is small and slight, but he has a strong growth of black beard, as you can tell by the thick coat of powder on his cheeks. His eyes are larger than life, with a deep and melancholy glow. He has put on rouge besides the powder—those dull carmine high-lights on the cheeks can be nothing but a cosmetic. "Queer," thinks the Professor. "You would think a man would be one thing or the other—not melancholic and use face paint at the same time. It's a psychological contradiction. How can a melancholy man rouge? But here we have a perfect illustration of the abnormality of the artist soul-form. It can make possible a contradiction like this—perhaps it even consists in the contradiction. All very interesting—and no reason whatever for not being polite to him. Politeness is a primitive convention—and legitimate. . . . Do take some lemon, Herr Hofschauspieler!"

Court actors and court theatres—there are no such things any more, really. But Herzl relishes the sound of the title, notwithstanding he is a revolutionary artist. This must be another contradiction inherent in his soul-form; so, at least, the Professor assumes, and he is probably right. The flattery he is guilty of is a sort of atonement for his previous hard thoughts about the rouge.

"Thank you so much—it's really too good of you, sir," says Herzl, quite embarrassed. He is so overcome that he almost stammers; only his perfect enunciation saves him. His whole bearing towards his hostess and the master of the house is exaggeratedly polite. It is almost as though he has a bad conscience in respect of his rouge; as though an inward compulsion had driven him to put it on, but now, seeing it through the Professor's eyes, he disapproves of it himself, and thinks, by an air of humility toward the whole of unrouged society, to mitigate its effect.

They drink their tea and chat: about Möller's folk-songs, about Basque folk-songs and Spanish folk-songs; from which they pass to the new production of "Don Carlos" at the Stadttheater, in which Herzl plays the title-rôle. He talks about his own rendering of the part, and says he hopes his conception of the character has unity. They go on to criticise the rest of the cast, the setting and the production as a whole; and Cornelius is struck, rather painfully, to find the conversation trending towards his own special province, back to Spain and the counter-Reformation. He has done nothing at all to give it this turn, he is perfectly innocent; and hopes it does not look as though he had sought an occasion to play the professor. He wonders, and falls silent, feeling relieved when the little folk come up to the table. Ellie and Snapper have on their blue velvet Sunday frocks; they are permitted to partake in the festivities up to bedtime. They look shy and large-eyed as they say how-do-you-do to the strangers, and, under pressure, repeat their names and ages. Herr Möller does nothing but gaze at them solemnly, but Herzl is simply ravished. He rolls his eyes up to heaven and puts his hands over his mouth, he positively blesses them. It all, no doubt, comes from his heart; but he is so addicted to theatrical methods of making an impression and getting an effect, that both words and behaviour ring frightfully false. And even his enthusiasm for the little folk looks too much like part of his general craving to make up for the rouge on his cheeks.

The tea-table has meanwhile emptied of guests, and dancing is going on in the hall. The children run off, the Professor prepares to retire. "Go and enjoy yourselves," he says to Möller and Herzl, who have sprung from their chairs as he rises from his. They shake hands and he withdraws into his study, his peaceful kingdom, where he lets down the blinds, turns on the desk lamp, and sits down to his work.

It is work which can be done, if necessary, under disturbed conditions: nothing but a few letters and a few notes. Of course, Cornelius' mind wanders. Vague impressions float through it: Herr Hergesell's refractory pumps, the high pipe in that plump body of the Plaichinger female. As he writes, or leans back in his chair and stares into space, his thoughts go back to Herr Möller's collection of Basque folk-songs, to Herzl's posings and humility; to "his" Carlos and the court of Philip II. There is something strange, he thinks, about conversations. They are so ductile, they will go of their own accord in the direction of one's dominating interest. Often and often he has seen this happen. And while he is thinking, he is listening to the sounds next door—rather subdued, he finds them. He hears only voices, no sound of footsteps. The dancers do not glide or circle round the room; they merely walk about over the carpet, which does not hamper their movements in the least. Their way of holding each other is quite different and strange, and they move to the strains of the gramophone, to the weird music of the new world. He concentrates on the music and makes out that it is a jazz-band record, with various percussion instruments and the clack and clatter of castanets, which, however, are not even faintly suggestive of Spain, but merely jazz with the rest. No, not Spain. . . . His thoughts are back at their old round.

Half an hour goes by. It occurs to him it would be no more than friendly to go and contribute a box of cigarettes to the festivities next door. Too bad to ask the young people to smoke their own—though they have probably never thought of it. He goes into the empty dining-room and takes a box from his supply in the cupboard: not the best ones, nor yet the brand he himself prefers, but a certain long, thin kind he is not averse to getting rid of—after all, they are nothing but youngsters. He takes the box into the hall, holds it up with a smile, and deposits it on the mantel-shelf. After which he gives a look round and returns to his own room.

There comes a lull in dance and music. The guests stand about the room in groups, or round the table at the window, or seated in a circle by the fireplace. Even the built-in stairs, with their worn velvet carpet, are crowded with young folk as in an amphitheatre: Max Hergesell is there, leaning back with one elbow on the step above and gesticulating with his free hand as he talks to the shrill, voluptuous Plaichinger. The floor of the hall is nearly empty, save just in the centre: there, directly beneath the chandelier, the two little ones in their blue velvet frocks clutch each other in an awkward embrace, and twirl silently round and round, oblivious of all else. Cornelius, as he passes, strokes their hair, with a friendly word; it does not distract them from their small solemn preoccupation. But at his own door he turns to glance round and sees young Hergesell push himself off the stair by his elbow—probably because he noticed the Professor. He comes down into the arena, takes Ellie out of her brother's arms, and dances with her himself. It looks very comic, without the music, and he crouches down just as Cornelius does when he goes walking with the four gentlemen, holding the fluttered Ellie as though she were grown up, and taking little "shimmying" steps. Everybody watches with huge enjoyment, the gramophone is put on again, dancing becomes general. The Professor stands and looks with his hand on the door-knob. He nods and laughs; when he finally shuts himself into his study the mechanical smile still lingers on his lips.

Again he turns over pages by his desk lamp; takes notes, attends to a few simple matters. After a while he notices that the guests have forsaken the entrance hall for his wife's drawing-room, into which there is a door from his own study as well. He hears their voices, and the sounds of a guitar being tuned. Herr Möller, it seems, is to sing—and does so. He twangs the strings of his instrument, and sings in a powerful bass a ballad in a strange tongue, possibly Swedish. The Professor does not succeed in identifying it, though he listens attentively to the end, after which there is great applause. The sound is deadened by the portière that hangs over the dividing door. The young bank clerk begins another song. Cornelius goes softly in.

It is half-dark in the drawing-room; the only light is from the shaded standard lamp, beneath which Möller sits, on the divan, with his legs crossed, picking his strings. His audience is grouped easily about; as there are not enough seats, some stand, and more, among them many young ladies, are simply sitting on the floor with their hands clasped round their knees, or even with their legs stretched out before them. Hergesell sits thus, in his dinner jacket, next the piano, with Fräulein Plaichinger beside him. Frau Cornelius is holding both children on her lap, as she sits in her easy-chair opposite the singer. Snapper, the Bæotian, begins to talk loud and clear in the middle of the song, and has to be intimidated with hushings and finger-shakings. Never, never would Ellie allow herself to be guilty of such conduct. She sits there daintily erect and still on her mother's knee. The Professor tries to catch her eye and exchange a private signal with his little girl; but she does not see him. Neither does she seem to be looking at the singer. Her gaze is directed lower down.

Möller sings the "joli tambour":

"Sire, mon roi, donnez-moi votre fille,—"

They are all enchanted. "How good," Hergesell is heard to say, in the odd, nasally-condescending Hergesell tone. The next one is a beggar ballad, to a tune composed by young Möller himself; it elicits a storm of applause:

"Gypsy lassie a-going to the fair
Huzza!
Gypsy laddie a-goin' to be there—
Huzza, diddley umpty dido!"

Laughter and high spirits, sheer reckless hilarity, reigns after this jovial ballad. "Frightfully good!" Hergesell comments again, as before. Follows another popular song, this time a Hungarian one; Möller sings it in its own outlandish tongue, and most effectively. The Professor applauds with ostentation. It warms his heart, and does him good, this outcropping of artistic, historic, and cultural elements all amongst the shimmying. He goes up to young Möller and congratulates him, talks about the songs and their sources, and Möller promises to lend him a certain annotated book of folk-songs. Cornelius is the more cordial because all the time, as fathers do, he has been comparing the parts and achievements of this young stranger with those of his own son, and being gnawed by envy and mortification. This young Möller, he is thinking, is a capable bank clerk (though about Möller's capacity he knows nothing whatever) and has this special gift besides, which must have taken talent and energy to cultivate. "And here is my poor Bert, who knows nothing and can do nothing, and thinks of nothing except playing the clown, without even talent for that!" He tries to be just; he tells himself that after all Bert has innate refinement; that probably there is a good deal more to him than there is to the successful Möller; that perhaps he has even something of the poet in him, and his dancing and table-waiting are due to mere boyish folly and the distraught times. But paternal envy and pessimism win the upper hand; when Möller begins another song, Dr. Cornelius goes back to his room.

He works as before, with divided attention, at this and that, while it gets on for seven o'clock. Then he remembers a letter he may just as well write, a short letter and not very important, but letter-writing is wonderful for the way it takes up the time, and it is almost half-past when he has finished. At half-past eight the Italian salad will be served; so now is the prescribed moment for the Professor to go out into the wintry darkness to post his letters, and take his daily quantum of fresh air and exercise. They are dancing again, and he will have to pass through the hall to get his hat and coat; but they are used to him now, he need not stop and beg them not to be disturbed. He lays away his papers, takes up the letters he has written, and goes out. But he sees his wife sitting near the door of his room, and pauses a little by her easy-chair.

She is watching the dancing. Now and then the big folk or some of their guests stop to speak to her; the party is at its height, and there are more onlookers than these two: blue-faced Ann is standing at the bottom of the stairs, in all the dignity of her limitations. She is waiting for the children, who simply cannot get their fill of these unwonted festivities, and watching over Snapper, lest his all-too-rich blood be churned to the danger point by too much twirling round. And not only the nursery but the kitchen takes an interest: Xaver and the two ladies Hinterhofer are standing by the pantry door looking on with relish. Fräulein Walburga, the elder of the two sunken sisters (the culinary section—she objects to being called a cook), is a whimsical, good-natured sort, brown-eyed, wearing glasses with thick circular lenses; the nose-piece is wound with a bit of rag to keep it from pressing on her nose. Fräulein Cecilia is younger, though not so precisely young either. Her bearing is as self-assertive as usual: this being her way of sustaining her dignity as a former member of the middle class. For Fräulein Cecilia feels acutely her descent into the ranks of domestic service. She positively declines to wear a cap or other badge of servitude; and her hardest trial is on the Wednesday evening when she has to serve the dinner while Xaver has his afternoon out. She hands the dishes with averted face and elevated nose—a fallen queen; and so distressing is it to behold her degradation that one evening when the little folk happened to be at table and saw her they both with one accord burst into tears. Such anguish is unknown to young Xaver. He enjoys serving, and does it with an ease born of practice as well as talent, for he was once a “piccolo.” But otherwise he is a thorough-paced good-for-nothing and wind-bag—with quite distinct traits of character of his own, as his long-suffering employers are always ready to concede, but perfectly impossible and a bag of wind for all that. One must just take him as he is, they think, and not expect figs from thistles. He is the child and product of the disrupted times, a perfect specimen of his generation, follower of the revolution, bolshevist sympathiser. The Professor’s name for him is the “minute-man,” because he is always to be counted on in any sudden crisis, if only it address his sense of humour or love of novelty; and will display therein amazing readiness and resource. But he utterly lacks a sense of duty, and can as little be trained to the performance of the daily round and common task as some kinds of dog can be taught to jump over a stick. It goes so plainly against the grain that criticism is disarmed. One becomes resigned. On grounds that appealed to him as unusual and amusing he would be ready to turn out of his bed at any hour of the night. But he simply cannot get up before eight in the morning, he cannot do it, he will not jump over the stick. Yet all day long the evidence of this free and untrammelled existence, the sound of his mouth-organ, his joyous whistle, or his raucous but expressive voice lifted in song, rises to the hearing of the world above-stairs; and the smoke of his cigarettes fills the pantry. While the Hinterhofer ladies work he stands and looks on. Of a morning while the Professor is breakfasting, he tears the leaf off the study calendar —but does not lift a finger to dust the room. Dr. Cornelius has often told him to leave the calendar alone, for he tends to tear off two leaves at a time, and thus to add to the general confusion. But young Xaver appears to find joy in this activity, and will not be deprived of it.

Again, he is fond of children, a winning trait. He will throw himself into games with the little folk in the garden, make and mend their toys with great ingenuity, even read aloud from their books—and very droll it sounds in his thick-lipped pronunciation. With his whole soul he loves the cinema; after an evening spent there he inclines to melancholy and yearning and talking to himself. Vague hopes stir in him that some day he may make his fortune in that gay world and belong to it by rights; hopes based on his shock of hair and his physical agility and daring. He likes to climb the ash tree in the front garden, mounting branch by branch to the very tip, and frightening everybody to death who sees him. Once there he lights a cigarette and smokes it as he sways to and fro, keeping a look out for a cinema director who might chance to come along and engage him.

If he changed his striped jacket for mufti, he might easily dance with the others, and no one would notice the difference. For the big folks' friends are rather anomalous in their clothing: evening dress is worn by a few, but it is by no means the rule. There is quite a sprinkling of guests, both male and female, in the same general style as Möller the ballad singer. The Professor is familiar with the circumstances of most of this young generation he is watching as he stands beside his wife's chair; he has heard them spoken of by name. They are students at the High School, or at the School of Applied Art; they lead, at least the masculine portion, that precarious and scrambling existence which is purely the product of the time. There is a tall, pale, spindling youth, the son of a dentist, who lives by speculation. From all the Professor hears, he is a perfect Aladdin. He keeps a car, treats his friends to champagne suppers, and showers presents upon them on every occasion, costly little trifles in mother-of-pearl and gold. So to-day he has brought gifts to the young givers of the feast: for Bert a gold lead-pencil, and for Ingrid a pair of earrings of barbaric size, great gold circlets that fortunately do not have to go through the little ear-lobe, but are fastened over it by means of a clip. The big folk come laughing to their parents to display these trophies; and the parents shake their heads even while they admire—Aladdin bowing over and over from afar.

The young people appear to be absorbed in their dancing—if the performance they are carrying out with so much still concentration can be called dancing. They stride across the carpet, slowly, according to some unfathomable prescript, strangely embraced; in the newest attitude, tummy advanced and shoulders high, wagging the hips. They do not get tired, because nobody could. There is no such thing as heightened colour, or heaving bosoms. Two girls may dance together, or two young men—it is all the same. They move to the exotic strains of the gramophone, played with the loudest needles to procure the maximum of sound: shimmeys, foxtrots, one-steps, double foxes, African shimmeys, Java dances and Creole polkas, the wild musky melodies follow one another, now furious, now languishing, a monotonous negro programme in unfamiliar rhythm, to a clacking, clashing and strumming orchestral accompaniment.

"What is that record?" Cornelius inquires of Ingrid, as she passes him by in the arms of the pale young speculator, with reference to the piece then playing, whose alternate languors and furies he finds comparatively pleasing and showing a certain resourcefulness in detail.

"'Prince of Pappenheim: Console thee, dearest child,'" she answers and smiles pleasantly back at him with her white teeth.

The cigarette smoke wreathes beneath the chandelier. The air is blue with a festal haze compact of sweet and thrilling ingredients, that stir the blood with memories of green-sick pains, and are particularly poignant to those whose youth—like the Professor's own—has been over-sensitive. . . . The little folk are still on the floor. They are allowed to stop up until eight—so great is their delight in the party. The guests have got used to their presence; in their own way, they have their place in the doings of the evening. They have separated, anyhow: Snapper revolves all alone in the middle of the carpet, in his little blue velvet smock; while Ellie is running after one of the dancing couples, trying to hold the man fast by his coat. It is Max Hergesell and Fräulein Plaichinger. They dance well, it is a pleasure to watch them. One has to admit that these mad modern dances, when the right people dance them, are not so bad after all—they have something quite taking. Young Hergesell is a capital leader, dances according to rule, yet with individuality. So it looks. With what aplomb can he walk backwards—when space permits! And he knows how to be graceful standing still in a crowd. And his partner supports him well, being unsuspectingly lithe and buoyant, as fat people often are. They look at each other, they are talking, paying no heed to Ellie, though others are smiling to see the child's persistence. Dr. Cornelius tries to catch up his little sweetheart, as she passes, and draw her to him. But Ellie eludes him, almost peevishly, her dear Abel is nothing to her now. She braces her little arms against his chest, and turns her face away with a persecuted look. Then escapes to follow her fancy once more.

The Professor feels an involuntary twinge. Uppermost in his heart is hatred for this party, with its power to intoxicate and estrange his darling child. His love for her—that not quite disinterested, not quite unexceptionable love of his—is easily wounded. He wears a mechanical smile, but his eyes have clouded, and he stares fixedly at a point in the carpet, between the dancers' feet.

"The children ought to go to bed," he tells his wife. But she pleads for another quarter of an hour; she has promised already, and they do love it so! He smiles again and shakes his head, stands so a moment and then goes across to the dressing-room, which is full of coats and hats and scarves and overshoes. He has trouble in rummaging out his own coat, and Max Hergesell comes out of the hall, wiping his brow.

"Going out, sir?" he asks, in Hergesellian accents, dutifully helping the older man on with his coat. "Silly business this, with my pumps," he says. "They pinch like hell. The brutes are simply too tight for me, quite apart from the bad leather. They press just here on the ball of my great toe"—he stands on one foot and holds the other in his hand—"it's simply unbearable. There's nothing for it but to take them off; my brogues will have to do the business. . . . Oh, let me help you, sir."

"Thanks," says Cornelius. "Don't trouble. Get rid of your own tormentors. . . . Oh, thanks very much!" For Hergesell has gone on one knee to snap the fasteners of his snow boots.

Once more the Professor expresses his gratitude; he is pleased and touched by so much sincere respect and youthful readiness to serve. "Go and enjoy yourself," he counsels. "Change your shoes, and make up for what you have been suffering. Nobody can dance in shoes that pinch. Good-bye, I must be off to get a breath of fresh air."

"I'm going to dance with Ellie now," calls Hergesell after him. "She'll be a first-rate dancer when she grows up, and that I'll swear to."

"Think so?" Cornelius answers, already half out. "Well, you are a connoisseur, I'm sure. Don't get curvature of the spine with stooping."

He nods again and goes. "Fine lad," he thinks as he shuts the door. "Student of engineering. Knows what he's bound for, got a good clear head, and so well set up and pleasant too." And again paternal envy rises, as he compares his poor Bert's status with this young man's, which he puts in the rosiest light that his son's may look the darker. Thus he sets out on his evening walk.

He goes up the avenue, crosses the bridge and walks along the bank on the other side as far as the next bridge but one. The air is wet and cold, with a little snow now and then. He turns up his coat collar and slips the crook of his cane over the arm behind his back. Now and then he ventilates his lungs with a long deep breath of the night air. As usual when he walks, his mind reverts to his professional preoccupations, he thinks about his lectures and the things he means to say to-morrow about Philip's struggle against the Germanic revolution, things steeped in melancholy and penetratingly just. Above all just, he thinks. For in one's dealings with the young, it behoves one to display the scientific spirit, to exhibit the principles of enlightenment—not only for purposes of mental discipline but on the human and individual side, in order not to wound them or indirectly offend their political sensibilities; particularly in these days, when there is so much tinder in the air, opinions are so frightfully split up and chaotic, and you may so easily incur attacks from one party or the other, or even give rise to scandal, by taking sides on a point of history.

"And taking sides is unhistoric anyhow," so he muses. "Only justice, only impartiality is historic." And could not, properly considered, be otherwise. . . . For justice can have nothing of youthful fire, and blithe, fresh, loyal conviction. It is by nature melancholy. And being so, has secret affinity with the lost cause and the forlorn hope rather than with the fresh and blithe and loyal—perhaps this affinity is its very essence and without it it would not exist at all! . . . "And is there then no such thing as justice?" the Professor asks himself; and ponders the question so deeply that he absently posts his letters in the next box and turns round to go home. This thought of his is unsettling and disturbing to the scientific mind—but is it not after all itself scientific, psychological, conscientious, and therefore to be accepted without prejudice, no matter how upsetting? In the midst of which musings Dr. Cornelius finds himself back at his own door.

On the outer threshold stands Xaver, and seems to be looking for him.

"Herr Professor," says Xaver, tossing back his hair, "go upstairs to Ellie at once. She's in a bad way."

"What's the matter?" asks Cornelius in alarm. "Is she ill?"

"No-o, not to say ill," answers Xaver. "She's just in a bad way and crying fit to bust her little heart. It's along o' that chap with the shirt-front that danced with her—Herr Hergesell. She couldn't be got to go upstairs peaceably, not at no price at all, and she's b'en crying bucketfuls."

"Nonsense," says the Professor, who has entered and is tossing off his things in the dressing-room. He says no more; opens the glass door and without a glance at the guests turns swiftly to the stairs. Takes them two at a time, crosses the upper hall and the small room leading into the nursery. Xaver follows at his heels, but stops at the nursery door.

A bright light still burns within, showing the gay frieze that runs all round the room, the large row of shelves heaped with a confusion of toys, the rocking-horse on his swaying platform, with red varnished nostrils and raised hoofs. On the linoleum lie other toys—building blocks, railway trains, a little trumpet. The two white cribs stand not far apart, Ellie's in the window corner, Snapper's out in the room.

Snapper is asleep. He has said his prayers in loud, ringing tones, prompted by Nurse, and gone off at once into vehement, profound and rosy slumber—from which a cannon-ball fired at close range could not rouse him. He lies with both fists flung back on the pillows on either side of the tousled head with its funny crooked little slumber-tossed wig.

A circle of females surrounds Ellie's bed: not only blue-faced Ann is there but the Hinterhofer ladies too, talking to each other and to her. They make way as the Professor comes up, and reveal the child sitting all pale among her pillows, sobbing and weeping more bitterly than he has ever seen her sob and weep in her life. Her lovely little hands lie on the coverlet in front of her, the nightgown with its narrow lace border has slipped down from her shoulder—such a thin, bird-like little shoulder—and the sweet head Cornelius loves so well, set on the neck like a flower on its stalk, her head is on one side, with the eyes rolled up to the corner between wall and ceiling above her head. For there she seems to envisage the anguish of her heart, and even to nod to it—either on purpose or because her head wobbles as her body is shaken with the violence of her sobs. Her eyes rain down tears. The bow-shaped lips are parted, like a little mater dolorosa's, and from them issue long, low wails that in nothing resemble the unnecessary and exasperating shrieks of a naughty child, but rise from the deep extremity of her heart and wake in the Professor's own a sympathy that is well-nigh intolerable. He has never seen his darling so before. His feelings find immediate vent in an attack on the ladies Hinterhofer.

"What about the supper?" he asks sharply. "There must be a great deal to do. Is my wife being left to do it alone?"

For the acute sensibilities of the former middle class, this is quite enough. The ladies withdraw in righteous indignation, and Xaver Kleinsgutl jeers at them as they pass out. Having been born to low life instead of achieving it, he never loses a chance to mock at their fallen state.

"Childie, childie," murmurs Cornelius, and sitting down by the crib enfolds the anguished Ellie in his arms. "What is the trouble with my darling?"

She bedews his face with her tears.

"Abel. . . . Abel . . ." she stammers between sobs. "Why— isn't Max— my brother? Max ought to be—my brother!"

Alas, alas! What mischance is this? Is this what the party has wrought, with its fatal atmosphere? Cornelius glances helplessly up at blue-faced Ann standing there in all the dignity of her limitations with her hands before her on her apron. She purses up her mouth and makes a long face. "It's pretty young," she says, "for the female instincts to be showing up."

"Hold your tongue," snaps Cornelius, in his agony. He has this much to be thankful for, that Ellie does not turn from him now; she does not push him away as she did downstairs, but clings to him in her need, while she reiterates her absurd, bewildered prayer that Max might be her brother, or with a fresh burst of desire demands to be taken downstairs so that he can dance with her again. But Max, of course, is dancing with Fräulein Plaichinger, that behemoth who is his rightful partner and has every claim upon him; whereas Ellie—never, thinks the Professor, his heart torn with the violence of his pity, never has she looked so tiny and birdlike as now, when she nestles to him shaken with sobs and all unaware of what is happening in her little soul. No, she does not know. She does not comprehend that her suffering is on account of Fräulein Plaichinger, fat, overgrown and utterly within her rights in dancing with Max Hergesell, whereas Ellie may only do it once, by way of a joke, although she is incomparably the more charming of the two. Yet it would be quite mad to reproach young Hergesell with the state of affairs, or to make fantastic demands upon him. No, Ellie's suffering is without help or healing and must be covered up. Yet just as it is without understanding, so it is also without restraint—and that is what makes it so horribly painful. Xaver and blue-faced Ann do not feel this pain, it does not affect them—either because of native callousness or because they accept it as the way of nature. But the Professor's fatherly heart is quite torn by it, and by a mortifying horror of this passion, so hopeless and so absurd.

Of no avail to hold forth to poor Ellie on the subject of the perfectly good little brother she already has. She only casts a distraught and scornful glance over at the other crib where Snapper lies vehemently slumbering, and with fresh tears calls again for Max. Of no avail either the promise of a long, long walk to-morrow, all five gentlemen, round and round the dining-room table; or a dramatic description of the thrilling cushion games they will play. No, she will listen to none of all this, nor to lying down and going to sleep. She will not sleep, she will sit bolt upright and suffer. . . . But on a sudden they stop and listen, Abel and Ellie; listen to something miraculous, that is coming to pass, that is approaching by strides, two strides, to the nursery door, that now overwhelmingly appears. . . .

It is Xaver's work, not a doubt of that. He has not remained by the door where he stood to gloat over the ejection of the Hinterhofers. No, he has bestirred himself, taken a notion, likewise steps to carry it out. Downstairs he has gone, twitched Herr Hergesell's sleeve and made a thick-lipped request. So here they both are. Xaver, having done his part, remains by the door; but Max Hergesell comes up to Ellie's crib: in his dinner-jacket, with his sketchy side-whisker and charming black eyes; obviously quite pleased with his rôle of swan knight and fairy prince, as one who should say: "See, here am I, now all losses are restored and sorrows end."

Cornelius is almost as much overcome as Ellie herself.

"Just look," he says feebly, "look who's here. This is uncommonly good of you, Herr Hergesell."

"Not a bit of it," says Hergesell. "Why shouldn't I come to say good-night to my fair partner?"

And he approaches the bars of the crib, behind which Ellie sits struck mute. She smiles blissfully through her tears. A funny, high little note that is half a sigh of relief comes from her lips, then she looks dumbly up at her swan knight with her golden-brown eyes—tear-swollen though they are, so much more beautiful than the fat Plaichinger's. She does not put up her arms. Her joy, like her grief, is without understanding; but she does not do that. The lovely little hands lie quiet on the coverlet, and Max Hergesell stands with his arms leaning over the rail as on a balcony.

"And now," he says smartly, "she need not 'sit the livelong night and weep upon her bed!'" He looks at the Professor to make sure he is receiving due credit for the quotation. "Ha, ha!" he laughs, "she's beginning young. 'Console thee, dearest child!' Never mind, you're all right! Just as you are you'll be wonderful! You've only got to grow up. . . . And you'll lie down and go to sleep like a good girl, now I've come to say good-night? And not cry any more, little Lorelei?"

Ellie looks up at him, transfigured. One birdlike shoulder is bare, the Professor draws the lace-trimmed nightie over it. There comes into his mind a sentimental story he once read about a dying child who longs to see a clown he had once, with unforgettable ecstasy, beheld in a circus. And they bring the clown to the bedside marvellously arrayed, embroidered before and behind with silver butterflies; and the child dies happy. Max Hergesell is not embroidered, and Ellie, thank God, is not going to die, she has only "been in a bad way." But after all, the effect is the same. Young Hergesell leans over the bars of the crib and rattles on, more for the father's ear than the child's, but Ellie does not know that—and the father's feelings toward him are a most singular mixture of thankfulness, embarrassment, and hatred.

"Good-night, little Lorelei," says Hergesell, and gives her his hand through the bars. Her pretty, soft, white little hand is swallowed up in the grasp of his big, strong, red one. "Sleep well," he says, "and sweet dreams! But don't dream about me—God forbid! Not at your age—ha, ha!" And then the fairy clown's visit is at an end. Cornelius accompanies him to the door. "No, no, positively, no thanks called for, don't mention it," he large-heartedly protests; and Xaver goes downstairs with him, to help serve the Italian salad.

But Dr. Cornelius returns to Ellie, who is now lying down, with her cheek pressed into her flat little pillow.

"Well, wasn't that lovely?" he says, as he smooths the covers. She nods, with one last little sob. For a quarter of an hour he sits beside her and watches while she falls asleep in her turn, beside the little brother who found the right way so much earlier than she. Her silky brown hair takes the enchanting fall it always does when she sleeps; deep, deep lie the lashes over the eyes that late so abundantly poured forth their sorrow; the angelic mouth with its bowed upper lip is peacefully relaxed and a little open. Only now and then comes a belated catch in her slow breathing.

And her small hands, like pink and white flowers, lie so quietly, one on the coverlet, the other on the pillow by her face—Dr. Cornelius, gazing, feels his heart melt with tenderness as with strong wine.

"How good," he thinks, "that she breathes in oblivion with every breath she draws! That in childhood each night is a deep, wide gulf between one day and the next. To-morrow, beyond all doubt, young Hergesell will be a pale shadow, powerless to darken her little heart. To-morrow, forgetful of all but present joy, she will walk with Abel and Snapper, all five gentlemen, round and round the table, will play the ever-thrilling cushion game."

Heaven be praised for that!

MR. AND MRS. ABBEY'S DIFFICULTIES

E. M. Forster

(1879- )

THE DEATH OF MRS. RAWLINGS, followed four years afterwards by that of Mrs. Jennings, her respectable parent, involved Mr. and Mrs. Abbey in appreciable difficulties finally. They did not at first realize the possible consequences of becoming guardian to the four children—John, George, Tom, and Fanny—the offspring of Mrs. Rawlings by a previous union; indeed, Mr. Abbey acted with unusual precipitancy, and, without troubling Mr. Sandall, his co-executor under Mrs. Jennings' will, undertook sole charge even in the grandmother's lifetime. The sum of £8,000—and £8,000 was a substantial sum a hundred years ago—passed into his control, and he proceeded to administer it for the benefit of the young people as only a business man can.

The connection of the two deceased ladies had been with the livery trade. They had kept the stables attached to the Swan and Hoop, Finsbury Pavement, and the first husband of Mrs. Rawlings had actually been killed by falling off one of his own horses on a dark night not far from Southgate. Mr. Abbey's own position was more secure. A broker in tea, and in coffee also, although scarcely in coffee to an equal extent, he had added to his office in Pancras Lane a residence at Walthamstow, and to the latter a conservatory, and to everything that he undertook the conviction of some ultimate issue. It was at Walthamstow that he made provision for the child Fanny, who was aged but seven years only when she came under his charge. He arranged that she should live with Mrs. and Miss Abbey, she should attend a young ladies' school where she might acquire such education as her sex necessitated. The education of her brother John was already complete, for he had attained his sixteenth year, and Mr. Abbey was prompt to remove him from his studies and to apprentice him to a surgeon. George (aged thirteen) and Tom (eleven) were received as clerks into his own office. Thus suitable provision for all concerned was rapidly and adequately made.

Unfortunately the children were restless—a defect inherited from their father, who had been of rustic origin. John would not stick to his gallipots, nor George and Tom to their stools; and Fanny wished to learn the flageolet. They were always asking for money to satisfy their whims, and since Mr. Abbey had in view their ultimate good alone and had reinvested the £8,000 to that end, he negatived all such demands. What they wasted on letter-paper alone was deplorable, for, as the three boys grew up, they were in constant correspondence with one another and with their sister. Mr. and Mrs. Abbey valued a united family highly, none higher; but saw no advantage in Tom communicating with George that it was raining in Devonshire, or in John informing Fanny that he had counted the buns and tarts in a pastry-cook's window, and 'was just beginning with the jellies.' Mrs. Abbey, in particular, felt that family affection was used as a cloak for something else: that they communicated, as she expressed it, 'behind my back,' and were not so much devoted to each other, which is all very proper and well, as interested in what each other thought. An unfortunate discovery gave her some pain. Fanny left her letters lying about, as young girls will, and Mrs. Abbey's eye was caught by the strange appearance of one of them. It was written in short lines, certainly just nonsense, yet she did not relish it, the more so since it was in John's handwriting, and he a notorious makegame.

Two or three Posies
With two or three simples—
Two or three Noses
With two or three pimples—
Two or three sandies
And two or three tabbies—
Two or three dandies
And two Mrs. — mum!

Who might 'Mrs. — mum!' be? Mrs. Abbey reread the paragraph and then saw that it was a crambo or forfeit, the last line of which concealed her own name. She was affronted, the more so since the name must be in the plural gender. 'Two Mrs. Abbeyes,' she repeated to herself. 'And why two?' She inquired of her husband next time he came down from Pancras Lane, of Miss Caley, the headmistress of Fanny's school, of Miss Tucker, the headmistress of the school to which she was subsequently transferred. They all agreed that an unkindness was intended. She kept a look-out for John's letters in the future, and discovered in another that she was to be sent up to the London office 'to count coffee-berries,' while the grass plot was used for dancing. Elsewhere Fanny was to 'pay no attention to Mrs. Abbey's unfeeling and ignorant gabble. You can't stop an old woman's crying any more than you can a child's. The old woman is the greatest nuisance, because she is too old for the rod. Many people live opposite a blacksmith's till they cannot hear the hammer.' Here all was too plain, except, indeed, the blacksmith, whose forge was at the farther extremity of the village; and Mrs. Abbey was obliged to take up a different line with Fanny. She would not allow the girl to go up to see her brother in town, and she discouraged his visiting Walthamstow.

How necessary her strictness was, the following anecdote will evince. While the children were deficient in character and breeding on the one side, they had inherited from their mother, Mrs. Rawlings, on the other, a tendency to consumption, and Tom was the first to sicken. Fanny professed to be heart-broken, and permission for a visit to his bedside could not well be withheld. She went up to Hampstead, and saw him, thus paying lip service to truth, but afterwards proceeded to act the fine lady, and made a round of calls with her brother John. She returned to Walthamstow in an unseemly state, could give Mrs. Abbey no interesting details as to the progress of Tom's malady, nothing but chatter about Mr. So-and-so and Miss T'other, what they said and ate and wore and contributed to the newspapers, and might she buy a magazine once a month, even if it meant giving up her spaniel, and she did not think Miss Tucker would object, for newspapers opened the world as Mr. Dilke had remarked, and Mrs. Dilke was at Brighton. She was easily silenced, but the Abbeyes realized how susceptible she was to bad influences, and how sternly they must guard her against them. Letters like the following could not be indefinitely allowed to arrive:

'MY DEAR FANNY—

'I called on Mr. Abbey in the beginning of last week, when he seemed averse to letting you come again from having heard that you had been to other places besides Well Walk. I do not mean to say you did wrongly in speaking of it, for there should rightly be no objection to such things: but you know with what People we are obliged in the course of Childhood to associate, whose conduct forces us into duplicity and falsehood to them. . . . Perhaps I am talking too deeply for you: if you do not know, you will understand what I mean in the course of a few years. I think poor Tom is a little Better, he sends his love to you. I shall call on Mr. Abbey to-morrow: when I hope to settle when to see you again. Mrs. Dilke is expected home in a day or two. She will be pleased, I am sure, with your present. I will try for permission for you to remain all Night should Mrs. D. return in time.

'Your affectionate brother

'JOHN'

Permission was refused. The Dilkes and their set were no companions for a growing girl of fourteen, and Fanny remained under discipline at the time of Tom's death. The discipline had even to be increased, as the following letter, dated four months later, indicates; it had proved impossible to keep her in a healthy and modest frame of mind without almost entirely forbidding any intercourse between her and the rest of her family; it had also proved desirable to remove her from Miss Tucker's, owing to the expense:

'MY DEAR FANNY—

'Your letter to me at Bedhampton hurt me very much. What objection can there be to your receiving a letter from me? At Bedhampton I was unwell and did not go out of the Garden Gate but twice or thrice during the fortnight I was there—Since I came back I have been taking care of myself—I have been obliged to do so, and am now in hopes that by this care I shall get rid of a sore throat which has haunted me at intervals nearly a twelvemonth. I always had a presentiment of not being able to succeed in persuading Mr. Abbey to let you remain longer at School—I am very sorry that he will not consent. I recommend you to keep up all that you know and to learn more by yourself, however little. The time will come when you will be more pleased with Life—look forward to that time, and though it may be a trifle be careful not to let the idle and retired Life you lead fix any awkward habit or behaviour on you—whether you sit or walk endeavour to let it be in a seemly and, if possible, a graceful manner. We have been very little together: but you have not the less been with me in thought. You have no one in the world besides me who would sacrifice anything for you—I feel myself the only Protector you have. In all your little troubles think of me with the thought that there is at least one person in England who, if he could, would help you out of them—I live in hopes of being able to make you happy—I should not perhaps write in this manner if it were not for the fear of not being able to see you often or long together. I am in hopes that Mr. Abbey will not object any more to your receiving a letter now and then from me. How unreasonable! . . .

‘Your affectionate brother

‘JOHN’

Though less coarse in tone than its predecessors, this letter was even more calculated to undermine authority. O mark the impudence of calling life at Walthamstow ‘idle’—he who had never done a stroke of real work for years, had weakened his constitution by dissipation and drift, falling in love with his landlady’s daughter, and had vainly tried, when it was too late, to continue his medical career and obtain a post as surgeon upon an East Indiaman! The ‘sore-throat’ of which he complained was the precursor of the usual hereditary trouble, its later developments proving fatal. Kindly Mr. and Mrs. Abbey were distressed, and, Fanny herself falling ill, called in the family practitioner to attend her. Yet they could not but feel that sickness had all along been used to claim illicit privileges and to undermine their authority as guardians, and that just as in the case of Tom so in the case of John there had been duplicity. In view of his departure abroad, John was permitted to write his sister as often as he wished, and almost his last letter to her contained the venomous sentence, ‘In case my strength returns, I will do all in my power to extricate you from the Abbies.’ He could not even spell.

Blessed with excellent health himself, Mr. Abbey left illness to doctors. But in money matters he felt himself on firmer ground, and, a man of business through and through, brooked no interference in his own domain. When the three boys had abandoned the professions assigned to them, he could not prevent them, but he could cut off their supplies whenever fit without giving a reason. There was so much that boys could not understand. In the first place, the reinvestment of the £8,000 had, he owned frankly to himself, not been a success. In the second place, old Mr. Jennings, the original stableman, had left a confused will. He had died worth £13,160 19s. 5d., £9,343 2s. of which had gone to his widow and thence in more compact form to the grandchildren as £8,000; but he had also left his grandchildren £1,000 direct and £50 a year besides in reversion after their mother's death.

Mr. Abbey was aware of these additional legacies, but they were not often in his mind, for, like all city men, he had much to think about, and he deemed it fitter to leave them alone; they would do no harm, the interest would accumulate in Chancery, and when documents came about them it was his habit to clear his throat and drop everything together into a safe. And as years went on and the children failed to mention the legacies to him he ceased mentioning them to himself. He had so much to think about. After the first excitement of guardianship, he had done what nine men out of ten of substance would do in his place: nothing; so he said nothing. When John and George called with troubled faces at Pancras Lane and asked exactly how poor they were, he rightly replied, 'This is no ordinary question,' and silenced them by some reference to their own inexperience. Or, 'Ask your Aunt Midgely,' he would say. They knew not what he meant, nor did he, for Mrs. Midgely Jennings was unlikely to afford information, since she was herself dissatisfied with her income, and periodically threatened to bring suits, against whom or for what Mr. Abbey was not quite cognizant.

He was not clear either about the great Chancery suit, Rawlings v. Jennings, which the mother and grandmother had initiated by mutual consent in their lifetimes in order to clear up in an amicable spirit the obscurities of Mr. Jennings' will. Not one to interfere with another man's job, Mr. Abbey left law to the lawyers, and thanks to his attitude the Chancery suit lasted twenty years. Ah, he did not know much, but he always knew a little more than his wards; he performed that duty, and Tom and John remained ignorant until the day of their death, while Fanny believed for many years that she was a pauper and owed Mrs. Abbey for her board and lodging. Much extravagance was averted by this timely reticence, many loans to undesirable friends, and tours both in England and on the Continent, which could have led to no useful purposes. 'Ever let the fancy roam, pleasure never is at home,' wrote John to George openly in one of his letters; atrocious advice as coming from an elder brother to a younger, and alluding to the fact that George had decamped with the daughter of a sea-captain to America. All this Mr. Abbey realized, deprecated, and strove to check, and it was not his fault when Fanny terminated her connection with Walthamstow in the arms of a Spaniard.

The last years of the stewardship were very painful. Being small and sickly, and two of her brothers dead and the third abroad, Fanny seemed inclined to settle down. She spoke little, she dressed plainly, and never tossed her head when Mrs. Abbey repeated that she resembled her father, who had fallen off the horse, and that naught but idleness had ever been found on that side of the family. But, unfortunately, George came from America on a visit. Fanny was upset again, and all the careful accumulations of so many years came tumbling down. George was more robust than his brothers, had married, and had acquired a hard effrontery which passed for business ability among the Yankees, though it was not so estimated by Mr. Abbey. Retrenchment and deliberation were to Mr. Abbey the twin pillars of commercial achievement, he never hurried others and he did not expect to be hurried. He greeted the prodigal in measured tones, and received in reply a point-blank demand that the trust should be wound up. 'Ask your Aunt Midgely,' he said; but retorting that he knew whom to ask, George prepared to take the case into court. He insisted on the safe being opened, he discovered that the two additional legacies, ever Mr. Abbey's weak point, had been invested twenty years previously in Consols by order of the court, £1,550 7s. 10d. of Consols in the one case and £1,666 13s. 4d. in the other, and that the interest had been accumulating ever since his mother's death. He dragged every detail, including what had been paid as lawyers' fees, to the light, and before Mr. Abbey could collect himself had returned to America with £1,147 5s. 1d. in his pocket.

Worse was to follow; when Fanny came of age, which she did two years after George's visit, she claimed her share also. Mr. Abbey might have ceded it without protest, had she not claimed in addition the shares of her two dead brothers. Such rapacity was childish, and Mr. Abbey was quick to reply that the arrangement would be unfair to George. Fanny retorted 'No, George's own wish!' and she applied to Mr. Dilke, who produced the necessary documents. Fanny annexed the balance, no less than £3,375 5s. 7d., and quitted Walthamstow. Her Spanish adventurer married her soon afterwards, but Mr. and Mrs. Abbey could never feel it retribution sufficient. Although the money was not theirs to spend, they had come to feel that it was theirs to keep, and they would have liked it to accumulate at compound interest for ever. Bitter words had passed, Fanny insolently hinting that if Tom and John had been given their proper dues, the additional procurable comfort might have prolonged their lives.

Of course it would not have, and in any case what is the use of such people, Mr. Abbey could not help thinking as he sat at Walthamstow in the evening of his own life. Now that the worrying and badgering was over and the trust that he had so faithfully administered was filched from him, now that Rawlings v. Jennings was wound up, and idle verses about his wife no longer fell through the letter-box, he could not feel that his four wards had ever existed in the sense in which he, in which Mrs. Abbey, in which Miss Abbey and the conservatory existed. Already were they forgotten—George in America, Fanny in Spain, Tom in the graveyard of St.

Stephen's, Coleman Street, John at Rome. On the tomb of the last-mentioned had been placed a text which rather pleased the old gentleman, despite its fanciful wording. He found it appropriate to the whole family. 'Here lies one whose name was writ in water,' it said. He had written in water himself once with the point of a wet umbrella, and he remembered that almost before the servant arrived to open the door, his signature had evaporated. He himself has expressed the same truth in sounder English in the one letter of his that has been preserved, a business letter addressed to Messrs. Taylor and Hessey, publishers, Waterloo Place; he has summed up once for all the world's judgment upon inefficiency:

Pancras Lane,

THE INVISIBLE COLLECTION

AN EPISODE OF THE INFLATION PERIOD IN GERMANY

Stefan Zweig

(1881— )

TRANSLATED BY EDEN AND CEDAR PAUL

---

AT THE FIRST JUNCTION beyond Dresden, an elderly gentleman entered our compartment, smiled genially to the company, and gave me a special nod, as if to an old acquaintance. Seeing that I was at a loss, he mentioned his name. Of course I knew him! He was one of the most famous connoisseurs and art-dealers in Berlin. Before the war, I had often purchased autographs and rare books at his place. He took the vacant seat opposite me, and for a while we talked of matters not worth relating. Then, changing the conversation, he explained the object of the journey from which he was returning. It had, he said, been one of the strangest of his experiences in the thirty-seven years he had devoted to the occupation of art-pedlar. Enough introduction. I will let him tell the story in his own words, without using quote-marks—to avoid the complication of wheels within wheels.

You know [he said] what has been going on in my trade since the value of money began to diffuse into the void like gas. War profiteers have developed a taste for old masters (Madonnas and so on), for incunabula, for ancient tapestries. It is difficult to satisfy their craving; and a man like myself, who prefers to keep the best for his own use and enjoyment, is hard put to it not to have his house stripped bare. If I let them, they would buy the cuff-links from my shirt and the lamp from my writing-table. Harder and harder to find wares to sell. I'm afraid the term "wares" may grate upon you in this connexion, but you must excuse me. I have picked it up from customers of the new sort. Evil communications . . . Through use and wont I have come to look upon an invaluable book from one of the early Venetian presses much as the philistine looks upon an overcoat that cost so or so many hundred dollars, and upon a sketch by Guercino as animated by nothing more worthy of reverence than the transmigrated soul of a banknote for a few thousand francs.

Impossible to resist the greed of these fellows with money to burn. As I looked round my place the other night, it seemed to me that there was so little left of any real value that I might as well put up the shutters. Here was a fine business which had come down to me from my father and my grandfather; but the shop was stocked with rubbish which, before 1914, a street-trader would have been ashamed to hawk upon a hand-cart.

In this dilemma, it occurred to me to flutter the pages of our old ledgers. Perhaps I should be put on the track of former customers who might be willing to resell what they had bought in prosperous days. True, such a list of sometime purchasers has considerable resemblance to a battlefield laden with the corpses of the slain; and in fact I soon realized that most of those who had purchased from the firm when the sun was shining were dead or would be in such low water that it was probable they must have sold anything of value among their possessions. However, I came across a bundle of letters from a man who was presumably the oldest yet alive—if he was alive. But he was so old that I had forgotten him, since he had bought nothing after the great explosion in the summer of 1914. Yes, very, very old. The earliest letters were dated more than half a century back, when my grandfather was head of the business. Yet I could not recall having had any personal relationships with him during the thirty-seven years in which I had been an active worker in the establishment.

All indications showed that he must have been one of those antediluvian eccentrics, a few of whom survive in German provincial towns. His writing was copperplate, and every item in his orders was underlined in red ink. Each price was given in words as well as figures, so that there could be no mistake. These peculiarities, and his use of torn-out fly-leaves as writing paper, enclosed in a scratch assortment of envelopes, hinted at the penuriousness of a confirmed backwoodsman. His signature was always followed by his style and title in full: "Forest Ranger and Economic Councillor, Retired; Lieutenant, Retired; Holder of the Iron Cross First Class." Since he was obviously a veteran of the war of 1870-1871, he must by now be close on eighty.

For all his cheese-paring and for all his eccentricities, he had manifested exceptional shrewdness, knowledge, and taste as collector of prints and engravings. A careful study of his orders, which had at first totalled very small sums indeed, disclosed that in the days when a taler could still pay for a pile of lovely German woodcuts, this country bumpkin had got together a collection of etchings and the like outrivalling the widely trumpeted acquisitions of war profiteers. Merely those which, in the course of decades, he had bought from us for trifling sums would be worth a large amount of money today; and I had no reason to suppose that he had failed to pick up similar bargains elsewhere. Was his collection dispersed? I was too familiar with what had been going on in the art trade since the date of his last purchase not to feel confident that such a collection could scarcely have changed hands entire without my getting wind of the event. If he was dead, his treasures had probably remained intact in the hands of his heirs.

The affair seemed so interesting that I set forth next day (yesterday evening) on a journey to one of the most out-of-the-way towns in Saxony. When I left the tiny railway station and strolled along the main street, it seemed to me impossible that anyone inhabiting one of these gimcrack houses, furnished in a way with which you are doubtless familiar, could possibly own a full set of magnificent Rembrandt etchings together with an unprecedented number of Dürer woodcuts and a complete collection of Mantegnas. However, I went to the post-office to inquire, and was astonished to learn that a sometime Forest Ranger and Economic Councillor of the name I mentioned was still living. They told me how to find his house, and I will admit that my heart beat faster than usual as I made my way thither. It was well before noon.

The connoisseur of whom I was in search lived on the second floor of one of those jerry-built houses which were run up in such numbers by speculators during the sixties of the last century. The first floor was occupied by a master tailor. On the second landing to the left was the nameplate of the manager of the local post-office, while the porcelain shield on the right-hand door bore the name of my quarry. I had run him to earth! My ring was promptly answered by a very old, white-haired woman wearing a black lace cap. I handed her my card and asked whether the master was at home. With an air of suspicion she glanced at me, at the card, and then back at my face once more. In this God-forsaken little town a visit from an inhabitant of the metropolis was a disturbing event. However, in as friendly a tone as she could muster, she asked me to be good enough to wait a minute or two in the hall, and vanished through a doorway. I heard whispering, and then a loud, hearty, masculine voice: "Herr Rackner from Berlin, you say, the famous dealer in antiquities? Of course I shall be delighted to see him." Thereupon the old woman reappeared and invited me to enter.

I took off my overcoat, and followed her. In the middle of the cheaply furnished room was a man standing up to receive me. Old but hale, he had a bushy moustache and was wearing a semi-military frogged smoking-jacket. In the most cordial way, he held out both hands towards me. But though this gesture was spontaneous and nowise forced, it was in strange contrast with the stiffness of his attitude. He did not advance to meet me, so that I was compelled (I must confess I was a trifle piqued) to walk right up to him before I could shake. Then I noticed that his hand, too, did not seek mine, but was waiting for mine to clasp it. At length I guessed what was amiss. He was blind.

Ever since I was a child I have been uncomfortable in the presence of the blind. It embarrasses me, produces in me a sense of bewilderment and shame to encounter anyone who is thoroughly alive, and yet has not the full use of his senses. I feel as if I were taking an unfair advantage, and I was keenly conscious of this sensation as I glanced into the fixed and sightless orbs beneath the bristling white eyebrows. The blind man, however, did not leave me time to dwell upon this discomfort. He exclaimed, laughing with boisterous delight:

"A red-letter day, indeed! Seems almost a miracle that one of the big men of Berlin should drop in as you have done. There's need for us provincials to be careful, you know, when a noted dealer such as yourself is on the war-path. We've a saying in this part of the world: 'Shut your doors and button up your pockets if there are gipsies about!' I can guess why you've taken the trouble to call. Business doesn't thrive, I've gathered. No buyers or very few, so people are looking up their old customers. I'm afraid you'll draw a blank. We pensioners are glad enough to find there's still some dry bread for dinner. I've been a collector in my time, but now I'm out of the game. My buying days are over."

I hastened to tell him he was under a misapprehension, that I had not called with any thought of effecting sales. Happening to be in the neighbourhood I felt loath to miss the chance of paying my respects to a long-standing customer who was at the same time one of the most famous among German collectors. Hardly had the phrase passed my lips when a remarkable change took place in the old man's expression. He stood stiffly in the middle of the room, but his face lighted up and his whole aspect was suffused with pride. He turned in the direction where he fancied his wife to be, and nodded as if to say, "D'you hear that?" Then, turning back to me, he resumed—having dropped the brusque, drill-sergeant tone he had previously used, and speaking in a gentle, nay, almost tender voice:

"How charming of you. . . . I should be sorry, however, if your visit were to result in nothing more than your making the personal acquaintanceship of an old buffer like myself. At any rate I've something worth while for you to see—more worth while than you could find in Berlin, in the Albertina at Vienna, or even in the Louvre (God's curse on Paris!). A man who has been a diligent collector for fifty years, with taste to guide him, gets hold of treasures that are not to be picked up at every street-corner. Lisbeth, give me the key of the cupboard, please."

Now a strange thing happened. His wife, who had been listening with a pleasant smile, was startled. She raised her hands towards me, clasped them imploringly, and shook her head. What these gestures signified was a puzzle to me. Next she went up to her husband and touched his shoulder, saying:

"Franz, dear, you have forgotten to ask our visitor whether he may not have another appointment; and, anyhow, it is almost dinner-time.—I am sorry," she went on, looking to me, "that we have not enough in the house for an unexpected guest. No doubt you will dine at the inn. If you will take a cup of coffee with us afterwards, my daughter Anna Maria will be here, and she is much better acquainted than I am with the contents of the portfolios."

Once more she glanced piteously at me. It was plain that she wanted me to refuse the proposal to examine the collection there and then. Taking my cue, I said that in fact I had a dinner engagement at the Golden Stag, but should be only too delighted to return at three, when there would be plenty of time to examine anything Herr Kronfeld wanted to show me. I was not leaving before six o'clock.

The veteran was as pettish as a child deprived of a favourite toy.

"Of course," he growled, "I know you mandarins from Berlin have extensive claims on your time. Still, I really think you will do well to spare me a few hours. It is not merely two or three prints I want to show you, but the contents of twenty-seven portfolios, one for each master, and all of them full to bursting. However, if you come at three sharp, I dare say we can get through by six."

The wife saw me out. In the entrance hall, before she opened the front door, she whispered:

"Do you mind if Anna Maria comes to see you at the hotel before you return? It will be better for various reasons which I cannot explain just now."

"Of course, of course, a great pleasure. Really, I am dining alone, and your daughter can come along directly you have finished your own meal."

An hour later, when I had removed from the dining-room to the parlour of the Golden Stag, Anna Maria Kronfeld arrived. An old maid, wizened and diffident, plainly dressed, she contemplated me with embarrassment. I did my best to put her at her ease, and expressed my readiness to go back with her at once, if her father was impatient, though it was short of the appointed hour. At this she reddened, grew even more confused, and then stammered a request for a little talk before we set out.

"Please sit down," I answered. "I am entirely at your service."

She found it difficult to begin. Her hands and her lips trembled. At length:

"My mother sent me. We have to ask a favour of you. Directly you get back, Father will want to show you his collection; and the collection . . . the collection. Well, there's very little of it left."

She panted, almost sobbed, and went on breathlessly:

"I must be frank. . . . You know what troublous times we are passing through, and I am sure you will understand. Soon after the war broke out, my father became completely blind. His sight had already been failing. Agitation, perhaps, contributed. Though he was over seventy, he wanted to go to the front, remembering the fight in which he had taken part so long ago. Naturally there was no use for his services. Then, when the advance of our armies was checked, he took the matter very much to heart, and the doctor thought that may have precipitated the oncoming of blindness. In other respects, as you will have noticed, he is vigorous. Down to 1914 he could take long walks, and go out shooting. Since the failure of his eyes, his only pleasure is in his collection. He looks at it every day. 'Looks at it,' I say, though he sees nothing. Each afternoon he has the portfolios on the table, and fingers the prints one by one, in the order which many years have rendered so familiar. Nothing else interests him. He makes me read reports of auctions; and the higher the prices, the more enthusiastic does he become.

"There's the dreadful feature of the situation. Father knows nothing about the inflation; that we are ruined; that his monthly pension would not provide us with a day's food. Then we have others to support. My sister's husband was killed at Verdun, and there are four children. These money troubles have been kept from him. We cut down expenses as much as we can, but it is impossible to make ends meet. We began to sell things, trinkets and so on, without interfering with his beloved collection. There was very little to sell, since Father had always spent whatever he could scrape together upon woodcuts, copperplate engravings, and the like. The collector's mania! Well, at length it was a question whether we were to touch the collection or to let him starve. We didn't ask permission. What would have been the use? He hasn't the ghost of a notion how hard food is to come by, at any price; has never heard that Germany was defeated and surrendered Alsace-Lorraine. We don't read him items of that sort from the newspapers!

"The first piece we sold was a very valuable one, a Rembrandt etching, and the dealer paid us a long price, a good many thousand marks. We thought it would last us for years. But you know how money was melting away in 1922 and 1923. After we had provided for our immediate needs, we put the rest in a bank. In two months it was gone! We had to sell another engraving, and then another. That was during the worst days of inflation, and each time the dealer delayed settlement until the price was not worth a tenth or a hundredth of what he had promised to pay. We tried auction-rooms, and were cheated there too, though the bids were raised by millions. The million- or milliard-mark notes were waste-paper by the time we got them. The collection was scattered to provide daily bread, and little of that.

"That was why Mother was so much alarmed when you turned up to-day. Directly the portfolios are opened, our pious fraud will be disclosed. He knows each item by touch. You see, every print we disposed of was immediately replaced by a sheet of blank cartridge-paper of the same size and thickness, so that he would notice no difference when he handled it. Feeling them one by one, and counting them, he derives almost as much pleasure as if he could actually see them. He never tries to show them to anyone here, where there is no connoisseur, no one worthy to look at them; but he loves each of them so ardently that I think his heart would break if he knew they had been dispersed. The last time he asked someone to look at them, it was the curator of the copperplate engravings in Dresden, who died years ago.

"I beseech you"—her voice broke—"not to shatter his illusion, not to undermine his faith, that the treasures he will describe to you are there for the seeing. He would not survive the knowledge of their loss. Perhaps we have wronged him; yet what could we do? One must live. Orphaned children are more valuable than old prints. Besides, it has been life and happiness to him to spend three hours every afternoon going through his imaginary collection, and talking to each specimen as if it were a friend. Today may be the most enthralling experience since his sight failed. How he has longed for the chance of exhibiting his treasures to an expert! If you will lend yourself to the deception . . ."

In my cold recital, I cannot convey to you how poignant was this appeal. I have seen many a sordid transaction in my business career; have had to look on supinely while persons ruined by inflation have been diddled out of cherished heirlooms which they were compelled to sacrifice for a crust. But my heart has not been utterly calloused, and this tale touched me to the quick. I need hardly tell you that I promised to play up.

We went to her house together. On the way I was grieved (though not surprised) to learn for what preposterously small amounts these ignorant though kind-hearted women had parted with prints many of which were extremely valuable and some of them unique. This confirmed my resolve to give all the help in my power. As we mounted the stairs we heard a jovial shout: "Come in! Come in!" With the keen hearing of the blind, he had recognized the footsteps for which he had been eagerly waiting.

"Franz usually takes a siesta after dinner, but excitement kept him awake today," said the old woman with a smile as she let us in. A glance at her daughter showed her that all was well. The stack of portfolios was on the table. The blind collector seized me by the arm and thrust me into a chair which was placed ready for me.

"Let's begin at once. There's a lot to see, and time presses. The first portfolio contains Dürers. Nearly a full set, and you'll think each cut finer than the others. Magnificent specimens. Judge for yourself."

He opened the portfolio as he spoke, saying:

"We start with the Apocalypse series, of course."

Then, tenderly, delicately (as one handles fragile and precious objects), he picked up the first of the blank sheets of cartridge-paper and held it admiringly before my sighted eyes and his blind ones. So enthusiastic was his gaze that it was difficult to believe he could not see. Though I knew it to be fancy, I found it difficult to doubt that there was a glow of recognition in the wrinkled visage.

"Have you ever come across a finer print? How sharp the impression. Every detail crystal-clear. I compared mine with the one at Dresden; a good one, no doubt, but 'fuzzy' in contrast with the specimen you are looking at. Then I have the whole pedigree."

He turned the sheet over and pointed at the back so convincingly that involuntarily I leaned forward to read the nonexistent inscriptions.

"The stamp of the Nagler collection, followed by those of Remy and Esdaille. My famous predecessors never thought that their treasure would come to roost in this little room."

I shuddered as the unsuspecting enthusiast extolled the blank sheet of paper; my flesh crept when he placed a fingernail on the exact spot where the alleged imprints had been made by long-dead collectors. It was as ghostly as if the disembodied spirits of the men he named had risen from the tomb. My tongue clave to the roof of my mouth—until once more I caught sight of the distraught countenances of Kronfeld's wife and daughter. Then I pulled myself together and resumed my role. With forced heartiness, I exclaimed:

"Certainly you are right. This specimen is peerless."

He swelled with triumph.

"But that's nothing," he went on. "Look at these two, the Melancholia, and the illuminated print of the Passion. The latter, beyond question, has no equal. The freshness of the tints! Your colleagues in Berlin and the custodians of the public galleries would turn green with envy at the sight."

I will not bore you with details. Thus it went on, a pæan, for more than two hours, as he ransacked portfolio after portfolio. An eerie business to watch the handling of these two or three hundred blanks, to chime in at appropriate moments with praise of merits which for the blind collector were so eminently real that again and again (this was my salvation) his faith kindled my own.

Once only did disaster loom. He was "showing" me a first proof of Rembrandt's Antiope, which must have been of inestimable value and which had doubtless been sold for a song. Again he dilated on the sharpness of the print, but as he passed his fingers lightly over it the sensitive tips missed some familiar indentation. His face clouded, his mouth trembled, and he said:

"Surely, surely it's the Antiope? No one touches the wood-cuts and etchings but myself. How can it have got misplaced?"

"Of course it's the Antiope, Herr Kronfeld," I said, hastening to take the "print" from his hand and to expatiate upon various details which my own remembrance enabled me to conjure up upon the blank surface.

His bewilderment faded. The more I praised, the more gratified he became, until at last he said exultantly to the two women:

"Here's a man who knows what's what! You have been inclined to grumble at my 'squandering' money upon the collection. It's true that for half a century and more I denied myself beer, wine, tobacco, travelling, visits to the theatre, books, devoting all I could spare to these purchases you have despised. Well, Herr Rackner confirms my judgment. When I am dead and gone, you'll be richer than anyone in the town, as wealthy as the wealthiest folk in Dresden, and you'll have good reason for congratulating yourself on my 'craze.' But so long as I'm alive, the collection must be kept together. After I've been boxed and buried, this expert or another will help you to sell. You'll have to, since my pension dies with me."

As he spoke, his fingers caressed the despoiled portfolios. It was horrible and touching. Not for years, not since 1914, had I witnessed an expression of such unmitigated happiness on the face of a German. His wife and daughter watched him with tear-dimmed eyes, yet ecstatically, like those women of old who—affrighted and rapturous—found the stone rolled away and the sepulchre empty in the garden outside the wall of Jerusalem. But the man could not have enough of my appreciation. He went on from portfolio to portfolio, from "print" to "print," drinking in my words, until, outwearied, I was glad when the lying blanks were replaced in their cases and room was made to serve coffee on the table.

My host, far from being tired, looked rejuvenated. He had story after story to tell concerning the way he had chanced upon his multifarious treasures, wanting, in this connexion, to take out each relevant piece once more. He grew peevish when I insisted, when his wife and daughter insisted, that I should miss my train if he delayed me any longer. . . .

In the end he was reconciled to my going, and we said good-bye. His voice mellowed; he took both my hands in his and fondled them with the tactile appreciation of the blind.

"Your visit has given me immense pleasure," he said with a quaver in his voice. "What a joy to have been able at long last to show my collection to one competent to appreciate it. I can do something to prove my gratitude, to make your visit to a blind old man worth while. A codicil to my will shall stipulate that your firm, whose probity everyone knows, will be entrusted with the auctioning of my collection."

He laid a hand lovingly upon the pile of worthless portfolios.

"Promise me they shall have a handsome catalogue. I could ask no better monument."

I glanced at the two women, who were exercising the utmost control, fearful lest the sound of their trembling should reach his keen ears. I promised the impossible, and he pressed my hand in response.

Wife and daughter accompanied me to the door. They did not venture to speak, but tears were flowing down their cheeks. I myself was in little better case. An art-dealer, I had come in search of bargains. Instead, as events turned out, I had been a sort of angel of good-luck, lying like a trooper in order to assist in a fraud which kept an old man happy. Ashamed of lying, I was glad that I had lied. At any rate I had aroused an ecstasy which seems foreign to this period of sorrow and gloom.

As I stepped forth into the street, I heard a window open, and my name called. Though the old fellow could not see me, he knew in which direction I should walk, and his sightless eyes were turned thither. He leaned out so far that his anxious relatives put their arms round him lest he should fall. Waving a handkerchief, he shouted:

"A pleasant journey to you, Herr Rackner."

His voice rang like a boy's. Never shall I forget that cheerful face, which contrasted so grimly with the careworn aspect of the passers-by in the street. The illusion I had helped to sustain made life good for him. Was it not Goethe who said:

"Collectors are happy creatures"?

UNCLE FRED FLITS BY

P. G. Wodehouse

(1881- )

IN ORDER that they might enjoy their after-luncheon coffee in peace, the Crumpet had taken the guest whom he was entertaining at the Drones Club to the smaller and less frequented of the two smoking-rooms. In the other, he explained, though the conversation always touched an exceptionally high level of brilliance, there was apt to be a good deal of sugar thrown about.

The guest said he understood.

"Young blood, eh?"

"That's right. Young blood."

"And animal spirits."

"And animal, as you say, spirits," agreed the Crumpet. "We get a fairish amount of those here."

"The complaint, however, is not, I observe, universal."

"Eh?"

The other drew his host's attention to the doorway, where a young man in form-fitting tweeds had just appeared. The aspect of this young man was haggard. His eyes glared wildly and he sucked at an empty cigarette-holder. If he had a mind, there was something on it. When the Crumpet called to him to come and join the party, he merely shook his head in a distraught sort of way and disappeared, looking like a character out of a Greek tragedy pursued by the Fates.

The Crumpet sighed.

"Poor old Pongo!"

"Pongo?"

"That was Pongo Twistleton. He's all broken up about his Uncle Fred."

"Dead?"

"No such luck. Coming up to London again to-morrow. Pongo had a wire this morning."

"And that upsets him?"

"Naturally. After what happened last time."

"What was that?"

"Ah!" said the Crumpet.

"What happened last time?"

"You may well ask."

"I do ask."

"Ahl!" said the Crumpet.

Poor old Pongo (said the Crumpet) has often discussed his Uncle Fred with me, and if there weren't tears in his eyes when he did so, I don't know a tear in the eye when I see one. In round numbers the Earl of Ickenham, of Ickenham Hall, Ickenham, Hants, he lives in the country most of the year, but from time to time has a nasty way of slipping his collar and getting loose and descending upon Pongo at his flat in the Albany. And every time he does so, the unhappy young blighter is subjected to some soul-testing experience. Because the trouble with this uncle is that, though sixty if a day, he becomes on arriving in the metropolis as young as he feels—which is, apparently, a youngish twenty-two. I don't know if you happen to know what the word "excesses" means, but those are what Pongo's Uncle Fred from the country, when in London, invariably commits.

It wouldn't so much matter, mind you, if he would confine his activities to the club premises. We're pretty broad-minded here, and if you stop short of smashing the piano, there isn't much that you can do at the Drones that will cause the raised eyebrow and the sharp intake of breath. The snag is that he will insist on lugging Pongo out in the open and there, right in the public eye, proceeding to step high, wide and plentiful.

So when, on the occasion to which I allude, he stood pink and genial on Pongo's hearth-rug, bulging with Pongo's lunch and wreathed in the smoke of one of Pongo's cigars, and said: "And now, my boy, for a pleasant and instructive afternoon," you will readily understand why the unfortunate young clam gazed at him as he would have gazed at two-penn'orth of dynamite, had he discovered it lighting up in his presence.

"A what?" he said, giving at the knees and paling beneath the tan a bit.

"A pleasant and instructive afternoon," repeated Lord Ickenham, rolling the words round his tongue. "I propose that you place yourself in my hands and leave the programme entirely to me."

Now, owing to Pongo's circumstances being such as to necessitate his getting into the aged relative's ribs at intervals and shaking him down for an occasional much-needed tenner or what not, he isn't in a position to use the iron hand with the old buster. But at these words he displayed a manly firmness.

"You aren't going to get me to the dog races again."

"No, no."

"You remember what happened last June."

"Quite," said Lord Ickenham, "quite. Though I still think that a wiser magistrate would have been content with a mere reprimand."

"And I won't——"

"Certainly not. Nothing of that kind at all. What I propose to do this afternoon is to take you to visit the home of your ancestors."

Pongo did not get this.

"I thought Ickenham was the home of my ancestors."

"It is one of the homes of your ancestors. They also resided rather nearer the heart of things, at a place called Mitching Hill."

"Down in the suburbs, do you mean?"

"The neighbourhood is now suburban, true. It is many years since the meadows where I sported as a child were sold and cut up into building lots. But when I was a boy Mitching Hill was open country. It was a vast, rolling estate belonging to your great-uncle, Marmaduke, a man with whiskers of a nature which you with your pure mind would scarcely credit, and I have long felt a sentimental urge to see what the hell the old place looks like now. Perfectly foul, I expect. Still, I think we should make the pious pilgrimage."

Pongo absolutely-ed heartily. He was all for the scheme. A great weight seemed to have rolled off his mind. The way he looked at it was that even an uncle within a short jump of the looney bin couldn't very well get into much trouble in a suburb. I mean, you know what suburbs are. They don't, as it were, offer the scope. One follows his reasoning, of course.

"Fine!" he said. "Splendid! Topping!"

"Then put on your hat and rompers, my boy," said Lord Ickenham, "and let us be off. I fancy one gets there by omnibuses and things."

Well, Pongo hadn't expected much in the way of mental uplift from the sight of Mitching Hill, and he didn't get it. Alighting from the bus, he tells me, you found yourself in the middle of rows and rows of semi-detached villas, all looking exactly alike, and you went on and you came to more semi-detached villas, and those all looked exactly alike, too. Nevertheless, he did not repine. It was one of those early spring days which suddenly change to mid-winter and he had come out without his overcoat, and it looked like rain and he hadn't an umbrella, but despite this his mood was one of sober ecstasy. The hours were passing and his uncle had not yet made a goat of himself. At the Dog Races the other had been in the hands of the constabulary in the first ten minutes.

It began to seem to Pongo that with any luck he might be able to keep the old blister pottering harmlessly about here till nightfall, when he could shoot a bit of dinner into him and put him to bed. And as Lord Ickenham had specifically stated that his wife, Pongo's Aunt Jane, had expressed her intention of scalping him with a blunt knife if he wasn't back at the Hall by lunch time on the morrow, it really looked as if he might get through this visit without perpetrating a single major outrage on the public weal. It is rather interesting to note that as he thought this Pongo smiled, because it was the last time he smiled that day.

All this while, I should mention, Lord Ickenham had been stopping at intervals like a pointing dog and saying that it must have been just about here that he plugged the gardener in the trousers seat with his bow and arrow and that over there he had been sick after his first cigar, and he now paused in front of a villa which for some unknown reason called itself The Cedars. His face was tender and wistful.

"On this very spot, if I am not mistaken," he said, heaving a bit of a sigh, "on this very spot, fifty years ago come Lammas Eve, I . . . Oh, blast it!"

The concluding remark had been caused by the fact that the rain, which had held off until now, suddenly began to buzz down like a shower-bath. With no further words, they leaped into the porch of the villa and there took shelter, exchanging glances with a grey parrot which hung in a cage in the window.

Not that you could really call it shelter. They were protected from above all right, but the moisture was now falling with a sort of swivel action, whipping in through the sides of the porch and tickling them up properly. And it was just after Pongo had turned up his collar and was huddling against the door that the door gave way. From the fact that a female of general-servant aspect was standing there he gathered that his uncle must have rung the bell.

This female wore a long mackintosh, and Lord Ickenham beamed upon her with a fairish spot of suavity.

"Good afternoon," he said.

The female said good afternoon.

"The Cedars?"

The female said yes, it was The Cedars.

"Are the old folks at home?"

The female said there was nobody at home.

"Ah? Well, never mind. I have come," said Lord Ickenham, edging in, "to clip the parrot's claws. My assistant, Mr. Walkinshaw, who applies the anæsthetic," he added, indicating Pongo with a gesture.

"Are you from the bird shop?"

"A very happy guess."

"Nobody told me you were coming."

"They keep things from you, do they?" said Lord Ickenham, sympathetically. "Too bad."

Continuing to edge, he had got into the parlour by now, Pongo following in a sort of dream and the female following Pongo.

"Well, I suppose it's all right," she said. "I was just going out. It's my afternoon."

"Go out," said Lord Ickenham cordially. "By all means go out. We will leave everything in order."

And presently the female, though still a bit on the dubious side, pushed off, and Lord Ickenham lit the gas-fire and drew a chair up.

"So here we are, my boy," he said. "A little tact, a little address, and here we are, snug and cosy and not catching our deaths of cold. You'll never go far wrong if you leave things to me."

"But, dash it, we can't stop here," said Pongo.

Lord Ickenham raised his eyebrows.

"Not stop here? Are you suggesting that we go out into that rain? My dear lad, you are not aware of the grave issues involved. This morning, as I was leaving home, I had a rather painful disagreement with your aunt. She said the weather was treacherous and wished me to take my woolly muffler. I replied that the weather was not treacherous and that I would be dashed if I took my woolly muffler. Eventually, by the exercise of an iron will, I had my way, and I ask you, my dear boy, to envisage what will happen if I return with a cold in the head. I shall sink to the level of a fifth-class power. Next time I came to London, it would be with a liver pad and a respirator. No! I shall remain here, toasting my toes at this really excellent fire. I had no idea that a gas-fire radiated such warmth. I feel all in a glow."

So did Pongo. His brow was wet with honest sweat. He is reading for the Bar, and while he would be the first to admit that he hasn't yet got a complete toe-hold on the Law of Great Britain he had a sort of notion that oiling into a perfect stranger's semi-detached villa on the pretext of pruning the parrot was a tort or misdemeanour, if not actual barratry or soccage in fief or something like that. And apart from the legal aspect of the matter there was the embarrassment of the thing. Nobody is more of a whale on correctness and not doing what's not done than Pongo, and the situation in which he now found himself caused him to chew the lower lip and, as I say, perspire a goodish deal.

"But suppose the blighter who owns this ghastly house comes back?" he asked. "Talking of envisaging things, try that one over on your pianola."

And, sure enough, as he spoke, the front door bell rang.

"There!" said Pongo.

"Don't say 'There!' my boy," said Lord Ickenham reprovingly. "It's the sort of thing your aunt says. I see no reason for alarm. Obviously this is some casual caller. A ratepayer would have used his latchkey. Glance cautiously out of the window and see if you can see anybody."

"It's a pink chap," said Pongo, having done so.

"How pink?"

"Pretty pink."

"Well, there you are, then. I told you so. It can't be the big chief. The sort of fellows who own houses like this are pale and sallow, owing to working in offices all day. Go and see what he wants."

"You go and see what he wants."

"We'll both go and see what he wants," said Lord Ickenham.

So they went and opened the front door, and there, as Pongo had said, was a pink chap. A small young pink chap, a bit moist about the shoulder-blades.

"Pardon me," said this pink chap, "is Mr. Roddis in?"

"No," said Pongo.

"Yes," said Lord Ickenham. "Don't be silly, Douglas—of course I'm in. I am Mr. Roddis," he said to the pink chap. "This, such as he is, is my son Douglas. And you?"

"Name of Robinson."

"What about it?"

"My name's Robinson."

"Oh, your name's Robinson? Now we've got it straight. Delighted to see you, Mr. Robinson. Come right in and take your boots off."

They all trickled back to the parlour, Lord Ickenham pointing out objects of interest by the wayside to the chap, Pongo gulping for air a bit and trying to get himself abreast of this new twist in the scenario. His heart was becoming more and more bowed down with weight of woe. He hadn't liked being Mr. Walkinshaw, the anæsthetist, and he didn't like it any better being Roddis Junior. In brief, he feared the worst. It was only too plain to him by now that his uncle had got it thoroughly up his nose and had settled down to one of his big afternoons, and he was asking himself, as he had so often asked himself before, what would the harvest be?

Arrived in the parlour, the pink chap proceeded to stand on one leg and look coy.

"Is Julia here?" he asked, simpering a bit, Pongo says.

"Is she?" said Lord Ickenham to Pongo.

"No," said Pongo.

"No," said Lord Ickenham.

"She wired me she was coming here to-day."

"Ah, then we shall have a bridge four."

The pink chap stood on the other leg.

"I don't suppose you've ever met Julia. Bit of trouble in the family, she gave me to understand."

"It is often the way."

"The Julia I mean is your niece Julia Parker. Or, rather, your wife's niece Julia Parker."

"Any niece of my wife is a niece of mine," said Lord Ickenham heartily.

"We share and share alike."

"Julia and I want to get married."

"Well, go ahead."

"But they won't let us."

"Who won't?"

"Her mother and father. And Uncle Charlie Parker and Uncle Henry Parker and the rest of them. They don't think I'm good enough."

"The morality of the modern young man is notoriously lax."

"Class enough, I mean. They're a haughty lot."

"What makes them haughty? Are they earls?"

"No, they aren't earls."

"Then why the devil," said Lord Ickenham warmly, "are they haughty? Only earls have a right to be haughty. Earls are hot stuff. When you get an earl, you've got something."

"Besides, we've had words. Me and her father. One thing led to another, and in the end I called him a perishing old—Cool!" said the pink chap, breaking off suddenly.

He had been standing by the window, and he now leaped lissomely into the middle of the room, causing Pongo, whose nervous system was by this time definitely down among the wines and spirits and who hadn't been expecting this adagio stuff, to bite his tongue with some severity.

"They're on the doorstep! Julia and her mother and father. I didn't know they were all coming."

"You do not wish to meet them?"

"No, I don't!"

"Then duck behind the settee, Mr. Robinson," said Lord Ickenham, and the pink chap, weighing the advice and finding it good, did so. And as he disappeared the door bell rang.

Once more, Lord Ickenham led Pongo out into the hall.

"I say!" said Pongo, and a close observer might have noted that he was quivering like an aspen.

"Say on, my dear boy."

"I mean to say, what?"

"What?"

"You aren't going to let these bounders in, are you?"

"Certainly," said Lord Ickenham. "We Roddises keep open house. And as they are presumably aware that Mr. Roddis has no son, I think we had better return to the old layout. You are the local vet, my boy, come to minister to my parrot. When I return, I should like to find you by the cage, staring at the bird in a scientific manner. Tap your teeth from time to time with a pencil and try to smell of iodoform. It will help to add conviction."

So Pongo shifted back to the parrot's cage and stared so earnestly that it was only when a voice said "Well!" that he became aware that there was anybody in the room. Turning, he perceived that Hampshire's leading curse had come back, bringing the gang.

It consisted of a stern, thin, middle-aged woman, a middle-aged man and a girl.

You can generally accept Pongo's estimate of girls, and when he says that this one was a pippin one knows that he uses the term in its most exact sense. She was about nineteen, he thinks, and she wore a black béret, a dark-green leather coat, a shortish tweed skirt, silk stockings and high-heeled shoes. Her eyes were large and lustrous and her face like a dewy rosebud at daybreak on a June morning. So Pongo tells me. Not that I suppose he has ever seen a rosebud at daybreak on a June morning, because it's generally as much as you can do to lug him out of bed in time for nine-thirty breakfast. Still, one gets the idea.

"Well," said the woman, "you don't know who I am, I'll be bound. I'm Laura's sister Connie. This is Claude, my husband. And this is my daughter Julia. Is Laura in?"

"I regret to say, no," said Lord Ickenham.

The woman was looking at him as if he didn't come up to her specifications.

"I thought you were younger," she said.

"Younger than what?" said Lord Ickenham.

"Younger than you are."

"You can't be younger than you are, worse luck," said Lord Ickenham. "Still, one does one's best, and I am bound to say that of recent years I have made a pretty good go of it."

The woman caught sight of Pongo, and he didn't seem to please her, either.

"Who's that?"

"The local vet, clustering round my parrot."

"I can't talk in front of him."

"It is quite all right," Lord Ickenham assured her. "The poor fellow is stone deaf."

And with an imperious gesture at Pongo, as much as to bid him stare less at girls and more at parrots, he got the company seated.

"Now, then," he said.

There was silence for a moment, then a sort of muffled sob, which Pongo thinks proceeded from the girl. He couldn't see, of course, because his back was turned and he was looking at the parrot, which looked back at him—most offensively, he says, as parrots will, using one eye only for the purpose. It also asked him to have a nut.

The woman came into action again.

"Although," she said, "Laura never did me the honour to invite me to her wedding, for which reason I have not communicated with her for five years, necessity compels me to cross her threshold to-day. There comes a time when differences must be forgotten and relatives must stand shoulder to shoulder."

"I see what you mean," said Lord Ickenham. "Like the boys of the old brigade."

"What I say is, let bygones be bygones. I would not have intruded on you, but needs must. I disregard the past and appeal to your sense of pity."

The thing began to look to Pongo like a touch, and he is convinced that the parrot thought so, too, for it winked and cleared its throat. But they were both wrong. The woman went on.

"I want you and Laura to take Julia into your home for a week or so, until I can make other arrangements for her. Julia is studying the piano, and she sits for her examination in two weeks' time, so until then she must remain in London. The trouble is, she has fallen in love. Or thinks she has."

"I know I have," said Julia.

Her voice was so attractive that Pongo was compelled to slew round and take another look at her. Her eyes, he says, were shining like twin stars and there was a sort of Soul's Awakening expression on her face, and what the dickens there was in a pink chap like the pink chap, who even as pink chaps go wasn't much of a pink chap, to make her look like that, was frankly, Pongo says, more than he could understand. The thing baffled him. He sought in vain for a solution.

"Yesterday, Claude and I arrived in London from our Bexhill home to give Julia a pleasant surprise. We stayed, naturally, in the boarding-house where she has been living for the past six weeks. And what do you think we discovered?"

"Insects."

"Not insects. A letter. From a young man. I found to my horror that a young man of whom I knew nothing was arranging to marry my daughter. I sent for him immediately, and found him to be quite impossible. He jellies eels!"

"Does what?"

"He is an assistant at a jellied eel shop."

"But surely," said Lord Ickenham, "that speaks well for him. The capacity to jelly an eel seems to me to argue intelligence of a high order. It isn't everybody who can do it, by any means. I know if someone came to me and said 'Jelly this eel!' I should be nonplussed. And so, or I am very much mistaken, would Ramsay MacDonald and Winston Churchill."

The woman did not seem to see eye to eye.

"Tchah!" she said. "What do you suppose my husband's brother Charlie Parker would say if I allowed his niece to marry a man who jellies eels?"

"Ah!" said Claude, who, before we go any further, was a tall, drooping bird with a red soup-strainer moustache.

"Or my husband's brother, Henry Parker."

"Ah!" said Claude. "Or Cousin Alf Robbins, for that matter."

"Exactly. Cousin Alfred would die of shame."

The girl Julia hiccoughed passionately, so much so that Pongo says it was all he could do to stop himself nipping across and taking her hand in his and patting it.

"I've told you a hundred times, mother, that Wilberforce is only jellying eels till he finds something better."

"What is better than an eel?" asked Lord Ickenham, who had been following this discussion with the close attention it deserved. "For jellying purposes, I mean."

"He is ambitious. It won't be long," said the girl, "before Wilberforce suddenly rises in the world."

She never spoke a truer word. At this very moment, up he came from behind the settee like a leaping salmon.

"Julia!" he cried.

"Wilby!" yipped the girl.

And Pongo says he never saw anything more sickening in his life than the way she flung herself into the blighter's arms and clung there like the ivy on the old garden wall. It wasn't that he had anything specific against the pink chap, but this girl had made a deep impression on him and he resented her glueing herself to another in this manner.

Julia's mother, after just that brief moment which a woman needs in which to recover from her natural surprise at seeing eel-jelliers pop up from behind sofas, got moving and plucked her away like a referee breaking a couple of welter-weights.

"Julia Parker," she said, "I'm ashamed of you!"

"So am I," said Claude.

"I blush for you."

"Me, too," said Claude. "Hugging and kissing a man who called your father a perishing old bottle-nosed Gawd-help-us."

"I think," said Lord Ickenham, shoving his oar in, "that before proceeding any further we ought to go into that point. If he called you a perishing old bottle-nosed Gawd-help-us, it seems to me that the first thing to do is to decide whether he was right, and frankly, in my opinion . . ."

"Wilberforce will apologize."

"Certainly I'll apologize. It isn't fair to hold a remark passed in the heat of the moment against a chap . . ."

"Mr. Robinson," said the woman, "you know perfectly well that whatever remarks you may have seen fit to pass don't matter one way or the other. If you were listening to what I was saying you will understand . . ."

"Oh, I know, I know. Uncle Charlie Parker and Uncle Henry Parker and Cousin Alf Robbins and all that. Pack of snobs!"

"What!"

"Haughty, stuck-up snobs. Them and their class distinctions. Think themselves everybody just because they've got money. I'd like to know how they got it."

"What do you mean by that?"

"Never mind what I mean."

"If you are insinuating——"

"Well, of course, you know, Connie," said Lord Ickenham mildly, "he's quite right. You can't get away from that."

I don't know if you have ever seen a bull-terrier embarking on a scrap with an Airedale and just as it was getting down nicely to its work suddenly having an unexpected Kerry Blue sneak up behind it and bite it in the rear quarters. When this happens, it lets go of the Airedale and swivels round and fixes the butting-in animal with a pretty nasty eye. It was exactly the same with the woman Connie when Lord Ickenham spoke these words.

"What!"

"I was only wondering if you had forgotten how Charlie Parker made his pile."

"What are you talking about?"

"I know it is painful," said Lord Ickenham, "and one doesn't mention it as a rule, but, as we are on the subject, you must admit that lending money at two hundred and fifty per cent interest is not done in the best circles. The judge, if you remember, said so at the trial."

"I never knew that!" cried the girl Julia.

"Ah," said Lord Ickenham. "You kept it from the child? Quite right, quite right."

"It's a lie!"

"And when Henry Parker had all that fuss with the bank it was touch and go they didn't send him to prison. Between ourselves, Connie, has a bank official, even a brother of your husband, any right to sneak fifty pounds from the till in order to put it on a hundred to one shot for the Grand National? Not quite playing the game, Connie. Not the straight bat. Henry, I grant you, won five thousand of the best and never looked back afterwards, but, though we applaud his judgment of form, we must surely look askance at his financial methods. As for Cousin Alf Robbins . . ."

The woman was making rummy stuttering sounds. Pongo tells me he once had a Pommery Seven which used to express itself in much the same way if you tried to get it to take a hill on high. A sort of mixture of gurgles and explosions.

"There is not a word of truth in this," she gasped at length, having managed to get the vocal cords disentangled. "Not a single word. I think you must have gone mad."

Lord Ickenham shrugged his shoulders.

"Have it your own way, Connie. I was only going to say that, while the jury were probably compelled on the evidence submitted to them to give Cousin Alf Robbins the benefit of the doubt when charged with smuggling dope, everybody knew that he had been doing it for years. I am not blaming him, mind you. If a man can smuggle cocaine and get away with it, good luck to him, say I. The only point I am trying to make is that we are hardly a family that can afford to put on dog and sneer at honest suitors for our daughters' hands. Speaking for myself, I consider that we are very lucky to have the chance of marrying even into eel-jellying circles."

"So do I," said Julia firmly.

"You don't believe what this man is saying?"

"I believe every word."

"So do I," said the pink chap.

The woman snorted. She seemed overwrought.

"Well," she said, "goodness knows I have never liked Laura, but I would never have wished her a husband like you!"

"Husband?" said Lord Ickenham, puzzled. "What gives you the impression that Laura and I are married?"

There was a weighty silence, during which the parrot threw out a general invitation to the company to join it in a nut. Then the girl Julia spoke.

"You'll have to let me marry Wilberforce now," she said. "He knows too much about us."

"I was rather thinking that myself," said Lord Ickenham. "Seal his lips, I say."

"You wouldn't mind marrying into a low family, would you, darling?" asked the girl, with a touch of anxiety.

"No family could be too low for me, dearest, if it was yours," said the pink chap.

"After all, we needn't see them."

"That's right."

"It isn't one's relations that matter: it's oneself."

"That's right, too."

"Wilby!"

"Julia!"

They repeated the old ivy on the garden wall act. Pongo says he didn't like it any better than the first time, but his distaste wasn't in it with the woman Connie's.

"And what, may I ask," she said, "do you propose to marry on?"

This seemed to cast a damper. They came apart. They looked at each other. The girl looked at the pink chap, and the pink chap looked at the girl. You could see that a jarring note had been struck.

"Wilberforce is going to be a very rich man some day."

"Some day!"

"If I had a hundred pounds," said the pink chap, "I could buy a half-share in one of the best milk walks in South London to-morrow."

"If!" said the woman.

"Ah!" said Claude.

"Where are you going to get it?"

"Ah!" said Claude.

"Where," repeated the woman, plainly pleased with the snappy crack and loath to let it ride without an encore, "are you going to get it?"

"That," said Claude, "is the point. Where are you going to get a hundred pounds?"

"Why, bless my soul," said Lord Ickenham jovially, "from me, of course. Where else?"

And before Pongo's bulging eyes he fished out from the recesses of his costume a crackling bundle of notes and handed it over. And the agony of realizing that the old bounder had had all that stuff on him all this time and that he hadn't touched him for so much as a tithe of it was so keen, Pongo says, that before he knew what he was doing he had let out a sharp, whinnying cry which rang through the room like the wowl of a stepped-on puppy.

"Ah," said Lord Ickenham. "The vet wishes to speak to me. Yes, vet?"

This seemed to puzzle the cerise bloke a bit.

"I thought you said this chap was your son."

"If I had a son," said Lord Ickenham, a little hurt, "he would be a good deal better-looking than that. No, this is the local veterinary surgeon. I may have said I looked on him as a son. Perhaps that was what confused you."

He shifted across to Pongo and twiddled his hands enquiringly. Pongo gaped at him, and it was not until one of the hands caught him smartly in the lower ribs that he remembered he was deaf and started to twiddle back. Considering that he wasn't supposed to be dumb, I can't see why he should have twiddled, but no doubt there are moments when twiddling is about all a fellow feels himself equal to. For what seemed to him at least ten hours Pongo had been undergoing great mental stress, and one can't blame him for not being chatty. Anyway, be that as it may, he twiddled.

"I cannot quite understand what he says," announced Lord Ickenham at length, "because he sprained a finger this morning and that makes him stammer. But I gather that he wishes to have a word with me in private. Possibly my parrot has got something the matter with it which he is reluctant to mention even in sign language in front of a young unmarried girl. You know what parrots are. We will step outside."

"We will step outside," said Wilberforce.

"Yes," said the girl Julia. "I feel like a walk."

"And you?" said Lord Ickenham to the woman Connie, who was looking like a female Napoleon at Moscow. "Do you join the hikers?"

"I shall remain and make myself a cup of tea. You will not grudge us a cup of tea, I hope?"

"Far from it," said Lord Ickenham cordially. "This is Liberty Hall. Stick around and mop it up till your eyes bubble."

Outside, the girl, looking more like a dewy rosebud than ever, fawned on the old buster pretty considerably.

"I don't know how to thank you!" she said. And the pink chap said he didn't, either.

"Not at all, my dear, not at all," said Lord Ickenham.

"I think you're simply wonderful."

"No, no."

"You are. Perfectly marvellous."

"Tut, tut," said Lord Ickenham. "Don't give the matter another thought."

He kissed her on both cheeks, the chin, the forehead, the right eyebrow, and the tip of the nose, Pongo looking on the while in a baffled and discontented manner. Everybody seemed to be kissing this girl except him.

Eventually the degrading spectacle ceased and the girl and the pink chap shoved off, and Pongo was enabled to take up the matter of that hundred quid.

"Where," he asked, "did you get all that money?"

"Now, where did I?" mused Lord Ickenham. "I know your aunt gave it to me for some purpose. But what? To pay some bill or other, I rather fancy."

This cheered Pongo up slightly.

"She'll give you the devil when you get back," he said, with not a little relish. "I wouldn't be in your shoes for something. When you tell Aunt Jane," he said, with confidence, for he knew his Aunt Jane's emotional nature, "that you slipped her entire roll to a girl, and explain, as you will have to explain, that she was an extraordinarily pretty girl—a girl, in fine, who looked like something out of a beauty chorus of the better sort, I should think she would pluck down one of the ancestral battle-axes from the wall and jolly well strike you on the mazzard."

"Have no anxiety, my dear boy," said Lord Ickenham. "It is like your kind heart to be so concerned, but have no anxiety. I shall tell her that I was compelled to give the money to you to enable you to buy back some compromising letters from a Spanish demi-mondaine. She will scarcely be able to blame me for rescuing a fondly-loved nephew from the clutches of an adventuress. It may be that she will feel a little vexed with you for a while, and that you may have to allow a certain time to elapse before you visit Ickenham again, but then I shan't be wanting you at Ickenham till the ratting season starts, so all is well."

At this moment, there came toddling up to the gate of The Cedars a large red-faced man. He was just going in when Lord Ickenham hailed him.

"Mr. Roddis?"

"Hey?"

"Am I addressing Mr. Roddis?"

"That's me."

"I am Mr. J. G. Bulstrode from down the road," said Lord Ickenham. "This is my sister's husband's brother, Percy Frensham, in the lard and imported-butter business."

The red-faced bird said he was pleased to meet them. He asked Pongo if things were brisk in the lard and imported-butter business, and Pongo said they were all right, and the red-faced bird said he was glad to hear it.

"We have never met, Mr. Roddis," said Lord Ickenham, "but I think it would be only neighbourly to inform you that a short while ago I observed two suspicious-looking persons in your house."

"In my house? How on earth did they get there?"

"No doubt through a window at the back. They looked to me like cat burglars. If you creep up, you may be able to see them."

The red-faced bird crept, and came back not exactly foaming at the mouth but with the air of a man who for two pins would so foam.

"You're perfectly right. They're sitting in my parlour as cool as dammit, swigging my tea and buttered toast."

"I thought as much."

"And they've opened a pot of my raspberry jam."

"Ah, then you will be able to catch them red-handed. I should fetch a policeman."

"I will. Thank you, Mr. Bulstrode."

"Only too glad to have been able to render you this little service, Mr. Roddis," said Lord Ickenham. "Well, I must be moving along. I have an appointment. Pleasant after the rain, is it not? Come, Percy."

He lugged Pongo off.

"So that," he said, with satisfaction, "is that. On these visits of mine to the metropolis, my boy, I always make it my aim, if possible, to spread sweetness and light. I look about me, even in a foul hole like Mitching Hill, and I ask myself—How can I leave this foul hole a better and happier foul hole than I found it? And if I see a chance, I grab it. Here is our omnibus. Spring aboard, my boy, and on our way home we will be sketching out rough plans for the evening. If the old Leicester Grill is still in existence, we might look in there. It must be fully thirty-five years since I was last thrown out of the Leicester Grill. I wonder who is the bouncer there now."

Such (concluded the Crumpet) is Pongo Twistleton's Uncle Fred from the country, and you will have gathered by now a rough notion of why it is that when a telegram comes announcing his impending arrival in the great city Pongo blanches to the core and calls for a couple of quick ones.

The whole situation, Pongo says, is very complex. Looking at it from one angle, it is fine that the man lives in the country most of the year. If he didn't he would have him in his midst all the time. On the other hand, by living in the country he generates, as it were, a store of loopiness which expends itself with frightful violence on his rare visits to the centre of things.

What it boils down to is this—Is it better to have a loopy uncle whose loopiness is perpetually on tap but spread out thin, so to speak, or one who lies low in distant Hants for three hundred and sixty days in the year and does himself proud in London for the other five? Dashed moot, of course, and Pongo has never been able to make up his mind on the point.

Naturally, the ideal thing would be if someone would chain the old hound up permanently and keep him from Jan. One to Dec. Thirty-one where he wouldn't do any harm—viz. among the spuds and tenantry. But this, Pongo admits, is a Utopian dream. Nobody could work harder to that end than his Aunt Jane, and she has never been able to manage it.

IN THE LAST COACH

REFRESHED BY A MONTH'S HOLIDAY in the mountains, the banker, still a young man, was sauntering along between a trout-stream and a wet wall of rock, making for a café in the woods. Here, sitting on a terrace built out against the wall of the café, he could enjoy for the last time the aromatic strawberries and listen to the stimulating sound of the engines in the great saw-mill.

He hummed contentedly to himself, as he strode through the green and blue, thinking of the delightful journey down into the valley, of the famous viaduct that soared through the air eighty feet above the ground, and of the far-distant plains and mountains he would see from it. He lifted his hat with a vertical movement, as though it were a dumb-bell, in spritely acknowledgment of the sweeping curve described by the straw hat of the hardware traveller. Satisfied with the order he had received, the traveller had just left a shop which clung close to the cliff-face.

"What clear air! What wonderful flowers! What a marvellous scent there is here!" cried the hardware traveller. "And that cliff! It's quite a symbol of Germany."

"Because it's always dripping with water?"

"No, because of its defiant strength!"

They had first met while sunbathing a few days before.

"I'll take good care I never get so worn and skinny, nor acquire such a fat, pimply belly!" So the sturdy banker had thought, standing there firmly with legs apart, his hands on his hips and the thumbs turned down in front. He had been shocked and amused by the pitiable figure of the commercial traveller, and had tried in vain to get him under the cold shower.

"I'll see to that."

"See to what?"

"Exercise. You must have exercise. Arms—raise! Arms—lower! . . . Knees—bend! Knees—stretch!" He bent his knees once more and shot his arms forward till the shoulder-joints cracked. "There, sir, that's the way to keep young."

"That varies," answered the workman, standing in the open shed of the saw-mill beside his circular-saw. "Yesterday they sacked a hundred at one go. Now we've got close on seven hundred. We've got ten foremen."

"And the owner?" asked the banker.

"He came here once. That'll be about five years ago. He was touring the mountains with his car and dropped in at the mill. He lives in Berlin. I read in the paper the other day that he'd given two hundred thousand marks for cultural developments. It was a theatre!"

"I can assure you it's months since I had time to go to the theatre," said the traveller in hardware. "Our trade is booming."

"Yes, things seem to be improving a little. . . . Did you get your arm in the machine?" The banker laid his hand on the fair head of a little girl, whose left hand was missing.

"No, I was born like that," said the child, readily, as though she had often answered the same question, and hid the thin stump under her pinafore.

"Her mother had a shock before the child was born. That often happens about here; you see, a good few accidents happen in the saw-mills. The safety appliances are not too good."

"That will improve now, too," said the banker, reassuringly. "Times are changing, and those things will be looked after."

The traveller threw out his hand: "Have you ever been to the theatre? Do you ever—" He looked round, as though the heap of sawdust or the roof of the shed would inform him whether people hereabouts went to the theatre.

"Theatre!" The workman turned a handle, the circular-saw began to scream and wrapped him in a cloud of sawdust.

"Here, child, take that to your mother." The banker pressed a note into the little girl's right hand, and walked with springy tread through the gate.

Suddenly he turned back and patted the little girl's cheek. "What's your name? . . .

"Bärbelchen, is it? I see."

Taking one small step after another, he climbed peacefully café-wards in the wake of the panting hardware traveller.

As the waiter was bringing the second portion of strawberries, disconnected fragments of speech came up from the great yard of the saw-mill, which was now black with people.

"The meeting was probably called because a hundred workmen have been discharged," answered the waiter.

The traveller put down a spoonful of strawberries. "What, in broad daylight?"

"They never work on a Saturday afternoon."

"And why don't they work, I should like to know. Look at me—I've still got two customers to see and I'm leaving this afternoon."

The chairman was seated at a little table, placed on a pile of planks; he had a bell in front of him. The district secretary of the party was leaning forward at his side, speaking of the basic principles of Social Democracy, of the eventual triumph of Socialism by the gradual attainment of a parliamentary majority.

The audience—all the mill-hands and a number of woodcutters—were standing or sitting on piles of planks. Some were counting their money. It was pay-day. Many were grumbling.

The traveller turned sharply round and listened to the shouting that came up from the saw-mill. The excitement of the discharged workmen had suddenly exploded.

"That is the only way we can build up trade," shouted the secretary, through the noise, "and at the same time retain all the achievements of civilization and, so to speak, carry them with us. Comrades, may this beautiful valley of ours be saved from Asiatic excesses. In this beautiful vale——"

"A virgin went to the well with a pail!" cried one of the discharged workmen.

Many were mopping their faces with their handkerchiefs. There was a smell of sweat. The sun burned vertically down on the snowy peaks, which glittered like diamonds.

A discussion followed. While the first speaker was declaring that he was not quite in agreement with the secretary, but thought the interruption about the virgin going to the well with a pail to be unjustified, a bent, hoary, old woodcutter was showing his boot to one of his colleagues. The upper had been cut deep by an axe. "If I'd been barefoot there'd have been nothing left but a stump. It'll heal up. That boot's finished. That won't heal."

Just then his name was called. He pushed his way through and scrambled on to the stacked boards. "We old members of the party have been organized for thirty years. There's no need to explain the policy to us. We know all about it already. It's quite right. Everything evolves. And of course trade has got to be built up again. Our wages are not even enough to buy food. And nobody can afford a pair of boots. But I ask you this: I should like to send my two boys to the secondary school so that they'll learn something, and have a better time of it than their father. But I ask you: who's going to pay for it? What are you to do?— As soon as the lads come out of school and have had their plate of soup they have to be off to work. So how can they learn? I can reckon it out to the last pfennig. Without counting anything for clothes and boots, my wages——”

“I must ask the speaker to keep to the point.” The chairman sat down again. The discreet tinkle of the bell still hung in the air.

The stiff-jointed old woodcutter turned and looked helplessly at the chairman: “Well, that's what I had to say about the subject and about the policy.” He stood still for a moment, added suddenly: “That's the great point.” And scrambled down.

A gentleman with knock-knees and yellow gaiters was standing outside the fence. He had a large notebook in his hand and was looking with dreamy eyes at the distant mountains, as though he were sketching or writing verse.

A stranger, a well-known labour leader from the capital, an agitator whose name they had often seen in the papers and who had been sent here by his party, climbed on to the pile of planks.

In his first few sentences he dealt with the day's struggle and went on to the great aim for which the workers had been fighting for generations. The chairman then asked the agitator to keep to the point, and when the workmen raised violent objections, as though this were what they wanted to hear, he swung his bell vigorously.

The agitator, a man of not more than thirty, stood there on the piled planks with the bearing of a man of sixty, and, letting his thick lower lip droop down, waited, apparently unseeing, until the hubbub had died down. The knees of his trousers were baggy, his thin shoulder-blades protruded visibly.

Blue-black clouds hung over the end of the valley. The agitator spoke more quickly and without pauses, stepped forward to the edge of his crude platform and drove home his words with gestures. The workmen, sitting and standing, watched him, motionless.

The first dry lightning-flash spanned the whole valley, as though one peak were sending a signal to its fellow.

Outside the fence the gaitered gentleman was still standing on the same spot in the same dreamy posture.

In the storm-zone diagonal spears of rain were falling; the café-terrace was still in sunshine. “I'm Conservative. Very Conservative. That's the only party that will make Germany great again.”

“Well, you see, I'm a Democrat,” said, with a smile, the banker, reposing deep within himself. "The most capable men, those who have learned something, ought to be the leaders of the nation."

The traveller listened to the applause that ascended from the yard: "Well, have it your own way."

Large, separate raindrops spattered on the chairman's table and evaporated.

His arms level with his chest, the banker trotted down the zigzag path to the mill-yard.

"They don't trouble about their meeting now," panted the hardware traveller. Many of the audience were running with turned-up coat collars through the gate.

The whole sky was blue-black. Fiery serpents of lightning sprang at each other, struck and became wildly entangled; every second the accompanying thunder-claps burst forth.

At last the gaitered gentleman retired from the fence, soaked to the skin, and hastened away with long strides through the downpouring, vertical masses of water.

The banker had reached his hotel. The mill-yard was deserted.

A few minutes later, tatters of cloud, like huge frightened birds, were sailing high across the valley to vanish beyond the snowy peaks, where in places the sun was already shining. The sparrows began to chirp noisily. Everything sparkled with moisture.

The hotel coach, laden with yellow trunks, the owners of which were still sitting at dinner, passed a slowly revolving turn-table, on which stood the last coach, shining in its fresh coat of paint.

II

The drunken shunter reeled so unsteadily between the buffers that his arm, equally inebriated, was almost crushed as the last coach moved into place.

His voice, bawling a song, rose through the clang of the buffers. His hand went out by habit towards the couplings. Then he shouted to the engine-driver a word that came back, swollen to a cry of rage, from the mountain-cliffs; he reeled towards the station bar.

"That looks a bit like Socialism, too," said an army officer, as he got into the last coach.

"By the way, I did not know your father had two sons." The speaker, a public prosecutor, bowed and stepped aside to allow the agitator to precede him into the last coach. "I'm very glad to have met you. What a coincidence!"

The agitator let his heavy lower lip droop down. 'During the revolution he got working men condemned to more than three hundred years' penal servitude; no doubt he knows all about the leaders; he must have my photograph in his files. . . . He knows I know all that. So why is he fabricating another son for my father? Is he trying to be funny? Good, let's have a little joke together. We've a long journey before us!

By his tone, almost imperceptibly ironic, the public prosecutor had conveyed that he knew no second son existed.

"And how do you explain the shocking fact that your brother, who no doubt has enjoyed the same careful, conventional education as you have had yourself, could possibly have strayed into such paths?" he asked, and smiled.

With the same calm he had revealed on the pile of planks, while waiting for the hubbub to die down, the agitator allowed a few seconds to pass before he answered, with the same smile: "Let us assume that two sons of a highly-respected man have had the same mother and the same nurse, have been brought up with the same strictness by the same teachers and have been through the same experiences, so to speak, from the cradle upwards."

"Well?" asked the public prosecutor, in an interested voice, as the agitator paused. Both were leaning back on their seats.

"Paul adapts himself to life while still a child, and receives as a reward the privileges and enjoyments of his class; he grows up like his father, and becomes, like him, a highly-respected man; Eugen, on the other hand, rebels almost from infancy, refuses to give up his individuality, gets right out of the rut, and finally goes over to the working class. That is how my brother explains the reaction of us two to our environment. You see I get the worst of it, though he is the one who has gone off the rails."

"Off the rails! If that were all—if he were just a mettlesome young fellow who did nothing but play around and run into debt—well, that happens in the best families. But to forget his social obligations, to forget what a member of our class owes to his education and position in life, to join elements that are driving the nation headlong to perdition, that, really, that is incredible in a man of good family. You must pardon my speaking so frankly about your brother, doctor. Excuse me, you did take your degree, didn't you?"

"I am a doctor of economics."

"Your brother, too, unless I'm mistaken?"

"My brother is also a doctor of economics. We are twins."

"I was discussing this painful case only recently with your father, and he——"

"——agreed with you completely. I thought so. But my brother—we still meet occasionally—believes that the nation has already descended to the state you mentioned, owing to the war, and that there will always be wars so long as the means of production are not transferred to the nation."

"But your brother is not one of those who believe that this transfer can be made peaceably, when the time and economic conditions and capitalism and the working classes are ripe for it, and the international situation and a few dozen other things just happen to be favourable for the change, is he?" asked the public prosecutor, smiling and turning to the knock-kneed gentleman in gaiters, who was standing half in the corridor and half in the compartment, his ear turned towards the speaker. He signalled to him with an imperceptible shake of his head to go away, then he went to the window to see how long it would be before the train started.

"I've seen that six-foot ear somewhere before. . . . Has my special detective been promoted agent provocateur and this amateur appointed to watch over me?" reflected the agitator, and gave the gaitered gentleman that cheery smile which acts like the threat of a revolver on all spies who have not yet achieved complete cold-bloodedness.

The spy smiled cheerfully back.

"Not an amateur after all!"

"We love each other so dearly," said the banker to his young wife, who was in the final stages of pregnancy, "that nothing on earth could seriously threaten to come between us. The world is redeemed in us and in our love." He supported her with the utmost gentleness towards the last coach. "What bliss to work for you, to live and die for you!"

In addition to this couple the following passengers were seated in the same compartment of the last coach: a priest, the army officer, a university professor, a newspaper editor and the hardware traveller, who kindly gave up his corner-seat to the banker's wife. Might he offer her his travelling-cushion?

She thanked him with a smile, and drew a cushion out of her own case. Then her eyes went back at once to her husband, and seemed at the same time to be looking into her own body.

"I should have been delighted," added the traveller, and seemed to screw himself up in order to leave more room for the pregnant woman. His voice was so harsh that the agitator, who was alone with the public prosecutor in the next compartment, thought he was listening to the croakings of a flight of ravens.

The professor was leaning back in the corner next to the door, a Scotch plaid over his knees. He watched through his bright glasses, from under his plaid cap, the little interchange of courtesies which had just taken place, and smiled benevolently. All were silent now, but it seemed that he was quite exceptionally silent and would remain so during the whole journey.

The commercial traveller's solicitude for the banker's wife had created a pleasant, communal feeling in the compartment. Even the officer, while maintaining a proper reserve, had a friendly expression around his lips—though of course he had not yet been introduced. And the sad but kindly look on the face of the priest proclaimed unreservedly that nothing but mutual kindness and love could soften the inevitable hardships of life.

The banker, who had resolved to be an affectionate father, did all he could for his young wife, who expected to bear her child in the course of the following week. And she withdrew her glance from his face only to bury it in herself.

"Presumably I shall again lead for the prosecution in the sensational political trials which are still pending. Just imagine what my situation would be if the workers, instigated and led on by your brother, should again indulge in strikes or demonstrations, should plunder or come into conflict with the police or military. I should be compelled to demand, for the son of your highly-respected father, an exemplary sentence, possibly fifteen years——"

"——Or even death?"

"——Certainly, under certain conditions and if malicious intent were proven, even death."

'For me! Very nice.'

"What a situation for me to be in! You can see that?"

"I see. You deserve the deepest sympathy."

"And still more your father."

"And what about my brother?"

"He too, if you like! But revolution is warfare——"

"That is precisely what my brother says."

"——and if a man exposes himself to danger he must reckon with the possibility of death. . . . From what I know of your brother he would refuse the services of a psychiatrist; he would be more likely to use the court as a platform from which to make some violent speech, to take the last opportunity of serving the cause he has at heart."

"With the possibility of the death sentence before his eyes! . . . And yet under certain conditions and with the proof of malicious intent, sentence of death might be passed on—me!"

"Yes! For leaders of your sort are exceptionally dangerous."

"And must be removed, I suppose?"

"That is so."

III

The train began to move. A goods train, loaded with logs, had left this station, the highest in the whole country, a short time before. Bark was still lying between the rails at the siding. Long, thin wisps of smoke still clung to the damp cliffs.

An ex-student was standing alone in the corridor. His ambition was to become a public prosecutor. A vigorous, black moustache, curled up at the ends, on a pale face covered with duelling scars. He looked up at the wet, perpendicular walls of rock and down far below, where the little hamlets lay blue on green silk, as though strewn from a box of toys.

The ex-student thrust out his lower lip and let it slip back approximately each time a telegraph-pole flew by. He suffered from boredom. And from an affection of the bladder. That was why he was standing in the corridor.

A workman had strayed into the corridor of the second-class coach and was leaning against the next window, eating a green apple. He was one of the hundred who had been dismissed from the saw-mill and was going to the city in the hope of finding work.

"Rich crops."

"But coal! Coal is what we need," repeated the hardware traveller, obstinately.

And the clergyman: "If it is God's will, we shall soon have coal again, too."

'God' produced no response from the traveller; he said: "Without coal, no production. Without production, no export. Without export, no payment of debts and no boom. That's clear. Coal is everything."

The banker's wife had closed her eyes. She was living her two lives to herself.

The banker said, "Yes, coal! And big, long-term credits. And work, of course, only work——"

"——can save us. That's clear. Work's everything."

"The return to the old German discipline," said the university professor, to everyone's surprise.

The officer's body automatically expressed approval by moving from the hips upward, as though driven by electricity.

"Then we should soon be back where we were before the war. We could—begin all over again. We'd show the world what we're made of. We should be able to work again. And we can work. Better than anyone else."

"We've proved that."

"We've proved it."

The priest said flatly: "This nation cannot be broken."

'It'll be hard to find a job; there are too many unemployed,' thought the discharged mill-hand. 'What are they talking about in there?'

"If you would like to know why I was entrusted with the prosecution in those sensational political trials—if you are interested——"

"I am very deeply interested."

"Then I will explain it to you with pleasure," cried the public prosecutor. He shouted the words aloud. And the ardour of a youth of seventeen revived in his eyes.

"You see, some boys are interested in nothing but football. Life to them is just a football-field. Others long for the open road, for a life of freedom on the high seas, and cannot understand the ambition of a boy who, God knows why, is determined to be the best lithographer in his native town and marry his neighbour's daughter Lenchen. But the latter suddenly becomes a ship's boy on a boat bound for India, while the one who dreamed of freedom is cooped up as a clerk in the municipal offices."

The detective appeared in the doorway and examined the luggage rack with great interest. The public prosecutor laughed frankly and waved him away.

"The boy on the ground floor spends his youth building model steam-engines; the one on the floor above collects snakes; some people will collect anything, and others make it a principle to collect nothing but what they find in the streets. . . . My youthful passion was the study of the political trials and revolutionary movements of all times and peoples. To-day I am a public prosecutor. My life is entirely consistent."

The train was late. It stopped. Only for a half minute. And, as it moved slowly forward again, a breathless peasant, scythe in hand, scrambled on to the running-board and entered the last coach.

"I had all the books on the subject—every one of them! And I studied them, read them and read them again and again, full of revolt against the savage injustice of the rulers, full of passion and determination to become an avenger of the poor, a revolutionary such as the world had never seen before."

"That sounds as though you were describing my own youth rather than your own."

"But one day I realized that all I had been doing was, so to speak, to collect revolutions and attempts to save humanity."

"And yet you think your life is consistent?"

The public prosecutor was silent for a second. And during that long second, there appeared on his face the phantom of his submerged self; it stood on the frontier of life and could not step over it.

Then he drew back his lips, and his face resembled a plaster mask, hanging on the wall, which suddenly begins to smile. "Well, my case was like that of the lover of freedom, who longs for the high seas, and is placed by Fate in the municipal offices. . . . What of it? There are so many who want to save the world while they are young. There may even be one in the next compartment among those representatives of our national life—the church, science, finance, the army, the press, education. And who knows? Perhaps at one time in his life even that detective—Life is not easy."

"But, my dear, you have no idea of the cost of such a school. 'An open-air school with boarding facilities for gifted children of the working classes'—I know, it sounds very nice," whispered the banker. "There are buildings to be put up and furnished! Salaries for long-haired teachers and young women in sandals! And think of how much your gifted children of the working classes will eat, when they spend long days in the clear, fresh air!"

The banker was irritated by the look which was his wife's first response. He knew that look: it said more plainly than words that a clear conscience is worth more than money.

"And what are your gifted working-class children to learn in this open-air school? To grow vegetable-marrows? To make chests of drawers?"

"Everything, everything. . . . A complete development of the faculties of mind and body. According to their ability. . . . Of course we should grow all we needed."

"Of course!"

"Vegetables and such things."

"Oh, yes, vegetables! . . . You would grow nothing, believe me." And suddenly, in a low, caressing voice: "All right—if it's a boy."

A train, packed with incoming visitors, crawled up the steep mountain-line so slowly that a dog would have had no difficulty in keeping up with it. It passed the other train, which was boring its way with screeching brakes and reversed power towards the valley, passed it so slowly that the agitator could see the passengers buttering their rolls in the dining-car and raising white coffee-cups to their lips; he saw the waiter spread out his hands and shrug his shoulders regretfully because a diner had asked for something he could not supply.

"Yes, Socialism is my passion. Or anything connected with revolution! And that's as true to-day as when I was a young man!"

"Why are you displaying your cynicism to me of all people?" asked the agitator, in an indifferent voice.

The public prosecutor shook his head as though in surprise. "You are busy all day long with Socialism, devotion, loyalty and similar virtuous ideas, and you evidently cannot imagine what a relief it is for one of us to be able to tell the truth occasionally."

"At all events you differ in one pleasing respect from other members of your class, for you know that your views are a swindle."

"You are not very polite. And you seem to be a cynic too. At least I've not noticed so far that you showed any moral indignation at my insincerity; I have however noticed a sturdy cynicism in many of your remarks."

"Cynicism is in the thing itself and not in the words that designate it."

"Says Marx in his excellent work Das Elend der Philosophie, page 17," said the prosecutor fluently, and, since the agitator did not conceal his surprise:

"Few of your comrades have studied the life work of that great man as passionately as I—of course, in my youth."

The public prosecutor had lost something of his reserve. His calm had left him. His brow was flushed. It had an unhealthy look. The public prosecutor was in the grip of an idea. Like a boy sorting his collection of snakes.

"Did you notice the famous viaduct as you came up?" began the banker, in the next compartment.

"Marvellous piece of work," said the commercial traveller, promptly. "And the view! Magnificent!"

"Yes, it reminded me of those religious paintings by the old masters."

And as the priest, favourably affected, threw a friendly, questioning look at the banker:

"In about an hour we shall cross the viaduct. You ought really to take a good look at it. . . . Just imagine a mountain valley bounded by the steep cliffs of sublime, snow-covered alpine giants; on all sides romantic, jagged mountain-chains extend to remote distances, and in the middle of this mighty, and, I must admit, rather grim valley, a lovely green hill in the shape of a pointed cone, quite idyllic, like the background of some old, religious painting."

"There's really no need," said the public prosecutor, with a smile, to the detective, who had been standing within hearing, his shorthand-notebook in his hand. A sudden backward jerk of the train had brought him into view.

"That's it. You have described it very well," said the editor. He took a bottle of wine and a corkscrew from his suit case, and looked inquiringly at the detective, who had now thrust his ear into this compartment.

"He was only sent here for my personal safety. But he can't help it. I never met a more conscientious man in my life." The public prosecutor took several pages of notes from his attaché case. "Would you like to read the verbatim report of the speech you made to-day at the saw-mill? I have put brackets round the passages he made up. 'The capitalists must be swept away with fire and sword, poison and the knife. . . . To the lamp-posts with every one of them!' I'm sure you didn't say that."

"Perhaps I did. Who knows?"

"This conical hill has been cleverly exploited by engineers as a base for the iron supports of the viaduct. The rails run through the air at a dizzy height, crossing the gulf to the top of the cone. You will see: we shall travel round a very small circle—actually a spiral—encircling the little green summit of the cone. And, as we are sitting in the last coach and the train happens to be a very long one, we shall see the engine of our own train coming towards us. The engine of our own train! Extraordinary, isn't it?"

The editor's tone suggested that he was quoting from something he had previously written: "American engineers came over on purpose to study this masterpiece of German railway construction." And he inserted the corkscrew into the cork.

"But why?" asked the banker, as his wife took off her heavy diamond rings, two from each hand.

"You take them." She showed the anticipatory maternal smile he already knew.

The banker had always accepted such actions without contradiction, when they seemed in some unaccountable way to be connected with the coming child.

Amidst the silence of his fellow-travellers, he carefully placed the rings in a little pigskin jewel-case, in which several valuable pendants, a diamond necklace and a long coiled chain of big pearls already lay on the white silk. As he did so, he went on:

"When we cross the viaduct we shall be sixteen hundred feet above the bottom of the valley. We travel, so to speak, through the air. The sides of this valley are so precipitous, so precipitous, that a chamois perhaps might manage to climb down them, but certainly not a human being. You can see everything quite clearly, for the circle, that is to say the spiral, is so small that the train, to avoid jumping the rails and hurtling down into the valley——"

"Sixteen hundred feet—that's quite enough for me!"

"——has to move exceptionally slowly."

At last the priest began to look a little perturbed. All fell silent. All saw the viaduct soaring through the air across the chasm; all watched the train move very, very slowly round the narrow spiral of rails that encircled the top of the conical hill.

The generous dinner they had just eaten and the regular rhythm of the train made the passengers feel sleepy.

The professor, already dozing, heard the train singing ceaselessly and monotonously: 'When the dog . . . with the bone . . . jumped o—ver the hedge . . . when the dog . . . with the bone . . . jumped o—ver the hedge.'

'That caper sauce was delicious at lunch to-day,' thought the banker. 'Yes, man's striving after perfection expresses itself in many forms.'

' . . . with the bone . . . jumped o—ver the hedge.'

And, since his fellow-passengers were all more or less asleep, the editor considered all to himself the accuracy of a statement he had recently made to the effect that the Press in the twentieth century was no trifle.

"Only work can save us and coal," murmured the priest, half asleep.

' . . . jumped o—ver the hedge.'

"This nation . . . cannot be broken."

'When the dog. . . '

Meanwhile the discharged mill-hand was mending the wide corridor-window. It was half open, and—so the guard had told him—had not opened properly since the coach was repainted.

IV

A man was leaning against the back end of the coach. He had been busy throughout the journey: first he had been writing figures in a notebook; then he had counted a number of bank-notes of high value, and a very large number of bank-notes of low value, and finally had compared the total with the sum of the figures in his notebook.

Suddenly his eyes opened wide. He wrenched open the door of the coach, jumped out, and rolled down the high embankment. He got up and stood staring after the last coach, which had become disconnected from the rest of the train and was moving at a moderate speed through the rugged landscape.

At this point the line was almost level; if anything it rose, so that the distance between the uncoupled last coach and the train grew rapidly greater.

The train moved on. And vanished behind the spur of a hill.

When the train had passed the pointsman's hut and was slowly boring its way with screaming brakes into the wide main valley, the pointsman switched over the points for the next timber-train.

From this spot, the timber-trains travelled by a rack and pinion through a branch valley, narrow and fissured, that led to the chief saw-mill at the foot of the mountains.

The pointsman whistled to his dog and walked towards his hut. He examined the condition of ten meagre heads of red cabbage, which grew in a patch of garden surrounded by a toy-like fence no higher than a man's knee. He leapt up and round.

He was just in time to see a second-class coach, its fresh paintwork glinting in the sun, pass slowly over the points and, propelled by its own weight, shoot down the steep decline of the branch-valley at a rapidly increasing speed.

He uttered a cry of horror. The dog barked. The coach had vanished.

The discharged mill-hand had been looking out of the rear window of the coach, vainly trying to catch sight of the man who had jumped out. At that moment he remembered that once as a boy he had been very anxious to pull the communication cord, which his father had strictly forbidden him to do. His feet were still by the door though his hands had already reached the window, as he threw himself with a wild vehemence across the compartment. It was as though, after thirty years, his father had at last given him permission to pull the communication cord. The passengers started out of their slumber.

His right hand raised to the cord, his left grasping the edge of the open window, he drew his body after him through the atmosphere of startled annoyance. As he did so, his head popped through the window and he saw that the coach was uncoupled.

The student appeared in the doorway. "A gentleman out here has just jumped out of the train."

Without a second's hesitation, the hardware traveller said: "If he likes to do that, it's his affair! Besides, he was a competitor of mine." His smugness caused some amusement among his fellow-passengers. It was the considered opinion of the banker, and he always carefully practised it, that nothing was better for an expectant mother than a cheerful frame of mind; he therefore smiled affectionately at his wife, encouraging her to join in the general amusement, and she produced a short, faint smile which broke almost before it had formed, and for a while the fragments remained in the neighbourhood of her lips.

The professor, reclining with crossed arms deep in his corner, showed that he could smile, even if the joke were a little banal. . . .

The officer was a uniformed dummy with eyes, a mouth and a forehead, correct poise with a stiff smile adhering to it.

"We're making up for lost time. Travelling like the devil after a pretty nun, what?"

The priest drew up his travelling-rug, leaned back more comfortably in his seat, and said with mild sympathy: "May God protect him! Why did this gentleman jump out?"

The face of the workman was quite colourless. He turned round very slowly. Shock had robbed him of speech.

"That queer fellow spent the whole time counting money," said the student, suspiciously. "You never know what would make a man like that jump out."

With a rapid glance, the banker assured himself that the valuable jewel-case was still on the folding-table.

The workman's eyes stared like glass. His little, dusty moustache was trembling. His white lips said: "We're uncoupled."

This flash of truth did not strike home at once. The hardware traveller, still indignant and yet already moved, as though death had touched him from a distance, said harshly: "What do you mean—uncoupled?"

The coach sped with violent jerks down the steep, cogged line.

"There's—there's—there's nothing we can do. There's—there's nothing we can do. It's all up."

He turned sideways and went through the door as slowly as though he had never in his life had so much time. "What? What can we do?"

The professor turned his head: "Has anything happened?"

Seen from a distant point outside the train: the mountain landscape in its vast dimensions—and on that line of rails with its toothed rack that dropped so steeply towards the valley, a dark, tiny, tiny speck that did not move, did not rush, but hurtled between the mountains into the depths.

"There's no way of stopping this coach," said the workman, still speaking into the compartment. "There's no way in the world." And, with lips white and a heart that scarcely beat, he stepped into the corridor. "We're all dead men."

"What's happened then? Has something happened? Something happened?" The professor had got up from his place.

The priest, still incredulous: "They say we are uncoupled."

The banker, at this moment still far from admitting the deadly fact even to himself, yet white in the face, began indignantly: "The authorities ought to——"

The officer and the hardware traveller had both looked out simultaneously: their faces reappeared. Colourless. White.

The truth struck home. All rose. Speechless. Without a word, the traveller dashed into the corridor, blindly seeking salvation.

A curve: the flying coach sprang a yard above the rails—those standing were mowed, falling across each other, on to the seats—and crashed back, while a scream of fear arose from many throats, on to the rails.

If the next curve were but a few degrees sharper, the coach would shoot off the track—fly straight through the air and explode like a shell.

Six pairs of glazed eyes.

Only the woman with child looked forward with soft, impressionable eyes to this frightful catastrophe, sent more and more intent and gentle looks pressing upon the first, till the disaster burnt itself into her eyes, and the child, if ever it were born, would come into the world with that horrid vision upon its skin.

The professor also had completely changed. He was no longer a professor. Glasses, cap, plaid travelling-rug lay on the floor. His face had grown angular and smaller. He had not yet accepted the inevitability of death.

None of them had accepted it yet. The banker asked: "You're not afraid, are you, dear? There's nothing to be afraid of?"

Has any man, however desperate his situation, ever given up his belief in life before the last second?

Voices shouting counsel, which the counsellors did not believe. The coach must be stopped. The passengers must jump out.

They could not even look out. The speed numbed their brains.

A short, sharp bang and black lightning—the sky again in a second: the flying coach had passed through a tunnel.

The officer, a brave man, who had resolutely risked his life in the war, always with the hope of saving it, had not yet lost his nerve. He was searching for some possible means of escape—searching with every muscle tense, the veins swollen on his forehead, for a possibility that did not exist. This was no enemy to be overcome by strength, courage and determination.

The woman dropped her face into her hands. Slowly a cry arose from deep in her womb, swelled upward—no one noticed it—welled out through her fingers, became sharp and guttural and broke in a scream: she had given up her own life and her child's for lost.

She withdrew her hands from her face, which was still mobile. Moaning, she lamented her own full life and the still un-lived one.

This did not attract for a moment the attention of the banker and the rest. For in just that moment death might seize any man whose mind relaxed or whose muscles were unready to jump. After all, there must be some possibility of salvation. Death was itself an impossibility.

An axle had run hot and was whistling shrilly. The intervals between its whistlings grew shorter and shorter till it whistled continuously; a noise that permeated and drowned all other noises, like a human cry driven to its topmost pitch, went with them as they rushed into the valley.

Dull thudding of rails; the coach leaped and crashed down again.

The professor repeatedly raised both hands to his temples; he felt the horror lie cold in his hair; in terror of death he exorcised his terror with a lie: he entered his flat in the best part of the town, went into his cheerful study, sat down at his desk: the green lamp-shade shone up.

His impotent will to live caused the banker to get out of the train, which had just steamed punctually into the valley station.

At intervals the old priest was no longer alive; his face was dead. But, in between, the will to live wrenched him back to his sense of horror.

At the door stood the student, staring inquiringly with dull eyes at those older than himself, who ought to know better than he by what means he could be saved. He got no answer.

The saliva was dripping from the editor's mouth.

The hardware traveller threw himself through the woman's ebbing cry towards the window, then immediately back into the corridor, and thence into the next compartment. From one compartment to another. From end to end of the coach. Up and down. There was no way out.

Into the compartment where the public prosecutor, the agitator and the detective stood clinging to each other and the luggage rack, tossed from side to side. The woman's face had turned green. Her labour had begun.

A hand still lay on her shoulder; it seemed to be independent of the banker's arm, to lie independently on her shoulder; for the banker was staring at the valley-station, where the train was just running in, just running in, over and over again.

He would finance the forest school for workmen's children. That was a vow.

Each made his own vow. Each had already made it, and repeated it and enlarged it.

All his life the mill-hand had worked in order to eat and eaten in order to work.

His mother is bleaching washing on the lawn for the gentlefolk. The cook from the big house gives the washerwoman's little boy, as he sits there beside the laundry, a hunk of fresh, white bread, thickly spread with butter. Again and again, this most beautiful of all his childhood's memories comes back. White laundry, white bread, shining butter, shining sun—again and again. And flits away. More quickly than the coach rushes valley-ward.

Did something flash past? Was that a station? A halt? An Alpine hut?

Green pastures, rocks. White waterfall. Mountain torrent. The thunder boomed louder over a little iron bridge. Forest. Another bridge. Green pastures. Yellow: a group of grazing cows.

Any tune can be set to the speed of a train; this projectile flew so fast that there were no joints between rails that could supply the beats.

The landscape roared by.

Now there was no one left in the compartments. All were in the corridor. They ran shouting up and down, seeking deliverance. Only the pregnant woman half sat, half lay, upon a seat, forsaken, moaning, throbbing with pain.

The workman was still listening—listening to the screaming, smoking whistle of the axle—still thinking. He thought the coach would catch fire at any minute. Burn to ashes!

Then death put its hand into the frenzied coach and strangled hope, which was as large as life and yet as minute as a speck of dust: with his mind's eye the banker saw the viaduct.

His lips framed the words: "The viaduct!" Yelled, "viaduct, the viaduct!" He fell on his hands and knees. Scrambled on all fours, uttering hoarse, animal sounds.

In a blue flash that struck hope dead, all saw the viaduct spanning the empty air, sixteen hundred feet above the valley, the narrow, deadly ring from which the frenzied coach must leap! Must!

"The viaduct. Viaduct!"

"Viaduct?"

Those were the last sounds of human speech, already drowned by cries of deadly terror, for which there are no words in any language.

The last vestiges of human masks, masks which in the course of life had grown into faces again, fell away, vanished: the primal face appeared.

All pressed back, retreating from the viaduct, stumbling over each other, wildly fighting each other, screaming in deadly terror, against the back of the coach—to be twenty-five feet farther away from the death leap.

Even the officer. Courage had ceased to exist, even for him, in face of inevitable and certain death. His temples turned cold and seemed to climb up over his head.

The detective's shorthand-notebook and a gold watch with a broken chain lay side by side in the corridor. The professor's plaid cap was propped against the wall by the window.

Faith, God, Jesus and the Virgin Mary, whose omnipotence the priest had been proclaiming for forty years, existed no longer: the Church collapsed without a sound.

"Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us poor sinners, now and in the hour of our death. Amen," muttered the pious peasant on his knees.

The woman had fallen from the seat and was writhing with upraised legs on the floor. Her piercing cries rose through the tumult. She had no husband now.

The workman was standing with knees half-bent, ready to jump, his hands clasping the edge of the window he had mended; several times he had noticed that, close beside him, life was wrestling for a life.

And, when he was spun round and thrown half into the compartment, he did what lay to hand with the same simple directness he had shown in mending the window: he knelt down and set to work: "Press! Press, I tell you! Keep on pressing!" And with his left hand braced against her chest he used his right to bring forth the child.

Past the agitator, who was half-lying in the doorway, pressing both fists into his eyes, rigid with horror at this meaningless death, the public prosecutor staggered, hurled violently to and fro between window and door, and joined the huddled throng.

The professor lay on his belly, his mouth on the floor, screaming convulsively.

A long swaying thread of saliva dripped on to him from the corner of the editor's mouth, which was drawn far back into his cheeks; his glassy eyes stared forward like all the rest, to the shattering end.

An amusement-contractor, whose roundabouts were at that moment revolving in a remote mountain-village, suddenly became insane. He ran out of the front compartment and down the corridor, wrenched open the door at the farther end and sprang out. Flew out.

The huddled group at the back of the coach saw the arm of the amusement-contractor torn from the body at the shoulder-joint, saw the body fly past. It was half a second before the hand loosed its grip on the door handle; then the arm was flung high in the air towards a freshly-ploughed field, dug itself in, and stood with the clenched fingers pointing towards the sky.

The door remained open, forged to the outside of the coach by the air-pressure.

Green, dark, sunny, dark, sky-blue.

A sparrow, not reckoning with this monstrous speed as it flew across the track, darted in through the open doorway, thudded against the panelling and fell dead on the floor.

The huddled group recoiled from the suction of that dangerous open door, fought with fists and feet, hissing between clenched teeth, for the safest place, scrambled over each other on hands and knees.

They did not resume the postures of human beings.

The mother on the seat, bare and bleeding, with the quiet baby in her hands moving its lips and bloody finger-tips, was borne with frantic speed through the landscape. The workman knelt in the blood, the jewel-case at his side and around him scattered diamond rings and the pearl necklace. The woman was not ashamed. We feel no shame when face to face with life and death.

A black pencil line became visible in the sunny distance ahead; in a few seconds it had grown into a horizontal walking stick moving slowly forward; then the agitator saw that it was a train: the goods train, laden with logs, which had left the terminus in the mountains before the passenger train.

Some enigmatic scruple had prevented the public prosecutor from taking part in the fight for the safest place; he looked back into his past, as though he had suddenly encountered a firm point within himself which arrested his fall into the chasm of fear. His face was transfigured as he pressed to his breast the youth he saw before him in flesh and blood, and held him tightly clasped, till the youth had finally entered into the man of thirty-four, to be carried within him as a talisman for the rest of his life.

In the mother's eyes as she looked at the workman was a happiness that could not be darkened even by the certain approach of death.

Suddenly she was holding a strange musical instrument in her hands. She was in darkness. Soft, wonderful music filled the air, never heard before: Death, a little man in a long coat, stepped quickly and noiselessly into the middle of the room. 'Death?' Then, as though in a theatre, the curtain fell. The woman had lost consciousness.

The agitator's brain had begun to work again: "If only that train would move faster, if only it would fly! . . . Unless the driver puts on full-steam we shall be shattered to pieces." And he shouted through the open window of the door at the front of the coach.

Suddenly every sound stopped. The whistling of the hot axle died out. The coach rose, sped through the air, noiseless. A silence of death. In which terrified screams burst out. Still flying. Human eyes, already lifeless, stared at the bloody mush of wood, limbs, bones, iron, flesh.

Once more the coach crashed back on to the rails.

"Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us poor sinners, now and in the hour of our death. Amen."

And the agitator shouted again through the open window of the door at the front. His shouts struck against the wall of air and recoiled into the coach.

The engine-driver heard nothing. All the brakes of the timber-train were grating. Pipe in mouth, his bare forearms resting comfortably on the iron door, he looked out over the passing landscape.

The rails flashed like streaks of lightning back under the coach. On each side, rocks, telegraph poles, trees, huts, reeled, merged and sped thundering past. Even the farthest peaks were in motion. The mountains turned slowly but visibly around the tiny projectile.

The engine-driver straightened his back and caught sight of the coach shooting towards him. Still nearly a mile away. No time for thought: the branch line had but a single track. Brakes off. Full steam.

In the next few seconds the space between the train and the projectile rapidly diminished; but the track was steep and the timber-train many times heavier than the coach.

Never had a train swooped so madly towards the valley.

After an immeasurable half-minute the two projectiles were travelling at the same speed, a few coach-lengths away from each other.

The brakes stole imperceptibly towards the wheels of the flying train, inaudibly, cautiously, like the hand of a pickpocket. Presently a hissing sound arose; gradually it grew louder and turned into a rising scream that drowned the noise of the train, deafened the ears, and filled the whole valley: the train stopped.

v

Silence. Through which came the hammering of a woodpecker. The newborn child had ceased to cry; in the midst of a cry it had fallen asleep. It lay, with both little legs drawn up, between the cushioned back of the seat and its unconscious mother.

So gently had buffer met buffer, despite the wild speed, that the men who crouched on hands and knees at the rear of the coach were still expecting a bloody fate though already they were saved.

Their numbed senses failed to react to silence and life; they still reproduced the catastrophic crashes and whistlings; like the mountains, which hum throughout eternity with the thousandfold echoes they hold imprisoned within themselves.

Twelve yards away a cow lay on the grass watching and chewing the cud. The whisper of grasses, the chatter and roar of distant brooks and falls, the buzz of myriads of gnats, caught up by the vibrating membranes of rocky cliffs and chasms, and thrown back across the quivering air of the valley, produced the great voice, the great audible silence of the mountains, in which the melodious twitter of a bird was the only living and immediate note.

That cow was not flashing past; it was lying still. This was no dream. The cow was reality, life. The bird, too, was twittering again.

Escaped from death, numb and terrified, they returned to life; feeling came back to their limbs. It was both painful and pleasant. Their heavy limbs refused to obey them.

Their helpless bodies slumped down over the running-board. They sat or lay outstretched: a little dark heap in a field.

Saved, released from the excess of fear they had experienced, breathing again in an excess of life, which came storming in upon them suddenly, confusing in its mighty power and millionfold variety, they could not apprehend the fields, the sun, the sky, the train, the greenness, the cow; for to apprehend these things man has a whole life at his disposal.

The agitator, too, had let himself sink down into the grass. The public prosecutor was sitting alone in the compartment, unaccountably transfigured.

The short, stumpy engine-driver walked slowly along the dark train, which was laden from the tender to the last truck with peeled fir trunks, shining in the sun; he walked like a man momentarily indifferent to his surroundings, who has just exerted all his energies to finish a hard job of work. He looked down at the ground, and wiped his hot, perspiring face with a red handkerchief.

The breathless cry of the child broke out again and died back upon itself. The woman awoke from her swoon, her eyes full of inquiry. Her groping hand found the baby. She closed her eyes again.

The banker had turned his head and listened. Then with his mind's eye he saw his wife, and his head jerked round again. His shoulders were glowing. That was good. And down his spine he felt a beneficent tingling of warmth, as after a cold shower-bath.

Willingly he helped the exhausted priest, who could not rise from the grass without his aid, and felt as he did so a melting tenderness in his breast.

"The coupling's not damaged. . . . Probably he forgot to fasten the catch," said the engine-driver, standing bent forward between the buffers. He fastened the catch and called on the passengers to get in.

"Well, I've got nothing to say," remarked the hardware traveller. He was the first to find his tongue.

The officer held out the palm of his hand: "After you, sir."

Brains began to function again. Knees were still shaking. Each helped the other to get in. The student appeared to think to himself: 'They ought to know.' And followed the others.

The banker leaned down and put out his hand. "Up!" he cried, jokingly. His smiling lips were trembling.

The engine-driver wiped his neck with his handkerchief as he walked back to his engine. There he found the workman, squatting in the grass, his head in his right hand, looking at the dripping, oily wheels. The boiler appeared to be sweating.

"We're off now. Jump in! You can come up with me."

The workman looked up inquiringly, as though he did not know where he was.

The peasant was already trudging across country towards the mountain-side. Scythe on shoulder, he was making for a meadow that lay higher up in the main valley. He and ten others had to mow that meadow during the evening and the cool moonlit night that would follow. His sunken lips were muttering. His left hand was counting on the fingers of the right, reckoning how much money he had lost through the delay.

Then there were his hopes for the child. . . . Our child! . . . We have been so near to each other . . . so near! thought the banker. 'And now . . . now. . . . Just because that drunken scoundrel failed to fasten the catch!'

At last he entered the compartment where his wife was lying in blood-stained desolation, the blood-stained child in her arms. "Now it's all over," he said, in a comforting tone. "You were so frightened of it. And now it's all over. There's the baby."

She shut her eyes—her hand moved as it lay on the child—and opened them again. 'Has nothing happened? Has not something occurred, something decisive, which you must admit unless our whole life from this moment on is to be a single, unbroken lie?' asked the exhausted woman with her eyes.

He spread the travelling-rug carefully and solicitously across her knees, bent on tiptoe to pick up the jewellery, and closed the pigskin case.

Our life before must have been a single unbroken lie, she thought, or this could not have happened. 'Between then and now are fifteen minutes of truth. His truth—Each for himself!'

"We shall soon be there. Then I'll see you get a bath, a bed, midwife, doctor, everything you want."

It was as though a planet spoke to another, which did not hear its voice. And yet again there lay that broken smile about her mouth.

The engine let off steam and half the train vanished in white; it moved and all the buffers groaned; the backward jerk ran through the trucks, the coach and all the passengers, and life had begun again: rattling, groaning and lamenting like the belts, hammers and files of a great factory, the timber-train crept cautiously and surely down into the valley.

The passengers who had been saved stood in the corridor, talking excitedly. All spoke together; all agreed with each other. They had the joy and splendour of life in their eyes and caresses that were never performed.

The public prosecutor sat motionless in his compartment, his eyes fixed on the distant past.

The hardware-traveller appeared in the doorway, took one step and laid his hand inquiringly on the shoulder of the man with the transfigured face.

He came out again on tiptoe. "That gentleman in there is crying."

"Crying?"

"Yes, he's crying."

"A man's crying." The professor passed the word along.

They spoke more quietly. And suddenly all fell silent, looking out.

How good the landscape was! The lovely fields. The bare fields in the sunshine. And birds were sitting on the telegraph wires. Close together. They flew up and flew down again. They opened their beaks and twittered; but one could not hear them.

"How cheerfully we all started out! . . . Who could have expected it!"

All looked at the editor. "Yes, things happen so suddenly," said the professor. "You are sitting quietly in your study—and suddenly a tiny vein bursts in your brain . . . and it's all up: tongue and limbs paralysed; you can't tell a goose from a child."

"What a hell of a speed!"

And the priest said: "We are always in God's hand."

"And now we're going so slowly that if the human eye was built to see round corners we should still be able to see that cow!"

They smiled happily. They breathed and smiled.

"Quite a difference in the speed, what?" joked the hardware-traveller. And began to describe his feelings during that wild downward rush.

"But one can't see round corners. I don't suppose they will ever discover how to see round corners," said the student, half inquiringly. His mind had moved rather slowly. He bent down and took up his gold watch. He held it to his left ear. He held it to his right ear. It was still going.

The detective had already picked up his shorthand-notebook. He shook off the dust and smoothed out two leaves that were covered with writing.

The agitator looked on in surprise. "Have you got it all down?"

"You've got to keep things tidy," said the detective, and carefully inserted the mauve carbon-paper between the cover and the first page.

"He lost both his sons. Just before the end of the war. It killed his wife. Since then he's been boozing," explained the engine-driver, and offered the workman his blue enamelled can, in which there was still a little coffee.

"Now they'll give him the sack." The workman handed back the can. "Then it's all over with him."

"Yes, all over with him then." The engine-driver drank the rest of the coffee.

"I've called it The Death Ride . . . That's the title. That's it. To-morrow afternoon you will find the whole story in my paper. To-morrow morning, if possible."

"Shall you print the names?" asked the hardware-traveller, eagerly.

So they began to introduce themselves. The student clapped his heels together twice, for he also gave the name of the corps he belonged to.

"He didn't fasten the safety-catch. He's——"

"Of course the man must——"

"——an absolute danger to life."

"——be discharged immediately."

"Of course."

"And he seems to be Socialistic," put in the officer. They were all speaking together.

The banker went into the corridor, met their questioning eyes and announced, the banker announced: "A healthy boy."

Amidst their congratulations—the officer was just introducing himself—he explained: "And we had got everything ready so carefully: midwife, doctor, nursery, with bath and everything complete. All the woodwork white enamelled—not just painted—and the dear little garments! Only the cradle is dark—a wonderful, seventeenth-century piece. And now—this surprise! Any poor woman, lying in a damp cellar, perhaps not even knowing where she can get food for her baby, would have had an easier and more comfortable time."

The priest said with mild gravity that God's ways were inscrutable.

And the traveller—he hesitated before deciding to say it: "One passenger gone west, and a new one come in his place."

At first they did not understand, but when they remembered the amusement contractor the expression of all their faces indicated that flippancy was in bad taste.

"We must see about searching for his body."

"Yes, his body must be found at once."

"It can't be left lying out there."

"Certainly not! I'll see to that. I'm a traveller; I know this part of the world. There's a motor lorry at the saw-mill. The manager wouldn't give up his car for a job like that."

"A good thing your wife didn't see that frightful incident. In her condition! . . . Did you see the way his hand still clung to the door-handle after his body had been torn off? Horrible!"

"The body must be somewhere between—I say, tell me, what became of——?"

"Wherever it is, it must be found at once."

"——the viaduct?"

"The viaduct?—It's on the main line—it didn't occur to me till later—our coach, this damned old 'bus, shot down into another valley. . . . But still, I had quite enough of it, thank you, without a viaduct!"

The professor put up his forefinger level with his eyes. "From a scientific standpoint it is an interesting fact that, when the body had already gone, the muscular strength of the arm still functioned sufficiently to enable it to cling to the handle."

For some little time the public prosecutor had been standing in the doorway, looking at the company as though at his own past.

As the timber-train ran into the saw-mill, for the track ended in the yard—the banker was sitting with his wife, holding her gently in his arms—the priest said: "When a man has been beheaded, they say his eyes still open and shut: I wonder whether he can still see what is happening?" And he gave the professor a modest smile, intending to convey that the subject in which he was expressing an interest did not really concern him as a tyro in the sciences and a shepherd of souls.

"You are the man who saved us. I thank you. . . . I haven't enough change, so take this." The banker looked on sympathetically as the engine-driver, his oily fingers outspread, folded the cheque with great care, and put it in his time-book.

Ten minutes later the woman was lying in a clean bed. She had everything; even the doctor and the midwife were there. She had everything. Except her faith in her husband.

"And now let us all thank God who has saved us from a great peril. . . . I wonder whether there is a priest in this charming village?"

"I know this part of the world. He lives in that big house among the trees. But he's a competitor of yours unless I'm mistaken, and I don't think I am mistaken."

The priest smiled wryly. "There are cases—there are cases in human experience," he said, more to himself than to the others; he took his handbag and walked away, his umbrella under his arm.

The motor-lorry clattered off up the mountain-side, past the house where the mother lay, which much resembled a shooting-gallery. Targets were painted over and on the door, on the green window-shutters, on the gable, on the weather-vane, over and between all the windows, till there was not a member of the ex-soldiers' association who could walk past the house without being overcome with a desire to shoot.

The midwife and the doctor were busy in the kitchen. The banker stood in the bedroom, beside the white bed. "I should so much like to stay with you. I'm so happy. But I simply can't do it. At the general meeting of the shareholders to-day—I represent forty per cent. of the capital—we are to deal with the old amalgamation scheme. The new company we should form, you know, would be far and away the biggest financial force in this part of the country, and would have the necessary power and resources. We should be able to control prices. But you understand, dear?"

"Yes, I won't keep you." She spoke as though she had realized that those laws which also express themselves in the furious downward rush of an uncoupled railway-coach cannot be set aside by the wish of one of the occupants to stay quietly at his wife's bedside.

"You can begin to collect your long-haired teachers, who know everything and have everything, except the money required to realize their ideals."

She made no reply to that. She thought with sympathy, which found in her weakness a proof of its depth, of the workman, and looked at her child as though it were the workman's child.

"I wonder whether the manager of the mill would lend me his car. Then I could still catch the train—you know, the train from which our coach was uncoupled."

The others had already set off on foot, through the lesser valley, across into the main valley to the station.

'It's like driving down the High Street,' thought the banker, sitting in the car; past the officer, who waved his hand, as he walked alone under the apple-trees, bare of any contact with the landscape; past the student who bowed, already telling his adventure to the members of his corps: 'A sticky business in one carriage: some woman had a kid.'

Past the editor and the professor: this time three black hats floated through the blue evening air.

'And that man with the gaiters touched his hat too. . . . We might just as well (as though I'm a sort of royalty!) have motored over to the station together.'

Up a steep hill, and slowly past the agitator and the public prosecutor. The banker leaned back. 'Father! . . . The little beggar will grow up some day. . . . I wonder if she's got all she wants. Good girl! . . . I'll send some flowers at once. And the family doctor. Heaps of flowers! But without scent! And sterilized milk. . . . What became of that workman who happened to be there, and was able to help her when the child was born? . . . Lucky chance! Lucky, when all's said and done! I'll send him something extra. . . . If only one could make everybody happy,' yearned the banker, suddenly, and immersed himself in his notes for the shareholders' meeting.

"Have you ever thought about it?" asked the agitator of the public prosecutor, and stood still.

(The detective also stood still.)

"What shall you do now?"

The ebb of the noisy day, the first descending veils of evening, sharpened the ears of the valley. The chirp of grasshoppers, the voices of animals, had grown stronger. In the distance, a little dark group of labourers trudged heavily across a field towards the village, and with them the cattle, whose tinkling bells sounded from the distance, as they were driven home from the pasturage. Here and there a peasant was still at work, kneeling in the fields. And a ploughman, whose silhouette rose black from the darkening hill against the white, sleeping mountainside, sank slowly downhill again, dissolved in the dark and was absorbed into his valley.

The public prosecutor had made no answer. He walked in silence beside the agitator, bound by the yoke of his opinions.

The manner in which they walked beside each other strengthened the detective's suspicions. 'If it turned out that he was a first-rate actor, a super spy, and I was a fool, they'd kick me out. . . . But if——'

Hesitating, the detective left the road and walked thoughtfully through the woods. He, too, had a mother and a wife and two little children; and when their father came home from a journey, they asked: "Have you brought us anything, daddy?" At which he started and said regretfully: "Goodness, fancy my forgetting!" and then winked slyly with his left eye.

The manager's car sped past, filled with flowers, returning from the station to the mill. The well-fed liveried chauffeur was whistling like a black-bird. A few minutes later a straw-hat was raised: the hardware-traveller, who had come to terms with the chauffeur, went riding past. He had paid a profitable visit to three retailers in the village, and finished up by inquiring after his fellow-traveller, the priest. In the living-room two sky-blue, glass vases of gentian were standing on the sideboard, and the two shepherds of souls were sitting in the twilight at a window-table, being served by an elderly woman with thin, yellow hands and hair combed smoothly back. On the wall above the bookshelf was ticking a finely-built clock, and presently the lamp would be brought in. 'Very nice, too!' the traveller had thought to himself.

All were seated at the same table in the waiting-room. The editor was writing his descriptive article. The banker was drinking water with a little red wine, and scanning the latest financial news in a paper he had bought at the station bookstall. Now and then he exchanged a word with the hardware-traveller, who was cracking jokes and writing figures in his notebook, or thought affectionately of his wife.

She had sent word to the priest, who had gone to the shooting-gallery house after dinner, prepared to baptize the child, that she was a Jewess.

The agitator and the public prosecutor were pacing up and down the platform. The train from which the last coach had become detached had just been signalled.

The detective watched the two men reflectively. At last he determined to communicate his suspicions to the political department, but only verbally and with much discretion.

The workman was standing on the quay by the wharf, looking across the river, immersed in memories; as though the river, and that alone, were his home, his childhood. He withdrew his glance, and asked an old boatman who was swilling the deck of a barge: "Is she yours?"

"Mine? She belongs to the saw-mill."

"I grew up by the water, too. Down at my home they've given up building boats of anything but iron. They last longer."

"Well, he's got plenty of wood. And these last too. We built this one in '86, down there at the yard. I can still remember it. . . . In the boat-yard. It belongs to the saw-mill now, too."

"There's something grand about flowing water. . . . That's the train at last."

"That's right."

From here onward the train was an express; it raced into the plain, moving irresistibly towards the capital.

COUNTERPARTS

(1882- )

---

THE BELL RANG furiously and, when Miss Parker went to the tube, a furious voice called out in a piercing North of Ireland accent:

"Send Farrington here!"

Miss Parker returned to her machine, saying to a man who was writing at a desk:

"Mr. Alleyne wants you upstairs."

The man muttered "Blast him!" under his breath and pushed back his chair to stand up. When he stood up he was tall and of great bulk. He had a hanging face, dark wine-coloured, with fair eyebrows and moustache: his eyes bulged forward slightly and the whites of them were dirty. He lifted up the counter and, passing by the clients, went out of the office with a heavy step.

He went heavily upstairs until he came to the second landing, where a door bore a brass plate with the inscription Mr. Alleyne. Here he halted, puffing with labour and vexation, and knocked. The shrill voice cried:

"Come in!"

The man entered Mr. Alleyne's room. Simultaneously Mr. Alleyne, a little man wearing gold-rimmed glasses on a clean-shaven face, shot his head up over a pile of documents. The head itself was so pink and hairless it seemed like a large egg reposing on the papers. Mr. Alleyne did not lose a moment:

"Farrington? What is the meaning of this? Why have I always to complain of you? May I ask you why you haven't made a copy of that contract between Bodley and Kirwan? I told you it must be ready by four o'clock."

"But Mr. Shelley said, sir——"

"Mr. Shelley said, sir. . . . Kindly attend to what I say and not to what Mr. Shelley says, sir. You have always some excuse or another for shirking work. Let me tell you that if the contract is not copied before this evening I'll lay the matter before Mr. Crosbie. . . . Do you hear me now?"

"Yes, sir."

"Do you hear me now? . . . Ay and another little matter! I might as well be talking to the wall as talking to you. Understand once for all that you get a half an hour for your lunch and not an hour and a half. How many courses do you want, I'd like to know. . . . Do you mind me now?"

"Yes, sir."

Mr. Alleyne bent his head again upon his pile of papers. The man stared fixedly at the polished skull which directed the affairs of Crosbie & Alleyne, gauging its fragility. A spasm of rage gripped his throat for a few moments and then passed, leaving after it a sharp sensation of thirst. The man recognised the sensation and felt that he must have a good night's drinking. The middle of the month was passed and, if he could get the copy done in time, Mr. Alleyne might give him an order on the cashier. He stood still, gazing fixedly at the head upon the pile of papers. Suddenly Mr. Alleyne began to upset all the papers, searching for something. Then, as if he had been unaware of the man's presence till that moment, he shot up his head again, saying:

"Eh? Are you going to stand there all day? Upon my word, Farrington, you take things easy!"

"I was waiting to see . . ."

"Very good, you needn't wait to see. Go downstairs and do your work."

The man walked heavily towards the door and, as he went out of the room, he heard Mr. Alleyne cry after him that if the contract was not copied by evening Mr. Crosbie would hear of the matter.

He returned to his desk in the lower office and counted the sheets which remained to be copied. He took up his pen and dipped it in the ink but he continued to stare stupidly at the last words he had written: In no case shall the said Bernard Bodley be . . . The evening was falling and in a few minutes they would be lighting the gas: then he could write. He felt that he must slake the thirst in his throat. He stood up from his desk and, lifting the counter as before, passed out of the office. As he was passing out the chief clerk looked at him inquiringly.

"It's all right, Mr. Shelley," said the man, pointing with his finger to indicate the objective of his journey.

The chief clerk glanced at the hat-rack, but, seeing the row complete, offered no remark. As soon as he was on the landing the man pulled a shepherd's plaid cap out of his pocket, put it on his head and ran quickly down the rickety stairs. From the street door he walked on furtively on the inner side of the path towards the corner and all at once dived into a doorway. He was now safe in the dark snug of O'Neill's shop, and, filling up the little window that looked into the bar with his inflamed face, the colour of dark wine or dark meat, he called out:

"Here, Pat, give us a g.p., like a good fellow."

The curate brought him a glass of plain porter. The man drank it at a gulp and asked for a caraway seed. He put his penny on the counter and, leaving the curate to grope for it in the gloom, retreated out of the snug as furtively as he had entered it.

Darkness, accompanied by a thick fog, was gaining upon the dusk of February and the lamps in Eustace Street had been lit. The man went up by the houses until he reached the door of the office, wondering whether he could finish his copy in time. On the stairs a moist pungent odour of perfumes saluted his nose: evidently Miss Delacour had come while he was out in O'Neill's. He crammed his cap back again into his pocket and re-entered the office, assuming an air of absent-mindedness.

"Mr. Alleyne has been calling for you," said the chief clerk severely. "Where were you?"

The man glanced at the two clients who were standing at the counter as if to intimate that their presence prevented him from answering. As the clients were both male the chief clerk allowed himself a laugh.

"I know that game," he said. "Five times in one day is a little bit. . . . Well, you better look sharp and get a copy of our correspondence in the Delacour case for Mr. Alleyne."

This address in the presence of the public, his run upstairs and the porter he had gulped down so hastily confused the man and, as he sat down at his desk to get what was required, he realised how hopeless was the task of finishing his copy of the contract before half past five. The dark damp night was coming and he longed to spend it in the bars, drinking with his friends amid the glare of gas and the clatter of glasses. He got out the Delacour correspondence and passed out of the office. He hoped Mr. Alleyne would not discover that the last two letters were missing.

The moist pungent perfume lay all the way up to Mr. Alleyne's room. Miss Delacour was a middle-aged woman of Jewish appearance. Mr. Alleyne was said to be sweet on her or on her money. She came to the office often and stayed a long time when she came. She was sitting beside his desk now in an aroma of perfumes, smoothing the handle of her umbrella and nodding the great black feather in her hat. Mr. Alleyne had swivelled his chair round to face her and thrown his right foot jauntily upon his left knee. The man put the correspondence on the desk and bowed respectfully but neither Mr. Alleyne nor Miss Delacour took any notice of his bow. Mr. Alleyne tapped a finger on the correspondence and then flicked it towards him as if to say: "That's all right: you can go."

The man returned to the lower office and sat down again at his desk. He stared intently at the incomplete phrase: In no case shall the said Bernard Bodley be . . . and thought how strange it was that the last three words began with the same letter. The chief clerk began to hurry Miss Parker, saying she would never have the letters typed in time for post. The man listened to the clicking of the machine for a few minutes and then set to work to finish his copy. But his head was not clear and his mind wandered away to the glare and rattle of the public-house. It was a night for hot punches. He struggled on with his copy, but when the clock struck five he had still fourteen pages to write. Blast it! He couldn't finish it in time. He longed to execrate aloud, to bring his fist down on something violently. He was so enraged that he wrote Bernard Bernard instead of Bernard Bodley and had to begin again on a clean sheet.

He felt strong enough to clear out the whole office single-handed. His body ached to do something, to rush out and revel in violence. All the indignities of his life enraged him. . . . Could he ask the cashier privately for an advance? No, the cashier was no good, no damn good: he wouldn't give an advance. . . . He knew where he would meet the boys: Leonard and O'Halloran and Nosey Flynn. The barometer of his emotional nature was set for a spell of riot.

His imagination had so abstracted him that his name was called twice before he answered. Mr. Alleyne and Miss Delacour were standing outside the counter and all the clerks had turned round in anticipation of something. The man got up from his desk. Mr. Alleyne began a tirade of abuse, saying that two letters were missing. The man answered that he knew nothing about them, that he had made a faithful copy. The tirade continued: it was so bitter and violent that the man could hardly restrain his fist from descending upon the head of the manikin before him:

"I know nothing about any other two letters," he said stupidly.

"You—know—nothing. Of course you know nothing," said Mr. Alleyne. "Tell me," he added, glancing first for approval to the lady beside him, "do you take me for a fool? Do you think me an utter fool?"

The man glanced from the lady's face to the little egg-shaped head and back again; and, almost before he was aware of it, his tongue had found a felicitous moment:

"I don't think, sir," he said, "that that's a fair question to put to me."

There was a pause in the very breathing of the clerks. Everyone was astounded (the author of the witticism no less than his neighbours) and Miss Delacour, who was a stout amiable person, began to smile broadly. Mr. Alleyne flushed to the hue of a wild rose and his mouth twitched with a dwarf's passion. He shook his fist in the man's face till it seemed to vibrate like the knob of some electric machine:

"You impertinent ruffian! You impertinent ruffian! I'll make short work of you! Wait till you see! You'll apologise to me for your impertinence or you'll quit the office instant! You'll quit this, I'm telling you, or you'll apologise to me!"

He stood in a doorway opposite the office watching to see if the cashier would come out alone. All the clerks passed out and finally the cashier came out with the chief clerk. It was no use trying to say a word to him when he was with the chief clerk. The man felt that his position was bad enough. He had been obliged to offer an abject apology to Mr. Alleyne for his impertinence but he knew what a hornet's nest the office would be for him. He could remember the way in which Mr. Alleyne had hounded little Peake out of the office in order to make room for his own nephew. He felt savage and thirsty and revengeful, annoyed with himself and with everyone else. Mr. Alleyne would never give him an hour's rest; his life would be a hell to him. He had made a proper fool of himself this time. Could he not keep his tongue in his cheek? But they had never pulled together from the first, he and Mr. Alleyne, ever since the day Mr. Alleyne had overheard him mimicking his North of Ireland accent to amuse Higgins and Miss Parker: that had been the beginning of it. He might have tried Higgins for the money, but sure Higgins never had anything for himself. A man with two establishments to keep up, of course he couldn't. . . .

He felt his great body again aching for the comfort of the public-house. The fog had begun to chill him and he wondered could he touch Pat in O'Neill's. He could not touch him for more than a bob—and a bob was no use. Yet he must get money somewhere or other: he had spent his last penny for the g.p. and soon it would be too late for getting money anywhere. Suddenly, as he was fingering his watch-chain, he thought of Terry Kelly's pawn-office in Fleet Street. That was the dart! Why didn't he think of it sooner?

He went through the narrow alley of Temple Bar quickly, muttering to himself that they could all go to hell because he was going to have a good night of it. The clerk in Terry Kelly's said A crown! but the consignor held out for six shillings; and in the end the six shillings was allowed him literally. He came out of the pawn-office joyfully, making a little cylinder of the coins between his thumb and fingers. In Westmoreland Street the footpaths were crowded with young men and women returning from business and ragged urchins ran here and there yelling out the names of the evening editions. The man passed through the crowd, looking on the spectacle generally with proud satisfaction and staring masterfully at the office-girls. His head was full of the noises of tram-gongs and swishing trolleys and his nose already sniffed the curling fumes of punch. As he walked on he preconsidered the terms in which he would narrate the incident to the boys:

"So, I just looked at him—coolly, you know, and looked at her. Then I looked back at him again—taking my time, you know. 'I don't think that that's a fair question to put to me,' says I."

Nosey Flynn was sitting up in his usual corner of Davy Byrne's and, when he heard the story, he stood Farrington a half one, saying it was as smart a thing as ever he heard. Farrington stood a drink in his turn. After a while O'Halloran and Paddy Leonard came in and the story was repeated to them. O'Halloran stood tailors of malt, hot, all round and told the story of the retort he had made to the chief clerk when he was in Callan's of Fownes's Street; but, as the retort was after the manner of the liberal shepherds in the eclogues, he had to admit that it was not as clever as Farrington's retort. At this Farrington told the boys to polish off that and have another.

Just as they were naming their poisons who should come in but Higgins! Of course he had to join in with the others. The men asked him to give his version of it, and he did so with great vivacity for the sight of five small hot whiskies was very exhilarating. Everyone roared laughing when he showed the way in which Mr. Alleyne shook his fist in Farrington's face. Then he imitated Farrington, saying, "And here was my nabs, as cool as you please," while Farrington looked at the company out of his heavy dirty eyes, smiling and at times drawing forth stray drops of liquor from his moustache with the aid of his lower lip.

When that round was over there was a pause. O'Halloran had money but neither of the other two seemed to have any; so the whole party left the shop somewhat regretfully. At the corner of Duke Street Higgins and Nosey Flynn bevelled off to the left while the other three turned back towards the city. Rain was drizzling down on the cold streets and, when they reached the Ballast Office, Farrington suggested the Scotch House. The bar was full of men and loud with the noise of tongues and glasses. The three men pushed past the whining match-sellers at the door and formed a little party at the corner of the counter. They began to exchange stories. Leonard introduced them to a young fellow named Weathers who was performing at the Tivoli as an acrobat and knockabout artiste. Farrington stood a drink all round. Weathers said he would take a small Irish and Apollinaris. Farrington, who had definite notions of what was what, asked the boys would they have an Apollinaris too; but the boys told Tim to make theirs hot. The talk became theatrical. O'Halloran stood a round and then Farrington stood another round, Weathers protesting that the hospitality was too Irish. He promised to get them in behind the scenes and introduce them to some nice girls. O'Halloran said that he and Leonard would go, but that Farrington wouldn't go because he was a married man; and Farrington's heavy dirty eyes leered at the company in token that he understood he was being chaffed. Weathers made them all have just one little tincture at his expense and promised to meet them later on at Mulligan's in Poolbeg Street.

When the Scotch House closed they went round to Mulligan's. They went into the parlour at the back and O'Halloran ordered small hot specials all round. They were all beginning to feel mellow. Farrington was just standing another round when Weathers came back. Much to Farrington's relief he drank a glass of bitter this time. Funds were getting low but they had enough to keep them going. Presently two young women with big hats and a young man in a check suit came in and sat at a table close by. Weathers saluted them and told the company that they were out of the Tivoli. Farrington's eyes wandered at every moment in the direction of one of the young women. There was something striking in her appearance. An immense scarf of peacock-blue muslin was wound round her hat and knotted in a great bow under her chin; and she wore bright yellow gloves, reaching to the elbow. Farrington gazed admiringly at the plump arm which she moved very often and with much grace; and when, after a little time, she answered his gaze he admired still more her large dark brown eyes. The oblique staring expression in them fascinated him. She glanced at him once or twice and, when the party was leaving the room, she brushed against his chair and said "O, pardon!" in a London accent. He watched her leave the room in the hope that she would look back at him, but he was disappointed. He cursed his want of money and cursed all the rounds he had stood, particularly all the whiskies and Apollinaris which he had stood to Weathers. If there was one thing that he hated it was a sponge. He was so angry that he lost count of the conversation of his friends.

When Paddy Leonard called him he found that they were talking about feats of strength. Weathers was showing his biceps muscle to the company and boasting so much that the other two had called on Farrington to uphold the national honour. Farrington pulled up his sleeve accordingly and showed his biceps muscle to the company. The two arms were examined and compared and finally it was agreed to have a trial of strength. The table was cleared and the two men rested their elbows on it, clasping hands. When Paddy Leonard said "Go!" each was to try to bring down the other's hand on to the table. Farrington looked very serious and determined.

The trial began. After about thirty seconds Weathers brought his opponent's hand slowly down on to the table. Farrington's dark wine-coloured face flushed darker still with anger and humiliation at having been defeated by such a stripling.

"You're not to put the weight of your body behind it. Play fair," he said.

"Who's not playing fair?" said the other.

"Come on again. The two best out of three."

The trial began again. The veins stood out on Farrington's forehead, and the pallor of Weathers' complexion changed to peony. Their hands and arms trembled under the stress. After a long struggle Weathers again brought his opponent's hand slowly on to the table. There was a murmur of applause from the spectators. The curate, who was standing beside the table, nodded his red head towards the victor and said with stupid familiarity:

"Ah! that's the knack!"

"What the hell do you know about it?" said Farrington fiercely, turning on the man. "What do you put in your gab for?"

"Sh, sh!" said O'Halloran, observing the violent expression of Farrington's face. "Pony up, boys. We'll have just one little smahan more and then we'll be off."

A very sullen-faced man stood at the corner of O'Connell Bridge waiting for the little Sandymount tram to take him home. He was full of smouldering anger and revengefulness. He felt humiliated and discontented; he did not even feel drunk; and he had only twopence in his pocket. He cursed everything. He had done for himself in the office, pawned his watch, spent all his money; and he had not even got drunk. He began to feel thirsty again and he longed to be back again in the hot reeking public-house. He had lost his reputation as a strong man, having been defeated twice by a mere boy. His heart swelled with fury and, when he thought of the woman in the big hat who had brushed against him and said Pardon! his fury nearly choked him.

His tram let him down at Shelbourne Road and he steered his great body along in the shadow of the wall of the barracks. He loathed returning to his home. When he went in by the side-door he found the kitchen empty and the kitchen fire nearly out. He bawled upstairs:

"Adal Adal!"

His wife was a little sharp-faced woman who bullied her husband when he was sober and was bullied by him when he was drunk. They had five children. A little boy came running down the stairs.

"Who is that?" said the man, peering through the darkness.

"Me, pa."

"Who are you? Charlie?"

"No, pa. Tom."

"Where's your mother?"

"She's out at the chapel."

"That's right. . . . Did she think of leaving any dinner for me?"

"Yes, pa. I—"

"Light the lamp. What do you mean by having the place in darkness? Are the other children in bed?"

The man sat down heavily on one of the chairs while the little boy lit the lamp. He began to mimic his son's flat accent, saying half to himself: "At the chapel. At the chapel, if you please!" When the lamp was lit he banged his fist on the table and shouted:

"What's for my dinner?"

"I'm going . . . to cook it, pa," said the little boy.

The man jumped up furiously and pointed to the fire.

"On that fire! You let the fire out! By God, I'll teach you to do that again!"

He took a step to the door and seized the walking-stick which was standing behind it.

"I'll teach you to let the fire out!" he said, rolling up his sleeve in order to give his arm free play.

The little boy cried "O, pa!" and ran whimpering round the table, but the man followed him and caught him by the coat. The little boy looked about him wildly but, seeing no way of escape, fell upon his knees.

"Now, you'll let the fire out the next time!" said the man, striking at him vigorously with the stick. "Take that, you little whelp!"

The boy uttered a squeal of pain as the stick cut his thigh. He clasped his hands together in the air and his voice shook with fright.

"O, pa!" he cried. "Don't beat me, pa! And I'll . . . I'll say a Hail Mary for you. . . . I'll say a Hail Mary for you, pa, if you don't beat me. . . . I'll say a Hail Mary. . . ."

THE TRAGEDY OF GOUPIL

Louis Pergaud

(1882-1915)

TRANSLATED BY VYVYAN HOLLAND

IT WAS A SPRING EVENING, a warm March evening no different from any other, an evening with a full moon and a high wind which kept the reluctant buds in their resinous prisons for fear of a possible frost.

But for Goupil it was not like any other evening.

That twilight hour which spreads its shadowy film over the countryside, making the peaks seem higher and deepening the valleys, had already brought the woodland beasts from their lairs. But he, apparently insensible to the mysterious life which stirred these familiar shadows, lay hidden in the hole in the Moraes rock, whither, closely pressed by the poacher Lisée's dog, he had taken refuge in the morning, and was not getting ready to mingle with it as he usually did each evening.

Yet it was not because he felt that an expedition into the clearing along the edge of the wood would prove fruitless; for the fox knew quite well that on windy nights, under the full moon, the timid hares, deluded by the moonlight and frightened by the noise made by the swaying branches, did not leave their forms until late at night; nor was it the rustling of the leaves stirred by the wind, for the old forester with his practised ear was quite capable of distinguishing between human and woodland sounds. Neither could his long reverie and his strange inaction be explained by weariness, since he had been resting all day, first of all stretched out like a corpse in the exhaustion following upon the determined pursuit of which he had been the object, and afterwards curled into a circle, his sensitive black muzzle resting on his hind paws to protect it from any unpleasant or irksome contact.

He was now lying in a heraldic attitude, his legs folded beneath him, his eyes half closed and his ears pricked, allowing his brain to grasp, according to the dictates of an instinctive, mysterious and all powerful logic, sensations and ideas powerful enough to keep him, without the restraint of any tangible barrier, behind the rock through a cleft in which he had crawled.

This Moraes cave was not Goupil's usual earth: it corresponded to the keep in which a beleaguered garrison seeks its last refuge, the last asylum in case of extreme peril.

At dawn on that same day he had gone to sleep in a bramble thicket at the very spot at which, with one masterly snap of his jaws, he had broken the back of a leveret returning to its form and with whose flesh he had appeased his hunger.

He had been dozing there when the bell on Miraut's collar had uncere- moniously roused him from the torpor into which the warmth of the spring sun and the tranquillity of a sated appetite had plunged him. Miraut was Lisée's dog.

Among all the dogs in the neighbourhood which in turns, when the morning conditions happened to be favourable and the autumn dew lay on the ground, had given him chase, Goupil knew of no more relentless enemy than Miraut. He knew by costly and bitter experience that no amount of cunning was of any use against him; so, as soon as the sound of his bark or the tinkle of his bell announced his approach, the fox fled as fast as his swift feet could carry him and, in order to put Miraut off the scent, contrary to the natural instinct of all foxes and contrary to his own habits, he would travel a great distance and describe a huge circle, following roads after the fashion of hares and then, returning to Moraes, would slide down the bank of rolling stones leading to his earth as quickly as possible, certain that his paws had not left his enemy sufficient scent to smell him out.

This was his last tactical resource which no untoward event had ever made him modify so far, and today it had succeeded as usual. Yet Goupil was not quiet in his mind for, at a few dozen yards from the path he seemed to have seen, concealed behind the bole of a beech tree, the form of Lisée, Miraut's master.

Goupil knew him well, but this time he had not leaped with fear at the thundering report which always marked the meeting of the two enemies; he had not heard the swift whistling lash of the pellets past his ears, those leaden pellets which, in spite of your winter coat, could bite into you more stingingly and deeper than even the great blackthorns. He was suspicious and from that suspicion there grew a vague alarm, the instinct of preservation which, even before he received painful evidence of its truth, kept him in the cave on the border line of the danger which threatened him.

Crouching in the depths of his lair, he heard suspicious sounds which might possibly have been nothing but the rolling of the last stones disturbed by his feet, but a strange framework, which he had never noticed before seemed to belie this easy explanation.

Goupil scented a trap. Goupil was Lisée's prisoner.

II

He seemed to be frozen into an apathetic sphinxlike attitude. But the shivers running through the fur on his front paws, the tips of his ears trembling at every sound that rose out of the night, and the fleeting glint in his eyes as his oblong pupils dilated beneath the half-lowered curtains of his eyelids, showed that every nerve in his body was intensely alert.

The old stager's deep meditation lasted throughout the night. Indeed there was nothing to compel him to leave his lair. On the contrary his stomach, accustomed to frequent and prolonged fasts and sufficiently balasted that morning with the food supplied by the leveret's flesh, urged him not to leave the chosen refuge which had so often sheltered him during the more perilous moments of his life.

Even though the night was really his accomplice, he was too distrustful to dare to profit by the insidious protection of its silence and its darkness. He awaited the dawn with a premonition that it would produce some new fact which, either confirming his suspicions or buoying up his hopes, would decide him on the course of action to be adopted.

Hour succeeded hour. The moonlight seemed to grow brighter and outlined against the black sky the even blacker branches of the trees, at the ends of which the swollen buds at the invisible tips of the twigs formed a sort of light mist over the forest.

Long rows of boughs, all aligned parallel to one another and cut by the woodmen after the rising of the sap, stretched out in infinite perspectives of dying shoots.

The blackbirds, which at dusk vied with one another in liveliness and cast the harmony of their notes to the four winds of heaven, had long been silent. Only the drumming of the wind rolled deliberately and continuously through the branches, punctuated now and then by the hooting of the little owls and the screeching of the screech owls, whilst from the fertile earth rose an indefinite, subtle and penetrating fragrance which seemed to contain in germ that of all woodland scents.

As dawn broke the man appeared, preceded by Miraut. Goupil heard the snuffling of the dog winding him at the entrance to his lair, and the violent oaths of the poacher as he calculated that the well-known patience and endurance of foxes would cause grave depreciation in the value of the silvery pelt which he expected to take from his victim when he was finally captured.

In the meantime Goupil, passing his long red tongue over his cunning old muzzle, congratulated himself on having escaped immediate danger and began to try to discover some means of giving his enemy the slip.

There seemed to be only two alternatives. He must either make a dash for it or, braving the pangs of hunger, try to exhaust the patience of his gaoler, who might eventually think that he had escaped and would then remove the trap. This second alternative was only to be resorted to in the last instance and it was to the first that the fox turned his attention.

As the trap barred the entry to the cave, Goupil carefully sounded the walls of his prison with his paws and his muzzle. The inspection did not take long: there was rock behind, rock above, to the right and to the left. There was no chance of escape there. Beneath him his claws made semi-circular patterns in the dark soil: perhaps salvation lay in that direction. And immediately, with the courage and tenacity of despair, he began to burrow into the soft earth.

At the end of the day he had dug a hole a good foot deep and as large as his body, when his claws scraped against something hard. He had reached rock again. Goupil tried digging further on, but with the same result; he kept on scratching, he scratched all night, ever hoping to come across a fault in the rock which would give him his freedom.

Slowly, following a cruel, relentless curve, the bedrock rose until it reached the level of the ground at the entrance to the cave; but in his feverish state the fox did not notice this. He kept on scratching, frantically scratching.

He scratched for three days and three nights, biting the earth with rage, a blackish saliva dripping from his jowl. He wore down his claws, broke his teeth and bruised his muzzle. He dug up all the earth in his cave. The impenetrable wall of rock still remained intact and the wretched prisoner, starved and feverish among the lamentable chaos of the tumbled earth, after struggling until his strength was completely exhausted, fell down and slept for twelve hours on end with that leaden sleep that follows a great defeat.

III

Under the violent pangs of his long-empty stomach, Goupil awoke among the wretched disorder of the earth. The clear dawn rose through the cleft in the rock; the buds were beginning to burst; every shade of green was spreading the joy of life in the sunlight and the song of the robins and of the blackbirds filled the air with a symphony of liberty which must have sounded terrible to the prisoner's ears. The knowledge of the truth returned to his mind like a tooth ripping up a hare's stomach and, resigned to his fate now, he settled himself down in the most convenient position in which to dream, to fast and to wait. And there before him, like an appalling nightmare, ironically defying his patience, rose the trap.

It was a rudimentary affair invented by Lisée: two uprights, like those of a scaffold, supported an oak plank which seemed to prolong them. But, owing to an ingenious piece of mechanism, when any intruder entered the fatal passage the oak plank, shaved away at each side, would slide treacherously down like a guillotine along grooves cut in the uprights, and break his back.

Then, excited by hunger, Goupil's brain lived again through the voluptuous memory of hearty meals he had enjoyed and conjured up pictures of orgies of flesh and blood to fall back, more modestly, on the frugal fare of wintertime, the dead moles devoured by the roadside, the red berries gleaned from the leafless bushes and the wild apples discovered beneath the damp decay of fallen leaves.

How many hares had he caught at footbridges over dykes and at places where cart tracks met, and how many leverets had he killed in fields of clover or of lucerne, how many partridges had he chased from their nests in order to devour their eggs, and how many fowls had he boldly stolen from chicken runs under the very noses of watchdogs and in constant danger from farmers' guns?

The hours dragged by, all terribly alike except that the increasing pangs of hunger kept adding to the sum total of his misery.

Stoically calm, his stomach pressed hard against the ground as though in an effort to compress it, Goupil, in order to forget his present situation, recalled to memory all the other perils he had escaped: his flights under showers of lead, the ruses he had employed to put dogs off his track, the poisoned bait tempting his hunger. But above all he saw rising before him with even more terrible precision, from among all the bad days of his life, a certain winter night whose most minute details were deeply engraved upon his memory; he lived through it again as it passed across the screen of his faithful memory:

The earth was white, the trees were white and in the clear sky the stars glittered harshly and shed a sinister, cold, almost wicked glow. The hares had not left their forms, the partridges had all crept up close to the villages and the moles slept in the most remote corners of their subterranean galleries; no more frozen sloes on the blackthorns in the valleys, no more wild apples beneath the apple trees in the woods. Nothing more anywhere, nothing but that soft glistening whiteness made up of crystalline spangles which become sharper in the frost and insinuate themselves right into the skin in spite of the thickness of one's pelt.

The valley slept in the distance beneath the aegis of its iron-roofed church tower. Goupil drew near it and cautiously crept round it, then, shortening his circles and egged on by hunger he gradually came right up to it.

There was not a sound to be heard except, every quarter of an hour, the thin note carelessly launched into the silence from the clock tower or the metallic clanking of chains rattled by oxen as they stirred in their sleep.

A strong smell of flesh reached his nostrils; no doubt some dead animal left there to rot, whose incipient decay deliciously tickled his famished sense of smell.

He continued on his way, hugging a fence until he came within a few paces of where he could see the object of his search lying as a brown mass on the virgin whiteness of the snow.

The house opposite was sleeping soundly: the quiet darkness of a large window seemed to bear witness to its emptiness or to its slumber.

But Goupil was suspicious. Impelled by his instinct, he hurled himself bravely at full speed into the open space and passed the carcass by without stopping, his eyes fixed on the suspected window. No one but he would have noticed anything; but the piercing eyes of the old savage had seen a tiny red reflection glowing in the upper corner of one of the panes and that was enough for him. He understood now.

The man behind there could load his gun and get ready to fire: the shot would not be for him. For Goupil was certain that behind that silent window a man was keeping vigil, one of his enemies, one of the murderers of his race: he had put out the lamp, pretending to have gone to bed, but the vent-hole of his stove, which he had neglected to shut, betrayed his presence and Goupil, who had already heard shots fired in the night, knew now why the man was watching. Who knows how many other animals, more trusting than himself, had paid with their lives for their rashness in exposing themselves to the assassin's shot at such close range? And Goupil reconstructed the scene: the man quietly seated in his mysterious house, meditating on the misery of wild creatures, offering them something with which to appease their hunger and, at the right moment, protected by the sheltering darkness, shooting his victims through the open window pane.

It was there that his woodland brothers perished, those who, with less self-control than he, had ventured down to the village and had never been seen again.

And as he retraced his way to his wood, keeping himself well in the shadows, the silhouette of a cat suddenly appeared on the top of a wall. His large dark eyes met the creature's phosphorescent pupils in the darkness and with a mighty bound he hurled himself in its wake.

The cat knew quite well that the menace of its claws, though quite sufficient to restrain the audacity of dogs, would not stop Goupil's rush and that neither would flight protect it from the old savage's attack. But there was an apple tree close at hand. It reached this and was already climbing it when a sudden snap stopped it and delivered it to its enemy, who finished it off. And the silence of the night was rent by a long sinister howl, a death howl which kept all the dogs in the village and in the farms in the neighbourhood barking at the doors of their kennels or in the stables far into the night.

Other memories, too, came and went in his mind while the links of the hours forged their monotonous chain and the eternal days passed.

Then Goupil's ideas became vague and confused. The memories of meals were mixed in appalling nightmares with fearful pictures: fantastic rings of hares spun around him, firing shots at him which ploughed through his skin, taking off long strips of fur without succeeding in killing him. A high fever attacked him: his cold black muzzle grew hot and his eyes red; his flanks began to throb and his long lean tongue hung from his jaws like a ragged wet cloth, on the central channel of which a drop of sweat would appear from time to time, to be licked back into his burning mouth in an effort to cool it.

Time passed. He had examined the trap and tried, in order to avoid it, to understand its danger, but his wild animal brain could not understand human mechanisms and he preferred starvation in the security of his refuge to this unknown horror full of agonising mystery.

One morning for one joyful moment he thought his deliverance had come. The man appeared. He remained there for some time, moved something and went away again; but the terrible oath which marked his departure left the fox with but very faint hope. Lisée had only been trying the trap and now he came every day at dawn, feeling that the end was at hand.

During this time Goupil was becoming more and more troubled by fever. Sometimes he lay stretched out for minutes at a time, panting desperately, sometimes he got up and walked round and round his prison, seeking for the outlet which he was always hoping to find, without success.

A crescent moon, in its last quarter, was mounting the sky. A red moon. It was like a joint of underdone meat which some cruel power was parading through the sky on a plate of clouds! Motionless, the fox stretched towards it his emaciated neck, his sunken jowl, his enormous eyes. As on the first day of his captivity, the wind howled dismally among the trees and he seemed to hear the ebb and flow of the music of a vast pack of hounds which was gradually drawing closer to him; or, again, the humming in his brain appeared to be the bubbling of a spring and, in order to try to quench his burning thirst, he kept turning round and round, looking on all sides for water, clear water which he would lap up for ever.

The dawn of the eleventh day revealed a milky brightness above the neighbouring wood. The end had got to come. Suddenly Goupil made up his mind and, without looking to either side, bracing his poor emaciated legs with a sort of despairing energy, he made a desperate bound and hurled himself into the unknown.

IV

On that day as on the preceding days, with the apparent heaviness with which he disguised the briskness of his gait, Lisée climbed the narrow gully through which his heavy hob-nailed boots had gradually worn a track ending at Goupil's prison.

As a well-trained dog, Miraut preceded him by a few yards. In the ordinary way, when hunting, the dog kept exactly the same distance from his master, a distance determined by long usage and mutual understanding. But that day Lisée had to keep on calling back his old associate by short and often repeated whistling.

With his muzzle in the air and his stern waving, Miraut scented his prey and Lisée, thinking of Goupil's fate, gleefully rubbed his great horny hands together. But he did not increase his pace and continued on his way towards the lair where the dog, his muzzle thrust forward, and his eyes staring before him, his body close to the ground and his stern stuck straight out behind him, was only waiting for the presence of his master and a signal to leap.

Beneath the weight of the oak plank which had fallen upon him, the fox, gaunt, half-flayed, lay on his right side, his hindquarters firmly fixed by the trap which had caught him just in front of his hind legs and, by throwing him a little to one side, had protected his spine from a mortal blow. A whitish mucus flowed from his nostrils, and his large, bleary eyes had closed when the shock had made him lose consciousness. He had been lying there for about a quarter of an hour when Lisée arrived.

A cruel, contemptuous smile showed that the victor's triumph was mitigated by the little he thought of the value of the vanquished. The pelt was worthless and what poor devil, however hungry he might be, would have attempted to attack such a wretched prey, even after, as usual, letting the flesh freeze to remove some of its wild-animal odour from it?

Suddenly the poacher, looking attentively at Goupil, saw a shudder pass through his frame. For, indeed, he had in fact only lost consciousness.

And then Lisée formulated in his mind a scheme of revenge, while at the same time playing a savage joke on his enemy.

Without saying a word he removed his dog's collar and immediately fastened it round Goupil's neck; he then fumbled in the pockets of his old corduroy trousers through which the bluish weft of the cotton foundation could be seen in places. Having found some pieces of string he soon made an effective muzzle which he fastened on to the old creature: then he tied his hind paws together with a handkerchief and opened the trap, which he hid in a neighbouring thicket. Lastly, seizing the fox by his four paws he flung him over his shoulders like a collar and retraced his way to the village with the same swift cumbrous gait.

Miraut followed behind, his eyes riveted on the pointed nose bumping up and down on his master's shoulder.

Lisée's rhythmic stride, the warmth of the sun and the pure balmy spring morning air gradually restored the use of his senses to Goupil.

His first sensation was a blessed feeling of relief and of lightness which contrasted with the sharp pain and the atrocious anguish which he had experienced when he was first caught in the trap; then the pleasant dilation of his lungs in the fresh, sweet-smelling air brought back to him the corresponding memory of his freedom in the woods; and, too, it was for him an unconscious delight once more to see the healthy clearness of the air through the mists of sleep and to enjoy the glorious sun appearing over the horizon.

But as he returned more fully to consciousness his sensations began to be modified: at first there was a feeling of discomfort in his legs and at his neck and a heaviness in his head; then the perception of a strange smell, the smell of man and dog, forcing itself upon his brain, rudely recalled him to reality. He opened his feverish eyes wide and saw everything: the man carrying him, the dog following him, his legs imprisoned in the poacher's rough hands and in the distance the village with its tiled roofs, that mysterious village full of traps and of enemies.

His whole body stiffened in an instinctive and desperate effort, a terrific strain in every muscle to try to make Lisée let go so that he could dash off into the forest. But the man was on his guard; he merely tightened the grip of his gnarled hands, thereby crushing the wretched creature's legs still more, and Miraut also showed his ruthless vigilance by growling significantly.

An even greater torment, which made him forget everything, hunger, thirst, and pain, now racked Goupil's mind. The danger had changed its form, but it was more imminent, more certain and more appalling. He almost regretted the atrocious hours during which he had been starving to death in his cave and he wondered what tortures he was going to be subjected to before dying.

He saw himself spreadeagled on the floor, abandoned to Miraut's teeth, or made to serve as a target for Lisée. He saw himself lying half flayed, his flesh quivering, his bones broken, and seemed to feel the pellets, coming from Heaven knew where, boring into his muscles and remaining like inextricable thorns, making holes from which the blood flowed continuously and without any possibility of being staunched.

Miraut was baring his sharp fangs and, in reply to this challenge Goupil, from behind the meshes of his muzzle, also snarled and uncovered his discoloured gums from which sprang the pointed canines. Oh, how glad he would have been to be able to bite the tormentor who was carrying him, but the man was quite confident of his immunity and went silently on his way to the village, smiling at the thought of his merciless jest.

The fox heard the various sounds of village life, many of which he recognised because he had at other times studied them from a distance: some of them meant nothing to him; some touched more particularly on his life as a hunter of cats and as a farm-yard expert, and lastly there were others, the most terrible of all, which reminded him of the fact that man and his vassal the dog were enemies upon whose clemency he could never count. He heard the lowing of cattle, the clucking of fowls, the barking of dogs and the shrill screams of children playing and quarrelling in front of houses. He saw himself already surrounded by a circle of ferocity, an unpenturable triple hedge of enemies and he dreaded even more keenly the prospect of his unknown fate.

Luckily for Goupil, Lisée lived in a house a little way out of the village. He entered a lane bordered by two hawthorn hedges and some urchins who were gathering violets there, interested by the sight of the curious, wicked-looking beast which he was carrying, followed him as far as his home.

Lisée tied Goupil with a piece of rope to the foot of the bed in the room containing the stove, and breakfasted on a bowl of soup which his wife gave him; then he went about his day's work, leaving to the care of Miraut the old muzzled creature who expected that at any moment the dog would leap upon him and tear him to shreds.

But nothing of the sort happened, and Miraut contented himself with lying curled up before the fire on a piece of sacking, from time to time casting a look of hatred in his direction, fully conscious of the responsibility placed upon him.

The sound of childish shouts and quarrelling and laughter struck terror into the captive's brain; all the village children, informed of his presence by those who had first seen him, were hovering round the house in the hope of also catching a glimpse of him.

Sometimes one of them, bolder than the rest, would pull himself up on the window sill and take a rapid glance into the darkened room and then, when questioned by the others and not having seen anything, would take refuge in significant silence.

All this noise terrified Goupil. An overwhelming feeling of languor came over him; bewildered by so many strange adventures he could no longer grasp anything that was happening and lost consciousness again. He did not notice the approach of night, but he shuddered when the poacher returned with several other enemies with the same smell, who made large clouds of blue smoke come out of their pipes. They were laughing.

Goupil did not know the smell of tobacco: it seized him by the nose and throat like the choking advance guard of death. Neither did he understand laughter. Miraut, who was intelligent and observant, knew that this outward sign in his master meant that he would be patted and given tidbits to eat: he, too, tried, like many other dogs, to make men understand his own good humour or his submissiveness by the more or less agreeable curling back of his lips. But the old fox saw nothing in this manifestation but stumps of teeth, yellowed by tobacco, set in cruel-looking jaws, and bellies which shook as though they themselves longed to seize on some coveted prey.

The only relationship that Goupil could establish was between the protruding teeth and the shaking bellies and this was for him a terrible sign of danger and menace.

Lisée was talking and gesticulating and the men's mouths grew larger, their teeth seemed to grow longer, their bellies shook more violently and their faces became more dreadful. The end was surely at hand.

Quietly, as though to give formality to the final preparations, the men sat down while Lisée prepared the instruments which were to serve to torture the condemned animal and Goupil himself cowered by the corner of the bed, vainly trying to hide himself and only wishing he could dissolve entirely and disappear.

At last the poacher seemed to have finished. In one hand he held what appeared to be a black metal jaw and in the other a small hollow metal sphere, pierced on top by two round holes which looked like the eyes of a corpse and underneath by a wide slit like a mouth distended by a savage smile.

He suddenly seized Goupil and held him by gripping his chest and neck between his knees. The fox felt that the end had come and, after a moment's vain desire to struggle, abandoned himself to his fate, realising the utter impossibility of even the faintest hope. He felt the cold of a piece of wire about his throat, he saw the metal jaw, the steel pincers, close suddenly on the wire and felt this new collar gradually crushing his neck in its merciless grip. . . . He was going to be strangled.

But Lisée, passing his finger between the wire and Goupil's neck, interrupted the torture, took off Miraut's leather collar and threw it to one side and then, seizing the bewildered Goupil by the metal sphere, dragged him towards the door, followed by the savage, relentless chorus of the other men.

The poacher let Goupil out in the direction of the swamp from which rose the hoarse croaking of bullfrogs and, before he could realise what was happening, Lisée shot him out into the night with a brutal kick on the hindquarters.

v

The fox did not try to understand and instinctively sped as fast as he could towards his native forest, just as a fish out of water tries to leap back into the river. But, to his horror, Miraut's bell, the same fatal bell which had awakened him as he lay in the brambles with the remains of the hare, followed him as he went.

No, it was no hallucination, it was indeed the bell whose thin, irregular tinkle he could quite clearly distinguish in the silence full of humming sounds and the shrilling of insects.

Miraut was not giving tongue in that regular, protracted way which he had when following a scent and which echoed all through the wood. This silent pursuit was all the more distracting and terrifying because of the mystery with which it was surrounded. The dog must be very close behind him and was perhaps just preparing to seize him and the fox expected at any moment to feel the sharp fangs pierce his skin; he seemed to hear the rippling of the muscles of the hound's legs as it strained to reach him and the laboured breathing of his own tired lungs.

It was a battle of speed, a desperate struggle in which the stronger and the more persevering must inevitably defeat the other.

In the meantime the bell stuck resolutely to his heels, neither gaining nor losing but keeping its exact distance. It was a heroic but unequal contest: on the one side the hale, robust dog, thirsting for revenge; on the other Goupil weakened by eleven days of fasting and fever and only kept going by the instinct of self-preservation which would make him use up his last ounce of strength before abandoning himself to his fate.

Quickening his pace he sped on into the night, looking neither to right nor to left, feeling nothing, seeing nothing; neither could he hear anything but the bell, each tinkle of which lashed his failing courage like a whip, made him pick up his stumbling feet and seemed to rub soothing oil into his exhausted muscles.

He was close to the edge of the wood now, with its low wall of mossy stones which had fallen down in places, and its half-choked ditch; Goupil crossed this at a place where there was a breach in the wall, near the beginning of a ride out of which the hares came when they wanted to graze in the fields. He dived straight into it, urged on by an instinctive impulse which told him that perhaps the dog would abandon his trail to follow a hare which had bolted at their approach; but Miraut held on and the bell continued to tinkle with him.

The straight ride, which had not been cut back by the keepers, seemed to rush towards a glade like an immense arch of greenery, from which the lowest branches hung like garlands. The stars were quietly coming out behind the lattice work of these branches, the blackbirds took up their over-night song once more in a hundred different themes, and countless swarms of cockchafers rose from the fields and flew towards the young greenery of the wood, making a far-away wave-like sound which kept rising and falling in intensity.

The fox fled desperately on, passing the boundary-stones of the rides without even looking at them, cutting across one to enter another, leaving the undergrowth for the clearings and the clearings for the open country, but ever pursued by the relentless bell.

The moon rose. Goupil returned to the undergrowth and made for the dense thickets through which his skill as an old forester enabled him to glide as swiftly as a shadow on a wall and where he hoped with the aid of the brambles and the clematis to shake off the savage hound that pursued him.

He doubled round the oaks, slid under entanglements of brambles which tore at him as he passed them without succeeding in stopping or even slowing down his mad flight; he plunged into tunnels of young vegetation to reappear, five or six paces further on, in the brightness of a sudden clearing, but the tinkling of the bell pursued him like a funeral knell, a monotonous and ceaseless tolling.

Animals started up beneath his feet and birds hurriedly took flight, vanishing like black shadows in the sinister half-light of the wood; brown owls and screech owls, attracted by the sound of the bell, followed this strange career with their silent flight and mingled their wings above his head.

The fox dived resolutely into the densest thickets; at one moment a clematis tendril held him up. He broke it with a sudden bound and started off again and the noise of the bell stopped. Hope filled the fugitive's lungs and braced his muscles with fresh strength; doubtless Miraut had lost sight of him and he sped straight before him like an arrow. He ran two hundred, perhaps three hundred yards in this hopeful silence and then, to make sure that he was alone, he stopped dead and cast a glance behind him.

Hardly had he turned his head when the thin irregular note of the bell once more fell upon his ear and embarked him once more upon his race through the woods, assailed with all the agonies of uncertainty.

He ran all night without interruption until his poor stiff swollen feet collapsed beneath him and flung him on the ground, an inert wreck, a few yards from a spring where he lay without consciousness, half dead, sightless and voiceless.

And immediately, as though its work were accomplished, the bell became silent.

VI

No one could say how long Goupil remained in that state of total prostration which no longer belonged to life and yet was not death. The vital force of the old forest ranger must have been very powerful for it to have been able, after so much fasting, so many emotions, so much weariness and so much suffering, to wake him from his lethargy and cast him back into the light of day.

Nothing seemed to predominate in the chaos of his sensations. In the midst of the gentle protective silence which surrounded him, and even before his stomach recalled him too vividly to painful reality, it was a feeling of discomfort at his neck that first awakened him: that piece of wire of Lisée's on which his thoughts dwelt so strangely and on which his new life seemed to be concentrated. Indeed, two separate sensations could hardly find accommodation in his enfeebled brain. Was he awake or was he asleep? Was he dreaming? He did not know. His eyes were closed and now he opened them. He opened them slowly, without moving his body, and gazed at the peaceful landscape before him; then, with infinite caution, to which he knew how to school himself when, guided by his subtle sense of smell, he crept up to a covey of partridges at dusk, he turned his head and looked round him. There was nothing suspicious in sight; he breathed again. Where could the dog have got to? It had vanished like a bad dream. Perhaps, after all, it had only been a long nightmare? But no, the uncomfortable piece of wire remained there to witness the retrospective horror of his appalling captivity.

Goupil instinctively put his paw up to it in the hope of being able to get rid of it, but he had hardly touched it when the bell sounded again and he cowered down and a shudder of terror ran along his spine. He gave a hurried look round, but there was still nothing in sight. And yet the bell was there, quite close to him. And then suddenly Goupil grasped the situation.

The metal sphere with its jeering mouth and its death's-head eyes, which Lisée had slipped on to the wire knotted round his neck, was Miraut's bell; it was with this fateful bell that he had run all through the night, thinking himself pursued by the dog; that was Lisée's revenge which had made him drain the cup of bitter agony to its dregs through eight hours of flight and which, now that he was returning once more to hope and happiness, was going to follow him pitilessly, to poison his days and to accomplish its deadly work in face of and in spite of everything.

He stood up painfully on his thin legs, forefeet first and then hind feet, and crawled over to the spring whose continuous monotonous rippling was almost a form of silence, a singing silence with whose tones the different cries of the woodland dwellers harmonised peacefully.

He drank for a long time with a noise like the clicking of castanets, blurring his reflection in the clear water, the reflection of an emaciated Goupil whose muzzle alone seemed to be alive, and on whose head the short, pointed ears seemed to be something detached, like twin turrets, listening to the noises of the countryside with the ever-present fear of catching hostile sounds in the perspectives of silence.

Then his thoughts turned to food and, as the forest did not offer him sufficient resources, he made for the grassy plain where the larks sprang up from time to time like fountain-jets in their reeling ascent, filling the air with their trills, to fall back again intoxicated with the blueness of the sky.

There he would certainly find some of the herbs which he had always known or which he had come to know: sprigs of wild sorrel, a few mushrooms perhaps, the purgative couch-grass or even a molehill or two which he would attack resolutely and, who knows, perhaps the half-decomposed carcasses of beasts or birds who had died during the winter and had not yet been found.

But how irritating the bell was! No doubt he would soon grow accustomed to the choking wire round his neck, but this noise which stuck to him like a thorn in his flesh, reminding him only too well of the dangers he had run and had yet to fear, secretly ruined the pleasure he would have experienced in being able to enjoy life to the full. It was the price of his liberty which he was condemned to drag about with him until he died. And the desire to get rid of it grew fiercer and fiercer in his heart.

Time after time, lying on his back, his hind legs rigid with determination and rage, stuck straight up in the air, he clawed at his neck with his forepaws in strong, regular strokes to try to drag off or to break the metallic grip of Lisée's wire. He only succeeded in completely stripping the fur from both sides of his neck and in breaking his claws, but the collar which held him did not yield a fraction of an inch and at every stroke the tinkle of the bell came like an insolent or ironically defiant peal of laughter. Goupil tried to get used to it, but in vain, and terrible rages which nothing could curb would grip him by the throat and contract his muscles. And yet he had to live.

He lived.

By turns, herbs from the plain, wild fruit from the woods and cockchafers which he shook out of bushes furnished him with his daily sustenance; there were also little birds' nests which he knew where to find behind the green shields of the hedges and beneath the thorny branches of wild gooseberry bushes. Sometimes he sucked the eggs, sometimes he devoured the fledglings, little red bodies whose eyes were closed and who opened enormous beaks when they heard the rustle of the twigs being pulled aside above their heads. He could raise himself as high as the blackbirds' nests built in the low branches of the hazels, he destroyed coveys of young partridges and quails among the green corn and he could even approach farmhouses without arousing suspicion, protected by his bell.

He had a particular hatred for a certain cock of Bouloie Farm, an ancient rooster with a strident voice and heavy, feathered legs, who was as cunning as he was himself. The all-powerful and jealous pasha of a vast seraglio of hens, he seemed to divine Goupil's presence every time he approached and, raising his head and beating his wings, would utter a rallying crow, an urgent call which warned the hens of their danger and sent them scurrying back in disorder round the watchdog's kennel, where they felt they were safe.

For a long time Goupil had decided upon the death of this fowl.

For several days he watched its movements and then, having got to know its habits, he came along one fine morning, crouched behind a hedge and waited.

The rooster approached, crest waving in the wind, eyes sparkling, at the head of his clucking flock. But he had neither the easy gallantry nor the swaggering boldness of the days on which he felt confident: he clearly scented danger. Goupil made his little bell tinkle and this domestic sound reassured his enemy; then with the patience of an experienced hunter he let the fowl draw slowly near and, when it was quite close and there was no longer any chance of its escaping, he made a tremendous bound towards it, chased it, caught it, crushed its breast between his jaws and, proud of his victory and carrying his crafty head on high, carried it off into the forest where he plucked it and devoured it.

After that it was easy to decimate the stupid flock of hens belonging to his neighbour the farmer: but he went at such varied intervals and at such different times of the day, that the farmer could never hope to surprise him and, not having seen him and not having any idea of the identity of the thief except from the sound of his bell and, moreover, knowing nothing of Goupil's adventures, stoutly accused Miraut of killing his hens and even went so far as to threaten to bring an action against Lisée or to destroy his good-for-nothing dog.

In the meantime Goupil was growing fat again and even if he had largely to resign himself to leaving hares alone, the fowls of the farm offered him quite sufficient compensation and he began to recover confidence in life.

One thing, however, weighed horribly on him, and that was loneliness.

He had never set eyes on any of his brothers since the evening of his captivity and he could not without deep emotion conjure up the romping, nibbling and teasing which preceded important expeditions, nor the bitter quarrels aroused by disputes over the division of spoils which made sharp rows of fangs shoot out challengingly under black curled-back lips.

But now the forest was empty. It seemed as though his race had disappeared since his captivity.

And yet he felt its presence around him perpetually. He felt it by the traces which other foxes left in crossing the damp paths through the undergrowth, by the scent left by their feet on the grass in the glades and on the low branches of thickets, and especially by the peculiar yelping which told him of a nocturnal hunt by two friends: one acting as dog, giving tongue in a thin rather husky voice, while the other, in accordance with the direction indicated by the barking, would wait at some place by which the hare would probably pass and would kill it without having to run a yard.

He knew every run and very seldom made a mistake about direction; he had even, one day when he felt a little hungry, become bold enough to lie in wait and kill a hare which Miraut was hunting. But he never tried to do that again, because the hound, just as cunning as he, guessed what had happened and set off with fresh energy in pursuit, without wasting a moment. Weighed down by his capture, the fox would infallibly have been caught had he not been prudent enough to abandon to his enemy the stolen prey which would have furnished him with such a satisfying meal. No doubt Miraut had recovered the hare on the steep pebble bank on which he had abandoned it, for patches of fur and bloodstains on the stones told a sufficiently clear story of the savoury meal to which he had so selfishly helped himself.

Goupil naturally hoped to profit by his brothers' hunting but he very seldom succeeded, for if the bell always sent the bushy-tailed hunter lying in wait about his business, it often happened that it also turned the tawny hare, with his keen ear for forest noises, away from the run. But when this happened his most earnest desire was to meet the other foxes once more in order to make them understand that he was not their enemy; but it was labour lost, for the lonely creature could neither get his brothers to come to him nor could he get near them; his calling met with no other response than the echo which cast mockingly back at him the plaintive end of his yelpings.

One evening he recognised the voice of his old hunting companion, now hunting with another, no doubt one of his rivals, and it made him miserable because he felt that there was a ban upon him among his race and that he was, as it were, dead to all other foxes.

How often, even without any desire for plunder, had he not tried to get near the hunters! But as soon as he approached the hunt seemed to fade away and silence fell all around: the bell created mystery and emptiness about him.

VII

Then came the season of love-making.

In the trail of the vixens in the mating season Goupil sniffed marvellously voluptuous scents which made his jaws snap together and fired his blood. Then his whole being vibrated with the great courage necessary for the fights which succeeded the nuptial parade, of which they were but the supreme form, and he conjured up in his mind before his wounded, shamed and vanquished rivals the slenderest of females, docile and submissive to her master's will.

Oh, for those battles in the depths of the woods, those fierce clashes in which teeth sink into pelts and make the flesh bleed, those howling battles at the end of which the victor, himself also wounded and bleeding, enjoyed his triumph while in the distance, still menacing, the vanquished showed their teeth and prowled restless and woeful round the mating couple.

Goupil was one of the stronger ones; he had often come off best in these nocturnal tourneys and, with a rage rendered ten times greater because of the inaccessibility of the goal, he followed the multiple tracks in which his rivals' footprints were confused as they followed the path taken by the coveted females; but the goal kept moving, never to be reached because the abominable bell, warning them of the presence of an interloper, reconciled the rivals in the face of common danger and always put the mating groups to flight.

Every night he ran hither and thither, leaving one track to follow another in the hope, never to be realised, that the constant yelping which he directed towards the female would be enough to prevent her from fleeing before the approaching bell.

He was in despair. He forgot to steal chickens or to drink at springs; he was consumed by the love fever, and wild paroxysms of rage, as in the first days of his liberation, made him fling himself on his back on the ground to try once more to snap the wire which welded to his life the indelible mark of the ferocity of man.

But it was waste of labour.

One evening, however, he changed his tactics. He had just crossed the track of a rutting female and decided that he must catch up with her at all costs, concentrating all the turbulent energies of an exasperated male to this end. But he must silence the bell. He must be able to do so!

In order to do this he determined to thread his way through the dense tangle of the undergrowth with a slow, easy gait during which his head and neck should preserve the most complete immobility. So he started off on the tracks of Madame Vixen, his whole body taut and set, his legs arched and his muzzle following the scent close to the ground.

He advanced with infinite precaution, stifling his instinctive emotions by the strength of his desire and by sheer will power. There would, for instance, be a path or a ditch which he was forcing himself to cross slowly when, deep inside him, a subconscious instinct of self-protection would flex the muscles of his hindquarters to clear it at a bound, or else an easy prey would suddenly appear and in spite of himself his eyes would follow its precipitous flight.

He stepped over twigs, slithered beneath the low-hanging branches of the dense shrubbery, now walking on the tips of his toes and now crouching down on his pliant hocks; he proceeded slowly, anxiously, his head in a whirl and his heart beating wildly as the delicious scent made his nerves tingle, and he got nearer and nearer to his goal. But he still took care not to move his neck the fraction of an inch or to cause the bell the slightest jar.

He was there.

In the centre of a glade brightly lit up by the moon two males were already fighting for the female who stood by watching them. Their fangs were being buried in each other's pelts with muffled snarls, their rigid legs were straining against each other's backs and hindquarters, blood was beginning to flow and the light of battle shone from the contestants' eyes.

Circling around the rivals in the narrow glade outlined by the freshly grown turf on the site of a charcoal burner's fire, the female considered them calmly through half-closed eyes, her brush trailing behind her like a lady's train.

She passed close to Goupil, winded him and turned towards him and he, emboldened and excited and disregarding the enforced stiffness of his neck, without troubling about the other two who were tearing each other to pieces, without heeding anything else, began to prepare for the love act by his preliminary caresses.

But at the supreme moment he raised himself sharply on his hindquarters and the sound of the bell rang out in the night. Immediately, as though actuated by invisible springs, both combatants and the female took to such sudden and headlong flight that before he had time to see them vanish, the bewildered Goupil found himself alone in the deserted glade.

Then the poor lonely creature began to bite the grass in the glade in uncontrollable rage, and to howl despairingly and to make the merciless bell ring unceasingly as though he were trying to tire it out. And the grinning moon made the shadows of the trees dance around him and the night birds, attracted by this unusual noise, wove the mysterious and balefully silent patterns of their flight above his head.

The dawn found him still there and, remembering the danger which he carried about him, he turned his thoughts to the question of self-preservation. Seized once more by love of life like a convalescent after a terrible crisis, he felt all the problems of existence weighing upon him and, in order to be able to solve them when the time came, he began by hiding himself in a thicket in the middle of the wood where he fell into the troubled sleep of hunted and harassed creatures.

And for a long time life went on in the same way. Forest life, so satisfying to his instincts, smiled upon him once more; he almost recaptured his forest ranger's soul, thanks to the necessity of finding his daily sustenance, and contented himself, though this was a sad form of enjoyment, a bitter pleasure, with listening from afar to the life of those of his race which their nocturnal hunting so often recalled to him, like the happy music of a lost paradise.

The oppressive heat of the month of August made him go at nightfall to the meadows beside the roads where he was certain of finding moles seeking on the surface a temporary respite from the heat which was stifling them, wandering about in the freshly mown swaths of the late crop and destined to death by the mere fact of having deserted the primitive cross-roads beneath their dried-up molehills.

This was an assured source of food for Goupil, because even if he had not found them still alive, wandering miserably beneath the double weight of their blindness and of the discomfort which drove them from the overheated furnace of the earth, he knew that he would certainly come across them dead by the roadside, for those that leave their tunnels in this way never return and nearly all perish in the course of their first and last journey into the open.

Then autumn followed with its abundance of fruit which would have made life particularly peaceful for him if packs of hounds, rousing his domain on every side with their furious baying, had not reminded him too vividly of Lisée and Miraut and of his captivity and isolation.

Having become more cunning as a result of his experience, he used an earth with a double exit and only entered it after having, by cleverly crossing his tracks, put up a false scent which would keep even the most formidable hounds away from his trail.

Life, however, seemed easy to him and the old scavenger never gave a thought to the approaching winter which, from the premature migration of the wood pigeons and the jays, and from the sudden thickening of his own pelt, promised to be early and severe.

VIII

It came suddenly, without any transition period, as sometimes happens in the mountains, after the cold mists of the end of October and of the first days of November which stripped the forest of its autumn-tinted leaves. A few red berries still gleamed among the briars in the hedges, a few violet sloes, wrinkled by the first frosts, still clung to the blackthorns, their stalks almost severed by the ruthless bite of the frost; then one fine morning when the wind seemed to have fallen asleep, snow began to fall, treacherously, noiselessly, and without any fuss, with the quiet persistence of the good workman whom nothing discourages and nothing flurries and who knows that he has plenty of time in which to finish his task.

The snow fell for two days and two nights without a stop, levelling the hillocks and filling up the dips in the ground, flattening everything with its soft, uniform covering. And during the whole of the time it was falling none of the woodland beasts or the non-migratory birds stirred from their carefully chosen shelters.

Goupil (he would have no more to do with caves), crouching beneath the low branches of a clump of hazels had, like the rest, allowed himself to be buried beneath the shroud which gradually formed and, moulding his huddled shape, built for him a narrow kennel, a delicate, fragile shell, whose flimsy wall he would easily be able to break through when the moment came. In this shell he was warm, for his pelt was thick and the vault of the snow, moulding an arch for his back, protected it completely from the outer cold.

When he guessed that the snow had ceased to fall he waited until midday and then made a narrow exit for himself and, being careful not to damage the snow house which nature had made to his measure, he went in search of his daily food.

The bad days had returned: Goupil felt this clearly, all the more because, hampered by the bell which he was condemned to sound at every step, he found himself at a very real disadvantage in hunting and especially in hunting hares.

He knew quite well that a hare bolting before him would inevitably fall a victim to him, because when the snow was soft, the unfortunate creatures were quite incapable of competing in speed with foxes and dogs. But they were quite aware of this inferiority, so that when they heard an unfamiliar sound, such as that of a bell or of footsteps, they took the wise precaution of getting a very long start. So that Goupil was more than suspect to them.

Then the endless searching started again, the weary digging beneath the wild apple trees, the patient gleaning among bushes shaken free from their snow, all of which only half filled his stomach which was too often quite empty.

Once more he experienced foodless days, long waits by the runs used by hares and cautious ambushes at the outskirts of villages or farms in the faint hope of catching a fowl or strangling a cat.

This continued until the first days of December. But at this period the cold grew more intense and biting blizzards began to blow; the snow, broken up by the frost into tiny crystal spangles, found its way into everything, filling up the deepest valleys, insinuating itself into the most sheltered places, and forming veritable white dunes and drifts which kept shifting at the will of the wind.

His snow house, however, remained intact; it had even become more substantial and he was more comfortable in it, for the warmth of his body had melted a thin layer of snow all round him and this subsequently froze and solidified and formed a harder crust, an arch of ice which easily supported the varying weight of the snow above it.

All the bushes had been carefully picked bare; the birds all hovered about the villages, and hares were unapproachable. Nothing, nothing more at all, and Goupil, remembering his former adventure, hesitated to tempt Providence again and to try to gain the confidence of domestic animals by means of his bell.

But it came inevitably to that. Each night he drew imperceptibly nearer to human habitations, even frightening away other foxes who, starving also, were already prowling round and had not, as he had, waited until hunger had driven them to the utmost limit before coming to hunt such dangerous quarry.

But not a single animal dreamed of leaving the warm litter in its stable or the fireside where, on warm bricks or floor-boards, the shivering cats would curl up when they were not watching the piled-up trusses of corn in the barns or holes in the walls for the lean, harried-looking mice who, also starving, had all returned to the shelter of the houses.

From time to time the furious barking of a dog would warn him that he had come too close, that he had been winded and that the time had come for him to make himself scarce with all possible speed. He never gained anything from these nocturnal expeditions. The traditional carcass which formerly tempted starving stomachs and from which one could, at the worst, by creeping up in short stages with long intervals between them, furtively seize a scrap and make off, no longer existed; the village animals obstinately refused to die. Nevertheless, Goupil kept on prowling round at a safe distance from the houses: but he carefully avoided Lisée's house and, in spite of the ferment in his brain, and in spite of his empty stomach, he fled even more quickly than usual on the night on which he heard Miraut's bark answering the bark of one of his hunting companions who was informing him in his own fashion of the proximity of one of the denizens of the forest.

But Goupil was still without food. The days passed but the cold remained and fiercer and fiercer hunger gnawed at the vitals of the forest dwellers.

And he, gaunt now, a wasted shadow of his former self, even more wretched looking than he had been after the days of his imprisonment, was nothing but a poor tatterdemalion, exhausted by fever, hovering between death and madness, who, having acquired the habit of prowling round the village, returned there inevitably each night at the same time, without knowing why, no longer trying to avoid the dogs, not even avoiding Lisée's house, without a hope of finding anything to eat, without even looking for anything, baffled by the bell which tinkled at his neck and ripe for the final and supreme ordeal.

IX

Christmas Eve that year had been a day of long twilight. The sun never showed itself at all; a few grey ribbons just above the horizon at mid-day had borne witness to its passage behind the inky clouds which stretched their sinister canopy above the silent, cheerless countryside.

A few mournful caws from luckless crows, and an occasional chattering magpie searching for the last red berries of the rowans had occasionally broken the silence, but that had been all.

The torpid village on which the motionless smoke, the feverish breath of the cottages, seemed to weigh like a pall of misery, had given the only other sign of life at dawn and at nightfall, when the stable doors had, at the usual hour, belched forth the cattle full of suppressed energy, lowing and hurrying towards their watering place.

And yet everything in the village was alive and awake, for it was Christmas Eve. There was a great deal of unaccustomed bustle in the old romanesque kitchens where the rustic pillars and smoke-blackened cross-beams supported the spans of the immense fireplaces in which sides of bacon and hams were being dried in the aromatic smoke of burning juniper wood.

For Christmas Eve and Christmas Day the housewives had kneaded and cooked a double batch of bread and of cakes whose warm smell still pervaded the whole house. Forgetting their games and their quarrels, the children had followed all the preparations with cries of delight and had noisily enumerated all the good things, impatiently awaiting the longed-for moment when they were to be enjoyed: plums dried in the oven on plaited osiers after the baking of the bread, meringues powdered with "hundreds and thousands" and apples brought up from the cellars emitting a subtle odour of ether.

Supper had been plentiful and full of gaiety, and, according to custom, at midnight the whole happy family had been lit by yellow torches to the church and back for the longed-for festivities.

They had eaten and drunk and sung and laughed and the grandmother had begun the traditional story in her quavering, rather mysterious and far-away voice:

"It was after midnight on one Christmas Eve many, many years ago, when the soil we till now still belonged to the great lords and our grandfathers' grandfathers obeyed them.

"The hour of mass was approaching when a man whom no one had ever seen before came to call upon the Count at the castle whose ruins are familiar to you all. A herd of wild boar, he said, had gathered at the bottom of the Wolves Valley and in the clear moonlight they could easily be hunted. Immediately the Count, who was an ardent sportsman, forgot his religious duties, had horses saddled for himself and his servants and sent for his hounds. But his pious wife wept and besought him so earnestly that at last he consented, when the church bell pealed for mass, to take his place in church in the red armchair beneath the gilded canopy which was reserved for them.

"The chanting had already begun, but a baffled frown barred the Count's forehead when the mysterious stranger, entering the church without signing himself, once more approached him and whispered in his ear.

"The unfortunate man could no longer resist and, in spite of the imploring looks of his wife, left the church, followed by his servants. Very soon the baying of the hounds could be heard in the distance and during the whole mass the noise of the hunt moving about the countryside was like blasphemy to the ears of the faithful, all of whom had tears in their eyes and offered up fervent prayers. The hunt went on all night and then suddenly all sound of it ceased. But the Count never returned to the castle; he disappeared with his infernal pack and his menials and now, in hell, he bitterly atones for the sacrilege for which God had condemned him to return every hundred years on Christmas Day, to hunt through the night with his hounds. The wretched Countess died in a convent; as for the stranger who had tempted her husband, he was never seen again either and everyone thought that he must have been the devil himself.

"My mother never heard the hunt, but her grandmother did: it was a dark night like this. It was . . ."

At that moment a dismal howl, a howl with a ring of death in it, tragically long and drawn out, swept through the village like a trail of horror and all the dogs in the village and in the outlying farms replied to this unearthly signal with long melancholy howls. The sound rose menacingly and then died down into a sob. When it was over, it began again, or rather it did not finish, but grew lower in agonising modulations and prolonged itself in a rhythm of monotonous despair.

"Let us pray, my children, let us pray for the soul of the Count."

No one in the village slept that night. The men took down their old flintlocks from the nails from which they hung and carefully examined their priming and in their awed faces, on which the scepticism of the century had perhaps placed its seal, the signs of old superstitious terror rose like foam upon a wave.

The women and children huddled silently round the fireplace, seeking protection in the light and warmth against the unknown danger with which they thought they were being threatened. But more than anyone else in the village that night Lisée felt the agony of fear.

For the first howl had come from outside the door of the old poacher and he feared neither God nor devil. It was from there that the strange master of this great mysterious drama gave orders to his invisible pack. And so Lisée had pushed a huge oak dresser against the door, before which Miraut, his tail between his legs and his hair bristling, howled dismally. Lisée remained awake all night, his gun charged with buck-shot in his hands, ready to fire. An hour before dawn the sound of the melancholy hunt died away.

Reassured by the daylight and by the silence, the poacher slowly and silently dragged aside the heavy dresser which barricaded the door and cautiously opened it.

There before him was Goupil, like a skeleton, his eyes haggard, his legs rigid in death and stiffened by the frost, his pelt nearly bald, with the fatal bell round his neck, in the attitude of a cat preparing to spring.

Miraut sniffed at him fearfully and backed away with a silent snarl.

Lisée went back into his house with his head throbbing and his legs tottering beneath him. He fetched a spade and a sack into which he placed the body of his unhappy victim and went up to the forest, followed by his dog.

There he dug a deep hole beneath the snow, into which he placed the body of the fox, carefully filling it in afterwards.

And he returned to his house with his shoulders bowed and his eyes full of vague terrors, while Miraut, who had not his master's reasons for grave preoccupation, raised an irreverent and philosophic leg against the grey mound of earth and snow beneath which Goupil slept his last sleep.

ODOUR OF CHRYSANTHEMUMS

(1885-1930)

---

THE SMALL LOCOMOTIVE ENGINE, Number 4, came clanking, stumbling down from Selston with seven full waggons. It appeared round the corner with loud threats of speed, but the colt that it startled from among the gorse, which still flickered indistinctly in the raw afternoon, outdistanced it at a canter. A woman, walking up the railway line to Underwood, drew back into the hedge, held her basket aside, and watched the footplate of the engine advancing. The trucks thumped heavily past, one by one, with slow inevitable movement, as she stood insignificantly trapped between the jolting black waggons and the hedge; then they curved away towards the coppice where the withered oak leaves dropped noiselessly, while the birds, pulling at the scarlet hips beside the track, made off into the dusk that had already crept into the spinney. In the open, the smoke from the engine sank and cleaved to the rough grass. The fields were dreary and forsaken, and in the marshy strip that led to the whimsey, a reedy pit-pond, the fowls had already abandoned their run among the alders, to roost in the tarred fowl-house. The pit-bank loomed up beyond the pond, flames like red sores licking its ashy sides, in the afternoon's stagnant light. Just beyond rose the tapering chimneys and the clumsy black headstocks of Brinsley Colliery. The two wheels were spinning fast up against the sky, and the winding-engine rapped out its little spasms. The miners were being turned up.

The engine whistled as it came into the wide bay of railway lines beside the colliery, where rows of trucks stood in harbour.

Miners, single, trailing and in groups, passed like shadows diverging home. At the edge of the ribbed level of siding squat a low cottage, three steps down from the cinder track. A large bony vine clutched at the house, as if to claw down the tiled roof. Round the bricked yard grew a few wintry primroses. Beyond, the long garden sloped down to a bush-covered brook course. There were some twiggy apple trees, winter-crack trees, and ragged cabbages. Beside the path hung dishevelled pink chrysanthemums, like pink cloths hung on bushes. A woman came stooping out of the felt-covered fowl-house, half-way down the garden. She closed and padlocked the door, then drew herself erect, having brushed some bits from her white apron.

She was a tall woman of imperious mien, handsome, with definite black eyebrows. Her smooth black hair was parted exactly. For a few moments she stood steadily watching the miners as they passed along the railway: then she turned towards the brook course. Her face was calm and set, her mouth was closed with disillusionment. After a moment she called:

"John!" There was no answer. She waited, and then said distinctly:

"Where are you?"

"Here!" replied a child's sulky voice from among the bushes. The woman looked piercingly through the dusk.

"Are you at that brook?" she asked sternly.

For answer the child showed himself before the raspberry-canes that rose like whips. He was a small, sturdy boy of five. He stood quite still, defiantly.

"Oh!" said the mother, conciliated. "I thought you were down at that wet brook—and you remember what I told you——"

The boy did not move or answer.

"Come, come on in," she said more gently, "it's getting dark. There's your grandfather's engine coming down the line!"

The lad advanced slowly, with resentful, taciturn movement. He was dressed in trousers and waistcoat of cloth that was too thick and hard for the size of the garments. They were evidently cut down from a man's clothes.

As they went slowly towards the house he tore at the ragged wisps of chrysanthemums and dropped the petals in handfuls along the path.

"Don't do that—it does look nasty," said his mother. He refrained, and she, suddenly pitiful, broke off a twig with three or four wan flowers and held them against her face. When mother and son reached the yard her hand hesitated, and instead of laying the flower aside, she pushed it in her apron-band. The mother and son stood at the foot of the three steps looking across the bay of lines at the passing home of the miners. The trundle of the small train was imminent. Suddenly the engine loomed past the house and came to a stop opposite the gate.

The engine-driver, a short man with round grey beard, leaned out of the cab high above the woman.

"Have you got a cup of tea?" he said in a cheery, hearty fashion.

It was her father. She went in, saying she would mash. Directly, she returned.

"I didn't come to see you on Sunday," began the little grey-bearded man.

"I didn't expect you," said his daughter.

The engine-driver winced; then, reassuming his cheery, airy manner, he said:

"Oh, have you heard then? Well, and what do you think——?"

"I think it is soon enough," she replied.

At her brief censure the little man made an impatient gesture, and said coaxingly, yet with dangerous coldness:

"Well, what's a man to do? It's no sort of life for a man of my years, to sit at my own hearth like a stranger. And if I'm going to marry again it may as well be soon as late—what does it matter to anybody?"

The woman did not reply, but turned and went into the house. The man in the engine-cab stood assertive, till she returned with a cup of tea and a piece of bread and butter on a plate. She went up the steps and stood near the footplate of the hissing engine.

"You needn't 'a' brought me bread an' butter," said her father. "But a cup of tea"—he sipped appreciatively—"it's very nice." He sipped for a moment or two, then: "I hear as Walter's got another bout on," he said.

"When hasn't he?" said the woman bitterly.

"I heered tell of him in the 'Lord Nelson' braggin' as he was going to spend that b—— afore he went: half a sovereign that was."

"When?" asked the woman.

"A' Sat'day night—I know that's true."

"Very likely," she laughed bitterly. "He gives me twenty-three shillings."

"Aye, it's a nice thing, when a man can do nothing with his money but make a beast of himself!" said the grey-whiskered man. The woman turned her head away. Her father swallowed the last of his tea and handed her the cup.

"Aye," he sighed, wiping his mouth. "It's a settler, it is——"

He put his hand on the lever. The little engine strained and groaned, and the train rumbled towards the crossing. The woman again looked across the metals. Darkness was settling over the spaces of the railway and trucks: the miners, in grey sombre groups, were still passing home. The winding-engine pulsed hurriedly, with brief pauses. Elizabeth Bates looked at the dreary flow of men, then she went indoors. Her husband did not come.

The kitchen was small and full of firelight; red coals piled glowing up the chimney mouth. All the life of the room seemed in the white, warm hearth and the steel fender reflecting the red fire. The cloth was laid for tea; cups glinted in the shadows. At the back, where the lowest stairs protruded into the room, the boy sat struggling with a knife and a piece of whitewood. He was almost hidden in the shadow. It was half-past four. They had but to await the father's coming to begin tea. As the mother watched her son's sullen little struggle with the wood, she saw herself in his silence and pertinacity; she saw the father in her child's indifference to all but himself. She seemed to be occupied by her husband. He had probably gone past his home, slung past his own door, to drink before he came in, while his dinner spoiled and wasted in waiting. She glanced at the clock, then took the potatoes to strain them in the yard. The garden and fields beyond the brook were closed in uncertain darkness. When she rose with the saucepan, leaving the drain steaming into the night behind her, she saw the yellow lamps were lit along the high road that went up the hill away beyond the space of the railway lines and the field.

Then again she watched the men trooping home, fewer now and fewer.

Indoors the fire was sinking and the room was dark red. The woman put her saucepan on the hob, and set a batter pudding near the mouth of the oven. Then she stood unmoving. Directly, gratefully, came quick young steps to the door. Someone hung on the latch a moment, then a little girl entered and began pulling off her outdoor things, dragging a mass of curls, just ripening from gold to brown, over her eyes with her hat.

Her mother chid her for coming late from school, and said she would have to keep her at home the dark winter days.

"Why, mother, it's hardly a bit dark yet. The lamp's not lighted, and my father's not home."

"No, he isn't. But it's a quarter to five! Did you see anything of him?"

The child became serious. She looked at her mother with large, wistful blue eyes.

"No, mother, I've never seen him. Why? Has he come up an' gone past, to Old Brinsley? He hasn't, mother, 'cos I never saw him."

"He'd watch that," said the mother bitterly, "he'd take care as you didn't see him. But you may depend upon it, he's seated in the 'Prince o' Wales.' He wouldn't be this late."

The girl looked at her mother piteously.

"Let's have our teas, mother, should we?" said she.

The mother called John to table. She opened the door once more and looked out across the darkness of the lines. All was deserted: she could not hear the winding-engines.

"Perhaps," she said to herself, "he's stopped to get some ripping done."

They sat down to tea. John, at the end of the table near the door, was almost lost in the darkness. Their faces were hidden from each other. The girl crouched against the fender slowly moving a thick piece of bread before the fire. The lad, his face a dusky mark on the shadow, sat watching her who was transfigured in the red glow.

"I do think it's beautiful to look in the fire," said the child.

"Do you?" said her mother. "Why?"

"It's so red, and full of little caves—and it feels so nice, and you can fair smell it."

"It'll want mending directly," replied her mother, "and then if your father comes he'll carry on and say there never is a fire when a man comes home sweating from the pit. A public-house is always warm enough."

There was silence till the boy said complainingly: "Make haste, our Annie."

"Well, I am doing! I can't make the fire do it no faster, can I?"

"She keeps wafflin' it about so's to make 'er slow," grumbled the boy.

"Don't have such an evil imagination, child," replied the mother.

Soon the room was busy in the darkness with the crisp sound of crunching. The mother ate very little. She drank her tea determinedly, and sat thinking. When she rose her anger was evident in the stern unbending of her head. She looked at the pudding in the fender, and broke out:

"It is a scandalous thing as a man can't even come home to his dinner! If it's crozzled up to a cinder I don't see why I should care. Past his very door he goes to get to a public-house, and here I sit with his dinner waiting for him——"

She went out. As she dropped piece after piece of coal on the red fire, the shadows fell on the walls, till the room was almost in total darkness.

"I canna see," grumbled the invisible John. In spite of herself, the mother laughed.

"You know the way to your mouth," she said. She set the dust-pan outside the door. When she came again like a shadow on the hearth, the lad repeated, complaining sulkily:

"I canna see."

"Good gracious!" cried the mother irritably, "you're as bad as your father if it's a bit dusk!"

Nevertheless she took a paper spill from a sheaf on the mantelpiece and proceeded to light the lamp that hung from the ceiling in the middle of the room. As she reached up, her figure displayed itself just rounding with maternity.

"Oh, mother——!" exclaimed the girl.

"What?" said the woman, suspended in the act of putting the lamp glass over the flame. The copper reflector shone handsomely on her, as she stood with uplifted arm, turning to face her daughter.

"You've got a flower in your apron!" said the child, in a little rapture at this unusual event.

"Goodness me!" exclaimed the woman, relieved. "One would think the house was afire." She replaced the glass and waited a moment before turning up the wick. A pale shadow was seen floating vaguely on the floor.

"Let me smell!" said the child, still rapturously, coming forward and putting her face to her mother's waist.

"Go along, silly!" said the mother, turning up the lamp. The light revealed their suspense so that the woman felt it almost unbearable. Annie was still bending at her waist. Irritably, the mother took the flowers out from her apron-band.

"Oh, mother—don't take them out!" Annie cried, catching her hand and trying to replace the sprig.

"Such nonsense!" said the mother, turning away. The child put the pale chrysanthemums to her lips, murmuring:

"Don't they smell beautiful!"

Her mother gave a short laugh.

"No," she said, "not to me. It was chrysanthemums when I married him, and chrysanthemums when you were born, and the first time they ever brought him home drunk, he'd got brown chrysanthemums in his button-hole."

She looked at the children. Their eyes and their parted lips were wondering. The mother sat rocking in silence for some time. Then she looked at the clock.

"Twenty minutes to six!" In a tone of fine bitter carelessness she continued: "Eh, he'll not come now till they bring him. There he'll stick! But he needn't come rolling in here in his pit-dirt, for I won't wash him. He can lie on the floor—— Eh, what a fool I've been, what a fool! And this is what I came here for, to this dirty hole, rats and all, for him to slink past his very door. Twice last week—he's begun now——"

She silenced herself, and rose to clear the table.

While for an hour or more the children played, subduedly intent, fertile of imagination, united in fear of the mother's wrath, and in dread of their father's home-coming, Mrs. Bates sat in her rocking-chair making a "singlet" of thick cream-coloured flannel, which gave a dull wounded sound as she tore off the grey edge. She worked at her sewing with energy, listening to the children, and her anger wearied itself, lay down to rest, opening its eyes from time to time and steadily watching, its ears raised to listen. Sometimes even her anger quailed and shrank, and the mother suspended her sewing, tracing the footsteps that thudded along the sleepers outside; she would lift her head sharply to bid the children "hush," but she recovered herself in time, and the footsteps went past the gate, and the children were not flung out of their play-world.

But at last Annie sighed, and gave in. She glanced at her waggon of slippers, and loathed the game. She turned plaintively to her mother.

"Mother!"—but she was inarticulate.

John crept out like a frog from under the sofa. His mother glanced up.

"Yes," she said, "just look at those shirt-sleeves!"

The boy held them out to survey them, saying nothing. Then somebody called in a hoarse voice away down the line, and suspense bristled in the room, till two people had gone by outside, talking.

"It is time for bed," said the mother.

"My father hasn't come," wailed Annie plaintively. But her mother was primed with courage.

"Never mind. They'll bring him when he does come—like a log." She meant there would be no scene. "And he may sleep on the floor till he wakes himself. I know he'll not go to work to-morrow after this!"

The children had their hands and faces wiped with a flannel. They were very quiet. When they had put on their nightdresses, they said their prayers, the boy mumbling. The mother looked down at them, at the brown silken bush of intertwining curls in the nape of the girl's neck, at the little black head of the lad, and her heart burst with anger at their father who caused all three such distress. The children hid their faces in her skirts for comfort.

When Mrs. Bates came down, the room was strangely empty, with a tension of expectancy. She took up her sewing and stitched for some time without raising her head. Meantime her anger was tinged with fear.

II

The clock struck eight and she rose suddenly, dropping her sewing on her chair. She went to the stairfoot door, opened it, listening. Then she went out, locking the door behind her.

Something scuffled in the yard, and she started, though she knew it was only the rats with which the place was overrun. The night was very dark. In the great bay of railway lines, bulked with trucks, there was no trace of light, only away back she could see a few yellow lamps at the pit-top, and the red smear of the burning pit-bank on the night. She hurried along the edge of the track, then, crossing the converging lines, came to the stile by the white gates, whence she emerged on the road. Then the fear which had led her shrank. People were walking up to New Brinsley; she saw the lights in the houses; twenty yards further on were the broad windows of the "Prince of Wales," very warm and bright, and the loud voices of men could be heard distinctly. What a fool she had been to imagine that anything had happened to him! He was merely drinking over there at the "Prince of Wales." She faltered. She had never yet been to fetch him, and she never would go. So she continued her walk towards the long straggling line of houses, standing blank on the highway. She entered a passage between the dwellings.

"Mr. Rigley?—Yes! Did you want him? No, he's not in at this minute."

The raw-boned woman leaned forward from her dark scullery and peered at the other, upon whom fell a dim light through the blind of the kitchen window.

"Is it Mrs. Bates?" she asked in a tone tinged with respect.

"Yes. I wondered if your Master was at home. Mine hasn't come yet."

"'Asn't 'e! Oh, Jack's been 'ome an' 'ad 'is dinner an' gone out. 'E's just gone for 'alf an hour afore bedtime. Did you call at the 'Prince of Wales'?"

"No——"

"No, you didn't like——! It's not very nice." The other woman was indulgent. There was an awkward pause. "Jack never said nothink about——about your Mester," she said.

"No!—I expect he's stuck in there!"

Elizabeth Bates said this bitterly, and with recklessness. She knew that the woman across the yard was standing at her door listening, but she did not care. As she turned:

"Stop a minute! I'll just go an' ask Jack if 'e knows anythink," said Mrs. Rigley.

"Oh, no—I wouldn't like to put——!"

"Yes, I will, if you'll just step inside an' see as th' childer doesn't come downstairs and set theirselves afire."

Elizabeth Bates, murmuring a remonstrance, stepped inside. The other woman apologized for the state of the room.

The kitchen needed apology. There were little frocks and trousers and childish undergarments on the squab and on the floor, and a litter of playthings everywhere. On the black American cloth of the table were pieces of bread and cake, crusts, slops, and a teapot with cold tea.

"Eh, ours is just as bad," said Elizabeth Bates, looking at the woman, not at the house. Mrs. Rigley put a shawl over her head and hurried out, saying:

"I shanna be a minute."

The other sat, noting with faint disapproval the general untidiness of the room. Then she fell to counting the shoes of various sizes scattered over the floor. There were twelve. She sighed and said to herself, "No wonder!"—glancing at the litter. There came the scratching of two pairs of feet on the yard, and the Ripleys entered. Elizabeth Bates rose. Rigley was a big man, with very large bones. His head looked particularly bony. Across his temple was a blue scar, caused by a wound got in the pit, a wound in which the coal-dust remained blue like tattooing.

"'Asna 'e come whoam yit?" asked the man, without any form of greeting, but with deference and sympathy. "I couldna say wheer he is—'e's non ower theer!"—he jerked his head to signify the "Prince of Wales."

"'E's 'appen gone up to th' 'Yew,'" said Mrs. Rigley.

There was another pause. Rigley had evidently something to get off his mind:

"Ah left 'im finishin' a stint," he began. "Loose-all 'ad bin gone about ten minutes when we com'n away, an' I shouted, 'Are ter comin', Walt?' an' 'e said, 'Go on, Ah shanna be but a'ef a minnit,' so we com'n ter th' bottom, me an' Bowers, thinkin' as 'e wor just behint, an' 'ud come up i' th' next bantle——"

He stood perplexed, as if answering a charge of deserting his mate. Elizabeth Bates, now again certain of disaster, hastened to reassure him:

"I expect 'e's gone up to th' 'Yew Tree,' as you say. It's not the first time. I've fretted myself into a fever before now. He'll come home when they carry him."

"Ay, isn't it too bad!" deplored the other woman.

"I'll just step up to Dick's an' see if 'e is theer," offered the man, afraid of appearing alarmed, afraid of taking liberties.

"Oh, I wouldn't think of bothering you that far," said Elizabeth Bates, with emphasis, but he knew she was glad of his offer.

As they stumbled up the entry, Elizabeth Bates heard Rigley's wife run across the yard and open her neighbour's door. At this, suddenly all the blood in her body seemed to switch away from her heart.

"Mind!" warned Rigley. "Ah've said many a time as Ah'd fill up them ruts in this entry, sumb'dy 'll be breakin' their legs yit."

She recovered herself and walked quickly along with the miner.

"I don't like leaving the children in bed, and nobody in the house," she said.

"No, you dunna!" he replied courteously. They were soon at the gate of the cottage.

"Well, I shanna be many minnits. Dunna you be frettin' now, 'e'll be all right," said the butty.

"Thank you very much, Mr. Rigley," she replied.

"You're welcome!" he stammered, moving away. "I shanna be many minnits."

The house was quiet. Elizabeth Bates took off her hat and shawl, and rolled back the rug. When she had finished, she sat down. It was a few minutes past nine. She was startled by the rapid chuff of the winding-engine at the pit, and the sharp whirr of the brakes on the rope as it descended. Again she felt the painful sweep of her blood, and she put her hand to her side, saying aloud, "Good gracious!—it's only the nine o'clock deputy going down," rebuking herself.

She sat still, listening. Half an hour of this, and she was wearied out.

"What am I working myself up like this for?" she said pitifully to herself, "I s'll only be doing myself some damage."

She took out her sewing again.

At a quarter to ten there were footsteps. One person! She watched for the door to open. It was an elderly woman, in a black bonnet and a black woollen shawl—his mother. She was about sixty years old, pale, with blue eyes, and her face all wrinkled and lamentable. She shut the door and turned to her daughter-in-law peevishly.

"Eh, Lizzie, whatever shall we do, whatever shall we do!" she cried.

Elizabeth drew back a little, sharply.

"What is it, mother?" she said.

The elder woman seated herself on the sofa.

"I don't know, child, I can't tell you!"—she shook her head slowly. Elizabeth sat watching her, anxious and vexed.

"I don't know," replied the grandmother, sighing very deeply. "There's no end to my troubles, there isn't. The things I've gone through, I'm sure it's enough——" She wept without wiping her eyes, the tears running.

"But, mother," interrupted Elizabeth, "what do you mean? What is it?"

The grandmother slowly wiped her eyes. The fountains of her tears were stopped by Elizabeth's directness. She wiped her eyes slowly.

"Poor child! Eh, you poor thing!" she moaned. "I don't know what we're going to do, I don't—and you as you are—it's a thing, it is indeed!"

Elizabeth waited.

"Is he dead?" she asked, and at the words her heart swung violently, though she felt a slight flush of shame at the ultimate extravagance of the question. Her words sufficiently frightened the old lady, almost brought her to herself.

"Don't say so, Elizabeth! We'll hope it's not as bad as that; no, may the Lord spare us that, Elizabeth. Jack Rigley came just as I was sittin' down to a glass afore going to bed, an' 'e said, 'Appen you'll go down th' line, Mrs. Bates. Walt's had an accident. 'Appen you'll go an' sit wi' 'er till we can get him home.' I hadn't time to ask him a word afore he was gone. An' I put my bonnet on an' come straight down, Lizzie. I thought to myself, 'Eh, that poor blessed child, if anybody should come an' tell her of a sudden, there's no knowin' what'll 'appen to 'er.' You mustn't let it upset you, Lizzie—or you know what to expect. How long is it, six months—or is it five, Lizzie? Ay!"—the old woman shook her head—"time slips on, it slips on! Ay!"

Elizabeth's thoughts were busy elsewhere. If he was killed—would she be able to manage on the little pension and what she could earn?—she counted up rapidly. If he was hurt—they wouldn't take him to the hospital

—how tiresome he would be to nurse!—but perhaps she'd be able to get him away from the drink and his hateful ways. She would—while he was ill. The tears offered to come to her eyes at the picture. But what sentimental luxury was this she was beginning? She turned to consider the children. At any rate she was absolutely necessary for them. They were her business.

"Ay!" repeated the old woman, "it seems but a week or two since he brought me his first wages. Ay—he was a good lad, Elizabeth, he was, in his way. I don't know why he got to be such a trouble, I don't. He was a happy lad at home, only full of spirits. But there's no mistake he's been a handful of trouble, he has! I hope the Lord'll spare him to mend his ways. I hope so, I hope so. You've had a sight o' trouble with him, Elizabeth, you have indeed. But he was a jolly enough lad wi' me, he was, I can assure you. I don't know how it is. . . ."

The old woman continued to muse aloud, a monotonous irritating sound, while Elizabeth thought concentratedly, startled once, when she heard the winding-engine chuff quickly, and the brakes skirr with a shriek. Then she heard the engine more slowly, and the brakes made no sound. The old woman did not notice. Elizabeth waited in suspense. The mother-in-law talked, with lapses into silence.

"But he wasn't your son, Lizzie, an' it makes a difference. Whatever he was, I remember him when he was little, an' I learned to understand him and to make allowances. You've got to make allowances for them——"

It was half-past ten, and the old woman was saying: "But it's trouble from beginning to end; you're never too old for trouble, never too old for that——" when the gate banged back, and there were heavy feet on the steps.

"I'll go, Lizzie, let me go," cried the old woman, rising. But Elizabeth was at the door. It was a man in pit-clothes.

"They're bringin' 'im, Missis," he said. Elizabeth's heart halted a moment. Then it surged on again, almost suffocating her.

"Is he—is it bad?" she asked.

The man turned away, looking at the darkness:

"The doctor says 'e'd been dead hours. 'E saw 'im i' th' lamp-cabin."

The old woman, who stood just behind Elizabeth, dropped into a chair, and folded her hands, crying: "Oh, my boy, my boy!"

"Hush!" said Elizabeth, with a sharp twitch of a frown. "Be still, mother, don't waken th' children: I wouldn't have them down for anything!"

The old woman moaned softly, rocking herself. The man was drawing away. Elizabeth took a step forward.

"How was it?" she asked.

"Well, I couldn't say for sure," the man replied, very ill at ease. "'E wor finishin' a stint an' th' butties 'ad gone, an' a lot o' stuff come down atop 'n 'im."

"And crushed him?" cried the widow, with a shudder.

"No," said the man, "it fell at th' back of 'im. 'E wor under th' face, an' it niver touched 'im. It shut 'im in. It seems 'e wor smothered."

Elizabeth shrank back. She heard the old woman behind her cry:

"What?—what did 'e say it was?"

The man replied, more loudly: "'E wor smothered!"

Then the old woman wailed aloud, and this relieved Elizabeth.

"Oh, mother," she said, putting her hand on the old woman, "don't waken th' children, don't waken th' children."

She wept a little, unknowing, while the old mother rocked herself and moaned. Elizabeth remembered that they were bringing him home, and she must be ready. "They'll lay him in the parlour," she said to herself, standing a moment pale and perplexed.

Then she lighted a candle and went into the tiny room. The air was cold and damp, but she could not make a fire, there was no fireplace. She set down the candle and looked round. The candlelight glittered on the lustre-glasses, on the two vases that held some of the pink chrysanthemums, and on the dark mahogany. There was a cold, deathly smell of chrysanthemums in the room. Elizabeth stood looking at the flowers. She turned away, and calculated whether there would be room to lay him on the floor, between the couch and the chiffonier. She pushed the chairs aside. There would be room to lay him down and to step round him. Then she fetched the old red tablecloth, and another old cloth, spreading them down to save her bit of carpet. She shivered on leaving the parlour; so, from the dresser-drawer she took a clean shirt and put it at the fire to air. All the time her mother-in-law was rocking herself in the chair and moaning.

"You'll have to move from there, mother," said Elizabeth. "They'll be bringing him in. Come in the rocker."

The old mother rose mechanically, and seated herself by the fire, continuing to lament. Elizabeth went into the pantry for another candle, and there, in the little penthouse under the naked tiles, she heard them coming. She stood still in the pantry doorway, listening. She heard them pass the end of the house, and come awkwardly down the three steps, a jumble of shuffling footsteps and muttering voices. The old woman was silent. The men were in the yard.

Then Elizabeth heard Matthews, the manager of the pit, say: "You go in first, Jim. Mind!"

The door came open, and the two women saw a collier backing into the room, holding one end of a stretcher, on which they could see the nailed pit-boots of the dead man. The two carriers halted, the man at the head stooping to the lintel of the door.

"Wheer will you have him?" asked the manager, a short, white-bearded man.

Elizabeth roused herself and came from the pantry carrying the unlighted candle.

"In the parlour," she said.

"In there, Jim!" pointed the manager, and the carriers backed round into the tiny room. The coat with which they had covered the body fell off as they awkwardly turned through the two doorways, and the women saw their man, naked to the waist, lying stripped for work. The old woman began to moan in a low voice of horror.

"Lay th' stretcher at th' side," snapped the manager, "an' put 'im on th' cloths. Mind now, mind! Look you now——!"

One of the men had knocked off a vase of chrysanthemums. He stared awkwardly, then they set down the stretcher. Elizabeth did not look at her husband. As soon as she could get in the room, she went and picked up the broken vase and the flowers.

"Wait a minute!" she said.

The three men waited in silence while she mopped up the water with a duster.

"Eh, what a job, what a job, to be sure!" the manager was saying, rubbing his brow with trouble and perplexity. "Never knew such a thing in my life, never! He'd no business to ha' been left. I never knew such a thing in my life! Fell over him clean as a whistle, an' shut him in. Not four foot of space, there wasn't—yet it scarce bruised him."

He looked down at the dead man, lying prone, half naked, all grimed with coal-dust.

"'Sphyxiated,' the doctor said. It is the most terrible job I've ever known. Seems as if it was done o' purpose. Clean over him, an' shut 'im in, like a mouse-trap"—he made a sharp, descending gesture with his hand.

The colliers standing by jerked aside their heads in hopeless comment.

The horror of the thing bristled upon them all.

Then they heard the girl's voice upstairs calling shrilly: "Mother, mother—who is it? Mother, who is it?"

Elizabeth hurried to the foot of the stairs and opened the door:

"Go to sleep!" she commanded sharply. "What are you shouting about? Go to sleep at once—there's nothing——"

Then she began to mount the stairs. They could hear her on the boards, and on the plaster floor of the little bedroom. They could hear her distinctly:

"What's the matter now?—what's the matter with you, silly thing?"—her voice was much agitated, with an unreal gentleness.

"I thought it was some men come," said the plaintive voice of the child. "Has he come?"

"Yes, they've brought him. There's nothing to make a fuss about. Go to sleep now, like a good child."

They could hear her voice in the bedroom, they waited whilst she covered the children under the bedclothes.

"Is he drunk?" asked the girl, timidly, faintly.

"No! No—he's not! He—he's asleep."

"Is he asleep downstairs?"

"Yes—and don't make a noise."

There was silence for a moment, then the men heard the frightened child again:

"What's that noise?"

"It's nothing, I tell you, what are you bothering for?"

The noise was the grandmother moaning. She was oblivious of everything, sitting on her chair rocking and moaning. The manager put his hand on her arm and bade her "Sh—sh!!"

The old woman opened her eyes and looked at him. She was shocked by this interruption, and seemed to wonder.

"What time is it?"—the plaintive thin voice of the child, sinking back unhappily into sleep, asked this last question.

"Ten o'clock," answered the mother more softly. Then she must have bent down and kissed the children.

Matthews beckoned to the men to come away. They put on their caps and took up the stretcher. Stepping over the body, they tiptoed out of the house. None of them spoke till they were far from the wakeful children.

When Elizabeth came down she found her mother alone on the parlour floor, leaning over the dead man, the tears dropping on him.

"We must lay him out," the wife said. She put on the kettle, then returning knelt at the feet, and began to unfasten the knotted leather laces. The room was clammy and dim with only one candle, so that she had to bend her face almost to the floor. At last she got off the heavy boots and put them away.

"You must help me now," she whispered to the old woman. Together they stripped the man.

When they arose, saw him lying in the naïve dignity of death, the women stood arrested in fear and respect. For a few moments they remained still, looking down, the old mother whimpering. Elizabeth felt countermanded. She saw him, how utterly inviolable he lay in himself. She had nothing to do with him. She could not accept it. Stooping, she laid her hand on him, in claim. He was still warm, for the mine was hot where he had died. His mother had his face between her hands, and was murmuring incoherently. The old tears fell in succession as drops from wet leaves; the mother was not weeping, merely her tears flowed. Elizabeth embraced the body of her husband, with cheek and lips. She seemed to be listening, inquiring, trying to get some connection. But she could not. She was driven away. He was impregnable.

She rose, went into the kitchen, where she poured warm water into a bowl, brought soap and flannel and a soft towel.

"I must wash him," she said.

Then the old mother rose stiffly, and watched Elizabeth as she carefully washed his face, carefully brushing the big blond moustache from his mouth with the flannel. She was afraid with a bottomless fear, so she ministered to him. The old woman, jealous, said:

"Let me wipe him!"—and she kneeled on the other side drying slowly as Elizabeth washed, her big black bonnet sometimes brushing the dark head of her daughter-in-law. They worked thus in silence for a long time. They never forgot it was death, and the touch of the man's dead body gave them strange emotions, different in each of the women; a great dread possessed them both, the mother felt the lie was given to her womb, she was denied; the wife felt the utter isolation of the human soul, the child within her was a weight apart from her.

At last it was finished. He was a man of handsome body, and his face showed no traces of drink. He was blond, full-fleshed, with fine limbs. But he was dead.

"Bless him," whispered his mother, looking always at his face, and speaking out of sheer terror. "Dear lad—bless him!" She spoke in a faint, sibilant ecstasy of fear and mother love.

Elizabeth sank down again to the floor, and put her face against his neck, and trembled and shuddered. But she had to draw away again. He was dead, and her living flesh had no place against his. A great dread and weariness held her: she was so unavailing. Her life was gone like this.

"White as milk he is, clear as a twelve-month baby, bless him, the darling!" the old mother murmured to herself. "Not a mark on him, clear and clean and white, beautiful as ever a child was made," she murmured with pride. Elizabeth kept her face hidden.

"He went peaceful, Lizzie—peaceful as sleep. Isn't he beautiful, the lamb? Ay—he must ha' made his peace, Lizzie. 'Appen he made it all right, Lizzie, shut in there. He'd have time. He wouldn't look like this if he hadn't made his peace. The lamb, the dear lamb. Eh, but he had a hearty laugh. I loved to hear it. He had the heartiest laugh, Lizzie, as a lad——"

Elizabeth looked up. The man's mouth was fallen back, slightly open under the cover of the moustache. The eyes, half shut, did not show glazed in the obscurity. Life with its smoky burning gone from him, had left him apart and utterly alien to her. And she knew what a stranger he was to her. In her womb was ice of fear, because of this separate stranger with whom she had been living as one flesh. Was this what it all meant—utter, intact separateness, obscured by heat of living? In dread she turned her face away. The fact was too deadly. There had been nothing between them, and yet they had come together, exchanging their nakedness repeatedly. Each time he had taken her, they had been two isolated beings, far apart as now. He was no more responsible than she. The child was like ice in her womb. For as she looked at the dead man, her mind, cold and detached, said clearly: "Who am I? What have I been doing? I have been fighting a husband who did not exist. He existed all the time. What wrong have I done? What was that I have been living with? There lies the reality, this man." And her soul died in her for fear: she knew she had never seen him, he had never seen her, they had met in the dark and had fought in the dark, not knowing whom they met nor whom they fought. And now she saw, and turned silent in seeing. For she had been wrong. She had said he was something he was not; she had felt familiar with him. Whereas he was apart all the while, living as she never lived, feeling as she never felt.

In fear and shame she looked at his naked body, that she had known falsely. And he was the father of her children. Her soul was torn from her body and stood apart. She looked at his naked body and was ashamed, as if she had denied it. After all, it was itself. It seemed awful to her. She looked at his face, and she turned her own face to the wall. For his look was other than hers, his way was not her way. She had denied him what he was—she saw it now. She had refused him as himself. And this had been her life, and his life. She was grateful to death, which restored the truth. And she knew she was not dead.

And all the while her heart was bursting with grief and pity for him. What had he suffered? What stretch of horror for this helpless man! She was rigid with agony. She had not been able to help him. He had been cruelly injured, this naked man, this other being, and she could make no reparation. There were the children—but the children belonged to life. This dead man had nothing to do with them. He and she were only channels through which life had flowed to issue in the children. She was a mother—but how awful she knew it now to have been a wife. And he, dead now, how awful he must have felt it to be a husband. She felt that in the next world he would be a stranger to her. If they met there, in the beyond, they would only be ashamed of what had been before. The children had come, for some mysterious reason, out of both of them. But the children did not unite them. Now he was dead, she knew how eternally he was apart from her, how eternally he had nothing more to do with her. She saw this episode of her life closed. They had denied each other in life. Now he had withdrawn. An anguish came over her. It was finished then: it had become hopeless between them long before he died. Yet he had been her husband. But how little!

"Have you got his shirt, 'Lizabeth?"

Elizabeth turned without answering, though she strove to weep and behave as her mother-in-law expected. But she could not, she was silenced. She went into the kitchen and returned with the garment.

"It is aired," she said, grasping the cotton shirt here and there to try. She was almost ashamed to handle him; what right had she or any one to lay hands on him; but her touch was humble on his body. It was hard work to clothe him. He was so heavy and inert. A terrible dread gripped her all the while: that he could be so heavy and utterly inert, unresponsive, apart. The horror of the distance between them was almost too much for her—it was so infinite a gap she must look across.

At last it was finished. They covered him with a sheet and left him lying, with his face bound. And she fastened the door of the little parlour, lest the children should see what was lying there. Then, with peace sunk heavy on her heart, she went about making tidy the kitchen. She knew she submitted to life, which was her immediate master. But from death, her ultimate master, she winced with fear and shame.

THE CHINK

---

WE HAD LEFT the trenches at dawn, with empty wicker cages fastened to our shoulders. It was the hour at which the war seemed to doze, overcome by weariness at the end of the night; the sentries' heads began to nod as they leaned against their armoured parapets with half-closed eyes and the guns seemed to yawn on their carriages. . . . It was also the hour of raids and surprise attacks, of sudden bombardments which stupefy men and seem to rob them of all will-power. But on that particular day all was quiet in the cheerless trenches, after a feverish, jumpy night in which sudden bursts of fire disturbed the flat calm, in which rockets called for barrages and stopped them again almost as soon as they had begun, and in which the men hurriedly put on their gas-masks at the sound of Klaxon-horns without anyone knowing why or whence the sound had come. A sleepy machine-gun spread its bullets around, and fatigue-parties, their pipes between their teeth, came down communication trenches in smoky processions, swinging water-bottles full of coffee in their hands. We were already walking in the open, passing through the barbed wire at breaches indicated by fir branches, on the backward slope of the crest, between the pale moon and the hazy sun; banks of mist wound along below us, following the course of a stream; the white frosty grass seemed to turn a mauve colour on the further slopes. Then, little by little, the sickle moon faded in the pink sky and the sun shone brightly on the black spruces on which the rime looked like a primitive form of decoration, composed of sugar or spun glass. My companion, the Chink, began to roll himself a cigarette and to talk interminably, scarcely pausing even for breath.

He was tall and sturdy, with shiny black hair and a short thin moustache. Beneath the grime on his face his skin was yellow; he never washed this, but after being soaped it would probably have shone like a ball of polished box-wood. And finally there were his eyes, elongated towards the temples, which, added to his colour and a certain indefinite air of mystery and drollery, had earned him the nickname of "The Chink", of which he was rather proud. Whence did he come? What was his family? What was his trade? An imaginative liar, he often told us the story of his life, but it was never the same story. His boasting used to amaze and disconcert and attract us; he was agreeable enough, a bit of a wag and rather domineering; when he talked the others used to gather round him, the simple ones open-mouthed and the more sophisticated incredulous. If some sceptic were to point out contradictions or gross improbabilities in any of his statements, he would either reply by some coarsely facetious remark or by insults, according to his mood, or by blows which were formidable enough in themselves and to which he gave English names which added to their moral effect. From the general basis of his stories and of his vocabulary one could deduce that he had once served in a disciplinary battalion and had worked irregularly as an electrician and as a printer and had been in all sorts of vague professions and had done all sorts of odd jobs. A "god-mother" who lived in a dingy house near the Montparnasse railway-station sent him a postal-order for ten francs every fortnight and a picture-postcard every Sunday; he seemed to have no other correspondent. He himself sometimes claimed to be the son of a cook in the Chinese Embassy and a show-girl at a low music-hall in Montparnasse, an illusion born of his nickname, and sometimes the son of a priest from the Yonne district who very nearly became a bishop. His popularity in the company was founded, apart from the respect he commanded by his "swings" and "uppercuts", on the dual faculty of being able to belch at will and to light his effluvia at a candle flame. He owed his lucky position to these two talents; I owed mine to a certain skill at poker, at which the quartermaster-sergeant, who was always hard up, was worth forty or fifty francs a month to me.

So we had a "cushy job", and we were the objects of envy and contempt on the part of our comrades. Every morning we trudged eight miles with our wicker baskets on our backs to the divisional pigeon-loft and eight miles back with the pigeons, which would be released in the line and, after circling three times in the sky, would return to their home, lit up by a red light in the highest attic of the village in which they lived. Having delivered our cooing burden we were exempt from patrols, fatigues and guards and spent the rest of the time in telling stories, playing cards and sleeping until the following morning in our bunks made of woven wire, unless, of course, there was a bombardment, a gas-attack or a raid. But that, as the Chink said, was no longer soldiering, it was war.

II

My companion looked at the clouds scurrying towards the East and rambled on in his usual way. I liked the unexpectedness and the incongruity of his associations of ideas and his mobile imagination which touched on everything but settled on nothing.

"Yes, my boy, it's a good job, a cushy job. . . . Just walking about like tourists with a wicker knapsack on one's back. There are always jobs in wartime for intellectuals and people with influence and independent people. Why, I could have been an N.C.O. myself but I didn't trouble about it: in spite of my education I like freedom. I've often been offered stripes. I commanded the section in the Faubourg St-Laurent at Arras. The major gave me some champagne, a bottle of gooseberry wine which didn't cost him much, out of a cellar as big as the Pantheon. I drank it, but I didn't take the stripes. I told him that I was working for the glory and the fraternity of peoples, for the crushing of militarism and for the League of Nations, not for ambition. The old man was rather sour and asked me if I was a Socialist. "Definitely," I replied. "Definitely" is a word which means that one's serious. That shut him up: the shock killed him three days later, that and a shrapnel splinter in the navel which gave him appendicitis, which was the fashionable disease then. Corporal! Sergeant! Sergeant-major! All a lot of humbug! We're stretcher-bearers for pigeons, that's the job for me! Oh, look at those clouds, one black and one white. They're going to box. The nigger Sam MacVea against Carpentier, four-ounce gloves, middle-weights, forty rounds. Time! The coloured man knows a thing or two. Right in the solar plexus! One, two, three! . . . The gong! . . . I tell you the paleface has taken the count! Filthy greasy nigger! Now there's a jockey in orange and blue coming past the post, riding in the American style, laughing at the rest of the field. I've bet fifteen francs on the rails and a hundred and twenty in the paddock. Where's my bookie gone? I want my money. And there's the Nesle Tower over there, above that shattered tree. 'It was a noble old man's head!' Oh, my friend, what a job, what a cushy job! The pigeon-fancier, little old Van de Putte, will give us a glass of spirits behind the wood-pile while he's smoking his half-penny pipe which stinks of nicotine and is as filthy as a Corsican's sock. There's always a place for intellectuals in wartime, independent people like you and me. . . ."

He went on talking, suiting his imaginary life and exploits to the undulations of the landscape and the changes in the sky. I did not listen to him, but I allowed myself to be lulled by his verbiage, which conjured up in my mind obscure pictures which dissolved as soon as they had formed; and the movement of my legs sent me off, so to speak, into a state of waking coma. We were now travelling through woods white with rime whose branches swept our cloaks and covered them with shining crystals. We broke through the gossamers stretched from one side of the rides to the other, between the leafless briars with their red berries and the fleecy viburnums. I never opened my mouth. Sometimes the Chink interrupted my vague meditations:

"I'll bet you don't believe me."

I replied mechanically:

"Yes. I believe you."

"Then you're a fool, because I've been talking rot and pulling your leg. But what I'm going to tell you now is gospel truth. The insoluble and unamalgamated truth. Sometimes one gasses away for the sake of gassing, at others one talks in order to think. That's the difference. Now listen to me."

What he likes about words is their resounding value, quite independently of their meaning; verbal explanations enchant him; he neither looks for nor understands any other sort. He says things like "This stuff must be incombustible because it is an ignifuge." He has picked up a compendious vocabulary in all manner of different places; "short-circuit" for anything to do with electricity, "the force of inertia" for the rest of physics. As for the fluctuations of the war, sometimes he sums them up with a casual: "What we need is better communications for the distribution of our effectives," and sometimes his only comment is a single cabalistic word, screwing up his slanting eyes and assuming an air of importance behind his rough greenish muffler, a single word framed by two periods of sybilline silence: "Treachery."

"Do you see that little bit of abandoned trench in the clearing there, behind those ash-trees? It reminds me of an adventure which disgusted me with militarism and glory from the first. We had attacked, in the Forest of Champenoux, a little ditch like that. It was more of a reconnaissance than an attack, as we did not quite understand the situation. I had got a little in advance of the others and when I jumped into the trench there was nothing there but a tin of canned peas, a hymn-book and a German helmet. So I put on the helmet and I started doing my job, walking up and down with my rifle at the slope, like a sentinel outside the Elysée. The section approached crawling on its stomach; the platoon officer saw my helmet and gave the order to fire. But one of the men cried: 'Don't shoot, it's the Chink!' They all laughed a lot, but the officer was furious: he gnawed his moustache and looked at me with eyes like a baboon: and I got a fortnight's fatigues. Then I said: 'Treachery!' After that I lost all interest in the war. . . . Sometimes, however, nature got the upper hand, in spite of my being fed up; then I outdid them all, the patrols, the snipers, all the volunteers for the dirty jobs. One day I raked the German wire with a rake pinched from the colonel's gardener to see if they'd electrified their entanglements, as people said they had. There was a moon shining as large as my bottom: all the others got the wind up merely from watching me. But that was only a flash in the pan. I never really put my heart into anything after the Champenoux affair."

I knew him to be brave enough, with a rather stupid, theatrical, completely useless, but on the whole seasoned kind of bravery, which very few people possess, even as a vice.

"I'm not a fire-eater, you understand. So, in order to avoid trouble, they made me a stretcher-bearer. Me a stretcher-bearer! I earned a lot of money in that job. We were holding a trench sector where there had been a battle and where a lot of corpses had remained between the lines, in no-man's land. The colonel mentioned all those who brought any back in regimental orders. Civilians all long to get the Croix de Guerre so as to dazzle their neighbours and fascinate their women with it; so they volunteered in crowds; only the miserable fellows dared not risk their precious skins. So I used to collect the stiff, at night, for thirty or forty francs, according to my client's purse. Afterwards they wrote to their Member of Parliament to have them taken out of the line; that banished their remorse. Oh, those were good times. Pockets full of money . . . I'll tell you something: the only industries that really pay are those which depend on the meanness of humanity. It's as rich as the Klondike and is quite inexhaustible."

We were descending a steep slope into a valley; in front and on a level with us rose the hutments of Camp-de-la-Fille-Verte, whose smoke floated peacefully up into the air. The Chink picked the over-ripe rowan-berries as he went along and jumped with both feet together on the huge white, black and orange slugs which crawled among the dead leaves like india-rubber lanyards.

"You're a pal, you are. You never say anything. You believe everything I tell you. It never seems to bore you. You're either too polite or too superior, too intelligent or too stupid, I never know which. You disgust me and yet I like you. One of these days I'll put your jaw out with a cross-hook. Recite me a Chinese poem, you old fool, a poem where marvellous things happen and there are wonderful words."

So I improvised, suiting the words and the rhythm to our pace:

"The wise Confucius lives
In his bath of asses' milk
Like the full moon
In the midst of the Milky Way."

The Chink was delighted; he laughed, screwed up his slanting eyes and put his two index fingers in the air like a cheap Chinese figure. I went on:

"The Celestial who reigns over the towns,
The rivers, the rice-field and the junks,
The supreme being whose ensign is a yellow dragon,
Eats, with four-sided scarlet chopsticks,
Ducks' eggs laid seven generations ago."

"I like that, I like that! It makes my liver swell!" cried my companion.

"The eye of the Sun dominates the peaceful sea,
The flower called Ho-to-ho gives out its scent,
The jackdaw does not interrupt the music of the flutes,
The Prince is beloved by his wives and the neat-herd by his oxen.
Here is the Empire of the Calm Morning
And of the Benevolent Afternoon."

The Chink beheaded the dry yellow toad-stools that lay in his path with his stick and continued, doggedly:

"I like those. . . . They're the songs of my own country. I tell you, my old friend, I ought to have been a mandarin with moustaches down to my navel and nails like bayonets. If you wanted, we could find an even better job than that of pigeon-carriers; a job compared with which that of chauffeur to the general at Limoges would seem like the smell of a dung-hill. Listen. You've got education and imagination and I'm a printer, and a good one at that. I've worked on Paris-Sport and on Gil-Blas, at the time when the press wasn't rotten as it is now. I know the alphabets of every language, even that of Hebrew, which is printed the wrong way round. I composed the Greek text of Abbé Pascal's Paroissiales, who wrote about priests and medical theses in which there were so many names of diseases that after reading them you were surprised to find yourself still alive and kicking. Well, we two can get together and start a trench newspaper, something with a good title that will please the colonel and the divisional commander. It's bound to succeed. You can write the stories, heroic stories, naturally, and jokes by soldiers when they sink into the mud up to the waist, when they're getting rained on or trench-mortared or shrapnelled or gassed and taking it all as a jest, and ragging everyone just as if they were among the girls at La Fauvette or the Gaieté-Montparnasse. Naturally, you'll make all this up behind the line, in a pub with a quart of red wine in front of you, and a fire at your back. I'll set up your articles. Oh, I can see myself, whistling while I pick out the letters; and of course I'll correct your spelling mistakes, because everyone knows that journalists can't spell. We'll be keeping up the morale of the troops. Even the officers would want to place copy with us, impressions of battles and diaries; it flatters them. But they'll have to coax us, and pay us. You see, my boy, we'll be like kings!"

"Don't dawdle, Chink. We're none too early as it is; and in any case we ought to hurry just here. They always pepper this place with shells every day at this time. It's a habit they've got. The big ones have even dug up the old men's potatoes and knocked their cabbages down."

It was quite sufficient for me to advise my companion to do something for him immediately to do the opposite. He leaned up against a beech-tree and rolled a cigarette, carefully removing, one by one, the pieces of wood which he always claims to find in Government tobacco, bits of wood big enough to build a corps observation station; and then he caught sight of a party of army telegraphists laying an underground cable in a fairly deep brick-lined trench.

"Hi, there, the Eighth Mudlarks! You've never been so near the line before; you'd better look out and keep your eyes skinned; one's all right here, five miles behind the reserve line. There'd have to be a successful attack for you to be sent to drive trams in Magdeburg. If there are any storm-troops in the sector and the sentries have gone to sleep you're boiled, cleaned up, done for!"

The engineer corporal, a lean man with a goatee and glasses, shrugged his shoulders.

"If you're drunk, buzz off or else put a cork in it!"

"Me buzz off? Me drunk? He insults the infantry and thinks himself a specialist. Specialist in what? A specialist in bloodiness. Why don't they put the engineers, the technicians, the clever people, like me for instance, in the intelligent branches of the army? Do you even know what the cable you are laying is called? Do you know its scientific name? Yes, scientific?"

"I tell you to buzz off and go and sleep it off somewhere."

"Well, specialist, it's called a triphrased cable, because there are three in each. Remember that; it may help you when you try to become a captain."

The Chink impudently enjoyed the effect of his words, his cap on the back of his head, his cigarette stuck in the corner of his mouth, smoking in short puffs; I called to him in vain to come on in order to avoid a brawl. The little corporal had already turned back his sleeves and seized a crowbar. My companion jeered at him:

"You've only to fasten claws on your legs to make you look like a daddy longlegs."

At that moment two almost simultaneous reports were carried to us by the wind; I shouted:

"Look out! Take cover, they're always on time!"

I made for a sort of cave beneath a rock overhanging the path, a disused ammunition dump, among abandoned tools and drums of rusty barbed wire. The engineers lay down at the bottom of the trench into which their corporal disappeared with diabolic speed. The shells came whining towards us. I yelled to the Chink:

"Don't be a fool! Get down!"

He replied, without budging, while relighting his cigarette, which had gone out, in that modest, bantering, doubtful tone of voice which he assumed when he wanted to swagger more effectively, and to appear not to be swaggering:

"They're firing on the batteries."

"You're kidding yourself."

"I'm inoculated against shells."

"You're trying to impress the sappers."

"I don't have to do what you tell me. You're not an N.C.O."

The two shells burst, rather short, shooting out a torrent of shrapnel which rained down like water out of a watering-can, sang through the air and hit the ground with a sharp thud; ragged wisps of black smoke floated in the air, wafted along by the wind. The Chink remained standing and, watching the direction in which the invisible sappers lay out of the corner of his eye, hummed villainously, to the air of a popular tune:

"A corporal is a vegetable
Which drinks and sleeps and smokes.
It cannot even sign its name;
It's as stupid as a pig."

The corporal brandished a wooden sledge-hammer, describing circles with it above the parapet of the trench. The Chink defied him homerically:

"Come out of that, capon, scum of the earth, defeatist! Come, Trotsky, take off your jacket and let's see if you've got a heart or a calf's liver in your chest!"

I made a megaphone of my hands and cried:

"There's a lull. Let's run for it!"

And I set off at the double for the steep road round the corner by which the camp was approached from the far side. Here one could breathe more easily; the road was built below the bluff, through a piece of dead ground which the enemy batteries could not reach. I waited there for my companion, who came strolling along a few minutes later whistling to himself. The bombardment grew fiercer; a droning aeroplane was directing the fire, followed by our anti-aircraft guns, which made a ring of white fluff balls round it: the bases of their shells fell to the right among the dried branches of the undergrowth, making a noise like squashed bees.

"Mind the flies!" said a venerable-looking territorial who had been breaking stones beside the road and was profiting by the enforced interruption to read his newspaper in a gap in the rock wall.

We walked along at a faster pace to make up for lost time. The Chink was capering along in front of me; his jovial face shone in the sunlight, covered with a fine network of wrinkles.

"I've shut the Eighth Mudlarks up: I've ruffled their smugness for them. Listen, I like that. There are plenty of shells falling now, light howitzers, perfect brutes. The game's warming up. They're hidden there among the bricks; it makes those pimps' hair stand on end. Calling themselves specialists and not even knowing what a triphrased underground cable is! The bombardment polarizes them. A fine lot of technicians! Technicians of nothing at all, only fit to strap clamps on their boots and climb telegraph poles and screw insulators on to them, monkeys who unwind cables from their drums with hands sticky with insulating tape. Nothing but mechanical rabbits. It's heart-breaking! And we, who are so competent, are choked and massacred in the infantry!"

A French fighting plane, predatory and active, turned and dived at the German observer; the anti-aircraft guns ceased fire; a few tufts of snowy cotton-wool still floated gently in the sky before dissolving; up above, the machine-guns rattled off in bursts; then the wooded hill-crest cut off the fight from us. The Chink walked sturdily on without saying any more.

III

When we reached Saint-Anthelme-de-Noroy, a small collection of houses lost in its swampy surroundings and inhabited by an artillery wagon-line and a road-making company, the Chink stopped in front of the second house on the left, the only one that remained intact in the hamlet. It stood in front of the drinking-fountain, from which a canvas trough extended, between the skeleton of a burnt-out barn and the blackened, empty stumps of what had been the town-hall before it was bombarded; three Portland stone steps gave evidence of its former splendour. But my companion had no intention of philosophising on the fate of this public building; he was scanning the sound house with its festoons of clay sparrows' nests, shaped like inverted tiaras. Above the window the words "Grocery, Wine, Beer. No Credit Given" were awkwardly scrawled in a handwriting like that of a giant learning his alphabet. A tariff-list was pasted on the closed shutters and on the worm-eaten door an official hand had written in chalk in a beautiful copper-plate: "Out of Bounds for Troops."

A gunner who was washing his leggings in a dixie enlightened us:

"It's no good knocking: they've shut the place up for a month. Some story of serving drinks after closing time and that a lance-corporal knocked out the pot-boy in the back premises when he was tight. The landlord's working in the fields and his wife has gone to stay with her cousin at Nancy. She'll come back at the end of the month with masses of fresh provisions in her kick."

"And the girl?" asked the Chink, eagerly.

"The girl's gone to Nancy as well. She's got a chap there. They say she's going to marry a sergeant in a regiment who was billeted in the village. He's said to come from a decent family and to have money."

My companion gave a hollow groan and we went on. He relapsed into glum silence and I let my thoughts wander. We passed through heath and fallow land and narrow strips of plough which wound round the hills like sashes and accentuated the contours of the ground. A black-and-white magpie clinging to the trunk of a horn-beam fled at our approach and fluttered away over the fields. We could hear a peasant's voice shouting to his horse as he guided his plough for the Autumn crop; a dog barked somewhere and there was the sound of a creaking wheel; solitary sounds filtering through the light mist, which seemed to accentuate the silence.

Suddenly the Chink, between his teeth, muttered:

"Do you know her name?"

"Whose name?"

"Not the Pope's anyway. The woman at the inn."

"I'm not interested in disused women."

"Not the old woman, for the love of Mike, the girl!"

"I don't know it."

"You're silly. It's a pretty name."

"Wait. Flourette was dreaming of it out loud in the dugout while the bomb splinters danced a tango on the corrugated iron roof——"

"Flourette . . . Oh, no, I hate Flourette. He's a bluffer and he's always broke. He hasn't got a bean in spite of the fact that he reshapes government uniforms into a cross between a ballet-skirt and an airman's tunic. If I were the sergeant-major I'd jug him. Shaping tunics at ten francs a time to attract the women! Hell take him! I'll tell you her name: it's Mary, with a y, like the nob's spell it."

"Toadie, also, because she's short and thickset. Two inches of leg and then her bottom."

"And who gave her that nickname? A lot of scrimshankers and good-for-nothings. She's called Mary with a y, in the English way. She's white and plump, well curved without being blubbery, with violet eyes and hair. . . . Hair like one sees on naked women in museums, right down to her knees and the colour of ripe corn, and so soft to touch that one feels as though one had a river of silk running through one's hands."

"Oh, so you've felt it."

"Yes, once, by accident."

I smiled and hummed the sentimental and rather vulgar waltz:

"You Gave Me the Greatest Thrill in Life."

The Chink broke off the reddish-brown branch of an oak and said, roughly:

"Don't jeer, you fool, you don't understand."

We kept silence after this; besides, the track began to rise; the clay, moistened by the rain and kneaded by the horses' hoofs, clung to the soles of our boots; I was trying to get back my breath on the top of the hill when my companion seized me violently by the arm.

"Listen, sonny," he said. "Listen and look. Look at the plains, the hills, the black and red forests and the rivers bordered by golden poplars. I myself like nature and clouds and wind. I've known people in the newspaper offices for which I worked who earned as much as twopence-halfpenny a line and got no kick at all out of nature. If I had been born in the middle-classes, instead of becoming a waster I should have been a novelist, a poet or an electrical inventor. I wouldn't have liked too narrow or too quiet a profession, but something slightly adventurous, and rather leisurely. I've been a type-setter; it's not quite the same thing, perhaps, but they're down the same street. Imagination, nature and women, those are the bees in my bonnet, my diseases."

"But your 'god-mother' in the Hotel de l'Occident et du Brésil. Isn't she enough for you?"

"Oh, you know . . . Don't talk about that, my boy. Chuck it. When I was in the hospital, after my wound, there was a sister there, a little pink-and-white thing, who was always on the move like a water-wagtail. She took an interest in me, this nun did, and then, out of devilry, I used to swear and put forward scandalous theories of life: I influenced others, I stole, I made myself out even worse than I am, and I laughed at her when she came to pray for me. She prayed for my sins, all by herself, at least so she said. Perhaps she was laughing at me; but all the same it made me happy to think this little wagtail twittered 'Hail Marys' for me; it had never happened to me before. When I left she gave me a holy medal. I never dared write to her to tell her how I was getting on. During my convalescence in Paris I found my girl again, my real, regular girl; I beat her when I thought of that nun praying for my sins. It relieved me and seemed to me to be a good action. . . . I tell you once more that I don't belong to the same race as other men, labourers and peasants and shop-keepers and clerks. I am outside the law."

He walked on pensively for a while, then squirted a jet of tobacco-juice at a mound of earth at the edge of the wood bordering the path.

"Look," he observed, "there's a fine place to set rabbit-snares. Let's pinch some wire from those telephone chaps. You can see their runs; they come out of the wood by them to go and lie in the fields."

"Oh, Chink, don't dawdle; Van de Putte is waiting for us!"

He ran and caught me up:

"Mary with a y, brother . . . Violet eyes and hair down to her knees. The last woman one saw when one went into the line, at the bend in the road, framed in the window; beyond that there are no more civilians. The first woman, too, whom one saw when one came back from the trenches. How many men in the sector are thinking of her at this moment! And how many dead are there to whom she waved and smiled as they passed? And from afar those that return search eagerly for the hovel with its sign. The battalion marches past, rifles slung over shoulders, and the battalion makes eyes at her; for this is the beginning of the world in which there are gardens and children and lovely things which are not only meant to kill. The battalion cook on the field-kitchen presents his ladle; the machine-gunner, the one who sits at the back of the gun-carriage and has no need to turn round, waves his helmet at her for a long time, as far as the bridge. The boys begin to understand that they're going on living; they're no longer afraid, they sing, they groom their mules, they breathe the fresh air deep into their lungs. And all because of her. I myself can only love women whom other men want. It's a fancy of mine. It excites me."

He swept his arm round in a vague circle as though calling Heaven and Earth to witness his words and then he stared me straight in the eye. The walk, the keen wind and the autumn sun filled me with a sort of cheerful mischief, which made me mow down the grass with my stick and kick at any unevenness in the ground. I do not know what put it into my mind to contradict the Chink and to draw his insults down on my head. Perhaps I was unconsciously getting a little tired of his verbosity; perhaps the demon of curiosity made me want to penetrate his thoughts and to strike a spark of conflict and discussion from him. So after a short pause I replied, with deliberately aggressive coldness:

"You're lying, Chink, and you know it. You bore me and disgust me."

"I'm lying? Say that again, you stinker! Say it again."

"You're lying. You're making all this humbug up to try to impress me and make me think what a fine fellow you are. But it's no good: I'm proof against that sort of thing. You can swear yourself to death with your hand on your heart and your eyes rolling like those of an old tom-cat. I don't care a damn. I just don't believe you."

"Curse and blast it! The one time I'm telling the truth! And to think how often I've made up stories which you swallowed with about as much subtlety as a ploughboy. I've had you often in spite of your being an intellectual. I've had you on toast. But to-day I don't want you to disbelieve me. I forbid you to! Or else . . ."

His face grew purple with fury; a mahogany-coloured gleam shone through the coat of filth which covered it. He took guard, his left arm bent on a level with his eyes and his right fist clenched. He was stamping with rage.

"Come and fight, you dirty dog! I'm going to knock your teeth out."

"Don't be silly; the pigeon-fancier is waiting for us; we've got to hurry. You waste half the day in talking rot and in stupid quarrelling——"

"You swine! You're taking sides with the Eighth Mudlarks now."

"You're begging the question."

"Me? Put 'em up, you mug, do you hear?"

"I'm not going to fight you, my son."

"Then look out for yourself. I'm going to give it to you."

"No, you brute. In the first place we're not in the same class. You weigh fifteen pounds more than I do. And in any case you're only a mountebank, a filthy mountebank."

This last insult flattered and appeased him and put him in a good temper. My mischievous gaiety was satisfied with this altercation; I preferred not to run the risk of being beaten up, which was inevitable if I could not avoid coming to blows with him; I could keep the upper hand so long as we stuck to insults. He kicked the mud that stuck to his boots in my direction, then he slapped me on the shoulder and we went on, side by side.

"You sly old rascal! You're the only man with any brains in the company, you and the company clerk, the one who once said: 'I'm not going to get married during the war because if my wife became a widow I should regret it all my life.' He's a one, he is, and no mistake. All the rest are bits of machinery, connecting-rods, driving-belts and the force of inertia."

His joviality suddenly deserted him and after a moment he said in a humble, crushed voice:

"Poor, feckless, drunken, lazy and yet with aspirations. Never a penny in one's pocket; as soon as one earns anything it's either drunk or gambled away. No chance of getting out of the rut. The man who comes into the world square can't leave it pointed. One never settles down; one eats and goes on the burst, vegetates, eats again and goes on the burst again. Life! It's a bloody life really. . . . Emotions which upset your brain, the need one feels of telling tales . . . One lies, just as much for oneself as for other people. One needs a woman to restrain one, to mould one. You can't understand that. You've never known what it is to be destitute. Destitution in itself is nothing. It is far worse to like it, not to try to get out of it, to consent to it and to enjoy it. One is perfectly free and depends on nothing; men admire that; they despise one, but they admire one, especially when one has the gift of the gab, and pretends to revolt against it and leans against the bar in a pub and stares at them with one's cigarette hanging from one's mouth and one's cap over one's eyes. Why didn't you believe me? Why did you call me a mountebank?"

"Listen, Chink, when you tell me stories, either true ones or false ones, I don't care: I take what amuses me and I let the rest go. But I will not, do you hear me, I will not stand it when you overstep the mark, when you try to rouse my pity for you and to interest me in your sentimental quibbles. That I won't accept."

His mouth pursed up in a spasm of rage and he leaned towards me, barring the way.

"Why not? Why not?"

I replied slowly, pausing between my words:

"Because it bores me. That's why."

I expected an explosion of rage, insults, even a fight perhaps, and I watched the Chink carefully, prepared for anything. I took an intense delight in the sight of that rich, undisciplined nature, that mobile, brutal character, and in this cruel game to which the very risk added piquancy. But my companion made no rejoinder; he merely shrugged his shoulders and quickened his pace. I wondered whether he was suddenly going to explode, whether he was turning some subtle revenge over in his mind, and whether he was thinking out some bold plan for retaliation which would be impossible to foresee and to guard against. He walked along silently, chewing his cigarette and jolting his wicker cage with sudden nervous spasms. We were approaching the end of our journey; we could already see the pigeon-loft perched on top of a barn; pigeons were flying round us in strictly symmetrical patterns; we could hear the rustle of their wings as they approached us, moved away again and returned, describing great circles in the pale light of the October morning. I ventured a remark:

"They're manœuvring, the little beasts. See how they turn, Chink. The inside ones hug the centre of the track and slow down, the middle ones keep on at the same speed and the outside ones increase theirs; the alignment remains the same always. It's like a bicycle race at the Buffalo Velodrome on a Sunday in peacetime; except that there's no money on it and no one gets left behind."

The Chink gave no sign that he had heard; even this reference to bicycle racing, so dear to his suburban heart, did not succeed in making him unbend. The shadow of the pigeon's flight, mottled like the shadow thrown by an almond-tree in blossom, was upon us now; then it moved away from us, across the fields, gradually becoming more compact, crossed the road, climbed the wall and lost itself in the dwarf vines twisted as though with scrofula. My companion did not deign either to look or to reply. A girl carrying a basketful of grass nodded to us; the Chink scowled at her. I bade her a friendly good-morning myself and said to him:

"There! And the first woman you see you ignore and scowl at."

Between his teeth he muttered:

"The first one is that other one, in the window."

"The window's closed and the bird has flown."

"That doesn't matter. She's still the first, even when there's nobody there."

He stamped on the ground and shortened his steps as though he was trapped by violent feelings from which he could not free himself. A preposterous idea occurred to me and stuck in my mind. Could he, by any possible chance, be sincere? Had he not invented it all, talked just for the sake of talking? Did he really, in his nebulous and contradictory way which always needed applause and a gallery, did he really love the grocer's daughter of Saint-Anthelme-de-Noroy, the first woman seen by those who come down from the deserted regions in which there are only men thirsting for blood and death?

IV

Old Van de Putte, the chief divisional pigeon-fancier, received us smoking his clay pipe, which bubbled in time with the heavy placid breathing of its owner, emitting at each rumbling a cloud of smoke and a smell of burnt earth and nicotine.

"Ah, my lads! So you're here, are you, you couple of bandits! Always late, never on time. A drink at every pub and a pinch for every girl you meet. It's utter destruction. No longer any discipline. Just going where the wind blows them. Disaster in the long run. Drunken, bottle-nosed, gallows-bird faces, with the shifty eye of the libertine. . . . Bandits . . . and they trust pigeons to them. Desolation, desolation!"

He laughed and his eyes softened as, with his hands clasped over his paunch, he said:

"The pigeons came home all right yesterday. Dudule the first and Marouf the last, as usual. You're going to take up the reliefs. Mind you don't shake them about too much! Fancy confiding these gentle birds to a couple of thugs, a couple of gin-vats like you! Little birds brought up like girls at the Sacré-Cœur handed over to a couple of pimps! Damnation! Damnation! Have you still got plenty of rice up there? Another bagful? Good. Don't stuff them too much. A few grains only, not more, or they may not come back. They don't know anything about war or about danger, the pretty dears; all that passes over their heads. And don't forget to release them at once in case of gas, so that they can get well up into the air. Don't let them die in their baskets like Fanfan and Coco, the victims of your predecessors. . . . Wait a minute, wait a minute! Don't put the cages on yet. You lads must be thirsty; you've come a long way. A couple of bad lots but not idlers with all that walking. You'll take a glass of coffee, eh, lads? And a little spirit with it, some mirabelle, extra special, at six francs a pint. You're not going to refuse? No, I see you're not. I always had an idea you wouldn't refuse, you young rascals!"

The old man winked his eye and jovially patted his rounded belly. We entered his low-roofed room; the coffee was warming in a dented saucepan over a fire of pine cones and vine branches. We drank the steaming brew in luxurious little sips. Then the pigeon-fancier tiptoed stealthily up carrying a bottle with an air of mystery and reverence and poured us each out a bumper of that colourless spirit which fills one with a taste of sun-warmed fruit and burning honey.

"Don't be nervous," he went on; "don't be shy. You don't want wrinkles in your stomach. It's ten years, my lads, since I saw my own toes. Have a drink from time to time and beware of women, the best of whom isn't worth a rap. They're a destructive breed."

"You're right there, Van de Putte, a thousand times right. You tell the Chink all about it; he's in love."

"That scoundrel in love?"

"Yes, with the grocer's daughter at Saint-Anthelme."

"It's a bad business, Chink, the shortest cut to unhappiness and trouble. I once had a big wife with teeth like pearls and a crupper like that of a fifteen-hundred-franc mare. I had a wife and a pigeon-loft. The pigeons always came back; they never got lost and brought me in a tidy sum in bets. They would be released at Bordeaux, at Toulouse, anywhere in the world, Chink. It was like having a racing stable. Everyone knew Van de Putte's pigeon-loft, even as far away as the Campine. A hundred pigeons that always came back and a single wife named Marie——"

"With a y?" the Chink interrupted eagerly.

"Y? No, no y. Why the hell with a y? Well, anyway, she went away one day to Lille, only forty kilometres from the pigeon-loft, and she never found the way back again. Pigeons have got compasses in their heads, not so women. Damnation! A great misfortune but a good riddance. Let's finish the mirabelle, lads! Look here, Chink, listen to the advice of an old man who was a cuckold before you drank your first glass of beer. . . . Don't let yourself be seduced by their wives; enjoy them when they're in the mood for it, but always keep your liberty."

"How can I help it?" the other replied glumly. "I love women; it's my nature."

"It's a bad nature, then. A disgusting vice. Everyone's getting like that since the war started. They get engaged, get married, write to 'god-mothers.' As if there wasn't enough catastrophe in the world they've to go making love. They're all mad, all crazy. They escape from machine-guns and bombs to fall into the clutches of women. I tell you, death seems to excite their passions; as for women, there's no longer any holding them. A philosopher explained this to me. He was the local scavenger, but he knew more than an officer of the Academy. It's the species, he explained to me, which insists on this; lots of men die, but the species doesn't want to die, it wants to perpetuate itself; so it sends men and women crazy with passion and forces them to procreate brats. The more carnage there is the more the species gingers up those that remain. This species is a strumpet, a pimp! But my friend was a philosopher; there wasn't much he didn't know. I've got a cousin who's a hospital-nurse. Her favourite expression is, 'I only look after the badly wounded.' You ought to see her when she says it; she rolls her eyes and wriggles her bottom just as if someone were tickling her with a feather. And yet she's long past the age for that sort of thing. Don't fall into degradation, Chink."

The Chink smiled with a superior air; he gave me a meaning look and casually observed to the pigeon-fancier:

"You're a misogynist."

"Ah!" replied Van de Putte. "Always using long words and humbugging. Go on! Be off with you! Get on with the job, you ruffians! And don't shake the poor innocents up too much."

v

On the road back, now crowded with transport and people on foot, rumbling supply-wagons, low-slung ambulances, companies of African donkeys loaded with faggots and soldiers going on leave with heavily loaded knapsacks, the Chink kept growling out disconnected phrases:

"Old fool . . . Just a doves' innkeeper . . . He doesn't understand anything else. . . . Ha-ha! Misogynist! That took his breath away. He's just a vulgarian trying to impress people, without knowing anything about life. Misogynist!"

The soldiers we met gave us friendly looks; the pigeons attracted a kind of sympathy which was reflected on their carriers and evoked ideas of soaring flight, of fidelity and of tenderness in men's minds. Their beaks pecked at my shoulders in a way that was not at all unpleasant; behind my back I could hear the cooing from their fine full chests beneath the water-proof cover on their cage, and I quoted, gazing into the distance:

"Two pigeons loved each other tenderly."

The Chink looked me up and down and spat out of the corner of his mouth: he had not yet forgiven my incredulity. I grew rather exasperated in my turn, and I tried to concoct some scheme which would make me complete master of his secret. I knew my companion to be far too loquacious to be able to walk eight miles without speaking; so I decided to let the conversation take its course and to rely on some sudden inspiration to gain my ends.

We made good progress with the wind at our backs; I chewed over-ripe rowan-berries which tasted of decayed leaves and autumn, and I watched the flight of the plovers as they wheeled in the air and uttered their plaintive cries. A strange, nostalgic harmony which bathed the perspective of a war winter with its deadly hours of cold and rain and night and mud. And I spat out the shining pips in the reddish ruts of the unmetalled road with a kind of bitter melancholy.

When we came in sight of the houses of Saint-Anthelme-de-Noroy, at the bottom of the basin through which a narrow stream ran between golden aspens, the Chink exclaimed:

"Curse and blast it! They've put the pub out of bounds. The slops have shut the place up and the girl has gone away by train. There was a woman there and now there isn't one any more. I've been thinking, sonny, the old doves' hotel proprietor was talking through his hat; he knows nothing about the feelings of the heart . . . and yet his reasoning was sound. We're all crazy, all mad; the war has altered all our ideas on the subject of love; everyone has completely changed. It is true that risk and death excite people's passions, as he said. I've seen old men become amorous of their wives after years of marriage and dozens of children; they wrote them eight-page letters every day and when they got tight in billets they maundered on about them, crying and showing their friends the photographs of their old Dutches, fat ones, thin ones, some with snub-noses, and some with noses as thin as razor-blades. And everyone thought it was all quite natural. And the younger ones' fiancées and 'god-mothers'! And those who become jealous, and those who let their hearts run away with them and don't know what they're doing and make women promises, chuck them over and then start all over again right and left! I knew an ex-colonial soldier, now dead, who had racketed about all the brothels in the four corners of the world without ever having given it a thought. Well, this man began to get ideas into his head after the war started; he complained; he was no longer content with physical contact. 'When I give a girl ten francs,' he said, 'she still doesn't give me her friendship.' This depressed him very much, poor devil, and before the war he had never so much as thought of anything but the colour of a girl's skin and the jut of her buttocks. And with women it's the same story, only worse. It's the will of the species, as the old scavenger philosopher used to say, the general upheaval all over the world. There are no longer any rules or morals; passions have turned everything topsy-turvy. Life nowadays is like a chaotic film exhibited by a mad operator on a warped screen."

"You're talking nonsense again, Chink. Have I changed, for instance?"

"You hide your feelings because you're an intellectual and are therefore more of a hypocrite than other people; besides, you don't drink. I've seen you waiting for your letters with the large sloping blue handwriting, pressing your thighs together and dilating your nostrils as though you were gambling your fortune on the spin of a coin, and the coin was actually in the air; I've pretended not to notice, out of tact. I could go on about it for seven years. Have you ever seen Sergeant Coudure, a sober-minded business man, with a nose like a searchlight and a belch like an eight-inch howitzer and very fond of his glass, when he says: 'The old girl has been swearing at me again'? His face gets long, his voice gets sloppy and one would think he was Romeo listening to the blackbird on his rope-ladder. And look at Corporal Joron, the man who's always talking of the open country: 'At the time when we weren't yet tucked away into mole-hills . . . At the time when we were cavaliers and not field-mice . . .' He used to go about asking every man he saw if he couldn't get his sister or his cousin or his niece to start a correspondence with him and marry him. One day he wrote to a young virgin whom he had met at some time or other; he came back from leave engaged to be married to her; he no longer spoke of the open country but spent all day composing long screeds on mauve paper at four francs a box. It needed a terrific emotion to cure him of his mania, a flash of lightning and God's thunder on top of it. Mourargue found out that he was a cuckold by accident; his wife gave birth to twins, an Indian and a Senegalese some people said, but that was an exaggeration. In peacetime he would have swallowed his shame, bumped the wench off or got divorced, or perhaps he would just simply have got tight and fed the little strangers without making too much fuss. But no—and as he was known to be a funk it makes it all the more meritorious—no, he volunteered for the advance-guard and during the attack on the 11th he got himself cut in half on a machine-gun by the fellow who was chained to it. Passion! Have you ever seen cuckolds in civil life dashing themselves against coffee-mills? They're all the same, all bewitched by that strumpet the Species. Saumoire fell in love with the two sisters who kept the café at Pou-Volant, he never quite knew which. The girls were jealous and there were sentimental complications with the fellow, who was already crazy: scenes, tears, makings up, moonlight walks, blows. He couldn't make up his mind; so at the first chance he got he volunteered for Salonica, where he caught fever. He spent his sick-leave at Pou-Volant. There he had an attack of malaria complicated with madness; following on a general row he blacked the mother's eye, locked the girls in the bakehouse, drank all the good wine in the cellar, took a pot shot at himself which missed because his hand was trembling so much and only removed the tip of his ear. And you think that's natural! The only explanation is the topsyturvydom of the age. My girl, the one in Montparnasse, confirmed this to me; she's not very bright, but she prowls about round the railway stations where one sees everyone. She maintains that men have been changed; before, they used to make love in a straightforward manner; now they've got ideas, they either want to beat people or to cry; they're looking for they don't know what; they puzzle one, even though one is used to them. They've been mechanised by circumstances."

We were descending the slope into the hamlet whose ruins, mended with planks of wood and patched with sheets of tarred paper, sheltered the personnel and the horses of the artillery waggon-line. Field-kitchens were smoking between the breached walls and sent the acrid smell of damp wood up to us. The roofless belfry brooded over the misery of its flock like an old man over the corpses of his little ragged children. A driver was singing at the top of his voice as he washed his shirt on a flat stone by the stream, and every time he slapped it down it seemed as if the front of the church tower leaned further over. With my pipe stem I drew the Chink's attention to Mary's house at the crossroads, with its black door, its green shutters and its clay tiaras. He went on, suddenly affected by the desolation of the scene:

"I once saw at the Clichy fair a booth over which was written: 'American Eye-opener.' Inside all sorts of curiosities and catastrophes were displayed in glass cases. But they were not to be compared with what we can see nowadays for nothing."

Suddenly he shouted:

"What on earth's up, old son? There's someone there. . . ."

He began to run at full speed; the wicker hamper bumped against his shoulders and the scared pigeons flapped their wings and made anguished cooing noises. The grocery window was open and the shutters were fastened back to the wall. I only caught the Chink up at the door, on which he was beating furiously. At last an old peasant cautiously opened it a few inches. The Chink whispered to me that he was going to have a word with him and greeted the owner politely.

"What do you fellows want?"

"Just a glass of wine to help us on our way."

"It's out of bounds; I can't serve you."

"We'll come in behind, through the pig-sty. Come on! A quick one, with a bit of saveloy."

"I tell you it's out of bounds to troops."

"The landlady knows me well."

"Well, I don't know you."

"Call her then."

"She's a long way away. I should have to shout pretty loud for her to hear me."

"In the vineyard?"

"No, at Nancy."

"And the girl? Mademoiselle Mary wouldn't refuse me. I gave her an aluminum ring and a cartridge case with a thistle pattern and her name engraved on it."

"Our daughter won't be back for some time. She's being married in three days. I'm going to the wedding myself and I'm taking the litter of pigs with me to sell it."

The old man shut the door again; the Chink leaned against the door-jamb with his eyes half closed. The man washing his shirt was still singing on the river-bank and from time to time a horse neighed; no other sound broke the silence. My companion passed the back of his hand over his forehead, ejected a long stream of saliva into the middle of the road and repeated three times without my being able to discover to whom his insult referred:

"Filthy beast! Filthy beast! Filthy beast!"

VI

The Fille-Verte camp was still being bombarded when we passed through it in short rushes between which we lay flat in the mud of the trenches. We were in a hurry and were both rather upset. The Chink was brooding over his heart troubles; I was indignant at the enemy sprinkling our path with shells at unexpected times. When one is accustomed to expect a bombardment at a certain time of day, one relies upon it; it seemed to me that the Germans were lacking in the courtesies of war. I was also irritated with my companion; I was convinced that he was lying to me; there was nothing to prove that he was just giving himself airs and there was nothing in his words to confirm the first theory I had formed, but instead of submitting to the facts I fought against them; such is the ordinary human attitude of mind; and I nursed a grudge against the Chink for having shown himself to be sincere and for having frustrated my knowledge of psychology and my insight into human nature. These rather nebulous feelings were complicated by the annoyance of finding myself bombarded, of being forced to play hide-and-seek with unexpected shells and of having to drag my cloak in the mud after having washed it the previous day.

It was some time before we were able to leave the redoubt; the shrapnel and high-explosive shells made the sunken road impassable; we lay side by side under a wretched battered tunnel of corrugated iron camouflaged with pine needles. The pigeons were gurgling behind our shoulders and pecked at us with their beaks and scratched us with their claws. A motor-cycle passed us like a flash at full speed, between two bursts of fire, crashed into a shell-hole, leaped into the air with its wheels racing and only came to earth some yards further on. The Chink, roused to curiosity, called out:

"He's crashed! No, he's all right! He's off again!"

A short sharp burst of fire from a high-velocity gun sent my companion back to cover; I heard a tearing sound and he chuckled:

"I've caught my trousers on a bit of barbed wire. Hell's bells! And I've got a gash in my thigh. And the bloody pigeons are pecking me. Let's buzz off. I'm not going to stay in this tunnel any more."

"Wait a minute, Chink; there's sometimes a belated shell or two."

"You've got the wind up too. I'm not going to stay and rot in here any more. I'm buzzing off."

"I forbid you to go."

"I don't take orders from a private soldier. Come along. Up with you!"

"If you move I'll hit you. You're getting on my nerves."

A last burst of fire put an end to our discussion; we waited a few minutes more and, as no more shells whistled through the pale sky, I started off. But the Chink, squatting on his haunches with a far-away look in his eyes, seemed not to be paying attention to anything. Finally he said, in a slow, solemn voice:

"An extraordinary thing once happened to me; I've suddenly remembered it, I don't exactly know why."

"You can think about it as you go along."

He smiled and replied quietly, with a shrug of indifference:

"Shut up! I'm not talking to you, I'm talking to myself."

He went on rolling his cigarette with his hands on a level with his waist in a Buddha-like pose. The pigeons were cooing softly; I suggested, ironically:

"The doves are playing the incidental music to the drama. Tremolo, enter the leading man."

He did not fly into a temper, as I expected him to do, but went on:

"There's nothing so dreary as a cinema without an orchestra. Yes, an adventure of which even the smartest couldn't make head or tail and for which I got a court-martial and two years' hard."

"You never told me about that."

"Yes." And he smote himself proudly on the chest. "Yes, I'm an old lag. In those days I belonged to an army for the exploitation of tactical success. Staff-officers' jargon. As there were no tactical successes, we hadn't got anything to exploit; we were like a lot of pastry-cooks without sugar or butter. So we didn't do anything. We just loafed and cleaned our rifles and played football in the back areas. They were happy enough days. Unfortunately an idle life never suited me; I felt at a loose end and I thought of writing to the nun at the hospital, the little creature who prayed for my sins, to tell her about myself. I cut parades and fatigues and broke camp whenever I could manage it, which was pretty often. You ought to have seen me, crouching beneath a tree with a board across my knees and holding a fountain-pen I had scrounged in an empty dugout between my first and second fingers. It was the beginning of Spring, when the leaves start coming out and the days start growing longer; I inhaled the balmy air with half-closed eyes; you would have thought I was a novelist."

"Chink," I said, "I'm making a dash for it. Who loves me follows me."

He never moved a muscle but lit his cigarette without seeming to have heard me and went on, lost in his memories:

"A fine time it was. I didn't really know whether I was happy or unhappy. When I wanted to write I couldn't. When I felt that I could I no longer wanted to. Added to which, the Spring was working in my blood and made me gay because the air was so bright and sad because I had grown unaccustomed to the sun. I spent days on end making resolutions."

With a heave of my shoulders I settled by pigeon basket on my back and then I left my companion after a short, rather disdainful "See you later" to which he made no reply. He did not catch me up again till I reached the field-kitchens; he was running, and I pretended not to recognise his step. He passed me and planted himself before me; I whistled under my breath and he shook his fists at me in a rage and shouted:

"Will you shut up! Stop that row or I'll spoil your beauty for you."

I replied in a superior, taunting voice:

"You inhaled the balmy air with half-closed eyes: one would have thought that you were a novelist. To be continued in our next."

He stamped his foot menacingly. A strange green glow came into his slanting eyes; his charred cigarette-end dangled from the yellow corner of his smoker's mouth and he went on, feverishly:

"Listen. One day I wrote perhaps ten letters, all of which I destroyed. So I went along to the café to get tight. There I found a sergeant molesting a girl; I didn't like it and I had to relieve my feelings somehow. I told the N.C.O. to let the wench go; he replied by telling me to go to hell; so I knocked out two of his teeth and cut his eyebrow open to lift me out of my depression. I got off cheaply with two years' hard. You see the sort of man I am. Now do you believe that I love the girl from Saint-Anthelme-de-Noroy, in life and in death?"

He held up his hand and spat on the ground to give weight to his words. I half closed my eyes so that he should not be able to read my thoughts. The note of truth which he had put into his brief speech, all delivered in a single breath, shook me for a moment; I was tempted to smile and to open my heart to him; but I kept control of myself. I had begun a game which I did not want to stop and I bluffed, as I did when I played poker with the quartermaster-sergeant. My inexorable curiosity struggled within me against all human weakness. Inscrutable and expressionless, therefore, I looked him straight in the eyes and answered in a voice which was neither sympathetic nor credulous nor hostile, nor even indifferent, a voice modulated by a succession of syllables and nothing more:

"I've already told you what I think about it. If it gives you any pleasure for me to believe you, I believe you. Let me know once for all and stop boring me."

"You swine!" he shouted. "Someone must understand me and appreciate me! I can't live alone in a hole; I need expansion and a pal who shares things with me; I can't just bury myself in my sentiments and go to sleep in them; I need you; your nature supplements mine. That's why I love the woman whom the whole sector has seen at her window and who has smiled at those who were about to die."

"That's all very fine, Chink, but it's just gallery stuff."

"I can prove it to you."

"How?"

"By material proof."

He searched his mind for a moment, his forehead wrinkled and his mouth set in a hard line.

"Proof? Oh, Mourargue was mown down by a Bavarian machine-gun. Saumoire returned from Salonica and had a shot at himself and took off the end of his ear. I myself have knocked out a sergeant for the nun at the hospital and got two years' hard for it. And all the others one has never heard of."

I retorted, with abusive familiarity:

"No more of that, my lad. You'd do better to do more and not talk so much; you've said too much already. It only makes me think your boasting has driven you mad. Don't count on me as a gallery to weep over your corpse. That's not in my line; you'll never be able to convince me."

We entered the windings of a communication trench from the walls of which the thaw was flaking pieces off; telegraph wires whose staples had fallen out formed dangerous entanglements; the broken duck-boards were full of snares; conversation died down automatically. I walked in front, without troubling my head about my companion, only paying attention to where I was placing my huge, mud-laden boots.

That evening, as usual on quiet days, we played cards in the company office, a well-built sap protected by iron girders and rough pit-props covered with eight feet of packed earth. The quartermaster-sergeant, who had pretensions to fastidiousness, cut the cards absently with rather a wry face because the sergeant-major, who was his partner, had insisted on playing "manille", a plebeian game which was, he considered, only played by common people in remote provincial inns. The "major" was thoroughly enjoying himself; an extra orderly, who never spoke, made the fourth. Salvoes of artillery fire occasionally shook our mole-hill; the candle flame flickered and straightened up again; the scared rats were quiet for a few seconds and then resumed their noisy aimless scurrying over the corrugated iron, uttering sharp squeaks all the time.

The sergeant-major paused for thought, running his forefingers over his fanned-out cards; the quartermaster scornfully toyed with his knife-chain; the orderly was intent on his hand, anxious not to make a mistake in front of these high and mighty dispensers of favours and "cushy" jobs. In those days a man's life might depend upon a badly played hand at cards.

There was a knock on the door and the Chink appeared. He saluted formally, which in itself rather astonished me, as he always prided himself on his lack of discipline. He pretended not to see me.

"Sergeant-major," he said, "I hear they asked for volunteers for the tanks this morning."

"Quite right, they did."

"I want you to put my name down."

The quartermaster-sergeant interrupted him.

"Why, Chink, you're crazy! You've got a job——"

"Don't bother about me!"

"Do you want to be killed? You'll never find a job like being a pigeon-carrier again, especially in the tanks."

"I tell you to put me down."

"But why the devil are you deserting us?"

"For . . ."

He hesitated a little and finally cast a glance in my direction, a glance which he shifted almost at once. Then, after a further pause, he went on:

"For entirely personal reasons."

The quartermaster-sergeant guffawed.

"I'll bet it's something to do with women again, you old rip!"

"Perhaps. Well, yes. Exactly."

"Oh, women! Women!" muttered the quartermaster, in a far-away voice, absent-mindedly taking a Virginian cigarette from my case lying open on the table. "Women! Nothing but heart burnings! Before the war I followed a little actress all over the place, as far as Morocco, with two celluloid collars and a father's curses in my suit-case. I'll tell you all about it some day. Folly! Nothing but folly! Have you got a light?"

The sergeant-major, having decided upon his plan of attack, was getting impatient; he had already made three francs at twenty-five centimes per form sent in, and he was longing to make it up to five francs. Besides, he had a horror of nil returns.

"Put him down, Quartermaster, put him down; don't discourage volunteers. Congratulations, Chink, and a thousand regrets at losing you. You've got guts; you're a real poilu. Put him down, Quartermaster. Good luck, Chink; we'll fix it for you. It's you to play."

I was troubled and torn by a sort of remorse. I wanted to speak, to detain my comrade; but I suddenly felt embarrassed and I could not make up my mind to do so; my feelings were overcome by my vanity. Finally I made an effort and blurted out:

"Chink!"

I stopped short. The Chink already had his hand on the door-latch, and he turned round; the light from the candle clearly lit up his slanting eyes, shaded by their thick lashes. The simplicity of the attitude and of the speech of a man whose nature was composed of boasting and excess, this very simplicity seemed to me to be a provocation and a mockery. Which of us was fooling the other? His mouth was twisted and contracted and seemed to be mocking me, yes, really enjoying the success of a tremendous farce pushed to extreme limits and capable of resolving itself in blood.

At that moment a bursting shell shook the dugout. The candle flame flickered and a wavering light passed across the Chink's eyes; his eyelids fluttered once and in the depths of those eyes I saw an unreal, supernatural fire, the kind with which we endow the looks of legendary lovers who exalt the power of passion in themselves to an almost limitless degree, and who accomplish themselves in death. And why not believe it? Because of his squalor and his bragging? The incidence of passion is a haphazard one and its devastations are not concerned with logical convention. I coughed once or twice and resumed:

"Chink. Chink, old boy!"

But the spell was broken, the flame had died down in his eyes, and they were but wretched human eyes, greenish circles in the centre of a ball of cornea criss-crossed with red lines. His hard, vulgar mouth no longer expressed anything but the obstinacy of a man who wanted to get the better of me, at no matter how great a price.

"Leave the Chink alone," said the sergeant-major. "Your turn, Quartermaster, and don't play your cards in that overbearing way."

The quartermaster-sergeant let a card fall on the table.

"I trump," proclaimed the sergeant-major in a triumphant voice. "I trump and it's a club. Queen wins, knave wins, seven wins!"

When I raised my head the Chink had gone.

That very evening he left for the divisional troop-lines and from there he went to an instructional camp. I never saw him again. A long time afterwards I heard of his death in a burning tank, in which he was roasted alive. I have never been able to decide whether he died for the girl from Saint-Anthelme or in order to get the better of me. The heart of man nearly always remains unfathomable. When I informed old Van de Putte of the Chink's caprice he thought for a while whilst sipping his mirabelle and murmured, with a wise look in his eye:

"It's the species that does that. We must believe what the scavenger said. Individual man no longer exists. There is only the species."

HAIRCUT

I GOT ANOTHER BARBER that comes over from Carterville and helps me out Saturdays, but the rest of the time I can get along all right alone. You can see for yourself that this ain't no New York City and besides that, the most of the boys works all day and don't have no leisure to drop in here and get themselves prettied up.

You're a newcomer, ain't you? I thought I hadn't seen you round before. I hope you like it good enough to stay. As I say, we ain't no New York City or Chicago, but we have pretty good times. Not as good, though, since Jim Kendall got killed. When he was alive, him and Hod Meyers used to keep this town in an uproar. I bet they was more laughin' done here than any town its size in America.

Jim was comical, and Hod was pretty near a match for him. Since Jim's gone, Hod tries to hold his end up just the same as ever, but it's tough goin' when you ain't got nobody to kind of work with.

They used to be plenty fun in here Saturdays. This place is jam-packed Saturdays, from four o'clock on. Jim and Hod would show up right after their supper, round six o'clock. Jim would set himself down in that big chair, nearest the blue spittoon. Whoever had been settin' in that chair, why they'd get up when Jim come in and give it to him.

You'd of thought it was a reserved seat like they have sometimes in a theayter. Hod would generally always stand or walk up and down, or some Saturdays, of course, he'd be settin' in this chair part of the time, gettin' a haircut.

Well, Jim would set there a w'ile without openin' his mouth only to spit, and then finally he'd say to me, "Whitey,"—my right name, that is, my right first name, is Dick, but everybody round here calls me Whitey—Jim would say, "Whitey, your nose looks like a rosebud tonight. You must of been drinkin' some of your aw de cologne."

So I'd say, "No, Jim, but you look like you'd been drinkin' somethin' of that kind or somethin' worse."

Jim would have to laugh at that, but then he'd speak up and say, "No, I ain't had nothin' to drink, but that ain't sayin' I wouldn't like somethin'. I wouldn't even mind if it was wood alcohol."

Then Hod Meyers would say, "Neither would your wife." That would set everybody to laughin' because Jim and his wife wasn't on very good terms. She'd of divorced him only they wasn't no chance to get alimony and she didn't have no way to take care of herself and the kids. She couldn't never understand Jim. He was kind of rough, but a good fella at heart.

Him and Hod had all kinds of sport with Milt Sheppard. I don't suppose you've seen Milt. Well, he's got an Adam's apple that looks more like a mushmelon. So I'd be shavin' Milt and when I'd start to shave down here on his neck, Hod would holler, "Hey, Whitey, wait a minute! Before you cut into it, let's make up a pool and see who can guess closest to the number of seeds."

And Jim would say, "If Milt hadn't of been so hoggish, he'd of ordered a half a cantaloupe instead of a whole one and it might not of stuck in his throat."

All the boys would roar at this and Milt himself would force a smile, though the joke was on him. Jim certainly was a card!

There's his shavin' mug, settin' on the shelf, right next to Charley Vail's. "Charles M. Vail." That's the druggist. He comes in regular for his shave, three times a week. And Jim's is the cup next to Charley's. "James H. Kendall." Jim won't need no shavin' mug no more, but I'll leave it there just the same for old time's sake. Jim certainly was a character!

Years ago, Jim used to travel for a canned goods concern over in Carterville. They sold canned goods. Jim had the whole northern half of the State and was on the road five days out of every week. He'd drop in here Saturdays and tell his experiences for that week. It was rich.

I guess he paid more attention to playin' jokes than makin' sales. Finally the concern let him out and he come right home here and told everybody he'd been fired instead of sayin' he'd resigned like most fellas would of.

It was a Saturday and the shop was full and Jim got up out of that chair and says, "Gentlemen, I got an important announcement to make. I been fired from my job."

Well, they asked him if he was in earnest and he said he was and nobody could think of nothin' to say till Jim finally broke the ice himself. He says, "I been sellin' canned goods and now I'm canned goods myself."

You see, the concern he'd been workin' for was a factory that made canned goods. Over in Carterville. And now Jim said he was canned himself. He was certainly a card!

Jim had a great trick that he used to play w'ile he was travelin'. For instance, he'd be ridin' on a train and they'd come to some little town like, well, like, we'll say, like Benton. Jim would look out the train window and read the signs on the stores.

For instance, they'd be a sign, "Henry Smith, Dry Goods." Well, Jim would write down the name and the name of the town and when he got to wherever he was goin' he'd mail back a postal card to Henry Smith at Benton and not sign no name to it, but he'd write on the card, well, somethin' like "Ask your wife about that book agent that spent the afternoon last week," or "Ask your Missus who kept her from gettin' lonesome the last time you was in Carterville." And he'd sign the card, "A Friend."

Of course, he never knew what really come of none of these jokes, but he could picture what probably happened and that was enough.

Jim didn't work very steady after he lost his position with the Carterville people. What he did earn, doin' odd jobs round town, why he spent pretty near all of it on gin and his family might of starved if the stores hadn't of carried them along. Jim's wife tried her hand at dressmakin', but they ain't nobody goin' to get rich makin' dresses in this town.

As I say, she'd of divorced Jim, only she seen that she couldn't support herself and the kids and she was always hopin' that some day Jim would cut out his habits and give her more than two or three dollars a week.

They was a time when she would go to whoever he was workin' for and ask them to give her his wages, but after she done this once or twice, he beat her to it by borrowin' most of his pay in advance. He told it all round town, how he had outfoxed his Missus. He certainly was a caution!

But he wasn't satisfied with just outwittin' her. He was sore the way she had acted, tryin' to grab off his pay. And he made up his mind he'd get even. Well, he waited till Evans's Circus was advertised to come to town. Then he told his wife and two kiddies that he was goin' to take them to the circus. The day of the circus, he told them he would get the tickets and meet them outside the entrance to the tent.

Well, he didn't have no intentions of bein' there or buyin' tickets or nothin'. He got full of gin and laid round Wright's poolroom all day. His wife and the kids waited and waited and of course he didn't show up. His wife didn't have a dime with her, or nowhere else, I guess. So she finally had to tell the kids it was all off and they cried like they wasn't never goin' to stop.

Well, it seems, w'ile they was cryin', Doc Stair came along and he asked what was the matter, but Mrs. Kendall was stubborn and wouldn't tell him, but the kids told him and he insisted on takin' them and their mother in the show. Jim found this out afterwards and it was one reason why he had it in for Doc Stair.

Doc Stair come here about a year and a half ago. He's a mighty handsome young fella and his clothes always look like he has them made to order. He goes to Detroit two or three times a year and w'ile he's there he must have a tailor take his measure and then make him a suit to order. They cost pretty near twice as much, but they fit a whole lot better than if you just bought them in a store.

For a w'ile everybody was wonderin' why a young doctor like Doc Stair should come to a town like this where we already got old Doc Gamble and Doc Foote that's both been here for years and all the practice in town was always divided between the two of them.

Then they was a story got round that Doc Stair's gal had throwed him over, a gal up in the Northern Peninsula somewheres, and the reason he come here was to hide himself away and forget it. He said himself that he thought they wasn't nothin' like general practice in a place like ours to fit a man to be a good all round doctor. And that's why he'd came.

Anyways, it wasn't long before he was makin' enough to live on, though they tell me that he never dunned nobody for what they owed him, and the folks here certainly has got the owin' habit, even in my business. If I had all that was comin' to me for just shaves alone, I could go to Carterville and put up at the Mercer for a week and see a different picture every night. For instance, they's old George Purdy—but I guess I shouldn't ought to be gossipin'.

Well, last year, our coroner died, died of the flu. Ken Beatty, that was his name. He was the coroner. So they had to choose another man to be coroner in his place and they picked Doc Stair. He laughed at first and said he didn't want it, but they made him take it. It ain't no job that anybody would fight for and what a man makes out of it in a year would just about buy seeds for their garden. Doc's the kind, though, that can't say no to nothin' if you keep at him long enough.

But I was goin' to tell you about a poor boy we got here in town—Paul Dickson. He fell out of a tree when he was about ten years old. Lit on his head and it done somethin' to him and he ain't never been right. No harm in him, but just silly. Jim Kendall used to call him cuckoo; that's a name Jim had for anybody that was off their head, only he called people's head their bean. That was another of his gags, callin' head bean and callin' crazy people cuckoo. Only poor Paul ain't crazy, but just silly.

You can imagine that Jim used to have all kinds of fun with Paul. He'd send him to the White Front Garage for a left-handed monkey wrench. Of course they ain't no such a thing as a left-handed monkey wrench.

And once we had a kind of a fair here and they was a baseball game between the fats and the leans and before the game started Jim called Paul over and sent him way down to Schrader's hardware store to get a key for the pitcher's box.

They wasn't nothin' in the way of gags that Jim couldn't think up, when he put his mind to it.

Poor Paul was always kind of suspicious of people, maybe on account of how Jim had kept foolin' him. Paul wouldn't have much to do with anybody only his own mother and Doc Stair and a girl here in town named Julie Gregg. That is, she ain't a girl no more, but pretty near thirty or over.

When Doc first come to town, Paul seemed to feel like here was a real friend and he hung round Doc's office most of the w'ile; the only time he wasn't there was when he'd go home to eat or sleep or when he seen Julie Gregg doin' her shoppin'.

When he looked out Doc's window and seen her, he'd run downstairs and join her and tag along with her to the different stores. The poor boy was crazy about Julie and she always treated him mighty nice and made him feel like he was welcome, though of course it wasn't nothin' but pity on her side.

Doc done all he could to improve Paul's mind and he told me once that he really thought the boy was gettin' better, that they was times when he was as bright and sensible as anybody else.

But I was goin' to tell you about Julie Gregg. Old Man Gregg was in the lumber business, but got to drinkin' and lost the most of his money and when he died, he didn't leave nothin' but the house and just enough insurance for the girl to skimp along on.

Her mother was a kind of a half invalid and didn't hardly ever leave the house. Julie wanted to sell the place and move somewheres else after the old man died, but the mother said she was born here and would die here. It was tough on Julie, as the young people round this town—well, she's too good for them.

She's been away to school and Chicago and New York and different places and they ain't no subject she can't talk on, where you take the rest of the young folks here and you mention anything to them outside of Gloria Swanson or Tommy Meighan and they think you're delirious. Did you see Gloria in Wages of Virtue? You missed somethin'!

Well, Doc Stair hadn't been here more than a week when he come in one day to get shaved and I recognized who he was as he had been pointed out to me, so I told him about my old lady. She's been ailin' for a couple years and either Doc Gamble or Doc Foote, neither one, seemed to be helpin' her. So he said he would come out and see her, but if she was able to get out herself, it would be better to bring her to his office where he could make a completer examination.

So I took her to his office and w'ile I was waitin' for her in the reception room, in come Julie Gregg. When somebody comes in Doc Stair's office, they's a bell that rings in his inside office so as he can tell they's somebody to see him.

So he left my old lady inside and come out to the front office and that's the first time him and Julie met and I guess it was what they call love at first sight. But it wasn't fifty-fifty. This young fella was the slickest lookin' fella she'd ever seen in this town and she went wild over him. To him she was just a young lady that wanted to see the doctor.

She'd came on about the same business I had. Her mother had been doctorin' for years with Doc Gamble and Doc Foote and without no results. So she'd heard they was a new doc in town and decided to give him a try. He promised to call and see her mother that same day.

I said a minute ago that it was love at first sight on her part. I'm not only judgin' by how she acted afterwards but how she looked at him that first day in his office. I ain't no mind reader, but it was wrote all over her face that she was gone.

Now Jim Kendall, besides bein' a jokesmith and a pretty good drinker, well, Jim was quite a lady-killer. I guess he run pretty wild durin' the time he was on the road for them Carterville people, and besides that, he'd had a couple little affairs of the heart right here in town. As I say, his wife could of divorced him, only she couldn't.

But Jim was like the majority of men, and women, too, I guess. He wanted what he couldn't get. He wanted Julie Gregg and worked his head off tryin' to land her. Only he'd of said bean instead of head.

Well, Jim's habits and his jokes didn't appeal to Julie and of course he was a married man, so he didn't have no more chance than, well, than a rabbit. That's an expression of Jim's himself. When somebody didn't have no chance to get elected or somethin', Jim would always say they didn't have no more chance than a rabbit.

He didn't make no bones about how he felt. Right in here, more than once, in front of the whole crowd, he said he was stuck on Julie and anybody that could get her for him was welcome to his house and his wife and kids included. But she wouldn't have nothin' to do with him; wouldn't even speak to him on the street. He finally seen he wasn't gettin' nowheres with his usual line so he decided to try the rough stuff. He went right up to her house one evenin' and when she opened the door he forced his way in and grabbed her. But she broke loose and before he could stop her, she run in the next room and locked the door and phoned to Joe Barnes. Joe's the marshal. Jim could hear who she was phonin' to and he beat it before Joe got there.

Joe was an old friend of Julie's pa. Joe went to Jim the next day and told him what would happen if he ever done it again.

I don't know how the news of this little affair leaked out. Chances is that Joe Barnes told his wife and she told somebody else's wife and they told their husband. Anyways, it did leak out and Hod Meyers had the nerve to kid Jim about it, right here in this shop. Jim didn't deny nothin' and kind of laughed it off and said for us all to wait; that lots of people had tried to make a monkey out of him, but he always got even.

Meanw'ile everybody in town was wise to Julie's bein' wild mad over the Doc. I don't suppose she had any idear how her face changed when him and her was together; of course she couldn't of, or she'd of kept away from him. And she didn't know that we was all noticin' how many times she made excuses to go up to his office or pass it on the other side of the street and look up in his window to see if he was there. I felt sorry for her and so did most other people.

Hod Meyers kept rubbin' it into Jim about how the Doc had cut him out. Jim didn't pay no attention to the kiddin' and you could see he was plannin' one of his jokes.

One trick Jim had was the knack of changin' his voice. He could make you think he was a girl talkin' and he could mimic any man's voice. To show you how good he was along this line, I'll tell you the joke he played on me once.

You know, in most towns of any size, when a man is dead and needs a shave, why the barber that shaves him soaks him five dollars for the job; that is, he don't soak him, but whoever ordered the shave. I just charge three dollars because personally I don't mind much shavin' a dead person. They lay a whole lot stiller than live customers. The only thing is that you don't feel like talkin' to them and you get kind of lonesome.

Well, about the coldest day we ever had here, two years ago last winter, the phone rung at the house w'ile I was home to dinner and I answered the phone and it was a woman's voice and she said she was Mrs. John Scott and her husband was dead and would I come out and shave him.

Old John had always been a good customer of mine. But they live seven miles out in the country, on the Streeter road. Still I didn't see how I could say no.

So I said I would be there, but would have to come in a jitney and it might cost three or four dollars besides the price of the shave. So she, or the voice, it said that was all right, so I got Frank Abbott to drive me out to the place and when I got there, who should open the door but old John himself! He wasn't no more dead than, well, than a rabbit.

It didn't take no private detective to figure out who had played me this little joke. Nobody could of thought it up but Jim Kendall. He certainly was a card!

I tell you this incident just to show you how he could disguise his voice and make you believe it was somebody else talkin'. I'd of swore it was Mrs. Scott had called me. Anyways, some woman.

Well, Jim waited till he had Doc Stair's voice down pat; then he went after revenge.

He called Julie up on a night when he knew Doc was over in Carterville. She never questioned but what it was Doc's voice. Jim said he must see her that night; he couldn't wait no longer to tell her somethin'. She was all excited and told him to come to the house. But he said he was expectin' an important long distance call and wouldn't she please forget her manners for once and come to his office. He said they couldn't nothin' hurt her and nobody would see her and he just must talk to her a little w'ile. Well, poor Julie fell for it.

Doc always keeps a night light in his office, so it looked to Julie like they was somebody there.

Meanw'ile Jim Kendall had went to Wright's poolroom, where they was a whole gang amusin' themselves. The most of them had drank plenty of gin, and they was a rough bunch even when sober. They was always strong for Jim's jokes and when he told them to come with him and see some fun they give up their card games and pool games and followed along.

Doc's office is on the second floor. Right outside his door they's a flight of stairs leadin' to the floor above. Jim and his gang hid in the dark behind these stairs.

Well, Julie come up to Doc's door and rung the bell and they was nothin' doin'. She rung it again and she rung it seven or eight times. Then she tried the door and found it locked. Then Jim made some kind of a noise and she heard it and waited a minute, and then she says, "Is that you, Ralph?" Ralph is Doc's first name.

They was no answer and it must of came to her all of a sudden that she'd been bunked. She pretty near fell downstairs and the whole gang after her. They chased her all the way home, hollerin', "Is that you, Ralph?" and "Oh, Ralphie, dear, is that you?" Jim says he couldn't holler it himself, as he was laughin' too hard.

Poor Julie! She didn't show up here on Main Street for a long, long time afterward.

And of course Jim and his gang told everybody in town, everybody but Doc Stair. They was scared to tell him, and he might of never knowed only for Paul Dickson. The poor cuckoo, as Jim called him, he was here in the shop one night when Jim was still gloatin' yet over what he'd done to Julie. And Paul took in as much of it as he could understand and he run to Doc with the story.

It's a cinch Doc went up in the air and swore he'd make Jim suffer. But it was a kind of a delicate thing, because if it got out that he had beat Jim up, Julie was bound to hear of it and then she'd know that Doc knew and of course knowin' that he knew would make it worse for her than ever. He was goin' to do somethin', but it look a lot of figurin'.

Well, it was a couple days later when Jim was here in the shop again, and so was the cuckoo. Jim was goin' duck-shootin' the next day and had come in lookin' for Hod Meyers to go with him. I happened to know that

Hod had went over to Carterville and wouldn't be home till the end of the week. So Jim said he hated to go alone and he guessed he would call it off. Then poor Paul spoke up and said if Jim would take him he would go along. Jim thought a w'ile and then he said, well, he guessed a half-wit was better than nothin'.

I suppose he was plottin' to get Paul out in the boat and play some joke on him, like pushin' him in the water. Anyways, he said Paul could go. He asked him had he ever shot a duck and Paul said no, he'd never even had a gun in his hands. So Jim said he could set in the boat and watch him and if he behaved himself, he might lend him his gun for a couple of shots. They made a date to meet in the mornin' and that's the last I seen of Jim alive.

Next mornin', I hadn't been open more than ten minutes when Doc Stair come in. He looked kind of nervous. He asked me had I seen Paul Dickson. I said no, but I knew where he was, out duck-shootin' with Jim Kendall. So Doc says that's what he had heard, and he couldn't understand it because Paul had told him he wouldn't never have no more to do with Jim as long as he lived.

He said Paul had told him about the joke Jim had played on Julie. He said Paul had asked him what he thought of the joke and the Doc had told him that anybody that would do a thing like that ought not to be let live.

I said it had been a kind of a raw thing, but Jim just couldn't resist no kind of a joke, no matter how raw. I said I thought he was all right at heart, but just bubblin' over with mischief. Doc turned and walked out.

At noon he got a phone call from old John Scott. The lake where Jim and Paul had went shootin' is on John's place. Paul had came runnin' up to the house a few minutes before and said they'd been an accident. Jim had shot a few ducks and then give the gun to Paul and told him to try his luck. Paul hadn't never handled a gun and he was nervous. He was shakin' so hard that he couldn't control the gun. He let fire and Jim sunk back in the boat, dead.

Doc Stair, bein' the coroner, jumped in Frank Abbott's flivver and rushed out to Scott's farm. Paul and old John was down on the shore of the lake. Paul had rowed the boat to shore, but they'd left the body in it, waitin' for Doc to come.

Doc examined the body and said they might as well fetch it back to town. They was no use leavin' it there or callin' a jury, as it was a plain case of accidental shootin'.

Personally I wouldn't never leave a person shoot a gun in the same boat I was in unless I was sure they knew somethin' about guns. Jim was a sucker to leave a new beginner have his gun, let alone a half-wit. It probably served Jim right, what he got. But still we miss him round here. He certainly was a card!

Comb it wet or dry?

CHAMPION

Ring Lardner

(1885-1933)

MIDGE KELLY scored his first knockout when he was seventeen. The knockee was his brother Connie, three years his junior and a cripple. The purse was a half dollar given to the younger Kelly by a lady whose electric had just missed bumping his soul from his frail little body.

Connie did not know Midge was in the house, else he never would have risked laying the prize on the arm of the least comfortable chair in the room, the better to observe its shining beauty. As Midge entered from the kitchen, the crippled boy covered the coin with his hand, but the movement lacked the speed requisite to escape his brother's quick eye.

"Watcha got there?" demanded Midge.

"Nothin'," said Connie.

"You're a one legged liar!" said Midge.

He strode over to his brother's chair and grasped the hand that concealed the coin.

"Let loose!" he ordered.

Connie began to cry.

"Let loose and shut up your noise," said the elder, and jerked his brother's hand from the chair arm.

The coin fell onto the bare floor. Midge pounced on it. His weak mouth widened in a triumphant smile.

"Nothin', huh?" he said. "All right, if it's nothin' you don't want it."

"Give that back," sobbed the younger.

"I'll give you a red nose, you little sneak! Where'd you steal it?"

"I didn't steal it. It's mine. A lady give it to me after she pretty near hit me with a car."

"It's a crime she missed you," said Midge.

Midge started for the front door. The cripple picked up his crutch, rose from his chair with difficulty, and, still sobbing, came toward Midge. The latter heard him and stopped.

"You better stay where you're at," he said.

"I want my money," cried the boy.

"I know what you want," said Midge.

Doubling up the fist that held the half dollar, he landed with all his strength on his brother's mouth. Connie fell to the floor with a thud, the crutch tumbling on top of him. Midge stood beside the prostrate form.

"Is that enough?" he said. "Or do you want this, too?"

And he kicked him in the crippled leg.

"I guess that'll hold you," he said.

There was no response from the boy on the floor. Midge looked at him a moment, then at the coin in his hand, and then went out into the street, whistling.

An hour later, when Mrs. Kelly came home from her day's work at Faulkner's Steam Laundry, she found Connie on the floor, moaning. Dropping on her knees beside him, she called him by name a score of times. Then she got up and, pale as a ghost, dashed from the house. Dr. Ryan left the Kelly abode about dusk and walked toward Halsted Street. Mrs. Dorgan spied him as he passed her gate.

"Who's sick, Doctor?" she called.

"Poor little Connie," he replied. "He had a bad fall."

"How did it happen?"

"I can't say for sure, Margaret, but I'd almost bet he was knocked down."

"Knocked down!" exclaimed Mrs. Dorgan.

"Why, who—?"

"Have you seen the other one lately?"

"Michael? No, not since mornin'. You can't be thinkin'——"

"I wouldn't put it past him, Margaret," said the doctor gravely. "The lad's mouth is swollen and cut, and his poor, skinny little leg is bruised. He surely didn't do it to himself and I think Helen suspects the other one."

"Lord save us!" said Mrs. Dorgan. "I'll run over and see if I can help."

"That's a good woman," said Doctor Ryan, and went on down the street.

Near midnight, when Midge came home, his mother was sitting at Connie's bedside. She did not look up.

"Well," said Midge, "what's the matter?"

She remained silent. Midge repeated his question.

"Michael, you know what's the matter," she said at length.

"I don't know nothin'," said Midge.

"Don't lie to me, Michael. What did you do to your brother?"

"Nothin'."

"You hit him."

"Well, then, I hit him. What of it? It ain't the first time."

Her lips pressed tightly together, her face like chalk, Ellen Kelly rose from her chair and made straight for him. Midge backed against the door.

"Lay off'n me, Ma. I don't want to fight no woman."

Still she came on breathing heavily.

"Stop where you're at, Ma," he warned.

There was a brief struggle and Midge's mother lay on the floor before him.

"You ain't hurt, Ma. You're lucky I didn't land good. And I told you to lay off'n me."

"God forgive you, Michael!"

Midge found Hap Collins in the showdown game at the Royal.

"Come on out a minute," he said.

Hap followed him out on the walk.

"I'm leavin' town for a w'ile," said Midge.

"What for?"

"Well, we had a little run-in up to the house. The kid stole a half buck off'n me, and when I went after it he cracked me with his crutch. So I nailed him. And the old lady came at me with a chair and I took it off'n her and she fell down."

"How is Connie hurt?"

"Not bad."

"What are you runnin' away for?"

"Who the hell said I was runnin' away? I'm sick and tired o' gettin' picked on; that's all. So I'm leavin' for a w'ile and I want a piece o' money."

"I ain't only got six bits," said Happy.

"You're in bad shape, ain't you? Well, come through with it."

Happy came through.

"You oughtn't to hit the kid," he said.

"I ain't astin' you who can I hit," snarled Midge. "You try to put somethin' over on me and you'll get the same dose. I'm goin' now."

"Go as far as you like," said Happy, but not until he was sure that Kelly was out of hearing.

Early the following morning, Midge boarded a train for Milwaukee. He had no ticket, but no one knew the difference. The conductor remained in the caboose.

On a night six months later, Midge hurried out of the "stage door" of the Star Boxing Club and made for Duane's saloon, two blocks away. In his pocket were twelve dollars, his reward for having battered up one Demon Dempsey through the six rounds of the first preliminary.

It was Midge's first professional engagement in the manly art. Also it was the first time in weeks that he had earned twelve dollars.

On the way to Duane's he had to pass Niemann's. He pulled his cap over his eyes and increased his pace until he had gone by. Inside Niemann's stood a trusting bartender, who for ten days had staked Midge to drinks and allowed him to ravage the lunch on a promise to come in and settle the moment he was paid for the "prelim."

Midge strode into Duane's and aroused the napping bartender by slapping a silver dollar on the festive board.

"Gimme a shot," said Midge.

The shooting continued until the wind-up at the Star was over and part of the fight crowd joined Midge in front of Duane's bar. A youth in the early twenties, standing next to young Kelly, finally summoned sufficient courage to address him.

"Wasn't you in the first bout?" he ventured.

"Yeh," Midge replied.

"My name's Hersch," said the other.

Midge received the startling information in silence.

"I don't want to butt in," continued Mr. Hersch, "but I'd like to buy you a drink."

"All right," said Midge, "but don't overstrain yourself."

Mr. Hersch laughed uproariously and beckoned to the bartender.

"You certainly gave that wop a trimmin' tonight," said the buyer of the drink, when they had been served. "I thought you'd kill him."

"I would if I hadn't let up," Midge replied. "I'll kill 'em all."

"You got the wallop all right," the other said admiringly.

"Have I got the wallop?" said Midge. "Say, I can kick like a mule. Did you notice them muscles in my shoulders?"

"Notice 'em? I couldn't help from noticin' 'em," said Hersch. "I says to the fella settin' alongside o' me, I says: 'Look at them shoulders! No wonder he can hit,' I says to him."

"Just let me land and it's good-by, baby," said Midge. "I'll kill 'em all."

The oral manslaughter continued until Duane's closed for the night. At parting, Midge and his new friend shook hands and arranged for a meeting the following evening.

For nearly a week the two were together almost constantly. It was Hersch's pleasant rôle to listen to Midge's modest revelations concerning himself, and to buy every time Midge's glass was empty. But there came an evening when Hersch regretfully announced that he must go home to supper.

"I got a date for eight bells," he confided. "I could stick till then, only I must clean up and put on the Sunday clo'es, 'cause she's the prettiest little thing in Milwaukee."

"Can't you fix it for two?" asked Midge.

"I don't know who to get," Hersch replied. "Wait, though. I got a sister and if she ain't busy, it'll be O. K. She's no bum for looks herself."

So it came about that Midge and Emma Hersch and Emma's brother and the prettiest little thing in Milwaukee foregathered at Wall's and danced half the night away. And Midge and Emma danced every dance together, for though every little onestep seemed to induce a new thirst of its own, Lou Hersch stayed too sober to dance with his own sister.

The next day, penniless at last in spite of his phenomenal ability to make someone else settle, Midge Kelly sought out Doc Hammond, matchmaker for the Star, and asked to be booked for the next show.

"I could put you on with Tracy for the next bout," said Doc.

"What's they in it?" asked Midge.

"Twenty if you cop," Doc told him.

"Have a heart," protested Midge. "Didn't I look good the other night?"

"You looked all right. But you aren't Freddie Welsh yet by a consid'able margin."

"I ain't scared of Freddie Welsh or none of 'em," said Midge.

"Well, we don't pay our boxers by the size of their chests," Doc said.

"I'm offerin' you this Tracy bout. Take it or leave it."

"All right; I'm on," said Midge, and he passed a pleasant afternoon at Duane's on the strength of his booking.

Young Tracy's manager came to Midge the night before the show.

"How do you feel about this go?" he asked.

"Me?" said Midge, "I feel all right. What do you mean, how do I feel?"

"I mean," said Tracy's manager, "that we're mighty anxious to win, 'cause the boy's got a chanct in Philly if he cops this one."

"What's your proposition?" asked Midge.

"Fifty bucks," said Tracy's manager.

"What do you think I am, a crook? Me lay down for fifty bucks. Not me!"

"Seventy-five, then," said Tracy's manager.

The market closed on eighty and the details were agreed on in short order. And the next night Midge was stopped in the second round by a terrific slap on the forearm.

This time Midge passed up both Niemann's and Duane's, having a sizable account at each place, and sought his refreshment at Stein's farther down the street.

When the profits of his deal with Tracy were gone, he learned, by first-hand information from Doc Hammond and the matchmakers at the other "clubs," that he was no longer desired for even the cheapest of preliminaries. There was no danger of his starving or dying of thirst while Emma and Lou Hersch lived. But he made up his mind, four months after his defeat by Young Tracy, that Milwaukee was not the ideal place for him to live.

"I can lick the best of 'em," he reasoned, "but there ain't no more chanct for me here. I can maybe go east and get on somewheres. And besides——"

But just after Midge had purchased a ticket to Chicago with the money he had "borrowed" from Emma Hersch "to buy shoes," a heavy hand was laid on his shoulders and he turned to face two strangers.

"Where are you goin', Kelly?" inquired the owner of the heavy hand.

"Nowheres," said Midge. "What the hell do you care?"

The other stranger spoke:

"Kelly, I'm employed by Emma Hersch's mother to see that you do right by her. And we want you to stay here till you've done it."

"You won't get nothin' but the worst of it, monkeying with me," said Midge.

Nevertheless, he did not depart for Chicago that night. Two days later, Emma Hersch became Mrs. Kelly, and the gift of the groom, when once they were alone, was a crushing blow on the bride's pale cheek.

Next morning, Midge left Milwaukee as he had entered it—by fast freight.

"They's no use kiddin' ourself any more," said Tommy Haley. "He might get down to thirty-seven in a pinch, but if he done below that a mouse could stop him. He's a welter; that's what he is and he knows it as well as I do. He's growed like a weed in the last six mont's. I told him, I says, 'If you don't quit growin' they won't be nobody for you to box, only Willard and them.' He says, 'Well, I wouldn't run away from Willard if I weighed twenty pounds more.'"

"He must hate himself," said Tommy's brother.

"I never seen a good one that didn't," said Tommy. "And Midge is a good one; don't make no mistake about that. I wisht we could of got Welsh before the kid growed so big. But it's too late now. I won't make no holler, though, if we can match him up with the Dutchman."

"Who do you mean?"

"Young Goetz, the welter champ. We mightn't not get so much dough for the bout itself, but it'd roll in afterward. What a drawin' card we'd be, 'cause the people pays their money to see the fella with the wallop, and that's Midge. And we'd keep the title just as long as Midge could make the weight."

"Can't you land no match with Goetz?"

"Sure, 'cause he needs the money. But I've went careful with the kid so far and look at the results I got! So what's the use of takin' a chanct? The kid's comin' every minute and Goetz is goin' back faster'n big Johnson did. I think we could lick him now; I'd bet my life on it. But six mont's from now they won't be no risk. He'll of licked hisself before that time. Then all as we'll have to do is sign up with him and wait for the referee to stop it. But Midge is so crazy to get at him now that I can't hardly hold him back."

The brothers Haley were lunching in a Boston hotel. Dan had come down from Holyoke to visit with Tommy and to watch the latter's protégé go twelve rounds, or less, with Bud Cross. The bout promised little in the way of a contest, for Midge had twice stopped the Baltimore youth and Bud's reputation for gameness was all that had earned him the date. The fans were willing to pay the price to see Midge's hay-making left, but they wanted to see it used on an opponent who would not jump out of the ring the first time he felt its crushing force. But Cross was such an opponent, and his willingness to stop boxing-gloves with his eyes, ears, nose and throat had long enabled him to escape the horrors of honest labor. A game boy was Bud, and he showed it in his battered, swollen, discolored face.

"I should think," said Dan Haley, "that the kid'd do whatever you tell him after all you done for him."

"Well," said Tommy, "he's took my dope pretty straight so far, but he's so sure of hisself that he can't see no reason for waitin'. He'll do what I say, though; he'd be a sucker not to."

"You got a contrac' with him?"

"No, I don't need no contrac'. He knows it was me that drug him out o' the gutter and he ain't goin' to turn me down now, when he's got the dough and bound to get more. Where'd he of been at if I hadn't listened to him when he first come to me? That's pretty near two years ago now, but it seems like last week. I was settin' in the s'loon acrost from the Pleasant Club in Philly, waitin' for McCann to count the dough and come over, when this little bum blowed in and tried to stand the house off for a drink. They told him nothin' doin' and to beat it out o' there, and then he seen me and come over to where I was settin' and ast me wasn't I a boxin' man and I told him who I was. Then he ast me for money to buy a shot and I told him to set down and I'd buy it for him.

"Then we got talkin' things over and he told me his name and told me about fightin' a couple o' prelims out to Milwaukee. So I says, 'Well, boy, I don't know how good or how rotten you are, but you won't never get no-wheres trainin' on that stuff.' So he says he'd cut it out if he could get on in a bout and I says I would give him a chanct if he played square with me and didn't touch no more to drink. So we shook hands and I took him up to the hotel with me and give him a bath and the next day I bought him some clo'es. And I staked him to eats and sleeps for over six weeks. He had a hard time breakin' away from the polish, but finally I thought he was fit and I give him his chanct. He went on with Smiley Sayer and stopped him so quick that Smiley thought sure he was poisoned.

"Well, you know what he's did since. The only beatin' in his record was by Tracy in Milwaukee before I got hold of him, and he's licked Tracy three times in the last year.

"I've gave him all the best of it in a money way and he's got seven thousand bucks in cold storage. How's that for a kid that was in the gutter two years ago? And he'd have still more yet if he wasn't so nuts over clo'es and got to stop at the good hotels and so forth."

"Where's his home at?"

"Well, he ain't really got no home. He came from Chicago and his mother canned him out o' the house for bein' no good. She give him a raw deal, I guess, and he says he won't have nothin' to do with her unles she comes to him first. She's got a pile o' money, he says, so he ain't worryin' about her."

The gentleman under discussion entered the café and swaggered to Tommy's table, while the whole room turned to look.

Midge was the picture of health despite a slightly colored eye and an ear that seemed to have no opening. But perhaps it was not his healthiness that drew all eyes. His diamond horse-shoe tie pin, his purple cross-striped shirt, his orange shoes and his light blue suit fairly screamed for attention.

"Where you been?" he asked Tommy. "I been lookin' all over for you."

"Set down," said his manager.

"No time," said Midge. "I'm goin' down to the w'arf and see 'em unload the fish."

"Shake hands with my brother Dan," said Tommy.

Midge shook with the Holyoke Haley.

"If you're Tommy's brother, you're O. K. with me," said Midge, and the brothers beamed with pleasure.

Dan moistened his lips and murmured an embarrassed reply, but it was lost on the young gladiator.

"Leave me take twenty," Midge was saying. "I prob'ly won't need it, but I don't like to be caught short."

Tommy parted with a twenty-dollar bill and recorded the transaction in a small black book the insurance company had given him for Christmas.

"But," he said, "it won't cost you no twenty to look at them fish. Want me to go along?"

"No," said Midge hastily. "You and your brother here prob'ly got a lot to say to each other."

"Well," said Tommy, "don't take no bad money and don't get lost. And you better be back at four o'clock and lay down a w'ile."

"I don't need no rest to beat this guy," said Midge. "He'll do enough layin' down for the both of us."

And laughing even more than the jest called for, he strode out through the fire of admiring and startled glances.

The corner of Boylston and Tremont was the nearest Midge got to the wharf, but the lady awaiting him was doubtless a more dazzling sight than the catch of the luckiest Massachusetts fisherman. She could talk, too—probably better than the fish.

"O you Kid!" she said, flashing a few silver teeth among the gold. "O you fighting man!"

Midge smiled up at her.

"We'll go somewheres and get a drink," he said. "One won't hurt."

In New Orleans, five months after he had rearranged the map of Bud Cross for the third time, Midge finished training for his championship bout with the Dutchman.

Back in his hotel after the final workout, Midge stopped to chat with some of the boys from up north, who had made the long trip to see a champion dethroned, for the result of this bout was so nearly a foregone conclusion that even the experts had guessed it.

Tommy Haley secured the key and the mail and ascended to the Kelly suite. He was bathing when Midge came in, half an hour later.

"Any mail?" asked Midge.

"There on the bed," replied Tommy from the tub.

Midge picked up the stack of letters and postcards and glanced them over. From the pile he sorted out three letters and laid them on the table. The rest he tossed into the waste-basket. Then he picked up the three and sat for a few moments holding them, while his eyes gazed off into space. At length he looked again at the three unopened letters in his hand; then he put one in his pocket and tossed the other two at the basket. They missed their target and fell on the floor.

"Hell!" said Midge, and stooping over picked them up.

He opened one postmarked Milwaukee and read:

DEAR HUSBAND:

I have wrote to you so manny times and got no anser and I dont know if you ever got them, so I am writeing again in the hopes you will get this letter and anser. I dont like to bother you with my trubles and I would not only for the baby and I am not asking you should write to me but only send a little money and I am not asking for myself but the baby has not been well a day sence last Aug. and the dr. told me she cant live much longer unless I give her better food and thats impossible the way things are. Lou has not been working for a year and what I make dont hardley pay for the rent. I am not asking for you to give me any money, but only you should send what I loaned when convenient and I think it amts. to about $36.00. Please try and send that amt. and it will help me, but if you cant send the whole amt. try and send me something.

Your wife,

EMMA

Midge tore the letter into a hundred pieces and scattered them over the floor.

"Money, money, money!" he said. "They must think I'm made o' money. I s'pose the old woman's after it too."

He opened his mother's letter:

dear Michael Connie wonted me to rite and say you must beet the dutchman and he is sur you will and wonted me to say we wont you to rite and tell us about it, but I gess you havent no time to rite or we herd from you long beffore this but I wish you would rite jest a line or 2 boy becaus it wuld be better for Connie then a barl of medisn. It wuld help me to keep things going if you send me money now and then when you can spair it but if you cant send no money try and fine time to rite a letter onley a few lines and it will please Connie. jest think boy he hasent got out of bed in over 3 yrs. Connie says good luck.

Your Mother,

ELLEN F. KELLY

"I thought so," said Midge. "They're all alike."

The third letter was from New York. It read:

HON:—This is the last letter you will get from me before your champ, but I will send you a telegram Saturday, but I can't say as much in a telegram as in a letter and I am writeing this to let you know I am thinking of you and praying for good luck.

Lick him good hon and don't wait no longer than you have to and don't forget to wire me as soon as its over. Give him that little old left of yours on the nose hon and don't be afraid of spoiling his good looks because he couldn't be no homlier than he is. But don't let him spoil my baby's pretty face. You won't will you hon.

Well hon I would give anything to be there and see it, but I guess you love Haley better than me or you wouldn't let him keep me away. But when your champ hon we can do as we please and tell Haley to go to the devil.

Well hon I will send you a telegram Saturday and I almost forgot to tell you I will need some more money, a couple hundred say and you will have to wire it to me as soon as you get this. You will won't you hon.

I will send you a telegram Saturday and remember hon I am pulling for you.

Well good-by sweetheart and good luck.

GRACE

"They're all alike," said Midge. "Money, money, money."

Tommy Haley, shining from his ablutions, came in from the adjoining room.

"Thought you'd be layin' down," he said.

"I'm goin' to," said Midge, unbuttoning his orange shoes.

"I'll call you at six and you can eat up here without no bugs to pester you. I got to go down and give them birds their tickets."

"Did you hear from Goldberg?" asked Midge.

"Didn't I tell you? Sure; fifteen weeks at five hundred, if we win. And we can get a guarantee o' twelve thousand, with privileges either in New York or Milwaukee."

"Who with?"

"Anybody that'll stand up in front of you. You don't care who it is, do you?"

"Not me. I'll make 'em all look like a monkey."

"Well you better lay down aw'ile."

"Oh, say, wire two hundred to Grace for me, will you? Right away; the New York address."

"Two hundred! You just sent her three hundred last Sunday."

"Well, what the hell do you care?"

"All right, all right. Don't get sore about it. Anything else?"

"That's all," said Midge, and dropped onto the bed.

"And I want the deed done before I come back," said Grace as she rose from the table. "You won't fall down on me, will you, hon?"

"Leave it to me," said Midge. "And don't spend no more than you have to."

Grace smiled a farewell and left the café. Midge continued to sip his coffee and read his paper.

They were in Chicago and they were in the middle of Midge's first week in vaudeville. He had come straight north to reap the rewards of his glorious victory over the broken-down Dutchman. A fortnight had been spent in learning his act, which consisted of a gymnastic exhibition and a ten-minutes' monologue on the various excellences of Midge Kelly. And now he was twice daily turning 'em away from the Madison Theatre.

His breakfast over and his paper read, Midge sauntered into the lobby and asked for his key. He then beckoned to a bell-boy, who had been hoping for that very honor.

"Find Haley, Tommy Haley," said Midge. "Tell him to come up to my room."

"Yes, sir, Mr. Kelly," said the boy, and proceeded to break all his former records for diligence.

Midge was looking out of his seventh-story window when Tommy answered the summons.

"What'll it be?" inquired his manager.

There was a pause before Midge replied.

"Haley," he said, "twenty-five per cent's a whole lot o' money."

"I guess I got it comin', ain't I?" said Tommy.

"I don't see how you figger it. I don't see where you're worth it to me."

"Well," said Tommy, "I didn't expect nothin' like this. I thought you was satisfied with the bargain. I don't want to beat nobody out o' nothin', but I don't see where you could have got anybody else that would of did all I done for you."

"Sure, that's all right," said the champion. "You done a lot for me in Philly. And you got good money for it, didn't you?"

"I ain't makin' no holler. Still and all, the big money's still ahead of us yet. And if it hadn't of been for me, you wouldn't of never got within grabbin' distance."

"Oh, I guess I could of went along all right," said Midge. "Who was it that hung that left on the Dutchman's jaw, me or you?"

"Yes, but you wouldn't been in the ring with the Dutchman if it wasn't for how I handled you."

"Well, this won't get us nowheres. The idear is that you ain't worth no twenty-five per cent now and it don't make no difference what come off a year or two ago."

"Don't it?" said Tommy. "I'd say it made a whole lot of difference."

"Well, I say it don't and I guess that settles it."

"Look here, Midge," Tommy said, "I thought I was fair with you, but if you don't think so, I'm willin' to hear what you think is fair. I don't want nobody callin' me a Sherlock. Let's go down to business and sign up a contract'. What's your figger?"

"I ain't namin' no figger," Midge replied. "I'm sayin' that twenty-five's too much. Now what are you willin' to take?"

"How about twenty?"

"Twenty's too much," said Kelly.

"What ain't too much?" asked Tommy.

"Well, Haley, I might as well give it to you straight. They ain't nothin' that ain't too much."

"You mean you don't want me at no figger?"

"That's the idear."

There was a minute's silence. Then Tommy Haley walked toward the door.

"Midge," he said, in a choking voice, "you're makin' a big mistake, boy. You can't throw down your best friends and get away with it. That damn woman will ruin you."

Midge sprang from his seat.

"You shut your mouth!" he stormed. "Get out o' here before they have to carry you out. You been spongin' off o' me long enough. Say one more word about the girl or about anything else and you'll get what the Dutchman got. Now get out!"

And Tommy Haley, having a very vivid memory of the Dutchman's face as he fell, got out.

Grace came in later, dropped her numerous bundles on the lounge and perched herself on the arm of Midge's chair.

"Well?" she said.

"Well," said Midge, "I got rid of him."

"Good boy!" said Grace. "And now I think you might give me that twenty-five per cent."

"Besides the seventy-five you're already gettin'?" said Midge.

"Don't be no grouch, hon. You don't look pretty when you're grouchy."

"It ain't my business to look pretty," Midge replied.

"Wait till you see how I look with the stuff I bought this mornin'!"

Midge glanced at the bundles on the lounge.

"There's Haley's twenty-five per cent," he said, "and then some."

The champion did not remain long without a manager. Haley's successor was none other than Jerome Harris, who saw in Midge a better meal ticket than his popular-priced musical show had been.

The contract, giving Mr. Harris twenty-five per cent of Midge's earnings, was signed in Detroit the week after Tommy Haley had heard his dismissal read. It had taken Midge just six days to learn that a popular actor cannot get on without the ministrations of a man who thinks, talks and means business. At first Grace objected to the new member of the firm, but when Mr. Harris had demanded and secured from the vaudeville people a one-hundred-dollar increase in Midge's weekly stipend, she was convinced that the champion had acted for the best.

"You and my missus will have some great old times," Harris told Grace. "I'd of wired her to join us here, only I seen the Kid's bookin' takes us to Milwaukee next week, and that's where she is."

But when they were introduced in the Milwaukee hotel, Grace admitted to herself that her feeling for Mrs. Harris could hardly be called love at first sight. Midge, on the contrary, gave his new manager's wife the many times over and seemed loath to end the feast of his eyes.

"Some doll," he said to Grace when they were alone.

"Doll is right," the lady replied, "and sawdust where her brains ought to be."

"I'm li'ble to steal that baby," said Midge, and he smiled as he noted the effect of his words on his audience's face.

On Tuesday of the Milwaukee week the champion successfully defended his title in a bout that the newspapers never reported. Midge was alone in his room that morning when a visitor entered without knocking. The visitor was Lou Hersch.

Midge turned white at sight of him.

"What do you want?" he demanded.

"I guess you know," said Lou Hersch. "Your wife's starvin' to death and your baby's starvin' to death and I'm starvin' to death. And you're dirty with money."

"Listen," said Midge, "if it wasn't for you, I wouldn't never saw your sister. And, if you ain't man enough to hold a job, what's that to me? The best thing you can do is keep away from me."

"You give me a piece o' money and I'll go."

Midge's reply to the ultimatum was a straight right to his brother-in-law's narrow chest.

"Take that home to your sister."

And after Lou Hersch had picked himself up and slunk away, Midge thought: "It's lucky I didn't give him my left or I'd of croaked him. And if I'd hit him in the stomach, I'd of broke his spine."

There was a party after each evening performance during the Milwaukee engagement. The wine flowed freely and Midge had more of it than Tommy Haley ever would have permitted him. Mr. Harris offered no objection, which was possibly just as well for his own physical comfort.

In the dancing between drinks, Midge had his new manager's wife for a partner as often as Grace. The latter's face as she floundered round in the arms of the portly Harris, belied her frequent protestations that she was having the time of her life.

Several times that week, Midge thought Grace was on the point of starting the quarrel he hoped to have. But it was not until Friday night that she accommodated. He and Mrs. Harris had disappeared after the matinee and when Grace saw him again at the close of the night show, she came to the point at once.

"What are you tryin' to pull off?" she demanded.

"It's none o' your business, is it?" said Midge.

"You bet it's my business; mine and Harris's. You cut it short or you'll find out."

"Listen," said Midge, "have you got a mortgage on me or somethin'? You talk like we was married."

"We're goin' to be, too. And to-morrow's as good a time as any."

"Just about," Midge said. "You got as much chanct o' marryin' me to-morrow as the next day or next year and that ain't no chanct at all."

"We'll find out," said Grace.

"You're the one that's got somethin' to find out."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean I'm married already."

"You lie!"

"You think so, do you? Well, s'pose you go to this here address and get acquainted with my missus."

Midge scrawled a number on a piece of paper and handed it to her. She stared at it unseeingly.

"Well," said Midge, "I ain't kiddin' you. You go there and ask for Mrs. Michael Kelly, and if you don't find her, I'll marry you to-morrow before breakfast."

Still Grace stared at the scrap of paper. To Midge it seemed an age before she spoke again.

"You lied to me all this w'ile."

"You never ast me was I married. What's more, what the hell diff'rence did it make to you? You got a split, didn't you? Better'n fifty-fifty."

He started away.

"Where you goin'?"

"I'm goin' to meet Harris and his wife."

"I'm goin' with you. You're not goin' to shake me now."

"Yes, I am, too," said Midge quietly. "When I leave town to-morrow night, you're going to stay here. And if I see where you're goin' to make a fuss, I'll put you in a hospital where they'll keep you quiet. You can get your stuff to-morrow mornin' and I'll slip you a hundred bucks. And then I don't want to see no more o' you. And don't try and tag along now or I'll have to add another K. O. to the old record."

When Grace returned to the hotel that night, she discovered that Midge and the Harrises had moved to another. And when Midge left town the following night, he was again without a manager, and Mr. Harris was without a wife.

Three days prior to Midge Kelly's ten-round bout with Young Milton in New York City, the sporting editor of The News assigned Joe Morgan to write two or three thousand words about the champion to run with a picture lay-out for Sunday.

Joe Morgan dropped in at Midge's training quarters Friday afternoon. Midge, he learned, was doing road work, but Midge's manager, Wallie Adams, stood ready and willing to supply reams of dope about the greatest fighter of the age.

"Let's hear what you've got," said Joe, "and then I'll try to fix up something."

So Wallie stepped on the accelerator of his imagination and shot away.

"Just a kid; that's all he is; a regular boy. Get what I mean? Don't know the meanin' o' bad habits. Never tasted liquor in his life and would prob'ly get sick if he smelled it. Clean livin' put him up where he's at. Get what I mean? And modest and unassumin' as a school girl. He's so quiet you wouldn't never know he was round. And he'd go to jail before he'd talk about himself.

"No job at all to get him in shape, 'cause he's always that way. The only trouble we have with him is gettin' him to light into these poor bums they match him up with. He's scared he'll hurt somebody. Get what I mean? He's tickled to death over this match with Milton, 'cause everybody says Milton can stand the gaff. Midge'll maybe be able to cut loose a little this time. But the last two bouts he had, the guys hadn't no business in the ring with him, and he was holdin' back all the w'ile for the fear he'd kill somebody. Get what I mean?"

"Is he married?" inquired Joe.

"Say, you'd think he was married to hear him rave about them kiddies he's got. His fam'ly's up in Canada to their summer home and Midge is wild to get up there with 'em. He thinks more o' that wife and them kiddies than all the money in the world. Get what I mean?"

"How many children has he?"

"I don't know, four or five, I guess. All boys and every one of 'em a dead ringer for their dad."

"Is his father living?"

"No, the old man died when he was a kid. But he's got a grand old mother and a kid brother out in Chi. They're the first ones he thinks about after a match, them and his wife and kiddies. And he don't forget to send the old woman a thousand bucks after every bout. He's going to buy her a new home as soon as they pay him off for this match."

"How about his brother? Is he going to tackle the game?"

"Sure, and Midge says he'll be a champion before he's twenty years old. They're a fightin' fam'ly and all of 'em honest and straight as a die. Get what I mean? A fella that I can't tell you his name come to Midge in Milwaukee onct and wanted him to throw a fight and Midge give him such a trimmin' in the street that he couldn't go on that night. That's the kind he is. Get what I mean?"

Joe Morgan hung around the camp until Midge and his trainers returned.

"One o' the boys from The News," said Wallie by way of introduction. "I been givin' him your fam'ly hist'ry."

"Did he give you good dope?" he inquired.

"He's some historian," said Joe.

"Don't call me no names," said Wallie smiling. "Call us up if they's anything more you want. And keep your eyes on us Monday night. Get what I mean?"

The story in Sunday's News was read by thousands of lovers of the manly art. It was well written and full of human interest. Its slight inaccuracies went unchallenged, though three readers, besides Wallie Adams and Midge Kelly, saw and recognized them. The three were Grace, Tommy Haley and Jerome Harris and the comments they made were not for publication.

Neither the Mrs. Kelly in Chicago nor the Mrs. Kelly in Milwaukee knew that there was such a paper as the New York News. And even if they had known of it and that it contained two columns of reading matter about Midge, neither mother nor wife could have bought it. For The News on Sunday is a nickel a copy.

Joe Morgan could have written more accurately, no doubt, if instead of Wallie Adams, he had interviewed Ellen Kelly and Connie Kelly and Emma Kelly and Lou Hersch and Grace and Jerome Harris and Tommy Haley and Hap Collins and two or three Milwaukee bartenders.

But a story built on their evidence would never have passed the sporting editor.

"Suppose you can prove it," that gentleman would have said. "It wouldn't get us anything but abuse to print it. The people don't want to see him knocked. He's champion."

---

NOTHING IN LIFE is more forlorn than looking back in vain regret. And, worse, to be an aging woman without a future and to sit on an afternoon of cold and drizzling rain, when it is neither autumn nor winter, looking out of a window in a provincial town on a street that apes the ostentation of a capital city; and to see it all in the naked dreariness and desolation of a ghoulish shadow-world, on whose altar you have a short while ago sacrificed a daughter . . . a young and lovely and unreflecting life cut short by a sudden, shamefaced, senseless death, a death caused by the attempt to procure an abortion, a painful, backstairs death, "as the law enjoined." She had yielded to the fear of people's tongues, in the pitiful and yet so human shrinking from scandal, meaning glances, pointing fingers, gossip. And to have to realise over and over again that this human frailty had instantly taken its revenge upon her, at once and unforeseeably; and her husband chose this very moment to leave her, to cast off the last shreds of a common life, as he might the bed-clothes of a bed in which he had slept too long, jumped up and went off and was no more heard of . . . and free now to live a new life, left his discarded wife behind as an empty oyster-shell fit only for the rubbish-heap where it properly belonged—without urgent cares or urgent needs, without joy or occupation or point or meaning . . . A bulky letter had lain unopened on the table for the last two days—perhaps anonymous and stuffed full of slander or hideous congratulations on being quit of a husband who—and then a torrent of gossip like an opened sewer, giving the names of waitresses and prostitutes and barmaids in the neighbouring town with the exact day and time, which enabled her to detect the barefaced lies; for they were often the very nights on which she and her husband had been accusing each other of Ilse's death in violent storms of mutual recrimination . . . Well, she would drain the cup to the dregs. Better the acrid stench of gossip than this grey and dreary drizzle against a background of stucco caryatids and stucco façades and shop-windows full of objects in whose motionless immutability she saw her own life staring out at her: a life of marking time, a life that numbly ran to waste. For such a life it was indeed worth while to suffer birth and death!

She looked first at the signature: the letter was from a young medical student who three days before had chosen not to take off his hat to her. She had sadly mentioned his rudeness to his mother when she met her at church the day before yesterday. But he was a good fellow, a friend of Ilse's, and she could read his letter with a quiet mind:—

"DEAR MADAM,

"My mother tells me you complained to her of my rudeness in not taking my hat off to you. You were kind enough to add that possibly it was my first term at the university that encouraged me to forget my manners and how to behave to a lady. This gives me the right to explain myself and I shall do so; but I warn you that my explanation will be a counter-attack, and a bitter one, which will give you further cause to complain of my manners. But I don't care a hang for good manners and if you don't like it you are not compelled to read this letter, which will possibly be a long one.

"I refused to take my hat off to you yesterday before my departure, as in the ordinary course of things I should have done, because my bile rose at the sight of your mourning and long black veil; I felt a hatred of you that no words can express and tonight, as I write, it makes me shudder as if I were in a fever. I have before my eyes at this moment the last (and very charming) photograph taken of your daughter, whom you lost five months ago. She is smiling, dressed in white and holding her tennis racket, and she looks triumphantly out at me as she used to do when playing with Egon B. against me and someone else. Now you can go and plant roses on her grave out there in the cemetery. Yes, I don't spare you and I shall not spare you; you deserve all this and more. Don't imagine I am so childish as to think you neglected to do everything in your power to save the dear girl's life. You were much too fond of her for that and you would not have spared yourself even if she had not been your only child, for no one could accuse you of not having been 'a good mother.'

"But I am forgetting to account clearly and precisely for my behaviour. It is on that and not on an apology that this letter turns. You are not a person one can take one's hat off to."

She raised her eyes from the paper: he knows nothing, poor fool; but what is he driving at? Has he some dim suspicion? Oh no, this Quixotic childishness is a thrust in the dark and yet it strikes home: it is true I deserve to be cut, for I have been cowardly, oh, so cowardly . . . She read on in resignation.

"Bear with me if I now recall things you know already—the years our families have been acquainted and how young Ilse and I were when we first played croquet together under the old chestnut trees in our garden. She was nine and wore short dresses and her beautiful brown hair was loose for the wind or the reverent hands of a boy to play with. It came on to rain and then we both took shelter under the trees or flattened our noses against a window-pane and Ilse told me she wanted to die very, very young and then she would not have to leave school, and she was going to die on her feet, struck by lightning; for she had heard some such alarming tale in the history lesson. I was only twelve then and I listened with awe and my flesh crept. I remember all this and much more, for my head is a whole gallery of such pictures.

"Later on, my mother used to say in joke that she had arranged our future for us and I confess it was my greatest delight to imagine what it would be like when we were married. Ilse quite approved of the scheme; she thought we suited each other very well because I was the taller and an obliging playfellow (I used always to pick up her balls for her at tennis); and when I once hotly took up the defence of blue eyes against all others in the world, she gave me afterwards our one and only kiss. You remember those blue eyes of hers. She was fourteen by that time and when she was fifteen she got to know Egon Bucksbach on my birthday in my room. I was eighteen and up to six months ago I often had good reason to curse that occasion. I do so no longer.

"I grant that even in those days I shared your dislike of that elegant and precocious youth; but Ilse loved him. He was her first love. Do you remember what that means? Can you imagine with what eyes she saw him? Her first . . . For as for loving me—it never occurred to her; I was always there, her playfellow and brother. She did not even notice that I felt differently. What would have been the point? I soon knew all about it. Even today when I am twenty and should look back on that time with detachment, even today I am amazed to see how much one could suffer over so little. It is that time which makes me your enemy. Not on my account. You wished me well; you regarded us as engaged—but you were deceived. It was then that I began to hate you; for, listen, I was the confidant of both . . . Ilse came to me, naturally, and he . . . he did the same as a matter of course.

"Do you begin to see now what the crime is I accuse you of? From the day you first tumbled to it that Ilse took to Bucksbach (it needed marvellous penetration to tumble to it with a child of her age) you treated her as though she were a thief or had gone on the streets. You used words to her that the child only dimly understood. You looked at her in ways that made her wretched. You didn't beat her—that is not done nowadays, of course—but in her hearing you called down God's mercy on 'this creature'. Ilse still believed in God. You locked her in her room; you crept in on tiptoe to take her by surprise; you stole her diary; you rummaged through her bed and cupboards for letters. You forced her to swear never to speak or write to him again; and then never dreamt of trusting to her word.

"You did all this to her, not to mention all the pinpricks, looks and glances with which one woman can torture another who has to live with her on the closest terms without any means of defence. In any case, Ilse had no wish to defend herself, for she thought herself very sinful.

"How do I know all this? From her tears and all she told me. It lessens your guilt in my eyes that tears mean little to a woman, because from an early age they are easily at her command; besides that, your unhappy marriage and your jealousy—for the motive of what you did was not maternal solicitude but jealousy—disposed you early on to read a vulgar meaning into anything that happened; but I who was a boy at that time could see how terribly you upset her and how bitterly her young heart suffered. Ilse came to me to weep her heart out, to lean upon me for sympathy and consolation, to hear from my lips whether she had really been so low a creature as you never tired of reproaching her with being. And once, when you had shed tears over her, it took me all my time to restrain her from an act of desperation; the poor child was so shattered and tortured. A mother's tears! You should have seen her! You should have heard her! How humbly she bowed before you, how she accused herself, how she acknowledged you were right. She never disputed your authority, never complained of you, never got indignant—she was only miserably unhappy.

"The affair with him lasted three months, her martyrdom fifteen. I know she let him kiss her, but only at the very end and very shyly; as far as I know it happened on eight or nine occasions. You see how deeply I was in their confidence; they hid nothing from me. Not even he. I heard his confession, I cheered him up when he flung himself in despair in the corner of the sofa, I bore with his self-accusations when he put all the blame on himself and said he was not worth suffering so much for . . . This conceited fop knew his own worthlessness compared with our little girl . . .

"'Oh, God,' he used to groan, 'I do not deserve her. She is far above me and now she has to go through all this.'

"He read me her letters; as I said before, he was a cad. Well, even if I had not always known what a wonderful child Ilse was those fifteen letters and notes would have opened my eyes. I have them still. He had to hand them over to me so that Ilse could truthfully assure you that he had not a line of hers in his possession. This precious treasure is in my hands and it is a real treasury of her beloved soul for ever. I would not part with it for anything in the world and if I thought I could ever smile over it I would prefer not to live. But I shall never sink so low.

"I know that all your hatred condensed to a fear lest Ilse and Bucks-bach might reach the point that experienced and sex-conscious women almost take for granted in every affair between young people. I hardly need assure you that no such thought ever entered either Ilse's head or his, although to you it seemed so likely. For the child's innocence was so complete that it put even him far from any idea of endangering it.

"I know all about schoolgirls nowadays. I know what they talk about when they get together in dark corners. And I know how they talk about it. One often shudders at the thought of marrying such girls. Ilse was never one of them; her innocence passed by such things unscathed.

"And yet for the last fifteen months of her life you filled her tender heart with unhappiness to overflowing. Perhaps you did not know that there were children who died of wounds which others scarcely feel. You drove her to despair, you laid her happy life waste, you brought her feelings to confusion and made her long for release. She did not kill herself—but when her terrible illness came I can well believe she gave way to it with relief and without a struggle. She died—a darling beautiful girl who had not harmed a soul and who gladdened every eye with the sight of her flying hair. She died at the age of seventeen and a half before she had tasted the happiness of life or known more of love than its torment . . . I was far away when she died.

"I knew nothing of her illness; when at last I heard from home that Ilse Arlesius was ill it was too late to do anything. I have often blamed myself since for not having been more comfort to her during her brief existence. It is true that after her last meeting with Bucksbach (it was a heart-rending parting in sobs and tears) she made me swear never to speak of their meeting again; but perhaps she might have consented to it if I had been more persistent. It was my luke-warmness, my indolence, my ridiculous egoism that persuaded me my turn would perhaps come if only the other were forgotten. I have really no right to write this letter.

"I was told (when I went home a few days ago) that Ilse often spoke of me in her last painful and feverish hours, that she asked for me and hoped—it fills me with joy and despair to think of it—I might in some way alleviate her suffering. Perhaps it was because she never omitted in childish solemnity to put my 'stud: med:' on the cards she sent me. Perhaps it was because she knew from of old that I always did what I could to spare her suffering or to lessen it. Ah yes . . . Now all that is over and there is nothing left but the mound of her grave, where the wreathes and flowers wither. It is somewhat of a shock to me to find myself incapable of accepting a fact: I would gladly dispute the logical conclusion of an indisputable proposition, namely, that the dead are dead and that I shall never see her again or hear her voice, whereas I still have all her movements, every tone of her voice, whether vexed or sad or playful, so clearly in my memory that some remote resemblance often makes me start, and hope that it is she who is speaking . . . which, as you will admit, is somewhat crazed . . .

"And I will confess, too, that during the first months of bitter affliction I regretted that my medical scepticism had forced me to regard spiritualism and everything of the sort once and for all as rubbish, fraud and self-deception.

"We have lost her, you and I. Perhaps when the year comes to an end you and I will be the only ones to remember her at all. We are united in that. Believe me, I shudder to think of your last few months—walking all alone through the rooms where every inch was loaded with memories of your child, opening and shutting doors whose cool metal handles were so often warmed by Ilse's hand, going up to cupboards where her pretty dresses hung, untouched and folded, the white ones and the brown and the sea-blue trimmed with fur that I loved so much. Oh no, I do not envy you all you have suffered! And the weeks of nursing and the three days afterwards; and what you must have had to bear, strong as you are, when Ilse's death hastened the separation from your husband; and then your sleepless nights, while the past twitched picture after picture before your eyes . . . To what loneliness we are left, you and I. How sadly we miss the delightful laughter and the darling solemnness of our Ilse! I, at least, know that life will bring new claims on my affections, that youth and its desires will unite to dim my memories and arouse new feelings. I shall never forget Ilse, for she is part, and the loveliest part, of my boyhood, but I shall think of her more calmly, more seldom—in time. But you! I shudder to think of your evenings, to think that your future is nothing but a chain of grief, a glaring mirror of the past, as you sit alone and hemmed in by pain within your four walls, where the presence of your husband had become intolerable. Oh, if I could only be of some help to you. Couldn't we talk sometimes of her whom we have lost? Couldn't we comfort each other by recalling our happy memories of her, now she is far removed from all pain? We human beings are so irresponsible in what we do, so innocent of what we suffer . . . All we do to make others suffer is so full of the best intentions, so overborne by forces over which we have no control. Do we hate? Do we love? I do not know. I feel it is something outside us that makes us love and hate, makes us do things that give us pleasure, things of which we suffer, things of which we perish. Perhaps it is in our blood; perhaps it is only something that has happened to us, or somewhere near us, days before. Then influences of all sorts come to us in dreams. And so, do not take too hardly all that came to you and Ilse. Perhaps years of sorrow and bitter tears and sadness might have been her lot—perhaps we can be happy in her death. It is never safe to be alive.

"My mother and I will always be glad to see you, I in any case. I may be young but I have suffered. And suffering brings people together. Do not refuse me, let me still enjoy in days of sorrow the friendship you showed me in happier ones.

"Yours,
"Joachim."

"P.S.

"Now that I have finished this wild letter in the wrought-up state I am in tonight, I remember that I began in quite another mood, a mood of hostility. I cannot bring myself to read it through; it called up what has been too vividly, too violently. I leave myself and my perhaps brutal tactlessness to your mercy. I beg you from my heart to forgive me all . . . I will call tomorrow afternoon to know whether you forgive me. I will bring Ilse's letters with me and I beseech you urgently to pardon me.

"Yours J."

A man of God! As soon as she had put the letter down on the windowledge she laughed—a bitter, noiseless laugh—over this Balaam who set out to curse and ended by blessing and whose curse and blessing were equally and touchingly wide of the mark—a laugh that dissolved her bitterness in tears. Suddenly she saw herself with alarming clearness. She saw a woman who had been guilty of much petty malice in the name of love. A woman who had known as little of her daughter as this boy had, whose love spoke in every line as clearly as the chirping of the grasshoppers from the grass at the edge of a field, incessant, scarcely audible above other sounds, but in the silence as loud as a surging sea. Oh yes, what horror and misery to be young in the world today, at a time when old conventions were no longer binding and new ones were not yet taken for granted: the loneliness and sorrow that fell to that child's, her Ilse's, lot, thousands of Ilses, thousands of Joachims were suffering at that very moment. They were no exception to the common run; it was simply that new ideas took possession of good and bad alike—and it was just the best that suffered because they could not bear the break with the past . . . But, if the young had these problems, a woman who had no ties could find work to do. She must learn to help people. She must learn midwifery and the care of children and all that went with it. Then her martyrdom would not have been in vain: she had learnt her lesson and could teach others; she could teach the old to have more discernment and youth to show more trust.

The rain came drearily down, but she saw it no longer with the listless eyes of one whose purpose in life had gone; she had received a blessing from the letter of a sorrowing lover and found her calling—the conversion of youth, perhaps, from its furtive precocity. She had been given strength to break away from her ladylike existence, to atone for the sin of cowardice by practical work in a place where no one knew her. She would dedicate her daily labours to youth here and now in the harshness of city life, where men lived and died unregarded, callously exploited as a piece of wood in which ants hollow out their tunnels and rear their broods and have their being, until at last it moulders away.

OLD MAN MINICK

Edna Ferber

HIS wife had always spoiled him outrageously. No doubt of that. Take, for example, the matter of the pillows merely. Old man Minick slept high. That is, he thought he slept high. He liked two plump pillows on his side of the great, wide, old-fashioned cherry bed. He would sink into them with a vast grunting and sighing and puffing expressive of nerves and muscles relaxed and gratified. But in the morning there was always one pillow on the floor. He had thrown it there. Always, in the morning, there it lay, its plump white cheek turned reproachfully up at him from the side of the bed. Ma Minick knew this, naturally, after forty years of the cherry bed. But she never begrudged him that extra pillow. Each morning, when she arose, she picked it up on her way to shut the window. Each morning the bed was made up with two pillows on his side of it, as usual.

Then there was the window. Ma Minick liked it open wide. Old man Minick, who rather prided himself on his modernism (he called it being up to date) was distrustful of the night air. In the folds of its sable mantle lurked a swarm of dread things—colds, clammy miasmas, fevers.

"Night air's just like any other air," Ma Minick would say, with some asperity. Ma Minick was no worm; and as modern as he. So when they went to bed the window would be open wide. They would lie there, the two old ones, talking comfortably about commonplace things. The kind of talk that goes on between a man and a woman who have lived together in wholesome peace (spiced with occasional wholesome bickerings) for more than forty years.

"Remind me to see Gerson to-morrow about that lock on the basement door. The paper's full of burglars."

"If I think of it." She never failed to.

"George and Nettie haven't been over in a week now."

"Oh, well, young folks . . . Did you stop in and pay that Koritz the fifty cents for pressing your suit?"

"By golly, I forgot again! First thing in the morning."

A sniff. "Just smell the Yards." It was Chicago.

"Wind must be from the west."

Sleep came with reluctant feet, but they wooed her patiently. And presently she settled down between them and they slept lightly. Usually, some time during the night, he awoke, slid cautiously and with infinite stealth from beneath the covers and closed the wide-flung window to within a bare two inches of the sill. Almost invariably she heard him; but she was a wise old woman; a philosopher of parts. She knew better than to allow a window to shatter the peace of their marital felicity. As she lay there, smiling a little grimly in the dark and giving no sign of being awake, she thought, "Oh, well, I guess a closed window won't kill me either."

Still, sometimes, just to punish him a little, and to prove that she was nobody's fool, she would wait until he had dropped off to sleep again and then she, too, would achieve a stealthy trip to the window and would raise it slowly, carefully, inch by inch.

"How did that window come to be open?" he would say in the morning, being a poor dissembler.

"Window? Why, it's just the way it was when we went to bed." And she would stoop to pick up the pillow that lay on the floor.

There was little or no talk of death between this comfortable, active, sound-appearing man of almost seventy and this plump capable woman of sixty-six. But as always, between husband and wife, it was understood wordlessly (and without reason) that old man Minick would go first. Not that either of them had the slightest intention of going. In fact, when it happened they were planning to spend the winter in California and perhaps live there indefinitely if they liked it and didn't get too lonesome for George and Nettie, and the Chicago smoke, and Chicago noise, and Chicago smells and rush and dirt. Still, the solid sum paid yearly in insurance premiums showed clearly that he meant to leave her in comfort and security. Besides, the world is full of widows. Everyone sees that. But how many widowers? Few. Widows there are by the thousands; living alone; living in hotels; living with married daughters and sons-in-law or married sons and daughters-in-law. But of widowers in a like situation there are bewilderingly few. And why this should be no one knows.

So, then. The California trip never materialized. And the year that followed never was quite clear in old man Minick's dazed mind. In the first place, it was the year in which stocks tumbled and broke their backs. Gilt-edged securities showed themselves to be tinsel. Old man Minick had retired from active business just one year before, meaning to live comfortably on the fruit of a half-century's toil. He now saw that fruit rotting all about him. There was in it hardly enough nourishment to sustain them. Then came the day when Ma Minick went downtown to see Matthews about that pain right here and came home looking shrivelled, talking shrilly about nothing, and evading Pa's eyes. Followed months that were just a jumble of agony, X-rays, hope, despair, morphia, nothingness.

After it was all over: "But I was going first," old man Minick said, dazedly.

The old house on Ellis near Thirty-ninth was sold for what it would bring. George, who knew Chicago real-estate if any one did, said they might as well get what they could. Things would only go lower. You'll see. And nobody's going to have any money for years. Besides, look at the neighborhood!

Old man Minick said George was right. He said everybody was right. You would hardly have recognized in this shrunken figure and wattled face the spruce and dressy old man whom Ma Minick used to spoil so delightfully. "You know best, George. You know best." He who used to stand up to George until Ma Minick was moved to say, "Now, Pa, you don't know everything."

After Matthews' bills, and the hospital, and the nurses and the medicines and the thousand and one things were paid there was left exactly five hundred dollars a year.

"You're going to make your home with us, Father," George and Nettie said. Alma, too, said this would be the best. Alma, the married daughter, lived in Seattle. "Though you know Ferd and I would be only too glad to have you."

Seattle! The ends of the earth. Oh, no. No! he protested, every fibre of his old frame clinging to the accustomed. Seattle, at seventy! He turned piteous eyes on his son George and his daughter-in-law Nettie. "You're going to make your home with us, Father," they reassured him. He clung to them gratefully. After it was over Alma went home to her husband and their children.

So now he lived with George and Nettie in the five-room flat on South Park Avenue, just across from Washington Park. And there was no extra pillow on the floor.

Nettie hadn't said he couldn't have the extra pillow. He had told her he used two and she had given him two the first week. But every morning she had found a pillow cast on the floor.

"I thought you used two pillows, Father."

"I do."

"But there's always one on the floor when I make the bed in the morning. You always throw one on the floor. You only sleep on one pillow, really."

"I use two pillows."

But the second week there was one pillow. He tossed and turned a good deal there in his bedroom off the kitchen. But he got used to it in time. Not used to it, exactly, but—well——

The bedroom off the kitchen wasn't as menial as it sounds. It was really rather cosy. The five-room flat held living room, front bedroom, dining room, kitchen, and maid's room. The room off the kitchen was intended as a maid's room but Nettie had no maid. George's business had suffered with the rest. George and Nettie had said, "I wish there was a front room for you, Father. You could have ours and we'd move back here, only this room's too small for twin beds and the dressing table and the chiffonier." They had meant it—or meant to mean it.

"This is fine," old man Minick had said. "This is good enough for anybody." There was a narrow white enamel bed and a tiny dresser and a table. Nettie had made gay cretonne covers and spreads and put a little reading lamp on the table and arranged his things. Ma Minick's picture on the dresser with her mouth sort of pursed to make it look small. It wasn't a recent picture. Nettie and George had had it framed for him as a surprise. They had often urged her to have her picture taken, but she had dreaded it. Old man Minick didn't think much of that photograph, though he never said so. He needed no photograph of Ma Minick. He had a dozen of them; a gallery of them; thousands of them. Lying on his one pillow he could take them out and look at them one by one as they passed in review, smiling, serious, chiding, praising, there in the dark. He needed no picture on his dresser.

A handsome girl, Nettie, and a good girl. He thought of her as a girl, though she was well past thirty. George and Nettie had married late. This was only the third year of their marriage. Alma, the daughter, had married young, but George had stayed on, unwed, in the old house on Ellis until he was thirty-six and all Ma Minick's friends' daughters had had a try at him in vain. The old people had urged him to marry, but it had been wonderful to have him around the house, just the same. Somebody young around the house. Not that George had stayed around very much. But when he was there you knew he was there. He whistled while dressing. He sang in the bath. He roared down the stairway, "Ma, where's my clean shirts?" The telephone rang for him. Ma Minick prepared special dishes for him. The servant girl said, "Oh, now, Mr. George, look what you've done! Gone and spilled the grease all over my clean kitchen floor!" and wiped it up adoringly while George laughed and gobbled his bit of food filched from pot or frying pan.

They had been a little surprised about Nettie. George was in the bond business and she worked for the same firm. A plump, handsome, eye-glassed woman with fine fresh coloring, a clear skin that old man Minick called appetizing, and a great coil of smooth dark hair. She wore plain tailored things and understood the bond business in a way that might have led you to think hers a masculine mind if she hadn't been so feminine, too, in her manner. Old man Minick had liked her better than Ma Minick had.

Nettie had called him Pop and joked with him and almost flirted with him in a daughterly sort of way. He liked to squeeze her plump arm and pinch her soft cheek between thumb and forefinger. She would laugh up at him and pat his shoulder and that shoulder would straighten spryly and he would waggle his head doggishly.

"Look out there, George!" the others in the room would say. "Your dad'll cut you out. First thing you know you'll lose your girl, that's all."

Nettie would smile. Her teeth were white and strong and even. Old man Minick would laugh and wink, immensely pleased and flattered. "We understand each other, don't we, Pop?" Nettie would say.

During the first years of their married life Nettie stayed home. She fussed happily about her little flat, gave parties, went to parties, played bridge. She seemed to love the ease, the relaxation, the small luxuries. She and George were very much in love. Before her marriage she had lived in a boarding house on Michigan Avenue. At mention of it now she puckered up her face. She did not attempt to conceal her fondness for these five rooms of hers, so neat, so quiet, so bright, so cosy. Over-stuffed velvet in the living room, with silk lamp-shades, and small tables holding books and magazines and little boxes containing cigarettes or hard candies. Very modern. A gate-legged table in the dining room. Caramel-colored walnut in the bedroom, rich and dark and smooth. She loved it. An orderly woman. Everything in its place. Before eleven o'clock the little apartment was shining, spotless; cushions plumped, crumbs brushed, vegetables in cold water. The telephone. "Hello! . . . Oh, hello, Bess! Oh, hours ago . . . Not a thing . . . Well, if George is willing . . . I'll call him up and ask him. We haven't seen a show in two weeks. I'll call you back within the next half hour . . . No, I haven't done my marketing yet. . . . Yes, and have dinner downtown. Meet at seven."

Into this orderly smooth-running mechanism was catapulted a bewildered old man. She no longer called him Pop. He never dreamed of squeezing the plump arm or pinching the smooth cheek. She called him Father. Sometimes George's Father. Sometimes, when she was telephoning, there came to him—"George's father's living with us now, you know. I can't."

They were very kind to him, Nettie and George. "Now just you sit right down here, Father. What do you want to go poking off into your own room for?"

He remembered that in the last year Nettie had said something about going back to work. There wasn't enough to do around the house to keep her busy. She was sick of afternoon parties. Sew and eat, that's all, and gossip, or play bridge. Besides, look at the money. Business was awful. The two old people had resented this idea as much as George had—more, in fact. They were scandalized.

"Young folks nowadays!" shaking their heads. "Young folks nowadays. What are they thinking of! In my day when you got married you had babies."

George and Nettie had had no babies. At first Nettie had said, "I'm so happy. I just want a chance to rest. I've been working since I was seventeen. I just want to rest, first." One year. Two years. Three. And now Pa Minick.

Ma Minick, in the old house on Ellis Avenue, had kept a loose sort of larder; not lavish, but plentiful. They both ate a great deal as old people are likely to do. Old man Minick, especially, had liked to nibble. A handful of raisins from the box on the shelf. A couple of nuts from the dish on the sideboard. A bit of candy rolled beneath the tongue. At dinner (sometimes, towards the last, even at noon-time) a plate of steaming soup, hot, revivifying, stimulating. Plenty of this and plenty of that. "What's the matter, Jo? You're not eating." But he was, amply. Ma Minick had liked to see him eat too much. She was wrong, of course.

But at Nettie's things were different. Hers was a sufficient but stern ménage. So many mouths to feed; just so many lamb chops. Nettie knew about calories and vitamins and mysterious things like that, and talked about them. So many calories in this. So many calories in that. He never was quite clear in his mind about these things said to be lurking in his food. He had always thought of spinach as spinach, chops as chops. But to Nettie they were calories. They lunched together, these two. George was, of course, downtown. For herself Nettie would have one of those feminine pick-up lunches; a dab of apple sauce, a cup of tea, and a slice of cold toast left from breakfast. This she would eat while old man Minick guiltily supped up his cup of warmed-over broth, or his coddled egg. She always pressed upon him any bit of cold meat that was left from the night before, or any remnants of vegetable or spaghetti. Often there was quite a little fleet of saucers and sauce plates grouped about his main plate. Into these he dipped and swooped uncomfortably, and yet with a relish. Sometimes, when he had finished, he would look about, furtively.

"What'll you have, Father? Can I get you something?"

"Nothing, Nettie, nothing. I'm doing fine." She had finished the last of her wooden toast and was waiting for him, kindly.

Still, this balanced and scientific fare seemed to agree with him. As the winter went on he seemed actually to have regained most of his former hardiness and vigor. A handsome old boy he was, ruddy, hale, with the zest of a juicy old apple, slightly withered but still sappy. It should be mentioned that he had a dimple in his cheek which flashed unexpectedly when he smiled. It gave him a roguish—almost boyish—effect most appealing to the beholder. Especially the feminine beholder. Much of his spoiling at the hands of Ma Minick had doubtless been due to this mere depression of the skin.

Spring was to bring a new and welcome source of enrichment into his life. But these first six months of his residence with George and Nettie were hard. No spoiling there. He missed being made much of. He got kindness, but he needed love. Then, too, he was rather a gabby old man. He liked to hold forth. In the old house on Ellis there had been visiting back and forth between men and women of his own age, and Ma's. At these gatherings he had waxed oratorical or argumentative, and they had heard him, some in agreement, some in disagreement, but always respectfully, whether he prated of real estate or social depravity; prohibition or European exchange.

"Let me tell you, here and now, something's got to be done before you can get a country back on a sound financial basis. Why, take Russia alone, why . . ." Or: "Young people nowadays! They don't know what respect means. I tell you there's got to be a change and there will be, and it's the older generation that's got to bring it about. What do they know of hardship! What do they know about work—real work. Most of 'em's never done a real day's work in their life. All they think of is dancing and gambling and drinking. Look at the way they dress! Look at . . ."

Ad lib.

"That's so," the others would agree. "I was saying only yesterday . . ."

Then, too, until a year or two before, he had taken active part in business. He had retired only at the urging of Ma and the children. They said he ought to rest and play and enjoy himself.

Now, as his strength and good spirits gradually returned he began to go downtown, mornings. He would dress, carefully, though a little shakily. He had always shaved himself and he kept this up. All in all, during the day, he occupied the bathroom literally for hours, and this annoyed Nettie to the point of frenzy, though she said nothing. He liked the white cheerfulness of the little tiled room. He puddled about in the water endlessly. Snorted and splashed and puffed and snuffled and blew. He was one of those audible washers who emerge dripping and whose ablutions are distributed impartially over ceiling, walls, and floor.

Nettie, at the closed door: "Father, are you all right?"

Splash! Prrrf! "Yes. Sure. I'm all right."

"Well, I didn't know. You've been in there so long."

He was a neat old man, but there was likely to be a spot or so on his vest or his coat lapel, or his tie. Ma used to remove these, on or off him, as the occasion demanded, rubbing carefully and scolding a little, making a chiding sound between tongue and teeth indicative of great impatience of his carelessness. He had rather enjoyed these sounds, and this rubbing and scratching on the cloth with the fingernail and a moistened rag. They indicated that someone cared. Cared about the way he looked. Had pride in him. Loved him. Nettie never removed spots. Though infrequently she said, "Father, just leave that suit out, will you? I'll send it to the cleaner's with George's. The man's coming tomorrow morning." He would look down at himself, hastily, and attack a spot here and there with a futile fingernail.

His morning toilette completed, he would make for the Fifty-first Street L. Seated in the train he would assume an air of importance and testy haste; glance out of the window; look at his watch. You got the impression of a handsome and well-preserved old gentleman on his way downtown to consummate a shrewd business deal. He had been familiar with Chicago's downtown for fifty years and he could remember when State Street was a tree-shaded cottage district. The noise and rush and clangor of the Loop had long been familiar to him. But now he seemed to find the downtown trip arduous, even hazardous. The roar of the elevated trains, the hoarse hoots of the motor horns, the clang of the street cars, the bedlam that is Chicago's downtown district bewildered him, frightened him almost. He would skip across the street like a harried hare, just missing a motor truck's nose and all unconscious of the stream of invective directed at him by his charioteer. "Heh! Whatcha! . . . Look!"— Sometimes a policeman came to his aid, or attempted to, but he resented this proffered help.

"Say, look here, my lad," he would say to the tall, tired, and not at all burly (standing on one's feet directing traffic at Wabash and Madison for eight hours a day does not make for burliness) policeman, "I've been coming downtown since long before you were born. You don't need to help me. I'm no Jay from the country."

He visited the Stock Exchange. This depressed him. Stocks were lower than ever and still going down. His five hundred a year was safe, but the rest seemed doomed for his lifetime, at least. He would drop in at George's office. George's office was pleasantly filled with dapper, neat young men and (surprisingly enough) dapper, slim young women, seated at desks in the big light-flooded room. At one corner of each desk stood a polished metal placard on a little standard, and bearing the name of the desk's occupant. Mr. Owens. Mr. Satterlee. Mr. James. Miss Rauch. Mr. Minick.

"Hello, Father," Mr. Minick would say, looking annoyed. "What's bringing you down?"

"Oh, nothing. Nothing. Just had a little business to tend to over at the Exchange. Thought I'd drop in. How's business?"

"Rotten."

"I should think it was!" Old man Minick would agree. "I—should—think—it—was! Hm."

George wished he wouldn't. He couldn't have it, that's all. Old man Minick would stroll over to the desk marked Satterlee, or Owens, or James. These brisk young men would toss an upward glance at him and concentrate again on the sheets and files before them. Old man Minick would stand, balancing from heel to toe and blowing out his breath a little. He looked a bit yellow and granulated and wavering, there in the cruel morning light of the big plate glass windows. Or perhaps it was the contrast he presented with these slim, slick young salesmen.

"Well, h'are you to-day, Mr.—uh—Satterlee? What's the good word?"

Mr. Satterlee would not glance up this time. "I'm pretty well. Can't complain."

"Good. Good."

"Anything I can do for you?"

"No-o-o. No. Not a thing. Just dropped in to see my son a minute."

"I see." Not unkindly. Then, as old man Minick still stood there, balancing, Mr. Satterlee would glance up again, frowning a little. "Your son's desk is over there, I believe. Yes."

George and Nettie had a bedtime conference about these visits and Nettie told him, gently, that the bond house head objected to friends and relatives dropping in. It was against office rules. It had been so when she was employed there. Strictly business. She herself had gone there only once since her marriage.

Well, that was all right. Business was like that nowadays. Rush and grab and no time for anything.

The winter was a hard one, with a record snowfall and intense cold. He stayed indoors for days together. A woman of his own age in like position could have occupied herself usefully and happily. She could have hemmed a sash-curtain; knitted or crocheted; tidied a room; taken a hand in the cooking or preparing of food; ripped an old gown; made over a new one; indulged in an occasional afternoon festivity with women of her own years. But for old man Minick there were no small tasks. There was nothing he could do to make his place in the household justifiable. He wasn't even particularly good at those small jobs of hammering, or painting, or general "fixing." Nettie could drive a nail more swiftly, more surely than he. "Now, Father, don't you bother. I'll do it. Just you go and sit down. Isn't it time for your afternoon nap?"

He waxed a little surly. "Nap! I just got up. I don't want to sleep my life away."

George and Nettie frequently had guests in the evening. They played bridge, or poker, or talked.

"Come in, Father," George would say. "Come in. You all know Dad, don't you, folks?" He would sit down, uncertainly. At first he had attempted to expound, as had been his wont in the old house on Ellis. "I want to say, here and now, that this country's got to . . ." But they went on, heedless of him. They interrupted or refused, politely, to listen. So he sat in the room, yet no part of it. The young people's talk swirled and eddied all about him. He was utterly lost in it. Now and then Nettie or George would turn to him and with raised voice (he was not at all deaf and prided himself on it) would shout, "It's about this or that, Father. He was saying . . ."

When the group roared with laughter at a sally from one of them he would smile uncertainly but amiably, glancing from one to the other in complete ignorance of what had passed, but not resenting it. He took to sitting more and more in his kitchen bedroom, smoking a comforting pipe and reading and re-reading the evening paper. During that winter he and Canary, the negro washwoman, became quite good friends. She washed down in the basement once a week but came up to the kitchen for her massive lunch. A walrus-waisted black woman, with a rich throaty voice, a rolling eye, and a kindly heart. He actually waited for her appearance above the laundry stairs.

"Weh, how's Mist' Minick to-day! Ah nev' did see a gemun spry's you ah fo' yo' age. No, suh! nev' did."

At this rare praise he would straighten his shoulders and waggle his head. "I'm worth any ten of these young sprats to-day." Canary would throw back her head in a loud and companionable guffaw.

Nettie would appear at the kitchen swinging door. "Canary's having her lunch, Father. Don't you want to come into the front room with me? We'll have our lunch in another half-hour."

He followed her obediently enough. Nettie thought of him as a troublesome and rather pathetic child—a child who would never grow up. If she attributed any thoughts to that fine old head they were ambling thoughts, bordering, perhaps, on senility. Little did she know how expertly this old one surveyed her and how ruthlessly he passed judgment. She never suspected the thoughts that formed in the active brain.

He knew about women. He had married a woman. He had had children by her. He looked at this woman—his son's wife—moving about her little five-room flat. She had theories about children. He had heard her expound them. You didn't have them except under such and such circumstances. It wasn't fair otherwise. Plenty of money for their education. Well. He and his wife had had three children. Paul, the second, had died at thirteen. A blow, that had been. They had not always planned for the coming of the three but they always had found a way, afterward. You managed, somehow, once the little wrinkled red ball had fought its way into the world. You managed. You managed. Look at George! Yet when he was born, thirty-nine years ago, Pa and Ma Minick had been hard put to it.

Sitting there, while Nettie dismissed him as negligible, he saw her clearly, grimly. He looked at her. She was plump, but not too short, with a generous width between the hips; a broad full bosom, but firm; round arms and quick slim legs; a fine sturdy throat. The curve between arm and breast made a graceful gracious line . . . Working in a bond office . . . Working in a bond office . . . There was nothing in the Bible about working in a bond office. Here was a woman built for child-bearing.

She thought him senile, negligible.

In March Nettie had in a sewing woman for a week. She had her two or three times a year. A hawk-faced woman of about forty-nine, with a blue-bottle figure and a rapacious eye. She sewed in the dining room and there was a pleasant hum of machine and snip of scissors and murmur of conversation and rustle of silky stuff; and hot savory dishes for lunch. She and old man Minick became great friends. She even let him take out bastings. This when Nettie had gone out from two to four, between fittings.

He chuckled and wagged his head. "I expect to be paid regular assistant's wages for this," he said.

"I guess you don't need any wages, Mr. Minick," the woman said. "I guess you're pretty well fixed."

"Oh, well, I can't complain." (Five hundred a year.)

"Complain! I should say not! If I was to complain it'd be different. Work all day to keep myself; and nobody to come home to at night."

"Widow, ma'am?"

"Since I was twenty. Work, work, that's all I've had. And lonesome! I suppose you don't know what lonesome is."

"Oh, don't II" slipped from him. He had dropped the bastings.

The sewing woman flashed a look at him from the cold hard eye. "Well, maybe you do. I suppose living here like this, with sons and daughters, ain't so grand, for all your money. Now me, I've always managed to keep my own little place that I could call home, to come back to. It's only two rooms, and nothing to rave about, but it's home. Evenings I just cook and fuss around. Nobody to fuss for, but I fuss, anyway. Cooking, that's what I love to do. Plenty of good food, that's what folks need to keep their strength up." Nettie's lunch that day had been rather scant.

She was there a week. In Nettie's absence she talked against her. He protested, but weakly. Did she give him egg-nogs? Milk? Hot toddy? Soup?

Plenty of good rich gravy and meat and puddings? Well! That's what folks needed when they weren't so young any more. Not that he looked old. My, no. Sprier than many young boys, and handsomer than his own son if she did say so.

He fed on it, hungrily. The third day she was flashing meaning glances at him across the luncheon table. The fourth she pressed his foot beneath the table. The fifth, during Nettie's afternoon absence, she got up, ostensibly to look for a bit of cloth which she needed for sewing, and, passing him, laid a caressing hand on his shoulder. Laid it there and pressed his shoulder ever so little. He looked up, startled. The glances across the luncheon had largely passed over his head; the foot beneath the table might have been an accident. But this—this was unmistakable. He stood up, a little shakily. She caught his hand. The hawk-like face was close to his.

"You need somebody to love you," she said. "Somebody to do for you, and love you." The hawk face came nearer. He leaned a little toward it. But between it and his face was Ma Minick's face, plump, patient, quizzical, kindly. His head came back sharply. He threw the woman's hot hand from him.

"Woman!" he cried. "Jezebel!"

The front door slammed. Nettie. The woman flew to her sewing. Old man Minick, shaking, went into his kitchen bedroom.

"Well," said Nettie, depositing her bundles on the dining room table, "did you finish that faggoting? Why, you haven't done so very much, have you!"

"I ain't feeling so good," said the woman. "That lunch didn't agree with me."

"Why, it was a good plain lunch. I don't see——"

"Oh, it was plain enough, all right."

Next day she did not come to finish her work. Sick, she telephoned. Nettie called it an outrage. She finished the sewing herself, though she hated sewing. Pa Minick said nothing, but there was a light in his eye. Now and then he chuckled, to Nettie's infinite annoyance, though she said nothing.

"Wanted to marry me!" he said to himself, chuckling. "Wanted to marry me! The old rip!"

At the end of April, Pa Minick discovered Washington Park, and the Club, and his whole life was from that day transformed.

He had taken advantage of the early spring sunshine to take a walk, at Nettie's suggestion.

"Why don't you go into the Park, Father? It's really warm out. And the sun's lovely. Do you good."

He had put on his heaviest shirt, and a muffler, and George's old red sweater with the great white "C" on its front, emblem of George's athletic prowess at the University of Chicago; and over all, his greatcoat. He had taken warm mittens and his cane with the greyhound's head handle, carved. So equipped he had ambled uninterestedly over to the Park across the way. And there he had found new life.

New life in old life. For the Park was full of old men. Old men like himself, with greyhound's-head canes, and mufflers and somebody's sweater worn beneath their greatcoats. They wore arctics, though the weather was fine. The skin of their hands and cheek-bones was glazed and had a tight look though it lay in fine little folds. There were splotches of brown on the backs of their hands, and on the temples and forehead. Their heavy grey or brown socks made comfortable folds above their ankles. From that April morning until winter drew on the Park saw old man Minick daily. Not only daily but by the day. Except for his meals, and a brief hour for his after-luncheon nap, he spent all his time there.

For in the Park old man Minick and all the old men gathered there found a Forum—a safety valve—a means of expression. It did not take him long to discover that the Park was divided into two distinct sets of old men. There were the old men who lived with their married sons and daughters-in-law or married daughters and sons-in-law. Then there were the old men who lived in the Grant Home for Aged Gentlemen. You saw its fine red-brick façade through the trees at the edge of the Park.

And the slogan of these first was:

"My son and my da'ter they wouldn't want me to live in any public Home. No, siree! They want me right there with them. In their own home. That's the kind of son and daughter I've got!"

The slogan of the second was:

"I wouldn't live with any son or daughter. Independent. That's me. My own boss. Nobody to tell me what I can do and what I can't. Treat you like a child. I'm my own boss! Pay my own good money and get my keep for it."

The first group, strangely enough, was likely to be spotted of vest and a little frayed as to collar. You saw them going on errands for their daughters-in-law. A loaf of bread. Spool of white No. 100. They took their small grandchildren to the duck pond and between the two toddlers hand in hand—the old and infirm and the infantile and infirm—was hard to tell which led which.

The second group was shiny as to shoes, spotless as to linen, dapper as to clothes. They had no small errands. Theirs was a magnificent leisure. And theirs was magnificent conversation. The questions they discussed and settled there in the Park—these old men—were not international merely. They were cosmic in scope.

The War? Peace? Disarmament? China? Free love? Mere conversational bubbles to be tossed in the air and disposed of in a burst of foam. Strong meat for old man Minick who had so long been fed on pap. But he soon got used to it. Between four and five in the afternoon, in a spot known as Under The Willows, the meeting took the form of a club—an open forum. A certain group made up of Socialists, Free Thinkers, parlor anarchists, bolshevists, had for years drifted there for talk. Old man Minick learned high-sounding phrases. "The Masters . . . democracy . . . toil of the many for the good of the few . . . the ruling class . . . free speech . . . the People. . ."

The strong-minded ones held forth. The weaker ones drifted about on the outskirts, sometimes clinging to the moist and sticky paw of a round-eyed grandchild. Earlier in the day—at eleven o'clock, say—the talk was not so general nor so inclusive. The old men were likely to drift into groups of two or three or four. They sat on sun-bathed benches and their conversation was likely to be rather smutty at times, for all they looked so mild and patriarchal and desiccated. They paid scant heed to the white-haired old women who, like themselves, were sunning in the park. They watched the young women switch by, with appreciative glances at their trim figures and slim ankles. The day of the short skirt was a grand time for them. They chuckled among themselves and made wicked comment. One saw only white-haired, placid, tremulous old men, but their minds still worked with belated masculinity like naughty small boys talking behind the barn.

Old man Minick early achieved a certain leadership in the common talk. He had always liked to hold forth. This last year had been one of almost unendurable bottling up. At first he had timidly sought the less assertive ones of his kind. Mild old men who sat in rockers in the pavilion waiting for lunch time. Their conversation irritated him. They remarked everything that passed before their eyes.

"There's a boat. Fella with a boat."

A silence. Then, heavily: "Yeh."

Five minutes.

"Look at those people laying on the grass. Shouldn't think it was warm enough for that . . . Now they're getting up."

A group of equestrians passed along the bridle path on the opposite side of the lagoon. They made a frieze against the delicate spring greenery. The coats of the women were scarlet, vivid green, arresting, stimulating.

"Riders."

"Yes."

"Good weather for riding."

A man was fishing near by. "Good weather for fishing."

"Yes."

"Wonder what time it is, anyway." From a pocket, deep-buried, came forth a great gold blob of a watch. "I've got one minute to eleven."

Old man Minick dragged forth a heavy globe. "Mm. I've got eleven."

"Little fast, I guess."

Old man Minick shook off this conversation impatiently. This wasn't conversation. This was oral death, though he did not put it thus. He joined the other men. They were discussing Spiritualism. He listened, ventured an opinion, was heard respectfully and then combated mercilessly. He rose to the verbal fight, and won it.

"Let's see," said one of the old men. "You're not living at the Grant Home, are you?"

"No," old man Minick made reply, proudly. "I live with my son and his wife. They wouldn't have it any other way."

"Hm. Like to be independent myself."

"Lonesome, ain't it? Over there?"

"Lonesome! Say, Mr.—what'd you say your name was? Minick? Mine's Hughes—I never was lonesome in my life 'cept for six months when I lived with my daughter and her husband and their five children. Yes, sir. That's what I call lonesome, in an eight-room flat."

George and Nettie said, "It's doing you good, Father, being out in the air so much." His eyes were brighter, his figure straighter, his color better. It was that day he had held forth so eloquently on the emigration question. He had to read a lot—papers and magazines and one thing and another—to keep up. He devoured all the books and pamphlets about bond issues and national finances brought home by George. In the Park he was considered an authority on bonds and banking. He and a retired real-estate man named Mowry sometimes debated a single question for weeks. George and Nettie, believed, thought he ambled to the Park and spent senile hours with his drooling old friends discussing nothing amiably and witlessly. This while he was eating strong meat, drinking strong drink.

Summer sped. Was past. Autumn held a new dread for old man Minick. When winter came where should he go? Where should he go? Not back to the five-room flat all day, and the little back bedroom, and nothingness. In his mind there rang a childish old song they used to sing at school. A silly song:

Where do all the birdies go?
I know. I know.

But he didn't know. He was terror-stricken. October came and went. With the first of November the Park became impossible, even at noon, and with two overcoats and the sweater. The first frost was a black frost for him. He scanned the heavens daily for rain or snow. There was a cigar store and billiard room on the corner across the boulevard and there he sometimes went, with a few of his Park cronies, to stand behind the players' chairs and watch them at pinochle or rum. But this was a dull business. Besides, the Grant men never came there. They had card rooms of their own.

He turned away from this smoky little den on a drab November day, sick at heart. The winter. He tried to face it, and at what he saw he shrank and was afraid.

He reached the apartment and went around to the rear, dutifully. His rubbers were wet and muddy and Nettie's living-room carpet was a fashionable grey. The back door was unlocked. It was Canary's day downstairs, he remembered. He took off his rubbers in the kitchen and passed into the dining room. Voices. Nettie had company. Some friends, probably, for tea. He turned to go to his room, but stopped at hearing his own name. Father Minick. Father Minick. Nettie's voice.

"Of course, if it weren't for Father Minick I would have. But how can we as long as he lives with us? There isn't room. And we can't afford a bigger place now, with rents what they are. This way it wouldn't be fair to the child. We've talked it over, George and I. Don't you suppose? But not as long as Father Minick is with us. I don't mean we'd use the maid's room for a—for the—if we had a baby. But I'd have to have someone in to help, then, and we'd have to have that extra room."

He stood there in the dining room, quiet. Quiet. His body felt queerly remote and numb, but his mind was working frenziedly. Clearly, too, in spite of the frenzy. Death. That was the first thought. Death. It would be easy. But he didn't want to die. Strange, but he didn't want to die. He liked Life. The Park, the trees, the Club, the talk, the whole show. . . . Nettie was a good girl . . . The old must make way for the young. They had the right to be born . . . Maybe it was just another excuse. Almost four years married. Why not three years ago? . . . The right to live. The right to live. . . .

He turned, stealthily, stealthily, and went back into the kitchen, put on his rubbers, stole out into the darkening November afternoon.

In an hour he was back. He entered at the front door this time, ringing the bell. He had never had a key. As if he were a child they would not trust him with one. Nettie's women friends were just leaving. In the air you smelled a mingling of perfume, and tea, and cakes, and powder. He sniffed it, sensitively.

"How do you do, Mr. Minick!" they said. "How are you! Well, you certainly look it. And how do you manage these gloomy days?"

He smiled genially, taking off his greatcoat and revealing the red sweater with the big white "C" on it. "I manage. I manage." He puffed out his cheeks. "I'm busy moving."

"Moving!" Nettie's startled eyes flew to his, held them. "Moving, Father?"

"Old folks must make way for the young," he said, gaily. "That's the law of life. Yes, sir! New ones. New ones."

Nettie's face was scarlet. "Father, what in the world——"

"I signed over at the Grant Home to-day. Move in next week." The women looked at her, smiling. Old man Minick came over to her and patted her plump arm. Then he pinched her smooth cheek with a quizzical thumb and forefinger. Pinched it and shook it ever so little.

"I don't know what you mean," said Nettie, out of breath.

"Yes, you do," said old man Minick, and while his tone was light and jesting there was in his old face something stern, something menacing. "Yes, you do."

When he entered the Grant Home a group of them was seated about the fireplace in the main hall. A neat, ruddy, septuagenarian circle. They greeted him casually, with delicacy of feeling, as if he were merely approaching them, at their bench in the Park.

"Say, Minick, look here. Mowry here says China ought to have been included in the four-power treaty. He says——"

Old man Minick cleared his throat. "You take China, now," he said, "with her vast and practically, you might say, virgin country, why——"

An apple-cheeked maid in a black dress and a white apron stopped before him. He paused.

"Housekeeper says for me to tell you your room's all ready, if you'd like to look at it now."

"Minute. Minute, my child." He waved her aside with the air of one who pays five hundred a year for independence and freedom. The girl turned to go. "Uh—young lady! Young lady!" She looked at him. "Tell the housekeeper two pillows, please. Two pillows on my bed. Be sure."

"Yes, sir. Two pillows. Yes, sir. I'll be sure."

JOHAN ABRECHT, assistant district surveyor, was a tall young man of powerful build. One afternoon between three and four o'clock on a hot and cloudless day in July he was walking from Lengenau to Diesbach to make a survey. The road was shadeless and the heat made his blood pulse through his veins. His dark clothes were not very suitable for such weather, but it made him happy to feel the sweat trickling down his chest.

He had got about half way to his destination and just passed the turn to Hochberg when he caught sight of a girl working in the fields. She was all alone in the sultry solitude beneath the shining vault of the sky. As soon as she heard his footsteps on the road she stood erect and looked at him, shading her eyes with her hand. She was only a young girl, and yet a woman too, sunburnt, stalwart and provocative. She laughed and waved to him. The blood rushed up to his eyes and before he knew what he was doing he was walking over the stubble towards her like a drunken man. What first passed between them he was never able to say, even later under interrogation in court. He let his bag of instruments fall to the ground and put his arm round her waist. She had nothing on beneath her blouse, which was hot and moist. Her healthy young body breathed out a breath that bereft him of his senses; it was the breath of the ever young and fruitful earth and he drew it in as he kissed her. She laughed and made no resistance and unthinkingly surrendered her large wide lips. He tore open the buttons of her blouse and uncovered her breasts, which were already ripe, firm and proud. The rigid restraint which prudence imposed on him as an official in a small town, was now his undoing and the natural instincts of a normal young man in one moment laid his life in ruins. He bent over her with his face buried in her breast, bathing his eyes and mouth in the fragrance of her youth. Next she was lying on the ground between two sheaves and he on the top of her; he was not so much resolved to possess her as rushed on by the irresistible wheels of fate. It was only then that she began to defend herself vigorously. But it was beyond him to see that her resistance was in earnest; the blood throbbed like a hammer in his ears, his eyes were shut, his mouth uttered unintelligible words, his hands gripped the quivering prey as in a vise. He no longer knew where he was nor what he did nor whom he embraced beneath the burning arc of the sky.

II

Next day the girl's father went to the police and lodged a charge. He was deaf to all reason, and even when the guilty man, overcome by shame and remorse, offered to make all amends in his power and promised to make the wronged girl his wife in a few years' time, he remained obdurate. It made no difference to the pig-headed farmer that the child quickly recovered and the very next morning called herself a silly little fool for rushing home in a storm of tears.

What finished John Abrecht was the unfortunate coincidence that the farmer had recently been worsted by the surveyor's office over a disputed boundary and no entreaties, least of all any appeal to his feelings, could have induced him to forego his unhoped for revenge.

So destiny took its course. The local police did not at first wish to proceed to an arrest, but they had to do so on receipt of telegraphic orders. John Abrecht was taken to the town and stood his trial seven weeks later.

He had no luck, for the girl, whose evidence might have got him off with a light sentence or perhaps even with an acquittal, was lying at home in a great feather bed with a temperature; and so instead of hearing what she had to say the court had only her first written evidence before it. And there was no getting over this bald account. Her extreme youth and even more her subsequent indisposition told heavily against the prisoner; for although she had merely caught a chill through bathing late on a cool September evening the prosecution deliberately led the jury astray by attributing her fever to Abrecht's assault, which her robust physique had long since got over.

John Abrecht was sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labour.

III

He came of a strict Protestant family and took his imprisonment as a just and not too harsh penance. His parents were no longer living and his only sister was married and lived in a distant part of the country, so her respectability would not be outraged, a thought that gave him some consolation.

The loss of his job was no great sorrow to him. He was robust and optimistic by nature and had never liked his humdrum duties. It was a fine life tramping the roads from village to village whether in the blaze of summer or through deep snowdrifts; but the tiresome work in the office over title deeds was not at all to his taste, and defining crooked boundaries between the properties of quarrelsome, petty-minded land owners was no profession for him. The fruitful steaming earth belonged to all and it was ridiculous presumption to cut it up into parcels and designate these parcels with numbers and letters. He was born to be a farmer, for he loved the earth and would have liked nothing better than to give all his energies to making it fruitful. He had often, while treading the daily round of official work, dreamt of emigrating to undeveloped countries oversea and wrestling alone with the untilled virgin soil.

These dreams inspired him now and made the dreary days of imprisonment seem shorter. He sat silent among the others in the gloomy work-room, cutting out boot soles with his strong fingers, and while his eyes seemed to be glumly fixed only on the hacked and dirty surface of the bench they saw his domain beneath a tropical sun: a long low white house, with a swiftly flowing stream near by and all around him fields of standing crops, bushes and large-leaved plants, his property, won by him from the primeval wilderness, and at evening when the sky was a blaze of red, herds of cattle and flocks of sheep, larger and finer than ours and with magnificently curved and bending horns, moved on towards him.

IV

The beasts he would own and look after often filled his mind. He was a good-natured fellow and had always loved animals; but now he felt that his act of folly had parted him from his fellow men and put him still nearer to the beasts of the field. His future was not peopled with friends; it scarcely included a woman; in his dreams he plunged his hands into the thick fleeces of rams, the oxen lowed softly as he pulled them familiarly by the tuft of hair on their foreheads, and a large black Newfoundland dog kept faithfully to his heels as he walked over the acres he had won beneath a southern sun.

Such fancies were not enough to prevent him suffering from his loneliness, yet he never tried to get into touch with the other prisoners. What he had done was the madness of a moment, the compulsion of an evil spirit; it had nothing to do with the kernel of his being and he had no wish to know or to realize at first hand what evil deeds had brought them all together in that place. He had made a slip and now he paid for it; he went through a two years' death in which he was alone with his conscience. New life beckoned from the other side. They let him go his way and gave up all attempts at whispered communication with him when they had their half hour's walk in the prison yard in single file. They even forgot his presence. The only man who seemed to have an active dislike for him was his warder. This was very soon brought home to him. Many of the convicts, if they earned it by good behaviour, were taken out on navvy work outside the town, and John, who longed for air and exercise, asked permission to be one of them. For three days he lived in a whirl of hope. Then his request was refused.

"You'll stay at home with us," the warder told him when he unlocked his cell in the morning to march him off to the workroom. He looked at Abrecht for a moment and then added malevolently, "You swine."

v

The warder was a small, thick-set fellow with short arms and enormous hands. He had a very low forehead, which was always red, and above it his tow-coloured hair stood up like a brush; his yellow eyes were set flatly in his face. But the most horrible thing about him was his narrow streak of a mouth between his dogged chin and his military moustache, a hard, colourless streak in the middle of his common, brutal face. It had no relation to the rest of his features; it seemed to be there by stealth. There was something sinister when this diminutive mouth opened to let out an abusive word, revealing two rows of small, pointed, regular teeth, which were always dirty.

This turn-key was a married man without children; he had passed middle-age and his long years of service had brought him no promotion. He was harsh, but not equally harsh to all the prisoners in his charge. There were ways of establishing a degrading sort of intimacy with him. It gave him satisfaction to make life easier for his favourites, but servility was essential. It was even said that he got in white bread, wine and cigars for an habitual swindler and that he was on friendly terms with this wrecker of widows and orphans during the periods he was not in prison. John Abrecht had never really taken his jailer into account. He was obedient and submissive, but there was nothing personal in his submissiveness; he was on the same terms with the man as with the thick walls and the lock of his cell, any feeling for which would have seemed equally absurd. Perhaps it was just this attitude that enraged the warder, for it gave him particular satisfaction to have his importance recognized by his educated victims. It may be that Abrecht's crime stirred the envy of a man who had a scraggy, unappetizing and cantankerous wife in his basement dwelling. But it is just as likely that the malice and cruelty of his nature fixed on Abrecht at random when he saw how resolutely and unassailably he bore his punishment. He watched for an opportunity to do him an injury, to show his contempt of him. One evening in the second spring he went to the peephole to observe the object of his hatred. It was half-past seven and it was still light in the cell. John was standing in his striped uniform in the middle of the cell with his shaven head turned away. He was looking up at the slit of window high up in the wall and through the grating the branch of a tree with serrated leaves could be seen against the red glow of the evening sky. It was one of the two or three trees that grew in the yard, a tall elm, which rose in the air at a short distance from the window. And John Abrecht was looking at it with his head raised and even from the back view of him it could be seen that he was intently listening.

The jailer put his ear to the opening and heard the song of birds in loud and rhythmic chant.

The prisoner stood lost in the sound. For weeks past it had been his joy morning and evening. Ever since the autumn he had been waiting for the singing of the birds to begin again, all through the long, dark and silent winter. It was not only the song of the small birds he heard as he stood there; the forests and gardens and plains of the whole earth sang to him and the beasts of the earth greeted him. He heard it in the barking of dogs, the crowing of cocks, the tender bleating of lambs, the neighing of wild horses and the dull bellow of the buffaloes in a far off, dreamed of home beyond the seas. He heard his freedom in it and the life to be when his penalty had been paid.

The warder turned the key and went in. "Oh, so you're enjoying a concert, are you?" he said after a pause. "Now then, lie down and be quick about it." And he pointed to the bunk, which he had let down from the wall an hour before when he locked the cells.

The prisoner obeyed. The warder left the cell and came back almost immediately with a ladder, climbed up and closed the shutter with a bang. Then he listened intently and made a sour grimace when the song of the birds was still faintly audible.

"We'll do something about that," he said spitefully. "You can say good-bye to your concert-party, you skunk."

Two days later Abrecht was put into another cell, from which nothing but the vacant sky was to be seen. He could only see, at heartbreaking intervals, a swallow flicker past in the bright vacancy of the sky.

VI

There were still six months to go before his release and now at last his sentence began to torture him in earnest. Now at last he knew the hideous waking, the first look into the intolerable loneliness and horror of each day, which so many identical days were to follow until the day of his release came. His plan for this day never altered. He was going to go to the girl whom he had assaulted and ask her and her parents for her hand. If they said yes, he would not mind; if they said no, as was more likely, he would make over to her as dowry the half of what little he possessed. With what remained to stand between him and destitution at the outset, he would start a new life beyond the sea and work as a free man. He would leave as little trace behind him as the ship that took him left in the sea.

What he wished remained steadfast, but in his longing for freedom, which was so constant and innocuous, there was mixed despair and hate. He wanted to outrun this hate for the man who tortured and injured him; it was of this rather than of remorse and regret and the blot on his name that he hoped to be cured in the air of the sea and a southern land. He scarcely dared to look at the man now for fear of his own uncontrollable nature, which had once already got the better of him so disastrously. He stood before him with lowered eyes, disciplined and submissive. And almost every hour he repeated the words that gave him comfort and self-control: "Once I am free I shall never see that man again, never, never."

Meanwhile his longing for the warm proximity of another human being increased. He yearned for the presence of a woman. But the desire that overwhelmed him was not merely sensual: it was the need for tenderness, gentle communion, the mutual exchange of kindness that enthralled him. If the little sunburnt girl in that harvest field allowed him to make good the wrong he had done her, what a life he would make for her, how his arms would protect her! She was often in his thoughts, he imagined he knew and loved her, feature by feature, though he had scarcely noticed her in the white glare of the sun and the tumult of his feelings. But if it was not to be her—well, he would find another over there in the new country. And his desire called up a slender, gentle creature with fragrant, dark hair, looking up at him confidently, with large and gentle eyes. But it needn't be a woman at all, not even a human being, only some living thing that he could watch over and protect. It need only be a dog that pressed against his knees, only a tame bird that liked to perch on his hand.

Only the tiniest heart that beat trustfully in his presence. Anything not to be alone with these dead walls and that hellish jailer. He got to such a pitch that in the night he put his right hand to his heart and felt his pulse at the same time, so as to have the sense of life twice over.

Summer came and every day John Abrecht believed that now his cup was full, now his craving for a living being could rise to no higher pitch, now the utmost limit of human suffering was reached. He might tell himself that soon, in little more than a hundred days the end was certain, he might contrast his fate with the thousands who had to suffer longer, suffer to all eternity, but for all that he felt no better off and his suffering grew. It was no relief to look at the mute and evil heads in the workroom; besides, his enemy had succeeded in getting him solitary confinement for three days out of the seven.

And then the miracle happened.

VII

He came back one evening from the workroom, the warder entered his cell with him, let the bunk down with a crash from the wall, looked round and, finding no cause for reprimand, shut the heavy door behind him and his vengeful footsteps died away.

John Abrecht stood a moment with his face turned to the square of paling summer sky, in which no living creature was to be seen, and then turned despondently to the dreary loneliness of his cell. His eye fell on the comfortless bunk.

Then he saw in the middle of the coarse grey blanket a moving particle of life, shining green and gold. John pressed both hands to his heart.

It was a mystery how the beetle could have got in. He could not have flown in through the window; John knew enough of the species to know that. But how unlikely it was, how astonishing and wonderful, that it should have found its way over the threshold of his cell, the door of which was so seldom open. It was a miracle.

John approached carefully in order not to frighten the tiny object. He silently let himself down on the wretched bed, knelt down in his prison trousers and looked closely at this living thing which had been given him for his delight. The little creature moved his six, finely articulated little brown legs one after the other and struggled on over the rough pile of the blanket. Sometimes he patiently stopped to rest. His green-gold wing cases shone in the evening light, the little shield on his neck glanced and shimmered like a precious jewel, his feelers moved more tenderly and silently than anything in the world and his projecting eyes peered about him.

You can't possibly see me, John thought, I am like a mountain to you, like a whole range of mountains, you little, little one. But I can see you, you bring me joy and a hint of liberty and you are so beautiful. But even if you were ugly and stank and stung me, I would still be kind to you, and you would still lie in my heart. Let me touch you, let me feel the living gold on your wings, my saviour, my beauty—and he carefully stretched out a trembling finger.

Then the second miracle happened. The beetle seemed to realize his presence, to feel that he was a man. It seemed dismayed. Then it made a clumsy turn in the heavy wool and came straight towards John Abrecht, straight towards his breast, as he knelt there.

VIII

Who can say whether it is possible or merely a childish dream, to tame an insect, to win its love and to make it one's friend? What do we know? We do not know what passes in the fibre of the branch that we break across our knees, we do not know what repercussions follow from the splintering of a stone, thrown by a child. We know nothing. We wash the sleep out of our eyes and go on with our concerns in deadly earnest, we warm our bodies with food and embrace a woman whose warmth pleases us and who is as strange to us as a tree or stone or an animal, we get up and go to bed again in ignorance deeper than before. We know nothing.

It was enough for John Abrecht to believe that he had won the affection of the little gold beetle. It was now his whole life. The days he had to spend in solitary confinement were now the best. But even the other days when he only returned to his cell at evening were tolerable, for they were shortened by anticipation.

He had to fight for his gleaming treasure. He listened, tense in every nerve for the warder's step in case he might take them both by surprise; and he suffered thirst in doing without his drink of water, for the water jug was the only hiding place the cell contained. He emptied it secretly and silently and in its moist earthenware depth the gold beetle sat all day long, waiting for him. He sat among the grasses and faded flowers which his human friend secretly brought up to him from his walks in the prison yard. They played together. The tiny creature clambered gently over the man's finger; its touch was soft, it was never afraid. And it nibbled at a grass stalk or sucked at a dandelion which the man held out to him.

John Abrecht was perfectly right in his head. He knew what it was he loved: just a little beetle, whose life would end with the summer. But his own torment would end with the summer too and then his tiny companion would lead him to the threshold of life and hand him over to all those creatures to whom John had dedicated his energies of love. What did it matter whence the joy came? It had come to him on the verge of his blackest despair, and why should he analyze it and ask more of this particle of life that gleamed so consolingly in the light of the estranging summer days?

I cannot show you enough love, precious little one, he thought, I cannot be kind enough to you, for you do not understand all. But even if you no longer lived and moved your little legs, my jewel, I would still stretch out my arms to love and cherish the earth to which you had returned.

IX

On one of his days of solitary confinement, John Abrecht was kneeling with his friend on the stone floor. It was about noon and he had put his bowl down in front of him and the beetle was amusing himself by making the circuit of its edge. Sometimes John held his forefinger across his path; then the little creature stopped, seemed to glance sideways and moved his foremost and shortest pair of legs as though in fun.

The door creaked and shut again. John jumped up and looked with mortal dread into the warder's angry face. His forehead was redder than usual and his flat eyes gleamed and his little mouth was nothing but a pinched white streak. Abrecht knew at once that concealment was over and that the man had been watching him. He raised his hands in clumsy supplication and looked not unlike the little creature he wanted to protect. He tried to speak.

"Shut your mouth," the warder said. "Show me what you've got there."

"Don't, don't!" Abrecht stammered. "Don't hurt him!"

The warden bent down and picked up the little creature, who had sat waiting on the edge of the bowl, gave a passing glance at the creeping thing in his hand, then let it fall to the ground and squashed it with his boot. You could hear the crunch.

"That will teach you to amuse yourself."

John Abrecht sank down on the stool in the corner. He sat with his face in his hands and did not move. He sat for half a minute with his nails boring into his temples, holding himself in with all his strength.

"Jump to it and clean it up," the warder said, giving him a push. Abrecht got up with his eyes fixed to the ground and obediently took the floor cloth from the corner. The boot had done its business well. There was only a patch on the floor, black mangled limbs and a little discoloured blood. A single scrap of one wing case could be distinguished and the gilded lacquer gleamed out from the darkness of destruction.

John carefully wiped it all up, without raising his eyes. The warder found nothing further to say and with another glance round went out, not satisfied even yet.

X

The man little knew how near death had been to his hairy throat in that half minute. He little knew why Abrecht's hands had bored so furiously into his temples. He had deprived a prisoner of a pastime. Duty was duty. Basta!

But the best pastime on this earth is hatred. Everybody knows that. The blockheads of every nation have known that since time immemorial. They occupy their vacant hours in hating and abusing other nations, and how can a man be aware of monotony or even of the passing of the days when his heart has once penetrated to the hellish depths of another's heart and come up again from that deep shaft like a bucket filled to the brim with the lust for revenge?

Two months lay between Abrecht and his release. They were no more to him than one brief torch-lit night. He stood and walked and worked and cleaned himself and his cell automatically and without a care, feeling with a terrible joy how the flames ate deeper and deeper into his vitals. He could crouch hour after hour on his stool, or lie in the dark under his blanket, revolving the same words, the same thoughts in his mind. Fifty and five hundred times over he could mutely repeat the same words: "How can a human being do that? A man like that must not live. A man like that contaminates the world."

But he knew too that the man no longer lived. His doom was sealed. It had been all he could do in that half minute not to kill him. But now it was easy; it cost him no trouble at all to wait. Now there was even a sort of bitter satisfaction in letting Satan enjoy his bail in the arrogant belief that no danger threatened him.

Imprisonment had not in the least turned his brain. When he cherished and loved the gilded beetle he had been perfectly sane. He had always been perfectly clear about what he felt: he loved a little gleaming beetle, which was no longer there and yet stood for everything. Even now he knew quite well what a little thing it was that had happened: someone had trodden on an insect. He was quite able to realize that there was very little in a defenceless prisoner's being deprived, for no reason but spite, of the one wretched joy he possessed.

Nevertheless it typified all that was hateful, despicable and worthy of destruction on earth. Nothing more insignificant and unimportant could be imagined and yet nothing more tremendous and evil and horrible; and if he killed that warder, if he broke his contemptible neck for him or stuck a knife into his gullet, he would still be killing the devil and bruising the serpent's head; and it had to happen and that was why it would happen, for he neither knew nor cared what awaited him when the deed was done and that was why he hungered and thirsted for that moment and would not fail it. Amen. Amen. Amen.

John Abrecht made for the centre of the town, uncertain of his way and what to do. His clothes hung loosely on him. His boots felt heavy. His felt hat was too large for his shaven head. He carried a small leather suitcase in his hand.

It was a fine sunny autumn morning and even the outskirts of the town had a friendly air. Everyone looked happy and the trams clanked cheerfully by. Before he had crossed more than a street or two he felt that he had come a long way: no one by that time would dream where he had come from. Taking care not to remove his hat, he stopped a young fellow and asked him the time. "Would you mind telling me the date as well?" he added in an undertone. "It's the 29th of September," the man said and hurried on.

So they had let him out two days before his time. What generosity after those two years! And he walked on lost in thought. Finally he stood, clasping his suitcase, on the front platform of a tram. People got on and off, nobody noticed him, the streets grew more crowded and lively. His eyes rested on a hand-cart heaped with ripe peaches long after they passed it. Anyone could go up and buy some of the luscious fruit for a few pence. He glanced into his pocketbook, in which he had a good number of folded notes. He had provided for himself well—in those days.

Perhaps it was the fruit-vendor's barrow that decided him to get out in the large market place and take a room in one of the hotels there. The boots took him up the narrow winding staircase, smelling of vegetables and spirits and wine, to a plainly furnished room high up under the roof. Then there was another interruption: it was the boots, panting in with a registration paper in his hand. He filled it in carefully and deliberately, giving a false name and a false address in another town. He noticed he had almost forgotten how to write.

Then he started to unpack his suitcase and it gave him an odd feeling as he took out his washing things, his two brushes and soap and comb and a little shaving mirror and razor and all that he had so carefully packed as though for a two days' holiday. Everything had been taken from him when he entered the prison and for seven hundred days his suitcase had lain untouched in store, provided with a label, on which were written the number of a cell and the date.

Dazed by his sudden release he idly reflected that he, as well as his suitcase, had been laid on one side all this time, waiting in a state of suspended animation. Now, surely, it must be possible to take up the thread of his life where he had let it drop.

But no, it was not.

He walked to the open window and put both his hands on the iron rail of the low balustrade. Below there was a happy turmoil of colour and noise. The square between the old gabled town hall and the irregular rows of houses to which his inn belonged was alive with the coming and going of market day; people were going cheerfully about their business in the sunshine, all the stalls were gay with fruit and flowers and leafy plants; everyone was happy, want was far away and life seemed easy.

All this lay beneath John's eyes and at the same time sharply separate from him; it was real and only a few steps parted him from it, and yet it seemed intangible and unsubstantial. It was the world, actual human existence, but he had no part in it, not yet. If he had descended the old inn stairs to the sunny square, it would all have retreated before him and the busy stir of life would still have gone on in the distance.

There was fruit in plenty: the sun had been busy while he had been banished from it. And even now he could not buy any of that lovely fruit heaped up like solid sunlight—not yet. His eye caught sight of more peaches in a basket. A peach seemed to him the perfect work of nature. Nature wanted to show once and for all what it was capable of and so it produced its best in a playful mood—a peach or a swan or a piece of rose-coloured crystal. At school one day he had been taught the meaning of the word peach. It meant Persian fruit. Persia! The dream of a sea voyage, foreign lands and southern suns passed dimly before his eyes. He might not stretch out his hands to part the veil yet, but the hour was near.

His spirits rose and he looked more closely at the gay scene below him. He saw a stall-holder playing with his dog. He was a robust man of fifty in a sweater with a tweed cap on his head; the dog, a playful little animal with flop ears that were much too big for it and too long a tail. Its forefeet were on a vegetable basket and the man was teasing it with a bunch of carrots. The dog enjoyed the game; it lifted first one and then the other of its short front legs to pat comically at the yellow bundle. Suddenly its master threw the carrots away, grasped him by one ear and laughed right in his black face. At that he broke loose and began to bark with all his might and ran excitedly round and round the stall.

But John was no longer looking. As he watched the dog playfully patting with its front legs, the veil was suddenly torn from his eyes and his actual situation rose before him. He knew what it was that still parted him from the world and from the future. He heard the crunching on the stone floor; he heard those pitiless and unspeakably brutal words; he saw those yellow eyes and that boot grinding on the floor. The world was full again of the pestilential breath of the most evil, the lowest of mankind; and his pulses throbbed again with a terrible hatred and an indefectible lust of vengeance. No consideration, no thoughts of prudence could stem the vehemence of that necessity. It would be easier to hold back the sea with a rope.

"I shall kill him," he told himself. For the first time he uttered what he had known for weeks was his resolve. He carefully shut the window and bolted the door as though someone outside might break in on his thoughts. Then he sat down in the middle of the room at the empty table and leaning his forehead in one hand he began methodically and calmly to make his plans.

XIII

Next day he had an exhaustive interview at the Emigration Office. From there he went to the Consulate of a South American State and was politely given full details by the official, an elderly German. There he booked his passage for a not far distant date and made arrangements with the depository where his things were stored. That night he began to make investigations. There was need of much methodical reconnaissance before he could be certain of achieving his aim. Not far from the prison, a little further out along the uncompleted suburban road, there was an inn called the Concord, frequented by the prison staff. It was here that the warders sat over beer and cards; and from this low-ceilinged and stuffy inn-parlour, where they sat in comfort, they returned to carry out their duties or to the cowardly satisfaction of their worst instincts. Night after night John hung about the place; twice he even went in and quietly drank his beer without being recognized and listened to the jailers' commonplace talk—to judge from which they might just as well have been rate-collectors or tobacco-conists.

He examined with particular care the stretch of road that led to the prison. After a short distance, in the direction of the town, a narrow lane went off to the left, leading between the outer wall of the prison and a long black warehouse. It was by this lane that the warders reached the back entrance of the prison.

John knew the daily routine of the prison and soon he had ascertained the rotation in which they went for their nightly refreshment in the public house. Only one thing remained—to come upon his victim when he was unaccompanied. In order to be sure, he made a test ambush.

He took up his station in the lane towards nine o'clock, squeezing himself up against the darkness of the warehouse door, and waited. Not far from him there was a dim oil lamp projecting from the prison wall on an iron bracket. Anyone who turned off the road along the lane could be clearly recognized. Soon a warder came along, a tall lean fellow. As soon as he passed under the light of the lamp, John noticed the grave and decent expression of his long face.

Why couldn't he have been my warder, he thought quietly, and then this load would not have lain on my heart. The man walked steadily on and rang the bell at the gate. The gate opened and shut behind him.

"Yes, I should not have had to kill him," he said to himself as he lay in wait. The thought inspired a calm regret for the part he had to play but not any pity at all for the condemned man. What lay before him did not follow from a resolve which he could alter at will: there was no choice. That man and the nameless evil he represented stood between John and the world. It was impossible to advance one single step into real life before this barrier had been overthrown. Actually, this barrier was not outside him at all; it was not a man with his feet on the ground; it was in Abrecht's blood as a terrible clot of hatred and nausea and contempt. His life was held from day to day only on that condition. Strength was given him only to do that deed. Only when that clot had been dispersed and washed away would he be free to breathe and live his life and love. Only then would his blood course calmly and gently through his veins.

He remembered a school friend of his, who had been dangerously ill; the doctor had diagnosed blood-poisoning and given him a mercury injection and cured him. John remembered distinctly what an impression it had made on him; he had imagined the cooling stream of dimly shining silver coursing through the boy's blood and gently carrying away all the poisonous germs. That's how it would be with him when his deed was done.

At that moment he saw his victim coming. A short heavy tread came along the lane and soon Abrecht saw the flat brutal face, the eyes, the moustache and the chin lit up for a moment by the lamp. He came on singing and suspecting nothing. John heard the words of a popular song in that hideous voice. "It needn't be flannel," he sang as he passed Abrecht's motionless figure.

"Though I daresay it will be," the voice went on. He laughed at the absurdity of the words, which the filthy idiot had no doubt got wrong; he laughed silently from scorn and hatred and the luxury of triumph as he thought how the man had brushed shoulders in his besotted complacency with his irrevocable doom.

There was a ring at the bell, the gate opened and slammed to again with a dull echo.

XIV

Next morning he took a local train. First it went through the ugly industrial outskirts and then for nearly an hour through pleasant rolling country. He got out and took the road for Hochberg.

The autumn fields lay brown and deserted in the clear air and John quite enjoyed the walk in spite of his thick dark suit. Soon he came to the spot where the road turned off and ascended a gentle hill towards Hochberg.

This was the place, he thought, as he looked at the empty silent field, on which then the sheaves had been standing and where his fate had overtaken him.

If I had only passed an hour later, he thought, my life would have gone on as usual; or if I had taken another road, or if it had not been so hot, or if the girl had had to stay at home peeling potatoes. It is on such things a man's destiny turns; everything is luck, whether good or bad.

But even while he thought this and looked at the reaped stubble field he knew that it was foolish to talk of luck. It was utterly impossible to think away that disaster or to cancel those two years in prison; his life had been directed and turned aside by some higher power, by some obscure and all powerful decree. Even if it was open to him to wish what was done undone, did not a secret instinct of his being accept and endorse every turn of fate? Did he not meet with composure his crime and his punishment, his imprisonment and his liberty, his homelessness and the promise of the unknown? He welcomed all, good and bad alike.

But no, not one thing—not the heartless cruelty of that malicious devil who murdered the defenceless. Room could be found for all in a heart which did not quail, which was ready to be overthrown, to suffer hunger, sorrow and pain, to be forsaken and lost and repulsed. But one thing alone could not be tolerated. That man must die. A red mist rose before John's eyes. He no longer saw the place where his destiny had been accomplished: the field had vanished from his eyes.

He broke off and took the road to Hochberg. When he got there he enquired his way to the farm and nobody noticed him as he went along the road. Only a few there had ever known him and people quickly forget. Soon he arrived at the farm, which had a moderately prosperous air.

The farmer was sitting at a table in the kitchen. John gave his name quietly, ready for a rough reception. But nothing of the sort occurred. The man only said yes and what did he want.

John put his question in few words.

"Well," the farmer said, still without getting up, "well, I don't know. The story's all forgotten now and it would be a pity perhaps to rake it up again, and you won't get your job back again, I suppose?"

"No, that's true," Abrecht said, surprised at the man's composure. Where had the anger gone that had flung him into a criminal's cell? Two years were an eternity. Was one still the same person after two years? He too was quite unmoved at the sight of his former enemy.

"Would you like to see Joanna?" he went on to ask. "I'll call her." He got up and crossed the yard to the door of a barn and John could see through the window that he stood still and said something through the door.

So her name was Joanna. He had forgotten that or never known it. But now it seemed to him that having the same names was a barrier to their union. It was certainly a foolish notion but it seemed to rule out all idea of their marrying. It was not to be.

The girl came in with her father. Abrecht would scarcely have recognized her. He would very likely not have noticed her in a crowd. She had grown into a lanky girl, neither pretty nor plain. Now that autumn had come she was not even particularly sunburnt and it was her sunburnt complexion that his memory had so long held fast. She looked aside in embarrassment as she held out her hand.

"I wanted to ask your forgiveness, Miss Joanna," he said.

She obviously did not know what to reply and muttered almost unintelligibly: "Oh, it doesn't matter."

"I have already told your father that I would gladly make you all amends. I asked him whether he would like us to marry."

She looked up at him for the first time; she too had never realized what he looked like and she was surprised by his grave lean face.

"I don't know, Mr. Abrecht," she murmured. "People have pretty well forgotten all about it now."

"Besides, there's another man who wants to marry her," her father said from his chair. "She's young yet, only seventeen."

"I see," said Abrecht. "Well, I wish you happiness. I am very glad that I have not ruined your life. I thought a lot about you, in there, Miss Joanna."

At this she looked him full in the face. "Did you have a very bad time?" she asked gently.

"Oh no," he replied vaguely.

He was now a free man and there was little more to detain him in the room; he had only his further offer of a sum of money to make. And he had to ask twice whether this was agreeable to them. Joanna's only reply was to look at him curiously and with bewilderment, but her father went into the proposal without thanking him or expressing any surprise, just as though it was a matter he had been counting on all the time. When it was settled, there seemed nothing further to say.

"My wife and son have gone to Lengenau market," her father said at last. "But will you have a cup of coffee, Mr. Abrecht?"

John declined, but the girl had already gone out, apparently relieved that the interview was over. After a few minutes she came back with two jugs and a cup and a loaf of very white, fragrant, milk bread. John ate and drank while the other two looked on. Scarcely anything more was said, for there was nothing more to say.

At last Abrecht took out his time-table from his pocket. "If I drive you to the station you can catch the three-sixteen," the farmer said. John again tried to decline, feeling rather sadly what a mockery it all was. But again the farmer had already left the room to put the horse in.

"I'll come with you, Father," his daughter called after him.

They drove to the station, the farmer smoking, the girl beside him and John on the back seat all by himself like a gentleman. He looked at the farmer's broad back and his daughter's narrower shoulders, wrapped in a shawl, and her hat adorned with yellow flowers, put on in his honour, and perched awkwardly on the top of her head like a plate. They drove through the village and on to the cross roads. They came to the undulating field. But neither father nor daughter looked at that stretch of fallow of theirs and John, who was lost in thought with his chin on his chest, did not notice till long afterwards that they had passed it.

At five o'clock he was back again in his inn and at eight he went his way through the dusk. He did not notice the coolness of the evening, he did not notice the passers-by who were off to rest or amuse themselves after the toils of the day. He walked all the way to give his limbs occupation and even so it was all he could do not to run headlong to his destination.

He had had to put restraint and compulsion on himself day after day; he had had to damp down the furnace within him in order to arrange everything with composure. But now that he gave the flames their head, now that they might leap up and destroy, every moment of waiting cramped and tortured him. His whole body now was nothing but the instrument of revenge, his eyes were riveted on their mark, and his hands were only weapons of destruction. His whole being ached with the lust to destroy. So longs a man on the rack for the end of his torture, so longs the lover for the arms of one woman alone, so longs the dying man in the glare of the desert for the water he cannot find. But Abrecht knew where to find it; the cure of his raging fever was certain and the cure was near at hand. He broke into a run and reached his destination long before it was prudent. But the dusk concealed him as he stood motionless at his post and at last he controlled even his breath and his thumping heart so that he could listen with all his ears. No one came past. He saw the gloomy prison wall and the dreary light of the lamp. He felt in his pocket for the strong-handed knife but as soon as his hand closed on it he knew that he would not need it. Nothing, not even steel should come between him and his vengeance.

"I shall strangle him," he told himself in a whisper. In the darkness he clenched his right hand with all the strength that possessed him. "I am strong enough to split a rock," he went on without knowing whether his lips had formed the words.

It occurred to him that he was not carrying out his plans after all. He had left his disguise behind in his room over the market place, a false beard and a mask of black cloth. But even if he had remembered them he would not have made use of them. He confronted his fate on the great day, the day of fulfilment: he would have gone to meet it naked.

In his frenzy he listened backwards into time and that brutal voice spoke in his ear, straight into his brain. He heard it saying: "I'll teach you to amuse yourself, you skunk. We'll see about that. Jump to it and clean it up——" And the sound of crunching.

Then there were footfalls in the lane, hurried and out of step, and in the light of the lamp Abrecht saw two of the warders on their way back to the prison, talking as they walked along.

One was the man with the long kindly face; the other he did not know. They passed, rang the bell, and vanished.

Supposing the man he waited for was not alone. How easily it might happen in spite of all his foresight! It was a possibility, but it would not happen. The tremendous tension of the last hours could never be repeated, could not come and go in vain. The world was not so lavish.

From that moment onwards he stood in complete composure, in the stillness of death, and waited. He was nothing but one iron muscle, taut and ready for the spring.

XVI

He was coming. He heard the step he knew from the dreary days of imprisonment, short, hard and hostile. Yes, there he came and alone. John saw him pass beneath the lamp and now he had only twenty paces to go, now only five. John stood there—nothing but a tool, ready to seize and clench. Now he had him, heaven be praised, at last, at last!

In one leap he was out of his hiding place and both his hands were round his enemy's throat, wrenching him round. The man tried to cry out in his mortal terror, but the sound was throttled in his throat; he fought, tried to get a grip, tried to get in a blow, but the iron hands kept their throttlehold and held him at arms' length, and his short arms beat the air. His cap fell to the ground and the light of the lamp lit up his short hair, standing up like a brush, and his contorted face.

And John saw him. His whole strength was concentrated in the clench of his hands, but his eye remained clear and his mind kept its sinister composure.

Silence fell. Scarcely a gurgle came from his throat. A squeak like that of a mouse or some tiny animal was all he could get out. His small mouth was open and his tongue quivered in the small opening between his sharp, dirty teeth. But those flat eyes protruded as though at any moment they would be squeezed from his head. John saw all this; he saw the man wilt and he knew that the end and unconsciousness would be the work of a moment and that his strength amply sufficed to bring this end about. But he did not relent. He, with his hands round the throat of the beast, was more than just an individual person taking his revenge.

There was an oppressive calm in John's heart. The impulse, the tremendous and agonizing impulse, the urge for release through an act of revenge was still there; only death, with its last gurgle, its last quiver, could do away with it. It was this frenzied speechless longing that gave his throttling hands their strength. He must press on to the end, he must finish it off, he must kill.

But then John began to speak. Holding the man at arms' length, he spoke into his tortured jowl in a cold, clear and controlled voice and heard his own words as though they were another's.

"I have got you. Do you hear? Do you know who I am? You have got to die. Do you see what I am doing to you? I am squeezing your life out in my hands. You will live only a few seconds more and they will be frightful. But not half frightful enough. For you are a devil, the lowest and filthiest of God's creatures. A bit of filth, so cruel and horrible that there is no punishment meet for you. Strangling is not bad enough, nothing is bad enough for you. You deserve to have every one of your bones broken one by one. Your hide ought to be cut in strips. Your flesh ought to be plucked from you with pincers, you torturer, you hangman, you cowardly brute. What have they, who serve their sentences in there, done to you? What have I done to you? Do you think, you devil, that there is no justice in the world? Did you think you could go on doing as you pleased? No, your end has come. You have done too much evil. You are not a human being, you are the serpent, you are all that is vile and evil in the world. Your pestilential breath fills the world and there is no breathing as long as you are in it. But I shall put you out, I shall strangle you. You shall be no more."

He was pulled forward and this told him that the man's knees had given way. He lay at his feet with his bloated face turned upwards in bestial despair, his eyes turned up and nearly extinct, his parched mouth open and his tongue protruding. John was neither shaken nor moved by the sight: his rage even increased. He tried to tighten the clench of his deadly grip with all the force of hatred, contempt and suffering that he had gone through. He bent down and spat out his words against the dying mask and now his voice was no longer clear, no longer controlled: it was an inhuman voice that screamed and broke.

"Do you still know me or have you passed out? Open your eyes and look at me. I am the man you tormented and now I am doing you in. I am the prisoner in cell 93. Do you remember the birds? Yes, I used to listen to them singing. That was me and it gave me pleasure and it's me who is murdering you now. And then you went and covered the grating and as you could still hear them you went to the Governor and had me moved to another cell and you pushed me and you insulted me and you shouted at me and you mocked me and you chucked my food at me and you reviled me and tortured and tormented me—me, a defenceless man. There, now die, now gasp and struggle for your last mouthful of air. There, there, do you feel me? But you shall know exactly what you are dying for. Shall I tell you? You are dying for a beetle, a little beetle . . . What was I but a poor miserable wretch? I had nothing in the world. I was next door to going crazy. Another day or two and I should have gone crazy. And then a joy came to me, a little joy that rescued me. What was that joy, eh? It was a beetle, an insect, a thing so small you could scarcely see it. And I loved it and rejoiced in it. I played with it and spoke to it and taught it to know me and that poor little thing was my whole world. In my wretchedness, it was all, everything. And it was that you took from me. It was that you flung on the ground and trod on with your dirty boot. Can God have made a man like you? Is he to live? No. He must get out of it. His breath must cease. So give it up now, your last, last gasp. . . .”

And with his iron grip round the dying jailer's throat he hissed in his face in a ghastly imitation of his voice: “What have you got there? Give it up! I'll teach you. There, clean it up.”

But suddenly in the midst of the thunderous haze of his vengeance, a great light came to John Abrecht, a light from God. He saw the man beneath him, now weak with his agony, unconscious, sinking fast, move his two arms. He saw those two short arms signalling for help, imploring mercy, moving uncertainly and feebly, two feelers of a dying creature. A sick child moves its arms like that when it wants something or a tiny, unconscious insect its thin legs.

A gentle current streamed through John's hair and body and hands. His grasp loosened, his muscles all relaxed and a cool air of sea and stars blew through his breast. The man at his feet sank speechless to the ground and John stood up and took a deep breath, a quiver between tears and laughter ran over his lank face and he leaned upright against the prison wall.

He stood there with his murderous hands pressed flatly to his chest. It was only for a few moments, which, for all he knew, might have been an instant or an age, and his whole being was released and renewed by a gentle and magical power, by a current of silver in his veins. He was unable to think; later, later on he would be able to think. He resigned himself and was healed and overwhelmed by a happiness beyond words—illumination, release and mercy.

He opened his eyes and bent over a lifeless form lying on its face. He took it carefully by the shoulders and raised it up. The man's breast rose and fell and his features, though his eyes were shut, stirred. John knelt over him, resting his weight on his arm, and watched him as he came back to life in the dreary light of the lamp.

Abrecht held the man's body with hands that forgot what they had done; he saw the man with eyes that had never seen him before. He had a funny little mouth half open, a childish little mouth with small sharp teeth and an underlip that drooped pathetically.

He began cautiously massaging his temples while he supported him with his left arm. And after a few moments he opened his eyes. They were dim and saw nothing as yet and shut again. His breath came in gasping spasms. John went quietly and slowly and methodically on with his task, as though he were alone in the world with his patient, as though no path led back to the ways of mankind. Sometimes he had to stop and draw in his breath to master a sense of bliss that threatened to reduce him to weakness.

Suddenly he noticed that the man was looking at him. He had come back to life and his whole body revived and gained resistance. Abrecht let him go and getting slowly to his feet retreated a step or two. He saw the look of mortal fear in the other man's eyes; he would gladly have reassured and consoled him, but he knew that this could not be and so he left him there with a rueful smile.

The jailer got shakily to his feet. He leant against the wall of the shed with gaping eyes and hands splayed out behind him. Then he staggered on his way, still expecting his assailant to follow him, and slowly made for the prison gate. John too walked away, lost in thought, still incapable of grasping the situation—back into the world.

XVII

But as he went back into the town his thoughts still remained behind and dwelt on his victim with feelings of mercy, and joy that he was alive after all. No anxiety was mingled with his feelings. The man might raise a hue and cry, hunt him down and have him imprisoned; but that fateful night would not end so. Even if it did he would accept it. Nothing could take away what it had given him. He went on his way without fear even though he did not know how ample his protection was.

For the jailer when he reached the little gate in the wall and gained his quarters had no thought of pursuit. He lay down, shivering with fright and cold. His wife gave him some tea and as she grumblingly brought it to him in bed she saw for the first time the piteous expression of his face. She questioned him, rather casually, it is true, for his goings-on interested her very little. But he did not dare tell her what had happened. He still felt that the horror might rise up again and stand before him if he mentioned it; he still felt the iron grip at his throat and hid himself in the bedclothes, pursued even into his bed by anguish and terror.

But in the middle of the night when he woke from sleep with a scream, he told her all about it. His wife was indignant at the assault and insisted that the man should be caught and punished. But he protested with horror and raised his cowardly hands in the flickering candle-light.

"No, no," he screamed. "If they catch him he'll come back and murder me in his cell." And he made his wife swear not to breathe a word of what had happened. She gave him her promise for the sake of peace.

Next day he was sick and unable to get up. He trembled when he saw the branches of the elm stirring in the breeze outside the window. He screamed when the door opened and his wife and the prison doctor came in. And even when after a few days he left his bed and tried to resume his duties he was no longer the same man. He was afraid of the prisoners and scarcely dared to be alone with any one of them; he started when a bunk he had himself let down fell with a clatter into its socket.

It soon became obvious that he was no longer fit to carry out his duties. The authorities, who considered that his conduct as a warder had been exemplary, took the trouble to get a post for him in the war museum. There he wandered round, silent and apprehensive, amidst the symbols of faded glory and the instruments of another kind of brutality. His duties were light and he had more leisure than before, but this was no consolation to him. It was no pleasure to him to get home early to the even more confined quarters he now occupied. His wife, loveless and cantankerous before, was short-tempered and felt bitter resentment against him now that, having lost his only redeeming quality of a semi-military status, he sat moodily and broken-spirited in their wretched dwelling, preventing her by his presence from indulging in those endless hours of gossip with the neighbours which had been her one delight.

She was angry with him also because his collapse forced her to look to every penny. His new post was easier but worse paid, and what he could earn in tips was not worth mentioning. Those who visited the war museum were not the sort of people to be free with their money. They were chiefly school children, herded round by their teachers or else in little troops on their own and up to any mischief; or lower middle-class people and junior officials, chiefly concerned in detecting stains of dried blood and deciphering the heroic emblems on the banners; or soldiers with their servant-girls. If by any chance a prosperous stranger came along and looked with interest at the rubbish-heap of glory and asked a question, he found that the attendant only gave a brief, confused and taciturn reply which showed very clearly that he knew nothing about it. The visitor then went on with a nod, and the wretched man shambled through the cold rooms beneath the bright tatters of standards and flags, among pikes and cannon and all the other mouldering instruments of death.

XVIII

When John Abrecht reached the middle of the town he sat down on a bench in the garden of a large cheerful square. It had been a fine, hot day, one of those with which summer takes its leave, and many people were still up and enjoying the cool night air. There were only a few couples strolling along the paths and talking in whispers, but in the streets outside people were sitting in front of the cafés with variously coloured drinks in front of them, talking and laughing. The distance lent beauty to the scene and the sound of a violin accompanied the voices and gave them harmony. The sun blinds of the cafés and the large-leaved exotic plants in the garden gave the square a foreign look and the emerald of the mown grass had an exotic luxuriance, lit up by the unnatural light of the tall arc lamps.

As John sat looking at all this there was peace in his heart; he had come a tremendous distance on his way, he had reached his goal and now enjoyed a brief, delicious rest; the luxury of release after long torture filled his heart and the singing tones of the distant violin and the subdued richness of the turf were one with it. He looked across the expanse of exotic-looking grass and smiled, and a verse came to his mind which he had learnt as a child: "Here Peace herds her white lambs."

He sat and rested. The night wore on; the voices died away one by one, the music ceased without his noticing, the light of some of the tall lamps was extinguished, dark shadows stretched across the emerald grass and a cool breeze stroked the bushes.

What was it I went through tonight, there in that lane, he thought to himself as he got up. What a moment it was! I shall never forget it. It is something that exceeds all thought. Besides, I have never learnt to think. But even if I were learned and wise I could never get to the bottom of it, for it lies beyond all words and beyond all thought.

What was it? I hated him and meant to kill him and then he raised his arms, moved them like this . . . and then I understood it all. Was it because he reminded me of the gilded beetle? Yes, that was it partly. The beetle moved his brown legs like that when we played together and then he crushed him with his boot. But it was not only that. As he raised his arms in that imploring way he looked like a little child in its cot. I too must have done the same at home when I was little. We are all more alike than we think, and where is the dividing line? Who can take his own measure and separate and distinguish himself or say he is this or that and this is good and that is bad? Yes, that, more or less, is what I felt there in the lane suddenly entering into me and gently coursing through my veins. But it was something even better and greater, I believe, only there are no words for it. . . .

That jailer was once a little child and at the moment of death he became a child again and he cannot help all that lies between. Probably he does not know he is evil and cruel. Probably he thinks he does right. And the little beetle that comforted me in my cell, he too is not there only for consolation and beauty; I know quite well he does not live on the flowers one brings him and does not endure captivity in a water jug with patience. He hunts little beetles and eats caterpillars and tiny snails and defenceless naked worms and who am I to judge and say this is good and that is bad and set myself up as a judge and an avenger? I assaulted a girl in a field on a hot day and today I have nearly committed a murder. I did not commit it, but what held me back? A miracle, the grace of God. Certainly I think that, in spite of lust and murder, I am a little better than that man. Possibly I would not torture a defenceless man, but what authority can I claim, what judgment can I invoke, where is the judge's bench to which one can appeal?

Is there such a court? Who knows in whose ear all voices make a concord? There the good is a high, clear note, the bad a deep and mighty bass. Who knows, who knows? Do we not think sometimes, did I not think, tonight in the lane, that I suddenly heard that harmony? As though a brief burst of music came through a suddenly opened door. Then we know at once how small and narrow and stupid all our thoughts and judgments are.

Yes, I felt tonight that I knew where my path led and could never lose it again. As though the silver current of truth coursed in my blood and would never fail me all my life. But is it so? Do I now know more of the forces that are at work in me, do I know better my place in the great plan?

Do I know his? Why was he made as he was, that man I wanted to kill? Why has he that mouth, that chin and that eye? Who is he? What is his business here? He lives his life knowing nothing of himself, and when he vanishes what does it amount to? It amounts to life, life! Welcome bad and good alike!

A gust blew through the bushes and trees. John took a deep breath.

Yes, that is it. Ugly and beautiful, good, bad, all is welcome! Oh life! I am still young. You spread out before me, a vast and radiant expanse with all your vicissitudes and terrors. I set out on my voyage with the strength of youth still in me and with a new blessing, ready to meet you in your might, you and all your creatures, and call you friend.

THE CATALAN NIGHT

Paul Morand

(1889- )

---

I WAS TO HAVE a lady as a travelling companion. One half of her already graced the compartment in which I sat. The other half, leaning out of the window, still belonged to Lausanne station and to a delegation of men of various nationalities, welded together by the same shadow on the platform, linked by the same wild rose in the buttonhole of each of them. Bells began to ring. Passengers ran about on the asphalt platform. As though at the tacit bidding of the time-table, the signal drooped like a scarlet fruit at the top of its latticed trunk. A whistle blew. The lady shook hands over the lowered window; a freckled British hand; a pulpy German hand; a Russian hand with a parchment-like skin; the slim fingers of a Japanese. And lastly a young Spaniard, with a stock hiding a boil on his neck, stretched out a grimy paw covered with copper rings and said:

"Good-bye, Doña Remedios!"

Then the crowd parted and through the gap a mauve star twinkled, followed by a soft flare and a cloud of smoke through which a film camera immediately began to perform its desperate duties.

The train broke, one by one, from the handshakes that were anchoring it and, having gained its freedom, sped on its way. A shout went up:

"Long live the International!" but it was instantly smothered by the clatter of the turntables and the velvety darkness of a tunnel.

The lady still leaned rashly out of the window, waving her hand. I prevailed upon her to stop by placing a hand on her plump shoulder, and I drew her attention to an enamelled notice on which was written:

IT IS DANGEROUS TO ALLOW CHILDREN TO LEAN OUT OF THE WINDOWS

at which she smiled, turning towards me.

Beautiful, handsome, pretty, intriguing. In that moment Fate made amends for the disappointments of so many other train departures, in which it is the woman with whom one would like to travel who remains on the platform, while the man who was with her sits beside one, without any indication until that moment as to which of the two was going to travel, so equally affected were they by the parting, so equally full of emotion, and wrapped in their dreams.

There was no disillusionment when the train came out of the tunnel. Under cover of a drowsiness with which I pretended to be overcome I began to study my companion's face as though it were a map, so that I should be in no danger of taking the wrong turning. A charming and undulating landscape bounded by shoes and a hat. I always envy those passport officials whose daily task enables them to make a record on their forms of so many human faces, cold, warm, as different from one another as the flower-like imprints of finger-tips.

In this face, with its soft curves, frankly no feature was remarkable; her full lips, her forehead, her high cheekbones which, seen three-quarter face, hid her eyes from one's gaze, cutting one's glance off slantwise in an irresistible way and sending it off in one of those theatrical exits known as "into the wings" which deceive no one but are none the less charming. Her bosom rose in a gentle slope to her rounded neck, encircled by a plain rope of imitation pearls, and shaded by a youthful and determined chin. On her first finger shone a sapphire set in brilliants; her thin silk dress fell in a fold between her short thighs. In the mittened hands spread flat upon her knees, in her feet, so arched that they almost seemed swollen and which did not quite reach the floor, in her hair tightly stretched back to her ears where it was allowed to escape in frothy waves, so oiled that it ceased to be black and reflected every colour of its surroundings, in the bun twisted like a wrung-out cloth and glistening with brilliantine, in all these things one's memory was taken irresistibly back to Spain.

She leaned her head against the railway embroidery on the head-rest and went to sleep quite naturally. Perhaps I had hypnotised her.

As we approached Morges a storm suddenly burst over us. Terrific thunder-claps crashed against the mountain peaks, drowning the rattle of the train. A whimper came from somewhere. My companion woke with a start and absent-mindedly made the sign of the cross. Taken unawares, she wore that look of a bird with ruffled plumage which Southern European women get when travelling. The young ones lose their composure and become wooden, whilst the older ones turn a lead-grey colour and sag beneath the sparkle of their jewels. The sky split like a piece of silk. The lightning struck the railway track with a suddenness that was even more abrupt than a Press photographer's flashlight. I offered to pull down the blind.

"I'm not frightened of the storm, but my dog, who is in her basket, can't bear it."

Then, as though her face had been stripped by the thunder, she opened her bag and reconstructed it behind a cloud of powder. There was a white lock among her black hair, like a jet of steam in a puff of coal smoke. The whimpering started again under the seat and went on until she decided to take a mongrel fox-terrier with fawn-coloured ears out of a gilt basket on which was written "Souvenir of the Rigi." To put her more at her ease I opened my bag and took out a teddy-bear and a red donkey. She complimented me on my menagerie. On my side I showered praises on her dog in a way which is usually only considered correct on suburban railway trains.

"Trick is ugly, Monsieur, but I love her because she is all I have left in the world."

"Nevertheless, the leave-takings which I witnessed at the station a little while ago seemed to me to be extraordinarily warm. Having only been in Lausanne a few hours myself, I know nothing at all of a person worthy of being photographed by flashlight. Perhaps you've been giving a charity performance at the Casino?"

"I am not, Monsieur, altogether an actress," she replied. As she finished the word "actress", lisping it slightly, her tongue appeared for a moment between her closed teeth which were like minute grains of rice. She favoured me with a tired smile. "Even though I have played a part in the most terrible parody of justice of this century. My name is Remedios Sirvent and I was the companion of Estebán Puig, the Catalan champion of liberty, legally assassinated at Barcelona last spring by the police, militarist and clerical reaction."

I had, like everyone else, taken a passing interest in that event, which some considered to be a just punishment and others looked upon as a martyrdom, but which had subsequently been relegated to oblivion. Consequently I was greatly surprised at the description which she gave me of the gathering at Lausanne, at the thought of which—here she beat her breast—she still thrilled.

In order that all restrictions on individual action should cease, and with the object of bringing pressure to bear on the Spanish Government, the International Socialist Bureau had organised a monster demonstration.

The mass meeting, she explained to me, took place in the rain, on the borders of the lake, in close, serried ranks. A seething mass of humanity stretched as far as the balconies of the villas and the hotel terraces; the roofs were packed with sight-seers. Souvenir cards were sold; subscription lists were filled with names; preceded by their silken ensigns the delegates marched past; anarchist contingents from Zurich and Lugano beneath their black banners; Russian social-revolutionaries, Indian nationalists, American Zionists, the General Unions of French and Belgian workers; the officials of the Independent Labour Party and of the Second International sang hymns. All the comrades were there: Rosario, Rakovski, Vandervelde, Luxembourg, Jaurès, Burns, Thomas, Lippovici. A never-to-be-forgotten moment. What mattered it that one no longer possessed a country, when one was received as she had been received, at the threshold of Humanity? She would do her duty now with renewed strength of purpose, pushing aside all obstacles in her path, striving to banish the languor which overcomes one after a great sorrow, and during which one's nature recovers its strength. She wanted to remain bruised, both in her opinions and in her affections, and to work tirelessly to the end that the work to which Puig had devoted his life should be continued and the Cause fostered. He had left her sufficient money for her needs. She belonged to the lower middle classes and was naturally inclined to a life of luxury and ease beneath a tranquil sky. But she could not drift into becoming the charming widow, absorbed in her white rabbits and her vineyards, taking the air in her carriage in her widow's weeds. She felt the need of great international conflicts, of European upheavals, of rugged climates, of propaganda voyages and lectures, and wanted to compel attention, to win the hearts of the people, to obtain a revision of his shameful trial.

Enthusiasm radiated from her eyes, her lips and the palms of her hands, with something playful and childish which was particularly attractive; sometimes she interpreted her thoughts seriously, announcing its degeneracy to a decadent world; sometimes she started off on a frantic and confused flow of invective without, however, losing any of her charm in the process.

The idea of a new order of Society enraptured her so much that beads of moisture stood out on her forehead. The natural passionate good-nature of the Spaniard gave way before a fervour of despotism which her eloquence alone held in check. But at the back of everything there remained the cold and austere religious sense and the respect for established order which are the nearest kin to prayer. Her marvellous credulity was a great asset, egging her on to romantic sacrilege and above all giving her the strength to be insatiable, which is usually lacking in revolutionaries of the Latin races, who are satisfied with so little.

"Hombre," she said, "my life is expressed in four words: service, knowledge, faith, love."

She enlarged upon this idea, but, before explaining it, insisted on defining her position in relation to the different political parties in Spain. For my part, I listened with such good will that I fell asleep.

We were approaching the frontier.

The lightning still accompanied us, punctuated by desultory thunder-claps, like an endless argument among the mountain tops. Doña Remedios still nursed her dog which, covering its mistress's knees with its ears, gloomily surveyed her little feet adorned with tastefully designed buckles, shaped like pieces of barbaric jewelry.

The daylight grew fainter and the sky seemed gradually to become charred like a smoking lamp in the rays of the setting sun. Eau de Cologne was shaking monotonously about in its bottles at the bottom of bags with the gurgling sound of subterranean springs; my companion, comfortably ensconced in the corner of that one-night travelling home, pickled in smoke and smelling of hot leather, was reading "Les Samedis de Chiffonnette."

The sound of iron-shod boots on the heating apparatus announced the arrival of the customs officials. Doña Remedios raised her eyes.

"Nothing to declare," she said.

A southern French customs officer, accompanied by a Swiss soldier, on whose cap one noticed with surprise the absence of the word "Lift", pointed to a parcel of some size lying in the rack.

"What have you got in that basket?" he asked.

With a mixture of irritation and embarrassment my companion rose and lifted down a thick bunch of palm-leaves tied in a sheaf with a red silk ribbon. She opened it and I saw in the midst of the foliage a plaster gentleman with empty eye-sockets who looked like President Carnot.

"There!" she said, proudly. "That is a bust of Estebán Puig which was presented to me this afternoon by the B.I.L. [Bureau Internationale de Lausanne]. Must one pay duty on one's memory of the dead on entering France?"

And she wiped away a tear with a lace handkerchief the size of a postage-stamp.

Samuel Pacifico, professor of history at the Louis-le-Grand college, was at home to his friends every Sunday in his sixth-floor attic in the Rue Saint-Jacques. Since leaving school we had always kept up the custom of visiting our old master. The author of "The History of the Working-Classes" was a timid, shaggy dwarf whose face was a network of blue veins, who smelled of the Saint-Paul quarter, made his own shoes and cut his own hair with a machine of his own invention. He used to walk down the Boulevard Saint-Michel, hugging the wall, talking to himself and scrutinising everyone with his grey and black eyes which reminded one of a photographic plate in a yellow developer. He had preserved for us that affection which had formerly deprived our lessons of much of their tediousness, and which later we had fostered and returned, no subsequent experience having ever again brought the good luck which was ours from childhood, namely that of finding a man who did not mind corrupting the youth of a generation which was no longer worthy of corruption. His intelligence, which was profound enough to have overthrown a nation, was entirely at the service of Science. He imposed a discipline and austere habits on himself which he did not even wish us to adopt, holding himself, as it were, responsible for our happiness. The Jesuits, against their inclination, took us, their boarders, to Pacifico's classes, disapproving all the time of his diabolic humour; later, at the Political Science lectures, Monsieur Laguillière-Desveaux would interrupt his polished and colourless discourse in order to put us on our guard against "the anti-liberal licentiousness with which nowadays people proceed to the study of Social Science."

Pacifico never went out to dinner, never set foot in a drawing-room and never crossed the Seine except to go to the Rue de la Paix to buy rings, of which he had a collection which drove women to distraction. But that was the only Eastern taste he possessed. He commanded respect as having played his part in the pomps (and also in some of the shady intrigues) of the Third Republic, an active part which will never be accredited to him by history, exerting his influence on behalf of his friends, avenging them, bringing to bear a subtle pressure which ministerial offices rarely resisted for more than a few hours, seeking no personal advancement and having for recreation nothing but his weekly receptions.

It would have been useless to try to open one of Bayle's folios in the room in the Rue Saint-Jacques on Sunday evenings towards six o'clock; there would have been no room. In an atmosphere of tobacco and sealing-wax, one found university students in dinner-jackets and ready-made ties, examination coaches with their acid-stained fingers, an unfrocked priest, a painted female lawyer or two, a few members of the communist colonies of Draveil who stole the teaspoons, and an actress from the Théâtre-Français converted to modern art, who had refused the Legion of Honour and talked of acting only for the lower classes.

Nevertheless, I was amazed to see my travelling companion of the previous week walk into the circular study, picking her way between the books and manuscripts. I wondered why it had not struck me before that I should meet her here. For was not this room—as unpretending as a railway turntable on a branch line, the abode of a scholar and recluse, unknown to Paris as is indeed everything else—was it not famous abroad? On crossing the frontier, on the threshold of France, the first enquiry is for a hotel and for this address. Wells, Unamuno, Gorki, Wedekind (Shaw simply put, "G.B.S. Irishman") have signed their names in the master's visitors' book. The leaders of Europe have come here to pick up hints about the governing of their countries. It was natural that Doña Remedios, in her turn, should continue her work close to the man who could drown his burning thoughts in wisdom in the same way that, after a war, explosives are relegated to the bottom of the sea. There she sat, draped in a graduate's gown lined with white satin, gazing around her, accompanying her replies with little grimaces and mechanically turning over the pages of Jaurès's "Social History of the French Revolution" as though it were a warrant for her presence there.

"We are old friends," she said, when Pacifico introduced me. "A storm brought us together."

She reminded me of the station, the thunder and the whining of her dog Trick.

"That journey," I said, "seems almost mythical to me now, and Switzerland has assumed a dignity which has not really been hers for a hundred years. The loyalty of atmosphere, the eloquence of the mountain torrents, the red elegy of your widowhood and that precious train of ours with its two engines, which bore us through such forests of symbols and of pines [Remedios never flinched], these I shall treasure in my mind for ever."

How satisfying she looked, braving in Paris the creations of the best dress-maker of the Paralelo—an unrelieved black—a pretentious hat with a feather in it, a silver-fox fur, a little colour in her cheeks and a little blood on her hands, brooding on vengeance through those autumn days during which, at the call of the chrysanthemums, one passes so imperceptibly into the winter.

Pacifico begged her to write something in his visitors' book.

"Will a quotation do?"

When she had put on her spectacles and taken up the pen, I suggested:

"Why not a thought of your own?"

She laughed and held the book out:

"It's a quotation from our Moratín."

We read:

Being young and thoughtless she was therefore a charming woman.

Remedios.

My confusion made her laugh and she observed that it would be a lesson to me not to make fun of her in the future.

"In the first place," I said, "I met you in Helvetia, where one is allowed to think, and, besides, I can assure you that in Paris general ideas are no longer possible; every thought must be expressed in anecdote."

The master took up the cudgels for Remedios and denounced me as having a purely literary turn of mind. We passed the time in this way until dinner to which we were asked to stay: for these gatherings added to their other attractions that of being far from unfriendly to laughter, particularly when the Collège de France made way for the younger generation which, Pacifico declared, "prolonged his life." The food was good and the wine carefully chosen, our host having entrusted the care of his establishment to a housekeeper who had at one time made the Bishop's palace at Toulouse the best pot-house in south-west France.

A few of us remained that evening under the vanilla-tinted light of the gothic bronze chandelier, surrounded by the illusive pastures of the tapestries on which, facing each other, were hung portraits of Renan and Berthelot, who continued their conversation above the fumes of turkey and cabbage. Remedios's prominent bust presided over this family dinner.

Pacifico held a glass of sherry to the light and then presented it to Remedios, saying:

"To the health and to the glory of Puig."

"I thank you and I believe that you mean it. In rushing headlong to his death, Estebán did nothing more than to answer the call of the oppressed with the heart of a hero."

"And now darkness is spreading over Spain once more," added Pacifico.

"So it will always be, hombre, each time anyone tries to awaken to class-consciousness a proletariat which has stagnated for centuries in monastic ignorance and in barbarism," declared Remedios with her thick Spanish accent. "Estebán realised the futility of violence after the attempt of 1905, and he explained to me that the problem would have to be approached from a greater distance. 'We are working for thirty, for fifty years hence,' he said. But as soon as he revealed his plans they made away with him."

One of the guests, a professor of semasiology, asked her to explain.

Full of her subject, Remedios considered us with the challenging air of a great pianist who is about to attack the Symphonic Variations. But she must have seen the look I gave her, devoid of all interest and enthusiasm, for she cut out the peroration and, in a rapid voice, laid down her conclusions.

"There's nothing to say that you don't already know," she said. "To the traveller, Spain is just like any other country, with lottery tickets, watering places, life insurance, members of parliament who kiss each other on the mouth after debates and lifts whose floors light up as soon as one sets foot in them. A picturesque cesspool. Barcelona is cast in a South American mould and there the sleeping cars break into flower at the end of their stalks in hotels which are blossoms of mahogany and blue velvet. One goes through the streets on metal wires, one paints as at Schwabing, one only applauds bull-fighters when they return from Buenos Aires and one constructs buildings with enamelled bricks in which one can drive a motor car up to the fifth floor. Then suddenly, round a bend in the road, appears the Blessed Sacrament, that obsolete coinage which still circulates among us; the people fall on their knees (they are fined if they don't) and one sees officials in blue silk belts carrying candles, followed by officers in cassocks and field-boots. The over-loaded tramcars stop, surrounded by yoked oxen and Hispano-Suiza cars, to make room for those people with the heads of Inquisitors, these mitred vultures, these mean old peasant faces issuing from priceless lace, the lackeys of a God who abandons the poor in order to fawn upon the rich. Or else, if the traveller doesn't read the papers and therefore doesn't know that a strike is imminent, he is surprised one morning, on waking, to see from the windows of his hotel the civil guard with their yellow bandoliers lying in ambush at the corners of the streets, waiting for the trades union worker to show himself. The town, haughty yesterday beneath its diadem of electric light, and distributing alms to the rest of Spain, is thenceforth as empty as the Sepulchre on the third day. The civil population is driven to work before the muzzles of the mercenaries' rifles. Constitutional guarantees are suspended and a police of hired assassins carries out a systematic search in those suburbs of ours smelling of charred bones, essence of cesspool and resin. Everything now proceeds according to an abominable, preconceived plan. The civil authority resigns and martial law is declared; following a telegram which is said to come from Madrid but which in actual fact the governor always keeps in his safe, the government passes into the hands of the most backward beings that exist on the face of the earth, only equalled, perhaps, by some of the Russian governors in the Caucasian provinces. The artillery takes up its position in the public squares, machine-guns are placed on the monuments. The troops shoot without orders. People are arrested in their homes, searches are carried out at all hours of the day and night, trials take place without counsel or witnesses, affidavits read out being a parody of justice. Then one day at dawn, in the fortress moat, they kill. It's all over: Truth covers her face for another fifty years."

She took a cigar, lit it and blew a long cloud of smoke beneath the chandelier. Then she hummed a tune they play in Spain to herald the entry of the bull.

"Don't let my excitement worry you. Actually these memories are a consolation to me. In Paris people work well, but they forget too soon. There is no time here to think of death, which is an ordinary Spanish amusement. One ought to think of it; it helps to keep things in their proper perspective. Either the present order of Society must change or I must leave my bones on it. I don't want to die until the great fictions of life, Religion, Authority, Family, which with us still retain all their evil influence, have had their emptiness exposed, nor do I want to die without having helped my brothers and sisters to rid themselves of the burden of 'pobreness,' and of the yoke of the capitalist and of the 'padrón.' Of all those who exploit the poor, the Catalans are the most bitter, the most cruel and the most unjust. Oh, how wonderful it would be to exterminate them all!"

And she banged her fist on the table, not with her thumb inside her fingers, as women generally do, but placed correctly over the fingers like a lid. Her breasts and the glasses shook.

Suddenly her mood changed to one of gaiety and she pushed her chair away from the table and addressed herself to Pacifico:

"Thank you, foster-father, for my good dinner."

"My little red child, this is your home, as they say in your country."

"For a moment," she said, "we swerve from our purpose and neglect our duty. That is the whole treacherous cunning of Paris. But to-morrow we resume our labours until the moment comes for the prison gates to fly open and for the whole fabric of prolific and radiant Spain to crumble to the ground."

She was exquisite in this mood, in her ardour and her strength; in her moments of repose she seemed detached, affected, out of touch with things and rather ridiculous. To think in capitals and to fly to extremes suited her, even though after being swept away by her one had, as a sort of self-punishment, a distinct tendency to look upon her as a character in a Spanish tragi-comedy. Looking at her under the chandelier, wasting herself in extravagant phrases, a well-built woman with a firm, calm body and the sturdy limbs of a well-fed shopkeeper's wife, one hesitated or indeed refused altogether to share her enthusiasm. But she had less charm when she became once more a nice, simple, naturally fresh young woman. She reminded me alternately of an eagle and a hen. In any case, she was a graceful figure, not particularly gifted and with nothing of the femme fatale about her. Affliction had left no mark of bitterness on her soft childish nose or on her full lips; no wrinkles furrowed her low forehead or the eyelids stretched over her wide eyes filled with perpetual but harmless fire.

I went on studying her. She had dispensed with all creeds and had freed herself from human ties and divine pledges; one expected that of her. But when all was said, what one felt most about this rebel girl was her sense of well-being, the integrity of her ideas, her catholic ancestry, mixed with that middle-class Spanish attitude of grateful respect towards the male which is a legacy from the Moors. As we sat round her we were all conscious of these things, but we were all inclined to want to put her beliefs to the test, watching for any sign of weakening, believing that hers was more a sentimental escapade into the world of anarchism than a true vocation.

"Remedios," said one of the guests, as we left the table, "is an idyl of a thoroughly domestic kind. She is a mermaid in the sea of Marxism."

"It would be interesting to see into her future," said Pacifico, who had leanings towards occultism.

Everyone had something to say:

"I think her end will come in days of violence, full of bloodshed in spite of her."

"She will marry a bull-fighter who has retired on his wounds and will keep a hotel in Algeciras."

"She will give lectures in the Argentine or go on the films."

"Has she any literary talent?"

"No, I believe she's quite a good girl."

From this point onwards all seriousness ceased. A friend of Pacifico's childhood, an old gentleman with rouged cheeks who played chess and repaired old lace, offered to tell our fortunes by cards. But we preferred the game which consists in giving each person a list of qualities or defects against which he has to give himself marks ranging from 0 to 20. We were soon pencilling away on our knees. The old gentleman established himself at the piano and played the overture to Les Indes galantes. The autumn wind blew white ash from the fire all over the carpet.

Remedios moistened her pencil with a look of perplexity and asked the difference between sensuality and temperament, maintaining that in Spanish there was only one word for both and that she, for her part, saw no difference between them. Pacifico, in his precise way, got the uncompromising idea of "goodness" changed to "niceness." Someone else pointed out that we had forgotten "snobbishness." Some of them cheated, others, seized with remorse, scratched out their marks, or, after a brief examination of conscience, increased them. Remedios proceeded hesitatingly, indiarubber in hand, full of concentrated sincerity. I asked if one could give oneself more than 20 marks for anything.

There was no sound but that made by the housekeeper clearing the table, the creaking of the furniture and the regular ticking of the clock. When the lists were complete, Pacifico called out each quality or defect and each person in turn, either boldly or sheepishly, called out the number of marks he had given himself for it.

"Man, know thyself," said Pacifico. And so we did, extraordinarily well. The younger ones were, I must admit, sometimes rather wide of the mark, but for those who had reached a certain age there were clearly no illusions left.

We then went on to the second part of the game, which consisted in taking one's neighbour's list and substituting for his marks the marks which we thought he really deserved.

"But you know nothing at all about me," exclaimed Remedios, as I took possession of her moral inventory.

I answered that I could always guess and that in any case I had drunk out of her glass in the dining-car when she was not looking.

Many days have passed since that happy Sunday. But I still possess Remedios's list, carefully drawn up by her and corrected by me. I give here, for what it is worth, this precious document which, beneath its dry figures, seems to me now to be full of admissions:

"If you like, Remedios, we could dine together one evening, without dressing, and go to a cinema."

"I should love to. I hate being alone. I hear mysterious knockings on my shutters every evening and the ghost of a nun appears from the back of my wardrobe every time I open it to get out my nightgown."

"And I'm afraid of dying when I sleep alone."

"Who wrote that?"

"Mallarmé, but it should have been Baudelaire."

"Come and fetch me on Tuesday at seven o'clock at the Hôtel du Mexique in the Rue Servandoni."

I had to wait for Remedios in the palm-filled hall, seated in a blue cane armchair, until the hands of the cuckoo clock pointed to a quarter to nine. Dinner, which was served on linoleum table-cloths with a Persian design, had been cleared away for two hours. The ecclesiastic contingent of the establishment had fondled the cat and read the advertisements in La Croix and the games of piquet were coming to an end. People were beginning to go to bed. At last Remedios came down, glistening with diamonds beneath a cloak of black Liberty silk, through which one caught a glimpse of full evening dress, with the key of her room and her candlestick in her hand. An elaborately cut tortoise-shell comb a foot high towered above her and knocked against the top of the carriage. At the sight of these things I changed my mind about taking her to a café and ran my mind along the Grands Boulevards to try to think of a restaurant in which a cloak like this would be admitted.

In spite of all my precautions, our entry did not pass altogether unnoticed.

"Please get it firmly into your mind that I want nothing but vegetables and a glass of water."

"Remedios, wonderful woman of a wonderful evening, do be serious. Do you like it dry or sweet?"

Between the salt cellar and the pepper-mill she deposited her white gloves twisted together, a velvet bag on which the following motto was worked in diamonds:

REMEDIOS

and a fan made of green feathers.

"I'll have some oysters," she declared resignedly, "if you will ask them to do one up in paper for me to take home to my Chinese gold fish. I should also like the outside slice of the saddle for Trick. You are dining with a woman who was rich this morning and who is penniless to-night. I think I told you in the train—in that spontaneous impulse to talk of oneself which is evoked by sympathy—that by his will Estebán Puig had left me sufficient for my needs. Actually he left me two houses let on lease at Biarritz. In point of fact, rumour attributed a much larger fortune to me. This gave me a great deal of pain. Buying El Debate, the organ of the Jesuits, at a kiosk in the Boulevard Saint-Michel this morning, I realised how much use our enemies were making of this. So I went straight to my lawyer and made him draw up a formal deed of renunciation which I signed there and then and which will be published in to-morrow's Humanité. The whole of Puig's gift will pass to his Socialist Institute. Which explains why I am penniless this evening."

She laughed and stirred her wine with a fork.

"No, there is nothing praiseworthy about this renunciation. It was wrong of me ever to have accepted it. I can never lose the real gifts I received from Puig. He found me, chose me and raised me to his level when I was nothing but a pupil teacher in a suburban school. He made me read, think; until the very day of his death his one desire for me was to make me a companion worthy of him. He was twenty years my senior, tall, with a head like a boulder and the eyes of a basilisk, but the lower part of his face and his hands were calm and full of wisdom. That is how he struck me when he came to my home one evening to ask me if I would take night-school for working-class children. His voice shook and seemed to issue from some secret hiding-place. He told me that he needed me. His face was as white as an altar cloth. I followed him."

The dress she was wearing fitted her closely and was cut low, her bosom swelling above it like an overflowing cup.

"Where did you get your dress?"

"At Worth's," she said, "they called it 'Eastern Night.' It can't be helped. . . . In future I shall copy the dresses in the woman's supplement of the Vanguardia."

She went on speaking:

"Just think. Puig was the soul of the Socialist Institute. It was created by him in 19— on an entirely new basis of teaching, at any rate in Spain, and there (you can imagine how revolutionary it was) he gave a mixed education both in the social and in the sexual sense of the word. In addition he insisted on moral and material cleanliness, teaching truth without either rewards or punishments, and knowledge without religion, making a fair distribution of mental and manual labour. In a word, the system consisted of the admirable scholastic enactments of your Convention, the ideas of Lavoisier put into practice, to quote Puig, as they have never been in France. Reclus and Kropotkin helped. I've got a wonderful correspondence with them in one of my hat boxes. But to create all this was to wage the battle of light against darkness and this cannot be done with impunity. Puig was crushed. In my country one must not take the children away from the priests, who want to make a saint of everyone."

She stopped talking, absorbed in her pocket mirror.

"How dark my complexion is! I wonder why?"

"A woman's complexion, Remedios, is her conscience."

"I am upsetting myself too much. Please forgive me, but I must keep on reminding myself of these things. Even though the head-waiter is listening to us with such horror, you must hear the exordium of Puig's funeral oration as it was delivered over his grave by Portet. It went like this: 'The reputed son of one of those innumerable gods created by man is condemned to death because he wished to be proclaimed king. He is about to die. Born, as are all gods, of ignorance and fear, he falters when face to face with death, loses confidence and cries tremulously: "Father, why hast thou forsaken me?"' On the other hand, look at Puig, the son of free thought and of morality without sanctions; he also is about to die. Does he flinch? Does he lose his freedom of thought? No! He stands proudly erect to the end, crying as he falls: "Long live the International!"' "

Remedios' eyes are black or grey or blue. How can one tell? All eyes are of all colours. My feeling of happiness suddenly dissolves. With hands as clumsy as wooden splints I take her hand. On her wrist she is wearing a bracelet of graduated sapphires. I feel I want to leave the place, but everything seems to have taken root. It is all a dream. My heart aches as though someone were extracting teeth from it.

"Remedios!"

"Por favor?"

"As a favour, let me love you."

I had not chosen my moment well, but the night before I had decided to.

make this declaration to her. She attracted me immeasurably, and her attraction seemed to increase daily.

"You would be making a great mistake if you did," she replied, shrugging her shoulders in little quick movements which had the effect of entirely obliterating her already short neck.

"It is principally to avoid it that I say it, dear remedy."

This talk of love gave the coffee back its taste and restored that equipoise which procures for us the sympathy of tradesmen and the collaboration of Fate.

"The fact is that when I am not violent and weak and overcome by the withering emotion of love, as I am this evening, my wickedness, Remedios, knows no bounds."

"Yes, I've noticed that," she replied, "and to be quite frank, for my part, I am quite certain that I shall never love anyone again. That side of my life is finished. Physical love is nothing but a magnificent debauch which time can, if necessary, replace. But when the bonds that bind two hearts are once broken, it is different."

She quoted some grossly sentimental Andalusian proverb which I have forgotten and which suddenly diminished her beauty.

After a moment's silence she went on:

"I'm going to make my living by giving Spanish lessons."

"May I be one of your pupils?"

"My first and my favourite one."

The revolving door of the restaurant turned its pink silk paddle-boards in the concave water of its glass sides. The tables were emptying. Women were going downstairs in their brightly lined cloaks like statues in coloured alcoves; men were looking excitedly for their companions or their hats.

Remedios exuded a fragrance in the close room like warmed wine. The last diners also exuded an atmosphere of delightful well-being. The wine-waiter became god-like. A lady who was drinking with one finger in the air remarked as she finished:

"Yes, it's very good, it leaves a slight taste in the mouth."

The radiators were cooling with a sound of cracking joints.

Remedios pushed aside her plate and her glass, took her lip-salve from her bag and drew a jota on the table cloth.

"First steps. The alphabet is A B C D E F G H I J . . . and that's the jota. No, it isn't a dance, it's the first difficulty that besets you when you cross the Pyrenees."

For a moment I tried to pronounce it.

"Your progress surprises me," said Remedios, flatteringly. "Now let's choose a phrase in which the r's and j's are well distributed,

"El pajarito de la caja roja."

"What does that purring sound mean, Remedios?"

"It means: 'The little bird in the red cage.'"

"But, Remedios, that's you!"

It was late. We rose. The restaurant was empty. I loved her for life. While she went to the cloak-room I returned to our little table and furtively licked her spoon.

I had patiently accustomed my tongue to rolling r's on my teeth from which I threw them back with a sudden movement on to the glottis in the pronunciation of a not too imperfect jota. On my way to the Rue Servandoni I set myself the task of repeating a hundred times the phrase which Remedios had taught me two days before.

At the hotel I found a note waiting for me. Remedios had left France the day before by the Barcelona express. The red cage was empty. All that was left was this revolting hall decorated with lizard skins, with coloured glass and with the cat which was devouring a sort of brain pudding out of an imitation Rouen plate. The autumn day was dying peacefully away under the canopy of an orange-coloured storm, and was being momentarily prolonged by the coat which painters, singing at their work, were putting on the house-fronts.

Crushed beneath the habits of two long days and suddenly crystallised into a fidelity that was new to me, I stood in the Luxembourg like a monolith. I had keyed myself up to meet Remedios again, to beset her with childish excitements as one does to stop hiccoughs, to put a thousand questions of grammar to her, to create quaint fancies for her, without ever revealing to her my purpose, which was to keep her thoughts on myself, to persuade her that all the refinements of Paris, the atmosphere of the Seine, the genius of the Saint-Michel fountain from which the water overflows like a bath in which one has fallen asleep with the tap on, the statement of the programme girl offering you a programme: "It cost me a franc," the charm of private rooms in restaurants, the broad outlook of the big Stores where the remnants unroll in little waves beneath the arc lamps of the central hall like dazzling orchids, were all nothing but different forms of love, a love in which the cafés also played their part when the hour of a quarter to eight brought its delicious relaxation with it.

By this unpremeditated departure I saw her, on the contrary, freed, in more peaceful possession of herself even than before, and gone from me for ever. It was still daylight and the only stars were those of the trams, when I began to realise how complete was my subjection and how sudden an end had been put to my happiness, and that this state of affairs continued even after sunset. Why this sudden departure, leaving no trace? Was not Spain barred to her? Or had she perhaps concealed the truth from me and set out for Italy and a mad round of excitements, or for America from a desire either for self-effacement or for notoriety?

It was indeed towards Spain that she had gone, for on the following day I received a postcard from the frontier. On it were depicted the docks of Port-Vendres with a row of large casks and a view of the town-hall above which rose a fort. On the back of the card were these words: "The decree of Fate," the proud Spanish brevity of which was spoilt by the fact that the handwriting was that of a servant girl and by the ending: A greeting from Port-Vendres. I hoped that Remedios had been unable to cross the frontier. But a few days later Pacifico told me that she had reached Barcelona.

Paris was flooded by an enervating November rain in which houses were reflected right up to the roof in the asphalt. The spray round the street lamps turned into a sort of pink dust. Along the soaking pavements the stunted trees bore the full brunt of the wind. At night-time a rush of waters beneath the roads came from the sewer outfalls. The need I felt for Remedios did not cease, nor did it even diminish. Our first meetings seemed now to have been specially arranged by destiny to ensure that at any rate our two lives should not remain apart for ever. I went over in my mind all the circumstances of our acquaintance. In the beginning I had loved her voice, coarsened by public meetings, her short hands, shorter still in their mittens, her murderer's thumb, her adventures in which lethargy always seemed to play a part, her escapade into anarchy; then I had come to love the narrow limits of her ideas, the chronicle of her sufferings, her goodness and also the perpetual amusement afforded by her love of pleasure, her natural sense of duty and the rebelliousness which made her swerve continually from the path of her destiny. I conjured her up again, irresponsible, romantic and always smiling. Was it possible that our meeting was merely one of those incidents which, judging from their results, Remedios accused of uniting against her peace of mind, declaring them at the same time to be inevitable? Everything began to hold evil omens; the shape of the clouds and of coffee-grounds began to be unfavourable. The loneliness of the evenings, and even of the mornings which were too brilliant for me to submit to Fate and to live sensibly, urged me to follow her. The newspapers announced grave reactionary measures in Catalonia. I could not bear the thought that, all because of me, Remedios was perhaps hurtling headlong towards disaster, and I in my turn took the evening express.

I was in a circus with an arena of sand, an unbroken beach in which the forces of sunlight and shadow held equal sway. Above was a circus of blue sky across which the fierce sun moved without encountering the outspread cape of a single cloud. A dense crowd was suspended midway between these two empty circuses, like a frame of dark wood dividing two mirrors which reflect each other. The countless pale smudges of the closely packed faces quivered in the heat-haze which made individual sounds vibrate and unite into a single harmony. Could one of these smudges, one of these sounds, be Remedios? It was the Fiesta de la Prensa and on the glaring posters we were promised eight Sottomayor bulls. In the space of an hour the town had emptied itself into this Moorish basin. I carefully scanned the tiers, stripping them like a corn-cob. I rid the circus of everything that was not a brilliant, eloquent mouth, a shapely body moulding a silk dress and two eyes as open as a book. Were you there, Remedios, you precious thing, you indispensable object? Perhaps, but not recognisable, because you were no longer that preposterous and provoking figure, that tongue of flame which one would have picked out instantly from a grey Parisian crowd; here you were merely one of these thousand glimmering lights, one of these bodies satiated with siestas, bloated with sweetmeats, dominated by religion and superstition, a Spanish woman.

One saw the civil guard in their top boots, the military band in their canvas shoes. In his box the president was holding forth to some women who looked like fondants. He cast his gestures to the crowd like handfuls of coppers. Piercing whistles rose up and gradually died down again. Then the president rose. So violently did he wave his handkerchief that it started the brazen notes of a trumpet into life. The trumpet in turn set in motion the gate of the toril, revealing a dark passage at the end of which was a glimmer of blue sky.

The bull came out into the light. Bewildered, he stopped at the edge of the shaded portion of the arena. His coat was dirty, his flanks were mottled. His horns were covered with plaster from the walls. He was alone, the single point on which the two halves of the ring were strained like bows. He was attracted by a horse kicking against the barrier. He trotted towards it. It was a decrepit old grey screw. Its stomach was patched like a poor man's coat and its legs tottered beneath the weight of the upholstered picador flourishing his lance. The bull halted for a moment and bellowed; then, attracted by the dull gleam of the steel that menaced him, he charged, his muzzle close to the ground. The lance entered between his shoulders, bent like a rapier and broke. A thrust from his hindquarters and his horns penetrated the horse's stomach with a squelching sound. The horse appeared to jump; it remained suspended in the air, its legs apart, while the bull, blinded with blood, gored its stomach. Then the horse crashed down like an old wall, smothering its rider, hampered by his horsehair armour. The picador's head emerged from a jumble of harness and entrails. His hat with its gaudy rosettes had fallen off, revealing a fat face like that of a terrified monk, glistening with sweat. The horse scrambled up and staggered off, shedding its bowels round the arena. Other horses were lying beside the barrier; the absence of saddles accentuated the prominence of their bones. Their yellow teeth were bared.

Remedios? Not one of those fans was cooling that beloved neck into which, in Paris, her veil used to dig so deep a furrow. No eyebrow was plastered down as much as hers, which she used to smooth with a little brush meant for glazing pastry. None of the women round me possessed that husky voice which enthralled me so. Remedios was not here. Remedios couldn't bear the sight of blood.

The bull now became the sport of men dressed in silver, arranged in a row like chessmen. One after the other they spread their wings, set flight and settled before the crimson horns. One swathed his hips in his cape, his foolish pink stockings emerging from below the skirt thus formed. Another held up a bright cape spotted with dried blood stains. He dragged this cape along the ground like a net and then spread it out like a curtain. The curtain parted and behold! A man had flashed across the sun, leaving in the bull two pairs of banderillas decorated with tin foil, like silver flowers from the roots of which the blood bubbled, already turning black.

The bull was getting slow. He was now the property of the man dressed in gold. From the crowd there gradually rose a low rumbling growl which the first clever pass would break into a thousand separate sounds. The killer was a small man. His hair was like the patent leather of his pumps. The bull rent the red cloth and the man's silk sleeves. He grew weary, his head drooped lower and lower towards the earth on which he slowly slobbered. The man retired three paces, wiped the sweat from his blue and yellow face and threw off his hat with a theatrical toss of the head; he was bald. He rose up on tiptoe like a tenor. A sudden momentary effort and a backward leap; he waited, hands on hips; a smile wrinkled his thin cheeks. He signed to the crowd to keep quiet for a moment. The bull receded obliquely, his muzzle in the sand; his legs bent; he fell on his knees. His feet stiffened and his head fell backwards.

The president awarded the ear.

Nothing remained in the empty arena but a trampled place with a jumble of footprints and hoof-marks round a dark stain.

Was it the aniseed-scented afternoon, my lack of love, or this harrowing butchery that made me feel so sick?

My search lasted two days. In the end I got Remedios's telephone number from the Socialist Institute. Her voice! She made an appointment to meet me at seven o'clock next morning on the outskirts of the town.

I tried to sleep, without success. My window looked out over a flat boulevard bedecked with palm trees. Children played there until two in the morning, digging with their spades in the electrically lit sand beneath the street lamps, enjoying themselves in the middle of the night of which other European children only know the borders. Electric signs flickered. A soap advertisement traced its crimson path across a house-front and went out, only to reappear an instant later to greet one in blue and then in green, just as theatrical stars take each call before the curtain wearing a different shawl. Above this domestic conflagration the fortress of Montjuich pursued its relentless vigil from the top of its rock, swept four times every minute by the lighthouse.

When three o'clock struck, the square was empty. The trente et quarante rooms still glowed on the first floors of the houses. Some of the players came out on the balconies while the cards were being shuffled and leaned their elbows on the plush-covered rails. In the streets below the cabmen were also playing cards in their carriages. With the first signs of dawn above the horizon, even the hairdressers, in whose shops the customers had been suffering a kind of cosmetic trepanning, covered up their hot water apparatus, and the town entered on a brief period of rest.

A little later a taxi came to take me to the Parque de Vich where Remedios had asked me to meet her. In the Plaza de Colón the confraternity of beggars was sleeping, each member stretched out on two iron chairs. There were about a hundred of them, their faces black, their feet wrapped in evening papers, under the pachydermatous palm trees, scratching themselves even in their dreams. Amongst them a gentleman in a dinner jacket, with a flower in his buttonhole, having decided against going home, was snoring with his mouth open.

The carriage passed through the Argüelles district, the quarter inhabited by rich cotton-brokers. To tell the truth I was not sure that I was yet awake. It was an endless series of villas twisted like marshmallow stalks, lit by windows which resembled chain-armour, railed off by metallic seaweed and zinc creepers painted green or pale pink. Under corrugated iron roofs sagged indiarubber houses, pierced by gaping doors through which the road seemed to continue, rising in a gentle slope to the roofs. At their sides the porters' lodges bulged like tumours, and chimneys rose like vines swollen with varicocele at the tops of walls where rabbit-fishes were fighting in thickets of wrought-iron irises. Then, the imagination of the architects having apparently come to an end, the avenues no longer existed except in their name plates, hidden amongst the featureless country. Here and there between the market gardens a private house still thrust up its silhouette of a mounted gun, with its burnt almond stucco, bristling with burr-stones, looking like unappetising praliné cakes. At last the carriage came to a halt before a tiled terrace decorated with china fruits on the top of twelve staggering cromlechs. This platform must also have served as a roof, for pierced japanned pipes, reminding one of pepper pots, sprouted from it like trees. I dived into the path which wriggled like a severed worm and I reached, in spirals, the chequered summer house where Remedios was waiting for me, smiling among the aloes. She looked as though she had nothing on beneath her lilac dust coat from Valentin's, the rubber king. The sky was reflected in her oiled hair. She turned her great eyes to me and pursing up her lips in that barren kiss which is called a pout, she said:

"Well, simpático, are you satisfied?"

"It's like a dream, I adore you so."

She patted my shoulder and then my back with her hand, showing her delight at seeing me in the Spanish fashion, in one of those embraces which one still sees in classic comedy at the Théâtre Français.

"How can I ever tell you," she said, "the sacrifice I am making in giving up my resistance? You have come at a terrible moment, when I ought to see no one, but providence . . . This is the Parque de Vich, given to the town by a Catalan who made his fortune in Chili. A mixture of Bagatelle and Luna Park. You must admit that it is idyllic with its banks, its powdered glass designs; in the evening a steam orchestra plays in the grotto. I am happy here; as in the well-known tango: 'I wish I were a bee, to die among the flowers.'

"Instead of that one must always be fighting. Oh, yes, I don't mind admitting to you that I wasn't made for this sort of thing. I am the secretary of the Party and honorary president with Anatole France of a League of Freedom, in addition to being traveller, lecturer and propagandist. But what I really love, you know, is to be able to lunch in my dressing-gown, to have a maid and keep birds, to have the hair-dresser in every day, to sleep in the shelter of two strong arms, to drink my chocolate in bed, to go to the cinema at the cocktail hour, the función-vermouth as we call it, to dine with my sisters among my nephews and nieces and to find a bowl of roses at my bedside when I go home. I have never admitted this to anyone else; take it with you as a secret to the grave. You must go now. I can't be sure I haven't been followed, even though I came straight here after getting up. Take the train back to France this evening."

"I came here to see you."

She became insistent.

"There's going to be a general strike in Barcelona at any moment, perhaps even to-morrow. All foreigners will be suspect; people will be ruthlessly shot. I can't say more than that."

"My only desire, Remedios, is to love you, and my only mistake is to want to seduce you. If I am plunged into danger with you it won't be from imprudence or gallantry or jocularly on my part, but because the need of being near you keeps me here."

Having said this, I took her into my arms.

She deposited face-powder and dried cosmetic on my clothes, grew sentimental and put on her spectacles.

From the summit of this calvary of ours with its border of fantastic shrubbery, amongst which beds of heliotrope were laid out in the form of the insignia of the Order of Alfonso XII, between the embrasures adorned with breast plates, the town appeared in the tense atmosphere, fined down like a model in an architectural exhibition. A thick haze hung over the sea and joined it to the sky. The funicular railway began to move; a dynamo purred somewhere.

"You see the awakening of Barcelona," said Remedios, "with her luxurious houses, her peaceful tramways, her civic amenities, all eloquent of her industry; but you have not seen her in her hours of bloodshed, with her torn-down shutters, her twisted and broken pipes, and just beneath my window, caressed by the sun, a single blot—the body of a little girl killed as she was leaving school, sprawling on the ground, her head covered with flies.” When she was carried away by her subject little silver bubbles blew from her mouth and floated for a moment in the sunlight.

“Yes, mono. Less than a year ago it began with a meeting of protest against the despatch of reservists to Morocco, that cancer which gnaws at the vitals of Spain. Opposite the station over there on the right, from which smoke is rising as from a cauldron, a watch was kept from the sinister windows of the Capitanía General. The rails had been torn up to prevent the arrival of reinforcements from Valencia and Madrid. It was a Wednesday. Paving stones were being taken up and trees felled. At mid-day the sack of the convents began. The first one was that of San Martin de Provencals, if I remember rightly. Puig, who had gone out at dawn, had not returned. At midnight I ventured out. The populace was converging towards the centre of the town, after rifling the armouries. I found out that Puig was remaining permanently at the People’s House.

“The churches of Maristes, San Antonio, San Pablo, the convents and the parish churches were burning one by one. Forty-nine churches were roasted in this way. Machine-guns swept the city from the top of the Columbus column. The infantry refused to fire. The Jesuits of Sarriá, that barrack-like building over there by the gasometer, defended themselves with rifles. At length the batteries of Montjuich trained their guns on the revolutionary party. From my room I heard muffled reports, the explosion of hidden syndicalist or clerical bomb stores. Then the reinforcements arrived. General Santiago had terrifying proclamations put up. There was a stampede and the ringleaders made for the Pyrenees. At last the detonations died down and ceased altogether. . . . Barcelona became once more as you see it there, a city of wealth and vice, the town of child prostitution, obscene photographs and ‘fancy goods,’ preserving the spirit of the Inquisition behind a screen of electric signs, with its fortified convents and banks, its patchwork houses with their strong-rooms and their cellars protected by bars, of which those which keep the poor from the confessionals are but gilded replicas. In the meantime Puig had been arrested and imprisoned up there.

“They had got him. They had at last laid their hands on this dangerous anarchist. No civil lawyer was allowed to cross the threshold of his cell. And yet you remember the indignation of Europe and the way in which every lover of justice had his eyes focussed on that dungeon, in which the greatest heart in the world was waiting without faltering for a single moment. Socrates, Christ, the Chevalier du Barreau, Bismarck, Ravachol, all the great adventurers into the realm of thought, have met their death like that. As for me, I never saw him again alive. Puig wrote to me every day, I know, but I never got his letters. I was myself placed secretly in a cabin of the Pelayo, that old cruiser which sleeps its crocodile sleep in the harbour basin, ready at any moment to serve as a gaol.

"Look, they are decking it with flags. To-day triumphal arches of silver paper will be erected all over the town. This evening there will be a candle in every window, for the King is coming to-morrow to review the troops who are going to Tetuan. Everything is beginning all over again, and will go on until the time when . . ."

An appetising domestic smell of chocolate rose in the morning air.

Remedios sucked her pendant with a far-away look. Then she went on speaking, as though in a dream:

"Puig was put into the chapel at six o'clock in the evening. All night long he remained awake, refusing to kneel, standing between two brothers of Charity. . . . He died shot in the back. For another whole day he remained on view in his black deal coffin, his head swathed in bandages, his face bloodless, and a wound in his throat plugged with lime."

Suddenly she threw her arms round my neck:

"What a little ragamuffin I am, aren't I?"

I went to the window to open it, but Remedios threw herself on the curtain and pulled it right across.

"Is that because of the man who is patrolling up and down outside?" I asked.

For some time I had noticed that a very tall man with a stoop and a complexion like fine porcelain framed in a beard was watching us.

"Yes, that is José Salt."

"Police?"

"No."

"Jealous?"

"It's rather sad. Salt was formerly professor of history at the Institute. He was one of Puig's most ardent supporters and served him with intelligence, delight and vanity. I in my turn took a class, as you know, and became Puig's companion. Salt fell in love with me and lost his peace of mind. He spied on us, followed us about, plagued us with anonymous letters, probably denounced us to the police, in short became such a nuisance that Puig, in spite of his gentleness and self-control, quarrelled with him, with the result that Salt had to leave the Institute. He was in the Argentine when the trouble occurred. I found him here on my return, avoiding me, dedicating poetry to me. He is lecturing again—the preachings of a visionary which no one listens to—passes his nights in churches and takes cocaine. Yesterday he came up to me in the street and asked me to live with him; when I tried to move away he swore that to-morrow he would put a bomb inside a bouquet of the flowers I like best and throw it from a window into the King's carriage on his return from the review."

"That is the sort of romantic venture that makes anarchy intolerable. Anarchy should above all be an exact science. But Spaniards have lost all sense of the fitness of things since they have given up the study of theology."

"It is quite true, amor simpático. You talk like a bird."

I suddenly heard my neck crack; against my lips I found teeth which were not my own. A heat greater than that of the mid-day sun pervaded me. I couldn't breathe; close to my eyes I saw a single shining eye which gazed at me, gave me a feeling of intense discomfort, and went out.

"What has suddenly changed me like this?" asked Remedios after the kiss. "I can assure you it isn't a passing fancy on my part—that's what you say, what you do in Paris, isn't it? No. I've no desire for pleasure left. But you were so unhappy that I couldn't resist you. That is my weak spot."

"In the first place, I am that sad brute . . ."

"Yes, I felt that about you when we first dined together, and you let me ask the gipsy band to play the music of Lakmé. I remember: 'It is that God is deserting us.' Just at that moment someone was cracking lobster claws. I felt it was my heart that was being crushed. You see, something goes on throbbing beneath all this. In France your votive offerings take the shape of election cards, academic palms and dentists' diplomas. In Spain, round the statue of the Virgin hang hearts, bunches of hearts . . ."

"Yes, and diseased eyes, tumours and, especially at Toledo, sexual organs, all modelled in wax."

"In any case, why should I invoke the Fates when we are together again? We have been separated for so long . . ."

"And you've got thinner," I continued flatteringly.

"Then you will love me always?"

"Of course."

"I should like you to be a cat," said Remedios, playing with my watch-chain. "You would never leave me then. In the daytime you would be put into a little basket and in the evening I would take you out and you would become a man again."

Her satin blouse was covered with big foolish dots and had a sailor collar with a white crêpe-de-chine scarf. I felt I wanted to bite her little feet to stop them swinging to and fro. What numberless seated ancestors she must have had to be what she was! Except for the flies we were alone in the tea shop. Half a Dutch cheese, like a severed breast, shared its glass cover with a raw ham which smelled of tallow and was turning black.

"When are we going on with our lessons? The irregular verbs?"

Remedios studied the lines round my eyes. I no longer saw anything but her round powdered nose protruding from her plump face.

"I think you are hypersensitive," she explained, "and capable of very deep affection. You ought to get to know me better. Personally I am hyperneurotic."

All the same I opened the window, so that she could call for help if I tried to kill her.

"You cannot often have been accused of coldness of heart," she said. "And yet you are not very demonstrative."

Her body was too long and from it she emitted a sigh which filled the whole room.

Beyond the pavement lay an imitation wharf. Barcelona was a monstrous town. All the women who went past seemed to have thick eyelashes and large thighs; they were followed by thin Jesuits who went along in threes, holding each other's little fingers. In the background there was the inevitable Montjuich, a sheer rock with palms growing out of its crevices like hairs and dotted with little houses clinging on like limpets. The view from the other window consisted of a woman selling dyed feathers and, in the distance, the modern cathedral of Soller, with its four reinforced concrete towers and its merry-go-round organ. Remedios was dwindling. She was becoming just an ordinary companion. That display of authority by which she asserted herself in Switzerland and France had gone. Her own country seemed to tone her down. Was that the reason she no longer wanted to have one? She used to be the personification of glory and love. But now she had become comfortable, cheerful and docile; a kind of domestic utensil. She had eyes for no one but me and her looks seemed to say: "After all one must live, so why not enjoy one's life?" She forgot the dead in the living, and used her old expression, "My sacrifice," to excuse herself. She really believed it, too; and not altogether without reason. I was only annoyed that I could not be grateful to her for it. Or was it her spotted blouse and the white crêpe-de-chine scarf that irritated me? How she used to attract me in Paris in her mourning! (There was, for instance, the silver veil she kept for interviews.) She climbed up the Rue Saint-Jacques as though it were a Calvary. What a crowd of idlers were always after her! I thought, as one always does, that I had found something quite extraordinary. To-day, without hypocrisy to myself, just as without any irony towards her . . .

"Let's take the funicular up to the Tibidabo this evening," she said. "I'll bring Trick and we can dine à la carte. The view stretches as far as the Palma lighthouse. I will rest my head softly on your shoulder and we will be wafted to the country of conventional dreams, in which heroism does not exist. I will bring a nightdress."

Her jet-black earrings trembled submissively.

I had room number 217. It was a new room and smelled of size. A black-beetle crawled leisurely across the carpet. Someone had left an ace of clubs in one of the drawers. I ordered dinner for two. At that moment there was an explosion in the distance. The electric light went out and I lit three candles.

I opened the window. It looked out over a courtyard from which rose the smell of bisque d'écrevisse and soapsuds. I counted the flowers on the counterpane, polished the tarnished bottles of my dressing-case on the curtains and put my slippers away. Lastly, I placed some flowers in a waterless vase as they do on the stage.

Remedios wanted me to be a cat in a little basket. She had promised to give me a cigarette-case with an enamelled cover representing a naked blonde on the sea-shore. For some obscure reason she had the bust of Estebán Puig with its gouged-out eyes brought to my hotel, wrapped in oil-cloth. I had put it under my bed. What was I to do? One must either live alone or take people as one finds them. Why do the Spanish newspapers devote the whole of their front pages to obituary notices? There is something so sinister in their daily lament.

I made new resolutions. I must be more ardent. I must be more carried away, more emotional. Perhaps I should exhibit chronic enthusiasm. How exquisite, how radiant Remedios was!

Tired of waiting for her, I dined alone. Every twenty minutes the funicular announced its arrival by a jar which made the mountain shake, followed by a noise of rushing water. Then my anxiety redoubled. I strained my ears. But Remedios was still not in that one. I dared not try to explain her lateness to myself or to think of what would happen if she did not come at all, out of fear of arousing hostile forces which would prevent her from reaching me. I wanted Remedios with all my heart and I longed to see her safe with me between these four smooth, sanatorium-like walls. I forgot that on that very morning I would have given anything to be back in Paris.

Gradually I compelled myself to believe that Remedios would certainly not come, but that I should pass just as good a night stretched diagonally or right across the bed.

The hotel was 800 metres above the sea-level. The sound of country life had not yet begun there and the hum of the town was too far away to reach me. Either would have lulled me into a sleep which was denied me and there was nothing left for me to do but to wait.

I lay down fully dressed. Towards two in the morning my neighbours, who had been carrying on an excited conversation for hours without a stop, sent for a steak and a bottle of manzanilla. Then a child began to cry, heralding the dawn. Another child answered it.

I had left the door ajar and I trembled at every sound. A hundred times I dozed for a moment. The telephone bell kept ringing in the corridor, but the floor waiter, dozing beneath a red lamp, paid no attention to it. The panels of the imported English furniture kept cracking all through the night. Every time I started up I saw the other pillow lying there swollen and cold and the infinitely big room, lit only by the moon which an obliging mirror deflected on to the dusty water of a fire bucket.

Then, suddenly, I sank into sleep.

It was not until the following morning that I heard of the outrage committed by Remedios and of her arrest.

SILENT SNOW, SECRET SNOW

Conrad Aiken

(1889- )

JUST WHY it should have happened, or why it should have happened just when it did, he could not, of course, possibly have said; nor perhaps could it even have occurred to him to ask. The thing was above all a secret, something to be preciousely concealed from Mother and Father; and to that very fact it owed an enormous part of its deliciousness. It was like a peculiarly beautiful trinket to be carried unmentioned in one's trouser-pocket—a rare stamp, an old coin, a few tiny gold links found trodden out of shape on the path in the park, a pebble of carnelian, a sea shell distinguishable from all others by an unusual spot or stripe—and, as if it were anyone of these, he carried around with him everywhere a warm and persistent and increasingly beautiful sense of possession. Nor was it only a sense of possession—it was also a sense of protection. It was as if, in some delightful way, his secret gave him a fortress, a wall behind which he could retreat into heavenly seclusion. This was almost the first thing he had noticed about it—apart from the oddness of the thing itself—and it was this that now again, for the fiftieth time, occurred to him, as he sat in the little schoolroom. It was the half hour for geography. Miss Buell was revolving with one finger, slowly, a huge terrestrial globe which had been placed on her desk. The green and yellow continents passed and repassed, questions were asked and answered, and now the little girl in front of him, Deirdre, who had a funny little constellation of freckles on the back of her neck, exactly like the Big Dipper, was standing up and telling Miss Buell that the equator was the line that ran round the middle.

Miss Buell's face, which was old and grayish and kindly, with gray stiff curls beside the cheeks, and eyes that swam very brightly, like little minnows, behind thick glasses, wrinkled itself into a complication of amusements.

"Ah! I see. The earth is wearing a belt, or a sash. Or someone drew a line round it!"

"Oh, no—not that—I mean—"

In the general laughter, he did not share, or only a very little. He was thinking about the Arctic and Antarctic regions, which of course, on the globe, were white. Miss Buell was now telling them about the tropics, the jungles, the steamy heat of equatorial swamps, where the birds and butterflies, and even the snakes, were like living jewels. As he listened to these things, he was already, with a pleasant sense of half-effort, putting his secret between himself and the words. Was it really an effort at all? For effort implied something voluntary, and perhaps even something one did not especially want; whereas this was distinctly pleasant, and came almost of its own accord. All he needed to do was to think of that morning, the first one, and then of all the others—

But it was all so absurdly simple! It had amounted to so little. It was nothing, just an idea—and just why it should have become so wonderful, so permanent, was a mystery—a very pleasant one, to be sure, but also, in an amusing way, foolish. However, without ceasing to listen to Miss Buell, who had now moved up to the north temperate zones, he deliberately invited his memory of the first morning. It was only a moment or two after he had waked up—or perhaps the moment itself. But was there, to be exact, an exact moment? Was one awake all at once? or was it gradual? Anyway, it was after he had stretched a lazy hand up towards the headrail, and yawned, and then relaxed again among his warm covers, all the more grateful on a December morning, that the thing had happened. Suddenly, for no reason, he had thought of the postman, he remembered the postman. Perhaps there was nothing so odd in that. After all, he heard the postman almost every morning in his life—his heavy boots could be heard clumping round the corner at the top of the little cobbled hill-street, and then, progressively nearer, progressively louder, the double knock at each door, the crossings and re-crossings of the street, till finally the clumsy steps came stumbling across to the very door, and the tremendous knock came which shook the house itself.

(Miss Buell was saying "Vast wheat-growing areas in North America and Siberia.")

Deirdre had for the moment placed her left hand across the back of her neck.)

But on this particular morning, the first morning, as he lay there with his eyes closed, he had for some reason waited for the postman. He wanted to hear him come round the corner. And that was precisely the joke—he never did. He never came. He never had come—round the corner—again. For when at last the steps were heard, they had already, he was quite sure, come a little down the hill, to the first house; and even so, the steps were curiously different—they were softer, they had a new secrecy about them, they were muffled and indistinct; and while the rhythm of them was the same, it now said a new thing—it said peace, it said remoteness, it said cold, it said sleep. And he had understood the situation at once—nothing could have seemed simpler—there had been snow in the night, such as all winter he had been longing for; and it was this which had rendered the postman's first footsteps inaudible, and the later ones faint. Of course! How lovely! And even now it must be snowing—it was going to be a snowy day—the long white ragged lines were drifting and sifting across the street, across the faces of the old houses, whispering and hushing, making little triangles of white in the corners between cobblestones, seething a little when the wind blew them over the ground to a drifted corner; and so it would be all day, getting deeper and deeper and silenter and silenter.

(Miss Buell was saying "Land of perpetual snow.")

All this time, of course (while he lay in bed), he had kept his eyes closed, listening to the nearer progress of the postman, the muffled footsteps thumping and slipping on the snow-sheathed cobbles; and all the other sounds—the double knocks, a frosty far-off voice or two, a bell ringing thinly and softly as if under a sheet of ice—had the same slightly abstracted quality, as if removed by one degree from actuality—as if everything in the world had been insulated by snow. But when at last, pleased, he opened his eyes, and turned them towards the window, to see for himself this long-desired and now so clearly imagined miracle—what he saw instead was brilliant sunlight on a roof; and when, astonished, he jumped out of bed and stared down into the street, expecting to see the cobbles obliterated by the snow, he saw nothing but the bare bright cobbles themselves.

Queer, the effect this extraordinary surprise had had upon him—all the following morning he had kept with him a sense as of snow falling about him, a secret screen of new snow between himself and the world. If he had not dreamed such a thing—and how could he have dreamed it while awake?—how else could one explain it? In any case, the delusion had been so vivid as to affect his entire behavior. He could not now remember whether it was on the first or the second morning—or was it even the third?—that his mother had drawn attention to some oddness in his manner.

"But my darling—" she had said at the breakfast table—"what has come over you? You don't seem to be listening. . . ."

And how often that very thing had happened since!

(Miss Buell was now asking if anyone knew the difference between the North Pole and the Magnetic Pole. Deirdre was holding up her flickering brown hand, and he could see the four white dimples that marked the knuckles.)

Perhaps it hadn't been either the second or third morning—or even the fourth or fifth. How could he be sure? How could he be sure just when the delicious progress had become clear? Just when it had really begun? The intervals weren't very precise. . . . All he now knew was, that at some point or other—perhaps the second day, perhaps the sixth—he had noticed that the presence of the snow was a little more insistent, the sound of it clearer; and, conversely, the sound of the postman's footsteps more indistinct. Not only could he not hear the steps come round the corner, he could not even hear them at the first house. It was below the first house that he heard them; and then, a few days later, it was below the second house that he heard them; and a few days later again, below the third. Gradually, gradually, the snow was becoming heavier, the sound of its seething louder, the cobblestones more and more muffled. When he found, each morning, on going to the window, after the ritual of listening, that the roofs and cobbles were as bare as ever, it made no difference. This was, after all, only what he had expected. It was even what pleased him, what rewarded him: the thing was his own, belonged to no one else. No one else knew about it, not even his mother and father. There, outside, were the bare cobbles; and here, inside, was the snow. Snow growing heavier each day, muffling the world, hiding the ugly, and deadening increasingly—above all—the steps of the postman.

"But my darling—" she had said at the luncheon table—"what has come over you? You don't seem to listen when people speak to you. That's the third time I've asked you to pass your plate. . . ."

How was one to explain this to Mother? or to Father? There was, of course, nothing to be done about it: nothing. All one could do was to laugh embarrassedly, pretend to be a little ashamed, apologize, and take a sudden and somewhat disingenuous interest in what was being done or said. The cat had stayed out all night. He had a curious swelling on his left cheek—perhaps somebody had kicked him, or a stone had struck him. Mrs. Kempton was or was not coming to tea. The house was going to be house cleaned, or "turned out," on Wednesday instead of Friday. A new lamp was provided for his evening work—perhaps it was eye-strain which accounted for this new and so peculiar vagueness of his—Mother was looking at him with amusement as she said this, but with something else as well. A new lamp? A new lamp. Yes Mother, No Mother, Yes Mother. School is going very well. The geometry is very easy. The history is very dull. The geography is very interesting—particularly when it takes one to the North Pole. Why the North Pole? Oh, well, it would be fun to be an explorer. Another Peary or Scott or Shackleton. And then abruptly he found his interest in the talk at an end, stared at the pudding on his plate, listened, waited, and began once more—ah how heavenly, too, the first beginnings—to hear or feel—for could he actually hear it?—the silent snow, the secret snow.

This had been, indeed, the only distressing feature of the new experience: the fact that it so increasingly had brought him into a kind of mute misunderstanding, or even conflict, with his father and mother. It was as if he were trying to lead a double life. On the one hand he had to be Paul Hasleman, and keep up the appearance of being that person—dress, wash, and answer intelligently when spoken to—; on the other, he had to explore this new world which had been opened to him. Nor could there be the slightest doubt—not the slightest—that the new world was the profounder and more wonderful of the two. It was irresistible. It was miraculous. Its beauty was simply beyond anything—beyond speech as beyond thought—utterly incommunicable. But how then, between the two worlds, of which he was thus constantly aware, was he to keep a balance? One must get up, one must go to breakfast, one must talk with Mother, go to school, do one's lessons—and, in all this, try not to appear too much of a fool. But if all the while one was also trying to extract the full deliciousness of another and quite separate existence, one which could not easily (if at all) be spoken of—how was one to manage? How was one to explain? Would it be safe to explain? Would it be absurd? Would it merely mean that he would get into some obscure kind of trouble?

These thoughts came and went, came and went, as softly and secretly as the snow; they were not precisely a disturbance, perhaps they were even a pleasure; he liked to have them; their presence was something almost palpable, something he could stroke with his hand, without closing his eyes, and without ceasing to see Miss Buell and the school-room and the globe and the freckles on Deirdre's neck; nevertheless he did in a sense cease to see, or to see the obvious external world, and substituted for this vision the vision of snow, the sound of snow, and the slow, almost soundless, approach of the postman. Yesterday, it had been only at the sixth house that the postman had become audible; the snow was much deeper now, it was falling more swiftly and heavily, the sound of its seething was more distinct, more soothing, more persistent. And this morning, it had been—as nearly as he could figure—just above the seventh house—perhaps only a step or two above: at most, he had heard two or three footsteps before the knock had sounded. . . . And with each such narrowing of the sphere, each nearer approach of the limit at which the postman was first audible, it was odd how sharply was increased the amount of illusion which had to be carried into the ordinary business of daily life. Each day, it was harder to get out of bed, to go to the window, to look out at the—as always—perfectly empty and snowless street. Each day it was more difficult to go through the perfunctory motions of greeting Mother and Father at breakfast, to reply to their questions, to put his books together and go to school. And at school, how extraordinarily hard to conduct with success simultaneously the public life and the life that was secret. There were times when he longed—positively ached—to tell everyone about it—to burst out with it—only to be checked almost at once by a far-off feeling as of some faint absurdity which was inherent in it—but was it absurd?—and more importantly by a sense of mysterious power in his very secrecy. Yes: it must be kept secret. That, more and more, became clear. At whatever cost to himself, whatever pain to others—

(Miss Buell looked straight at him, smiling, and said, "Perhaps we'll ask Paul. I'm sure Paul will come out of his day-dream long enough to be able to tell us. Won't you, Paul?" He rose slowly from his chair, resting one hand on the brightly varnished desk, and deliberately stared through the snow towards the blackboard. It was an effort, but it was amusing to make it. "Yes," he said slowly, "it was what we now call the Hudson River. This he thought to be the Northwest Passage. He was disappointed." He sat down again, and as he did so Deirdre half turned in her chair and gave him a shy smile, of approval and admiration.)

At whatever pain to others.

This part of it was very puzzling, very puzzling. Mother was very nice, and so was Father. Yes, that was all true enough. He wanted to be nice to them, to tell them everything—and yet, was it really wrong of him to want to have a secret place of his own?

At bedtime, the night before, Mother had said, "If this goes on, my lad, we'll have to see a doctor, we will! We can't have our boy—" But what was it she had said? "Live in another world"? "Live so far away"? The word "far" had been in it, he was sure, and then Mother had taken up a magazine again and laughed a little, but with an expression which wasn't mirthful. He had felt sorry for her. . . .

The bell rang for dismissal. The sound came to him through long curved parallels of falling snow. He saw Deirdre rise, and had himself risen almost as soon—but not quite as soon—as she.

II

On the walk homeward, which was timeless, it pleased him to see through the accompaniment, or counterpoint, of snow, the items of mere externality on his way. There were many kinds of bricks in the sidewalks, and laid in many kinds of pattern. The garden walls too were various, some of wooden palings, some of plaster, some of stone. Twigs of bushes leaned over the walls; the little hard green winter-buds of lilac, on gray stems, sheathed and fat; other branches very thin and fine and black and desiccated. Dirty sparrows huddled in the bushes, as dull in color as dead fruit left in leafless trees. A single starling creaked on a weather vane. In the gutter, beside a drain, was a scrap of torn and dirty newspaper, caught in a little delta of filth: the word ECZEMA appeared in large capitals, and below it was a letter from Mrs. Amelia D. Cravath, 2100 Pine Street, Fort Worth, Texas, to the effect that after being a sufferer for years she had been cured by Caley's Ointment. In the little delta, beside the fan-shaped and deeply runneled continent of brown mud, were lost twigs, descended from their parent trees, dead matches, a rusty horse-chestnut burr, a small concentration of sparkling gravel on the lip of the sewer, a fragment of eggshell, a streak of yellow sawdust which had been wet and was now dry and congealed, a brown pebble, and a broken feather. Further on was a cement sidewalk, ruled into geometrical parallelograms, with a brass inlay at one end commemorating the contractors who had laid it, and, halfway across, an irregular and random series of dog-tracks, immortalized in synthetic stone. He knew these well, and always stepped on them; to cover the little hollows with his own foot had always been a queer pleasure; today he did it once more, but perfunctorily and detachedly, all the while thinking of something else. That was a dog, a long time ago, who had made a mistake and walked on the cement while it was still wet. He had probably wagged his tail, but that hadn't been recorded. Now, Paul Hasleman, aged twelve, on his way home from school, crossed the same river, which in the meantime had frozen into rock. Homeward through the snow, the snow falling in bright sunshine. Homeward?

Then came the gateway with the two posts surmounted by egg-shaped stones which had been cunningly balanced on their ends, as if by Columbus, and mortared in the very act of balance: a source of perpetual wonder. On the brick wall just beyond, the letter H had been stenciled, presumably for some purpose. H? H.

The green hydrant, with a little green-painted chain attached to the brass screw-cap.

The elm tree, with the great gray wound in the bark, kidney-shaped, into which he always put his hand—to feel the cold but living wood. The injury, he had been sure, was due to the gnawings of a tethered horse. But now it deserved only a passing palm, a merely tolerant eye. There were more important things. Miracles. Beyond the thoughts of trees, mere elms. Beyond the thoughts of sidewalks, mere stone, mere brick, mere cement. Beyond the thoughts even of his own shoes, which trod these sidewalks obediently, bearing a burden—far above—of elaborate mystery. He watched them. They were not very well polished; he had neglected them, for a very good reason: they were one of the many parts of the increasing difficulty of the daily return to daily life, the morning struggle. To get up, having at last opened one's eyes, to go to the window, and discover no snow, to wash, to dress, to descend the curving stairs to breakfast—

At whatever pain to others, nevertheless, one must persevere in severance, since the incommunicability of the experience demanded it. It was desirable of course to be kind to Mother and Father, especially as they seemed to be worried, but it was also desirable to be resolute. If they should decide—as appeared likely—to consult the doctor, Doctor Howells, and have Paul inspected, his heart listened to through a kind of dictaphone, his lungs, his stomach—well, that was all right. He would go through with it. He would give them answer for question, too—perhaps such answers as they hadn't expected? No. That would never do. For the secret world must, at all costs, be preserved.

The bird-house in the apple-tree was empty—it was the wrong time of year for wrens. The little round black door had lost its pleasure. The wrens were enjoying other houses, other nests, remoter trees. But this too was a notion which he only vaguely and grazingly entertained—as if, for the moment, he merely touched an edge of it; there was something further on, which was already assuming a sharper importance; something which already teased at the corners of his eyes, teasing also at the corner of his mind. It was funny to think that he so wanted this, so awaited it—and yet found himself enjoying this momentary dalliance with the bird-house, as if for a quite deliberate postponement and enhancement of the approaching pleasure. He was aware of his delay, of his smiling and detached and now almost uncomprehending gaze at the little bird-house; he knew what he was going to look at next: it was his own little cobbled hill-street, his own house, the little river at the bottom of the hill, the grocer's shop with the cardboard man in the window—and now, thinking of all this, he turned his head, still smiling, and looking quickly right and left through the snow-laden sunlight.

And the mist of snow, as he had foreseen, was still on it—a ghost of snow falling in the bright sunlight, softly and steadily floating and turning and pausing, soundlessly meeting the snow that covered, as with a transparent mirage, the bare bright cobbles. He loved it—he stood still and loved it. Its beauty was paralyzing—beyond all words, all experience, all dream. No fairy-story he had ever read could be compared with it—none had ever given him this extraordinary combination of ethereal loveliness with a something else, unnameable, which was just faintly and deliciously terrifying. What was this thing? As he thought of it, he looked upward toward his own bedroom window, which was open—and it was as if he looked straight into the room and saw himself lying half awake in his bed. There he was—at this very instant he was still perhaps actually there—more truly there than standing here at the edge of the cobbled hill-street, with one hand lifted to shade his eyes against the snow-sun. Had he indeed ever left his room, in all this time? since that very first morning? Was the whole progress still being enacted there, was it still the same morning, and himself not yet wholly awake? And even now, had the postman not yet come round the corner? . . .

This idea amused him, and automatically, as he thought of it, he turned his head and looked toward the top of the hill. There was, of course, nothing there—nothing and no one. The street was empty and quiet. And all the more because of its emptiness it occurred to him to count the houses—a thing which, oddly enough, he hadn't before thought of doing. Of course, he had known there weren't many—many, that is, on his own side of the street, which were the ones that figured in the postman's progress—but nevertheless it came to him as something of a shock to find that there were precisely six, above his own house—his own house was the seventh.

Six!

Astonished, he looked at his own house—looked at the door, on which was the number thirteen—and then realized that the whole thing was exactly and logically and absurdly what he ought to have known. Just the same, the realization gave him abruptly, and even a little frighteningly, a sense of hurry. He was being hurried—he was being rushed. For—he knit his brows—he couldn't be mistaken—it was just above the seventh house, his own house, that the postman had first been audible this very morning. But in that case—in that case—did it mean that tomorrow he would hear nothing? The knock he had heard must have been the knock of their own door. Did it mean—and this was an idea which gave him a really extraordinary feeling of surprise—that he would never hear the postman again?—that tomorrow morning the postman would already have passed the house, in a snow by then so deep as to render his footsteps completely inaudible? That he would have made his approach down the snow-filled street so soundlessly, so secretly, that he, Paul Hasleman, there lying in bed, would not have waked in time, or, waking, would have heard nothing?

But how could that be? Unless even the knocker should be muffled in the snow—frozen tight, perhaps? . . . But in that case—

A vague feeling of disappointment came over him; a vague sadness, as if he felt himself deprived of something which he had long looked forward to, something much prized. After all this, all this beautiful progress, the slow delicious advance of the postman through the silent and secret snow, the knock creeping closer each day, and the footsteps nearer, the audible compass of the world thus daily narrowed, narrowed, narrowed, as the snow soothingly and beautifully encroached and deepened, after all this, was he to be defrauded of the one thing he had so wanted—to be able to count, as it were, the last two or three solemn footsteps, as they finally approached his own door? Was it all going to happen, at the end, so suddenly? or indeed, had it already happened? with no slow and subtle gradations of menace, in which he could luxuriate?

He gazed upward again, toward his own window which flashed in the sun: and this time almost with a feeling that it would be better if he were still in bed, in that room; for in that case this must still be the first morning, and there would be six more mornings to come—or, for that matter, seven or eight or nine—how could he be sure?—or even more.

III

After supper, the inquisition began. He stood before the doctor, under the lamp, and submitted silently to the usual thumpings and tappings.

"Now will you please say 'Ah!'"

"Ah!"

"Now again please, if you don't mind."

"Ah."

"Say it slowly, and hold it if you can—"

"Ah-h-h-h-h—"

"Good."

How silly all this was. As if it had anything to do with his throat! Or his heart or lungs!

Relaxing his mouth, of which the corners, after all this absurd stretching, felt uncomfortable, he avoided the doctor's eyes, and stared towards the fireplace, past his mother's feet (in gray slippers) which projected from the green chair, and his father's feet (in brown slippers) which stood neatly side by side on the hearth rug.

"Hm. There is certainly nothing wrong there . . ."

He felt the doctor's eyes fixed upon him, and, as if merely to be polite, returned the look, but with a feeling of justifiable evasiveness.

"Now, young man, tell me,—do you feel all right?"

"Yes, sir, quite all right."

"No headaches? no dizziness?"

"No, I don't think so."

"Let me see. Let's get a book, if you don't mind—yes, thank you, that will do splendidly—and now, Paul, if you'll just read it, holding it as you would normally hold it—"

He took the book and read:

"And another praise have I to tell for this the city our mother, the gift of a great god, a glory of the land most high; the might of horses, the might of young horses, the might of the sea. . . . For thou, son of Cronus, our lord Poseidon, hast throned herein this pride, since in these roads first thou didst show forth the curb that cures the rage of steeds. And the shapely oar, apt to men's hands, hath a wondrous speed on the brine, following the hundred-footed Nereids. . . . O land that art praised above all lands, now is it for thee to make those bright praises seen in deeds."

He stopped, tentatively, and lowered the heavy book.

"No—as I thought—there is certainly no superficial sign of eye-strain."

Silence thronged the room, and he was aware of the focused scrutiny of the three people who confronted him. . . .

"We could have his eyes examined—but I believe it is something else."

"What could it be?" This was his father's voice.

"It's only this curious absent-minded—" This was his mother's voice.

In the presence of the doctor, they both seemed irritatingly apologetic.

"I believe it is something else. Now Paul—I would like very much to ask you a question or two. You will answer them, won't you—you know I'm an old, old friend of yours, eh? That's right! . . ."

His back was thumped twice by the doctor's fat fist,—then the doctor was grinning at him with false amiability, while with one finger-nail he was scratching the top button of his waistcoat. Beyond the doctor's shoulder was the fire, the fingers of flame making light prestidigitation against the sooty fireback, the soft sound of their random flutter the only sound.

"I would like to know—is there anything that worries you?"

The doctor was again smiling, his eyelids low against the little black pupils, in each of which was a tiny white bead of light. Why answer him? why answer him at all? "At whatever pain to others"—but it was all a nuisance, this necessity for resistance, this necessity for attention: it was as if one had been stood up on a brilliantly lighted stage, under a great round blaze of spotlight; as if one were merely a trained seal, or a performing dog, or a fish, dipped out of an aquarium and held up by the tail. It would serve them right if he were merely to bark or growl. And meanwhile, to miss these last few precious hours, these hours of which every minute was more beautiful than the last, more menacing—? He still looked, as if from a great distance, at the beads of light in the doctor's eyes, at the fixed false smile, and then, beyond, once more at his mother's slippers, his father's slippers, the soft flutter of the fire. Even here, even amongst these hostile presences, and in this arranged light, he could see the snow, he could hear it—it was in the corners of the room, where the shadow was deepest, under the sofa, behind the half-opened door which led to the dining room. It was gentler here, softer, its seethe the quietest of whispers, as if, in deference to a drawing room, it had quite deliberately put on its "manners"; it kept itself out of sight, obliterated itself, but distinctly with an air of saying, "Ah, but just wait! Wait till we are alone together! Then I will begin to tell you something new! Something white! something cold! something sleepy! something of cease, and peace, and the long bright curve of space! Tell them to go away. Banish them. Refuse to speak. Leave them, go upstairs to your room, turn out the light and get into bed—I will go with you, I will be waiting for you, I will tell you a better story than Little Kay of the Skates, or The Snow Ghost—I will surround your bed, I will close the windows, pile a deep drift against the door, so that none will ever again be able to enter. Speak to them! . . ." It seemed as if the little hissing voice came from a slow white spiral of falling flakes in the corner by the front window—but he could not be sure. He felt himself smiling, then, and said to the doctor, but without looking at him, looking beyond him still—

"Oh, no, I think not—"

"But are you sure, my boy?"

His father's voice came softly and coldly then—the familiar voice of silken warning. . . .

"You needn't answer at once, Paul—remember we're trying to help you—think it over and be quite sure, won't you?"

He felt himself smiling again, at the notion of being quite sure. What a joke! As if he weren't so sure that reassurance was no longer necessary, and all this cross-examination a ridiculous farce, a grotesque parody! What could they know about it? These gross intelligences, these humdrum minds so bound to the usual, the ordinary? Impossible to tell them about it! Why, even now, even now, with the proof so abundant, so formidable, so imminent, so appallingly present here in this very room, could they believe it?—could even his mother believe it? No—it was only too plain that if anything were said about it, the merest hint given, they would be incredulous—they would laugh—they would say "Absurd!" think things about him which weren't true. . . .

"Why no, I'm not worried—why should I be?"

He looked then straight at the doctor's low-lidded eyes, looked from one of them to the other, from one bead of light to the other, and gave a little laugh.

The doctor seemed to be disconcerted by this. He drew back in his chair, resting a fat white hand on either knee. The smile faded slowly from his face.

"Well, Paul!" he said, and paused gravely, "I'm afraid you don't take this quite seriously enough. I think you perhaps don't quite realize—don't quite realize—" He took a deep quick breath, and turned, as if helplessly, at a loss for words, to the others. But Mother and Father were both silent—no help was forthcoming.

"You must surely know, be aware, that you have not been quite yourself, of late? don't you know that? . . ."

It was amusing to watch the doctor's renewed attempt at a smile, a queer disorganized look, as of confidential embarrassment.

"I feel all right, sir," he said, and again gave the little laugh.

"And we're trying to help you." The doctor's tone sharpened.

"Yes sir, I know. But why? I'm all right. I'm just thinking, that's all."

His mother made a quick movement forward, resting a hand on the back of the doctor's chair.

"Thinking?" she said. "But my dear, about what?"

This was a direct challenge—and would have to be directly met. But before he met it, he looked again into the corner by the door, as if for reassurance. He smiled again at what he saw, at what he heard. The little spiral was still there, still softly whirling, like the ghost of a white kitten chasing the ghost of a white tail, and making as it did so the faintest of whispers. It was all right! If only he could remain firm, everything was going to be all right.

"Oh, about anything, about nothing,—you know the way you do!"

"You mean—day-dreaming?"

"Oh, no—thinking!"

"But thinking about what?"

"Anything."

He laughed a third time—but this time, happening to glance upward towards his mother's face, he was appalled at the effect his laughter seemed to have upon her. Her mouth had opened in an expression of horror. . . . This was too bad! Unfortunate! He had known it would cause pain, of course—but he hadn't expected it to be quite so bad as this. Perhaps—perhaps if he just gave them a tiny gleaming hint—?

"About the snow," he said.

"What on earth!" This was his father's voice. The brown slippers came a step nearer on the hearth rug.

"But my dear, what do you mean?" This was his mother's voice.

The doctor merely stared.

"Just snow, that's all. I like to think about it."

"Tell us about it, my boy."

"But that's all it is. There's nothing to tell. You know what snow is?"

This he said almost angrily, for he felt that they were trying to corner him. He turned sideways so as no longer to face the doctor, and the better to see the inch of blackness between the window-sill and the lowered curtain,—the cold inch of beckoning and delicious night. At once he felt better, more assured.

"Mother—can I go to bed, now, please? I've got a headache."

"But I thought you said—"

"It's just come. It's all these questions—! Can I, Mother?"

"You can go as soon as the doctor has finished."

"Don't you think this thing ought to be gone into thoroughly, and now?" This was Father's voice. The brown slippers again came a step nearer, the voice was the well-known "punishment" voice, resonant and cruel.

"Oh, what's the use, Norman—"

Quite suddenly, everyone was silent. And without precisely facing them, nevertheless he was aware that all three of them were watching him with an extraordinary intensity—staring hard at him—as if he had done something monstrous, or was himself some kind of monster. He could hear the soft irregular flutter of the flames; the cluck-click-cluck-click of the clock; far and faint, two sudden spurts of laughter from the kitchen, as quickly cut off as begun; a murmur of water in the pipes; and then, the silence seemed to deepen, to spread out, to become worldlong and worldwide, to become timeless and shapeless, and to center inevitably and rightly, with a slow and sleepy but enormous concentration of all power, on the beginning of a new sound. What this new sound was going to be, he knew perfectly well. It might begin with a hiss, but it would end with a roar—there was no time to lose—he must escape. It mustn't happen here—

Without another word, he turned and ran up the stairs.

IV

Not a moment too soon. The darkness was coming in long white waves. A prolonged sibilance filled the night—a great seamless seethe of wild influence went abruptly across it—a cold low humming shook the windows. He shut the door and flung off his clothes in the dark. The bare black floor was like a little raft tossed in waves of snow, almost overwhelmed, washed under whitely, up again, smothered in curled billows of feather. The snow was laughing: it spoke from all sides at once: it pressed closer to him as he ran and jumped exulting into his bed.

"Listen to us!" it said. "Listen! We have come to tell you the story we told you about. You remember? Lie down. Shut your eyes, now—you will no longer see much—in this white darkness who could see, or want to see? We will take the place of everything. . . . Listen—"

A beautiful varying dance of snow began at the front of the room, came forward and then retreated, flattened out toward the floor, then rose fountain-like to the ceiling, swayed, recruited itself from a new stream of flakes which poured laughing in through the humming window, advanced again, lifted long white arms. It said peace, it said remoteness, it said cold—it said—

But then a gash of horrible light fell brutally across the room from the opening door—the snow drew back hissing—something alien had come into the room—something hostile. This thing rushed at him, clutched at him, shook him—and he was not merely horrified, he was filled with such a loathing as he had never known. What was this? this cruel disturbance? this act of anger and hate? It was as if he had to reach up a hand toward another world for any understanding of it,—an effort of which he was only barely capable. But of that other world he still remembered just enough to know the exorcising words. They tore themselves from his other life suddenly—

"Mother! Mother! Go away! I hate you!"

And with that effort, everything was solved, everything became all right: the seamless hiss advanced once more, the long white wavering lines rose and fell like enormous whispering sea-waves, the whisper becoming louder, the laughter more numerous.

"Listen!" it said. "We'll tell you the last, the most beautiful and secret story—shut your eyes—it is a very small story—a story that gets smaller and smaller—it comes inward instead of opening like a flower—it is a flower becoming a seed—a little cold seed—do you hear? we are leaning closer to you—"

The hiss was now becoming a roar—the whole world was a vast moving screen of snow—but even now it said peace, it said remoteness, it said cold, it said sleep.

THE LOVELY DAY

LET'S HIDE THE CASE under his napkin to give him a surprise."

"No. I'll take him to one side and give him the watch and tell him: 'Here's a present for your eleventh birthday from your grandmother and me, Henri.' You see, we mustn't treat him like a child. It only annoys him when we do; I noticed that last time."

The grandfather wandered round the table laid for luncheon and inspected it carefully. Suddenly he stopped and, pointing with his finger, said:

"It's the same with that mug. Why not give him a proper glass?"

"Don't you recognise it? It's the one that Louise used to use when she was a little girl. I thought it might amuse him. Besides, he'll see that we think of his mother and still love her."

She uttered these last words almost in a whisper, turning away her head as she did so. He made no reply and started off again.

This little old couple were curiously alike. They were both the same height and they both looked delicate; their faces were thin and their eyes dull. One might have thought that the same wear and tear had effaced all the outward signs of their original character. And yet, from a certain agitation and a peculiar manner of tossing her head, it was evident that she had a certain will of her own and did not take things lying down. He, on the other hand, walked with a measured step, with a thoughtful, pre-occupied air, nodding his head methodically as though he were doing an endless sum in mental arithmetic. Sometimes he halted, placed his hands one on each side of his face like blinkers and then brought them forward with a jerk in order better to limit his field of vision.

She picked up the mug, turned it over in her hands and gazed at the monogram engraved on its side.

"Do you remember, when Louise had her long illness and would scarcely eat anything at all, how I used to put meat jelly into it? I can see her now bending her poor thin little face over the mug."

He nodded, blinked his eyes and continued his walk round the table.

"Is it possible," she went on, gazing at the mug in a sort of reverie, "that the woman who now hates us so much and is always looking for some means of tormenting us is really the same person as that child? Sometimes, when I think about it, I can't believe that it's true. She does everything she can to make us suffer. For instance, why did she forbid us to go and meet Henri at the station this morning?"

She replaced the mug by a glass. There was a moment's silence.

"Why," cried the grandfather, "you've put a cushion on his chair! That's silly. He's taller than you are, my dear!"

"Oh, do let me arrange things in my own way!"

"I repeat that a boy doesn't like all these little attentions; they humiliate him."

He made his protest with a sort of quiet stubbornness, raising both hands together in his favourite gesture.

"A boy, a boy? . . . He's only a child . . . a child whom no one looks after and who never gets any affection or care. When he comes here I like him to feel some of the tenderness which his mother denies him now that she has no eyes for anyone but that wretched man."

"For Heaven's sake don't talk like that in front of him."

"And why not? Do you think that other fellow makes any bones about jeering at us and insulting us?"

"Very likely," he replied with a sigh, "but that doesn't mean that we must imitate him. The last time, when you told Henri that his stepfather was a bankrupt and had narrowly escaped going to prison, he blushed and I could easily see that he hated hearing about such things. I do implore you to be more careful today."

She shrugged her shoulders and retorted sharply:

"That's it! Always give in, always take everything lying down! That's your method. If, when Louise ran away with that man, we had asked the Court for the custody of our grandchild, Henri wouldn't have been brought up in the wings of a theatre by a rascally impresario. He would be living with us and I would have brought him up properly in spite of my affection for him which seems so ridiculous to you."

"I didn't say that, my dear; I only said that one must not identify Henri with the sad incidents that have estranged our daughter from us. When he is a man he will learn to distinguish of his own accord between what is decent and what is despicable. I'm confident of that."

The grandfather had drawn himself up to the full height of his small stature. His chin was twitching with emotion. His wife looked at him and replied, in a tender, rather subdued voice:

"Yes, I know, Antoine. I've let myself be carried away. Forgive me. We're both so unhappy, and today my nerves are all on edge. It's nearly five months since we've seen him. Just think of it. Isn't it wicked to keep him away from us for so long?"

Her voice broke, and she put her handkerchief up to her eyes, which had filled with tears. He took both her hands in his and pressed them.

"Now, don't distress yourself. We'll be happy today. It's going to be a lovely day. Look . . ."

He spoke to her with grave tenderness and led her gently towards the open door which led to the garden. When they reached the terrace they halted and raised their heads. The sky was a pale, pure blue. There was not a cloud to be seen. There was the same look of hope in their tired, blinking eyes. They kept hold of each other's hands and their voices mingled in soft repetition:

"A lovely day."

They were like two prison companions standing in the same narrow beam of light filtering into their cell.

The one-story house stood between two carefully tended garden plots. The front garden sloped down towards a road, beyond which flowed the Marne, like another, smoother and brighter road. The garden at the back consisted of a series of flower beds separated by a network of well-raked paths. A big lilac bush against the wall was in flower. Here and there on the horizon a factory chimney or a massive brick building rose up, reminding them that they were in a suburb of Paris. Some distance away a viaduct, straddling the river at a great height, cut the landscape in two.

"I must go into the kitchen," said the grandmother. "I want to see how Clothilde is getting along with the sweet."

Left alone, the old man walked carefully down the steps leading to the garden, went up to the lilac bush and slowly inhaled the perfume of the flowers, his hands clasped behind his back. A look of contentment appeared in his face and he stroked his little white beard. Then he seized a rake lying beneath the steps and began to rake one of the paths. Every now and then he stopped and then his expression was a mixture of happiness and resignation. From time to time he bent down to pull out a weed or to turn over a pebble. In all his movements there was a sort of humility which gave them a certain grace. He looked like some rustic saint.

Voices came from the kitchen. The grandmother appeared at the window, above the wire meat safe.

"What's the time, Antoine?" she called. "It's midday by Clothilde's clock."

He took out his watch and shook his finger in a sign of negation.

"It's thirteen minutes to. Look, the express is just passing."

He pointed in the direction of the viaduct. A short, shining train slid across it and disappeared.

The grandmother left the window and came to join her husband in the garden.

"It's just as well that I went into the kitchen," she said. "The cream was much too thin."

She tried to put her watch back into her belt, but her fingers got entangled in the guard. She tugged at the chain impatiently.

"Only a quarter of an hour more," she said. "In a quarter of an hour he will be here."

"Don't get so excited, my poor dear. You've been wearing yourself out ever since you got up."

She sighed deeply as though she really was very tired. Then she shrugged her shoulders and, firmly grasping her husband's arm, she observed in a low voice in which there was a note of anxiety:

"Look, Antoine, I only ask one thing: to live for a short while after Henri becomes free. Then he can choose his own home and he'll come and live here with us, and our last years will be the happiest of our lives.

"His mother can't love him," she went on with a sort of dull persistence. "If she did, would she drag him about in the way she does, from hotel to hotel, in her husband's trail? Neither Henri's happiness, nor his future, nor anything else has meant anything to her since she's become infatuated with that man. I may not always have got on with Louise's first husband, but at any rate the poor boy loved his son and looked after him."

He listened with a faraway, dreamy look in his eyes. Suddenly he interrupted her.

"When I think of Henri's career and when I tell myself that this bad upbringing may perhaps prevent him from becoming a respectable citizen . . . then I feel as though I could do anything . . . I even feel capable of strangling the brute!"

A wave of colour swept over his bald, sloping pate. His trembling fingers curved inwards as though about to seize something in a death grip. His wife looked on at this ineffective exhibition of fury.

"Oh, Antoine, how you love Henri!"

And she squeezed his hands in sympathy.

"Come, let's wait in front," she said.

They climbed the steps again and passed through the house. The kitchen door was open. The cook, hearing their footsteps, raised her head. She was a heavily built wench, no longer young, whose blue eyes and thick black eyebrows gave her a look which was a mixture of sensitiveness and surliness.

"Well, Master Henri won't be long now!" she called to them in a coarse, cheerful voice.

They smiled at her.

The front garden was to the south of the house. The lawn, with its bright green grass, shone in the sun. The two old people waited at the top of the steps and began to stare fixedly at the little iron gate at the end of the garden. They did not speak. Time passed. She jerked out her watch and looked at the time. Then he said, in a quiet, rather forced voice:

"What a lovely day!"

She did not appear to hear him. Then, in a sudden burst of anxious fury:

"He won't come!" she cried. "I've got a presentiment. They haven't sent him. Louise will have decided at the last moment, for no reason at all, just to be contradictory. I know her so well! She was like that as a child; she disobeyed me for the pleasure of disobeying, without any pity for the sorrow she caused me."

Her husband tried to calm her, but she would not let him speak.

"No! . . . I know her better than you do. Why did she forbid us to go and meet our darling this morning, unless it was for the pleasure of spoiling some of our happiness? 'Henri will be with you at midday. It's no use going to the station.' That's what she wrote to me, the stubborn, heartless girl!"

The little old woman stood stiffly erect, shaking as though in the presence of an enemy.

Suddenly she calmed down. Her arms fell to her sides. She instinctively turned her face towards the road, on which, however, nothing was to be seen; her eyes suddenly brightened.

"He's coming," she said eagerly.

And the next moment a boy, followed by a woman, appeared behind the bars of the gate.

He was tall, but rather thin and fragile, and from the way he pushed open the gate it seemed as though it cost him an effort. His face was round and, as he held it slightly bent down and as his complexion was pale, it appeared to be small and to present no salient feature.

He raised his face to greet his grandparents. He was not ugly, but there was nothing attractive about his listless expression. His grandmother had run across the lawn to meet him and was holding him in her arms.

"Henri, my Henri!" she kept saying, stroking his hair.

After he had returned her greeting he remained passive, staring covertly into the distance. Then it was the grandfather's turn and he took his grandson's head between his hands and kissed him tenderly and solemnly on the forehead.

The woman who had brought the child stood a little in the background. She was wearing a black dress, very short and tight-fitting. Her neck was bare and her face heavily made up. The grandmother took all this in at a glance. Nevertheless, she nodded to her graciously and said:

"Thank you for having brought our grandson. I hope it has not interfered with your day off."

"Oh, no, madame," replied the maid. "I happen to have an aunt who lives at La Varenne whom I would like to go and see this afternoon if Madame will allow me."

"Naturally," said the grandmother. "You can come back to fetch him for the six o'clock train."

"Madame Louise told us to leave at about four."

"But if you go to La Varenne after luncheon you'll hardly have any time there at all," replied the grandmother in a voice which was half conspiratorial and half pleading.

The maid gave a knowing little smile and made for the kitchen.

"How you've grown, Henri!" cried his grandmother, placing her arm round his neck. "See, my arm isn't long enough to go round. Do you know, it's nearly six months since we saw you. Have you thought of us at all?"

He nodded his head without speaking.

"And your birthday passed without us giving you a present. But we didn't forget it. We didn't want to send it by post. Your grandfather will give it to you now. Antoine!"

The grandfather produced the case, opened it and placed it in the child's outstretched hand. The boy thanked him, took out the watch and examined it and then shot a pleased glance at the two old people from between his long curly lashes.

"Do you like it?" asked the grandmother, solicitously.

"Oh, yes! Is it gold?"

"Of course," replied the grandfather. "It's a real man's watch."

Grasping his present firmly in his hand, he went over to them and gave them each a kiss.

The grandmother detained him and began to question him, stroking him lovingly as she did so.

"Tell me what you've been doing, darling. Are you comfortable in Marseilles? Have you got a nice room?"

He answered rather shyly, letting his arms hang idly by his sides. He did not like Marseilles, he said, but he had enjoyed himself at Nice, where they had spent a month, and also in Italy, at San Remo and Rapallo.

He spoke slowly and without any gestures. His face remained expressionless and even his lips scarcely moved. It was the grandmother who, eagerly following the movement of his lips, animated his recital. Her lined old face, brimming over with warmth and passion, puckered up at the mention of Marseilles and brightened at that of San Remo and Italy. And yet, masked by this forced gaiety, care and sorrow seemed to lurk in the depths of her eyes.

The grandfather stood a couple of yards away and rubbed his hands together with a complacent and wary look in his eyes. The cook appeared at the front door and in a familiar voice announced that luncheon was ready.

"Let's go and eat!" cried the grandfather, clapping his hands.

"Sit over there, Henri, facing the window, so that we can see you better," said his grandmother as they entered the dining room.

The child sat in the place indicated, wincing slightly as though he did not like the light.

Thus lit up, his features were even more strikingly lifeless. Never for a moment did his face betray any of those eager, innocent emotions usual to children, nor even any look of awkwardness or timidity. He would turn his head slowly in the direction of the person or object that interested him and stare fixedly at it, without any change of expression. Only very occasionally would a slight contraction round the eyes or a glance shot in a rather feminine way from beneath his eyelids indicate that something had struck him as agreeable or unpleasant.

"And your studies, Henri?" asked the grandfather. "How are you getting on? Do you like them?"

The child looked at him coldly and replied shortly that he had spent three months at school in Marseilles and since then had pursued his studies by correspondence.

"And are your masters pleased with you? Have your reports been good?"

A hostile little frown appeared on his forehead and he turned his head towards the dish which the servant was bringing in. His grandfather was about to pursue the subject when he caught an impatient gesture from his wife and held his tongue.

"And now," she said, "I hope you're going to remain in Paris. What are your mother's plans?"

"Mother wants to stay, but she says we shall have to be off again soon."

"Really? Can't she do what she wants to?" cried the grandmother, in a mixture of irritation and sarcasm. "Who's to stop her?"

The boy, his head bowed over his plate, went on eating greedily without replying. His grandmother continued, with some hesitation:

"And . . . and your stepfather . . . is he kind to you? Do your mother and he ever quarrel?"

He nodded his head, bending it still lower and showing his untidy locks; then he thrust out his glass for something to drink.

As she poured it out she noticed his hands.

"Why, Henri, you bite your nails!"

The frown of resentment reappeared on the child's face, and he tried to hide his finger tips.

"I'm very distressed about that," said his grandmother. "It's a very nasty habit, Henri. But," she added gaily, "I don't want to scold you today!"

And to make amends for having reprimanded him she stroked the bitten fingernails.

"Heavens! What have you got on?" she cried, tugging at a piece of red-and-green striped vest which she saw at his wrist. "It's awful. Where did you get it?"

"They bought it for me in Italy. Our trunks were left behind in the hotel at Nice, so . . ."

He became embarrassed and did not finish his sentence.

"It's terrible!" cried the grandmother. "So you hadn't any underlinen?"

"We got our luggage back when we returned."

She exchanged a long look with her husband. "What a life!" they thought. A short silence fell. Then the grandfather spoke in a voice which he tried to make sound cheerful.

"Tell me, Henri, what did you like most in your travels? You must have made some lovely excursions. And Italy is such a beautiful country! Tell me what you thought of it. What was it that amused you most?"

The child, who was drinking in long gulps, did not reply at once but looked from one to the other, his face half buried in his glass.

"When I played in comedy," he replied after a moment.

"When you played in comedy?" repeated his grandmother, raising her hands in surprise. "Where was that?"

"In a casino. But it was a real theatre and a real play."

The grandmother let her hands fall back on the table. She opened her mouth and asked mechanically:

"What play?"

"A very well-known one that has been played in Paris. My name was Charlie. I appeared in two of the scenes and in the second one I said things that made everyone laugh."

In an agonised voice the grandmother stammered:

"And did you like doing it?"

At this question the child's face suddenly changed. Dimples appeared in his cheeks and his eyes shone. He moistened his lips and made a sweeping gesture with his arm. And then the words came tumbling out:

"Oh, yes! When I came onto the stage I had a very funny feeling. I was happy, so happy, and yet my whole body trembled. I could see nothing but the row of electric lamps at the foot of the stage. Luckily the lady who was my mother in the play kept me close to her, otherwise I should not have been able to walk straight, the light was so bright. Then, after a moment, I got used to it and I was loudly applauded. I took three calls. After the performance someone told me that I could earn a lot of money later if I wanted to."

A peculiar resonance had come into his voice, and a gleam of sincerity and even a certain poetic look illuminated his features. But, catching sight of his grandmother's dismayed face, the child suddenly stopped talking, lowered his head and resumed his listless expression.

"And your mother let you do that?" the grandmother asked feebly. "Didn't she say anything when she saw you on the stage?"

"She remained in the wings all the time. I could see her clearly through the scenery. After the first scene she told me that I was too pale and put some rouge on my cheeks."

His grandmother hid her face in her hands and smothered an exasperated groan.

Luncheon proceeded. The grandmother constantly questioned the child, both about himself and about his mother and stepfather. She tried to delve into all the secrets of their lives. Her tone was urgent and sometimes bitter, but this keen curiosity was, as it were, quite ineffective, and when the child replied the old woman's face, twitching with apprehension, was like the face of a blind woman hearing a description of something she cannot see.

The grandfather did not seem to like these questions. From time to time he made discreet little signs to his wife. But she paid no attention and, indeed, at one moment shot a glance of annoyance at him. The grandfather bent his head in confusion. The child observed the whole of this incident, but he made no sign that he had done so and continued leisurely to chew his food.

"Henri," said his grandfather, as they rose from the table, "how would you like to go for a row on the river this afternoon?"

The grandmother intervened at once.

"What an idea! You're not going to take him away from me. You don't want to leave your grandmother, Henri, do you?"

She was seated on a low chair and held him tightly, as though fearing that someone would try to snatch him from her.

"I'm so glad to have you to myself today, Henri dear! I've been looking forward to it for so long."

Her voice trembled with emotion, and tears flowed down her worn cheeks. She made no attempt to dry them and indeed took a sort of pleasure in letting the child see them.

"But you mustn't be bored," she went on, briskly. "Tell us what you would like to do."

The child opened his lips as though to answer, but he changed his mind and after a moment said:

"I don't know."

"Yes, but I feel that there's something that would amuse you but that you don't like to tell us."

He denied this with a slight shake of his shoulders.

"Oh, well! We'll see about that in a moment or two," said his grandfather. "In the meantime, come and see my lilac."

They went into the garden. The lilac bush was very thick and partly concealed the window.

"Your grandmother wants to cut it back because it takes some of the light away from the drawing room; but then," explained the grandfather, "it would not bear such lovely flowers; for, you see, lilac is never more beautiful and more abundant than when one leaves it to itself."

He pulled down a branch and thrust a fully blown sprig of mauve blossom towards the child's face. The boy inhaled deeply and the sensual look returned to his face.

"And here," said the grandfather, proudly pointing to a bed full of red flowers. "What do you think of my garden, eh?"

He held his grandson by the hand. The grandmother, who had rejoined them, walked on the other side of the child. They remained silent, only raising their heads towards the tall trees which occasionally swayed in a neighbouring garden. Even though the sky was not so blue as it had been at midday, it was a splendid day. In the air, warmed by the sun, delicate odours and gentle rustlings seemed to be carrying out a quiet labour which lulled the senses. A woman's shout in the distance died away in a peal of laughter. A man's voice mimicked the shout with another and the first voice began to laugh still more loudly. Probably a couple passing down the river in a boat, with the man amusing himself by making it rock to try to frighten his companion.

The two old people enjoyed these things in a sort of gentle calm. Their heads were both inclined at the same angle and they both wore the same look of contentment. The grandmother had quietly replaced her arm round her grandson's neck.

The child was also affected by his surroundings in much the same way and made no attempt to move. But all sorts of secrets seemed to be stirring within him. His upper lip curled nervously and his teeth were clenched together, as though he had bitten into an unripe fruit. With a lithe movement of his head he broke loose from his grandmother's embrace. Then he became thoughtful again.

"Henri," said his grandmother, "do tell us what you would like to do."

He said nothing for a moment. Then a gleam came into his eyes.

"Let's go and see the thieves' house."

"The thieves' house? What do you mean?"

"The house where the band of thieves took refuge some years ago. The police besieged it, but the thieves barricaded themselves in and opened fire. The police had to blow down the walls."

"Whoever told you that tale?" asked his grandmother.

"Claire told me in the train, coming here. She told me that the house was quite close, under the viaduct. She's been there herself."

"That's absurd!" cried his grandmother in a muffled voice. Then she went on in a softer voice: "The house no longer exists, Henri, or, rather, it was rebuilt ages ago. There's nothing to see. . . . Besides, you couldn't enjoy seeing the place where something so horrible took place?"

"They held out for two days. Sometimes they fired from the windows and sometimes from the roof. And when their ammunition gave out they killed themselves. But they never gave in."

He acted the scene cleverly, pretending to hide and to take aim, as though he had given the story a great deal of thought.

The grandparents followed his movements in amazement and with a vague feeling of alarm. But the grandfather cast a reassuring glance at his wife and said:

"But of course, of course, it's only natural. . . . At his age one thinks of nothing but fighting and adventure. His muscles are beginning to develop and he's longing to use them.

"Henri," he added, feeling his arms, "would you like to play football? There's one here among your toys."

The boy nodded his head.

"That's right," said the grandmother, delighted that the idea of going for a row had been abandoned, "come and play here, on the grass."

"On the grass?" the grandfather quietly protested.

"Oh, you and your grass! Anyone would think that you loved it more than you love Henri."

She went in to fetch the ball and then came and sat in an armchair at the edge of the lawn. During her absence the goals had been marked out by driving sticks into the ground. The grandfather took off his coat and the game began.

The boy was impetuous but he lacked skill. He kicked the ball hard in such a way as to make it spin without travelling very far. He did not seem too anxious to run and preferred to wait for the ball to come to him, planted on his fragile legs, bare to the knees. Opposite him his grandfather with his precise movements seemed to be almost the more active of the two. He would go back a pace or two, raise his hands vertically to each side of his face to take better aim and then give the ball an accurate kick. He entered into the game with childish enthusiasm. With his legs slightly bent and his grey eyebrows knitted he took careful note of all his grandson's movements. Sometimes he would advance to the attack and sometimes he would retire prudently to his own ground. The grandmother's eyes never left her grandson; she encouraged him and cheered him on the whole time. This attitude seemed to provoke a fit of jealousy in her husband. He redoubled his efforts and he seemed extremely anxious to defeat his opponent. However, as the game became more lively, the child became more impetuous. His kicking became wilder and he dug up big pieces of turf with his toes. He charged his grandfather and jostled him. His grandmother, noticing these signs of impatience, began to be alarmed. She frowned at her husband as though to say: "Let him win." But the little old man, carried away by the game, pretended not to see and went on defending himself. The child was frowning with mortification. His grandmother began to be really anxious and swayed from side to side in her armchair. Suddenly, she had an idea. As the two players were struggling at the edge of a flower bed she cried:

"Look out for your flowers, Antoine!"

The grandfather raised his head and stood still. Then she went on, briskly:

"Go on, Henri, kick the ball."

The child, taking advantage of this distraction, shot forward and succeeded in steering the ball through his grandfather's goal.

"Oh!" said the grandfather, looking reproachfully in his wife's direction.

"Henri has won! Henri has won!" she cried, clapping her hands gleefully.

"But that's cheating!" the old man protested ruefully.

She shrugged her shoulders and covered her husband's voice.

"Bravo, Henri," she said. "And now come and rest beside me for a moment."

They sat down. The grandfather was slightly out of breath and held his hand up to his chest, but his wife took no notice of him and leaned over her grandson on whom she lavished praise for his skill. The child let his arms hang between his knees and picked up pebbles which he threw in front of him, aimlessly, without replying.

"Oh, look!" said his grandfather after a few moments. "I don't like the look of that sky."

"Nor of that either," he added, as a swallow flew by almost touching the lawn.

A cold breeze blew across the garden. The grandmother shivered and pressed her grandson to her as though to prevent him from shivering too. A moment later large drops of rain began to fall and they hurried back into the house.

The storm continued. It was a spring storm, interspersed with hail and lightning flashes. They had begun by playing a guessing game, but this did not seem to amuse the child; and now all three were standing by the window, gloomily watching the falling rain. The child pressed his forehead against the window and hummed a tune. His breath covered the pane with an opaque mist. Sometimes he clapped his hands when he saw large hailstones strike the leaves of the lilac bush and rebound.

From time to time the two old people glanced at him with the same anxious look. "If only he doesn't get bored," they both thought.

"Would you like to read a book until the rain stops, Henri?" asked his grandmother.

Without turning round, and with his lips pressed to the windowpane, he made a grimace of refusal.

"I can show you some books that will amuse you," said the grandfather. "Books full of adventures and fighting—just the sort that you like."

The child made another face. Then he said slowly:

"It's not the same thing, because the stories in books aren't true."

And he resumed his humming.

Low clouds covered the sky outside, and the window, already half obscured by the lilac bush, only let in a very feeble light. In this sudden darkness the silence and the lack of anything to do became even more palpable. A look of desperation came into the grandmother's eyes. She drew the curtains and moved a chair, as though to return to the world of light and sound.

"I've got an idea, Henri," she cried suddenly. "I'll show you all your things. They're in this cupboard."

The child turned round and it was evident that the idea pleased him. His grandmother immediately went to the cupboard and opened both its doors wide.

"Look, Henri, everything in here belongs to you."

It was a tall cupboard containing several shelves, and was filled with the presents which the grandparents had given their grandson. On the lower shelves were large square boxes, ninepins, a little rifle and a suit of toy armour; above, there were picture books and a stamp album. Everything was in beautifully arranged order.

The child drew near. He examined his possessions with considerable satisfaction. He raised the lids of some of the boxes and took out the toys they contained. The grandmother smilingly pointed things out to him.

"Your marionette theatre is up there, taken to pieces and carefully wrapped up so that it won't spoil. And behind there is the camera we gave you last year."

It was evident that she had arranged everything herself and that she often amused herself by handling them.

"This," she went on, as the child continued his inspection, "is my own corner. This is where I put all the things I treasure most. My jewels are in this casket. My purse is in that red bag. Here is a photograph of your mother when she was your age. And this notebook is precious to me too. You gave it to me yourself. Do you recognise it? See what's written on the cover. 'Drawings made by Henri at the age of eight and given to Grandmother.'"

Her face had become happy again. She pressed up against the child, who seemed to be attracted by the objects she was showing him. The grandfather smiled his approval of the scene and walked up and down the room. He halted for a moment by the window, opened it and announced that it had stopped raining. The grandmother suggested that they should go for a walk, but the child refused.

"I want to play with my toys," he said.

"Take some out-of-doors game and let's go into the garden. Look how clear the sky is now."

"No, I want to play here," he protested, with a sly, stubborn look.

They gave way to him eagerly. He went to the cupboard, considered all the boxes at length and indicated one of them.

"The theatre," he said.

The grandfather raised himself on tiptoe, lifted it down and brought it to him.

"I'll help you set it up, Henri."

"No," he replied quickly, "I want to do it by myself."

Kneeling on the ground, he took out the various parts of the theatre and then the scenery and the marionettes themselves. The two old people followed his movements admiringly. But the child did not seem quite happy. He looked at his grandparents out of the corners of his eyes and dawdled. After a moment or two he stood up and, going up to them, said in a pleading voice:

"Won't you leave me alone? I'll get everything ready. When I've finished I'll call you and I'll give you a performance."

And he kissed his grandmother on the cheek. Touched by this display of affection, she held him to her.

"Yes, Henri dear, we'll do just as you wish."

He quickly disengaged himself from her embrace and, as his grandparents left the room, he shook his finger at them and said:

"Don't come in until I call you!"

They went into the hall and the grandmother opened the kitchen door. Clothilde was alone.

"Has the maid gone already?" asked the grandmother.

"She has, indeed! And she was in a hurry, too."

"Of course! She asked leave to go and see her aunt at La Varenne."

"Oh, she won't go as far as that," replied the plump girl, ironically. "Her young man was waiting for her at the corner of the street and in weather like this they'll soon have got under cover. I don't know if they are all like that in Paris, but she's a real hussy. The things she told me about her house and her employers!"

"What did she say?" asked the grandmother eagerly.

"She said that her master and Madame Louise were always quarrelling, and that there's no money, and that the most extraordinary people come to the house . . ."

Such an expression of pain came over her mistress's face that she tried to modify her remarks.

"Anyway, it's probably nothing but lies. They're hardly worth repeating to Madame. One knows only too well the things a bad girl like that is capable of inventing about her employers!"

They walked along slowly without speaking, but they were clearly stunned by what they had just heard. Their eyes were lowered as though they were in the presence of something which they did not want to see. The grandmother broke the silence with a sigh.

"Louise," she said, in a voice which rose from the depths of her recollections, "Louise, who was so proud!

"And how awful to think that our little darling lives in such surroundings," she continued. "Our little darling who is so good."

She turned towards her husband as though seeking his assent, but he contented himself with nodding his head, and silence fell again.

In this silence the various incidents of the day returned to their minds. They thought of the moment at which the figure of their grandson had appeared through the bars of the garden gate. They recalled his movements and the expressions on his face, they remembered his words. Then, as though these pictures brought them back to the present, they raised their heads and looked around them. On all sides could be seen the damage done by the storm. The flowers in the flower beds had been beaten down by the hail; the gravel in the paths was streaked with muddy runnels.

The grandfather looked round his garden. He bent down to straighten a plant whose flower lay in the mud; but its stalk was broken. He sighed, took his wife's arm again, looked at the sky and said, sorrowfully shaking his head:

"We were expecting such a lovely day."

She answered him by a pressure of her arm to show that she shared his disappointment; and like a lovesick woman who has let herself be lulled by a dream and suddenly returns to reality, she leaned her head towards her husband and laid it tenderly upon his shoulder.

They had walked round the house and were now in the part of the garden onto which the drawing room opened.

"Henri must have finished his preparations by now," she said.

They crept up noiselessly and, hidden by the lilac bush, looked into the room. A painted cardboard theatre stood in the middle of it. They could see the little tragic mask above the stage. The child was at the far end of the room, with his back to the window. They could not distinguish his movements.

"What is he doing?" asked the grandmother. "Oh, yes, I see. He's looking for something in the cupboard. Now that he knows where his toys are, he'll go there often. Heavens, how wonderful it would be if we always had him with us!"

The grandfather was looking also. Suddenly he started, thrust his head forward and placed his hands on each side of it to get a better view.

"He looks as if he's hiding. Perhaps he is preparing a surprise for us," whispered the grandmother once more.

Then she recoiled abruptly. Her wide-open eyes, her gaping mouth and all her features were distorted in a sort of mute horror. It is thus, no doubt, that people look at the moment when they feel that their heart's blood is ebbing.

The child was holding up the red bag in his hands and with hurried, furtive movements, but with the utmost calm, he was stealing.

ON THE FARM

THE COLT was an ungainly, playful creature; it took the farmer and the carter at Babenhof all their time to hold him while they gave him one more grooming and a last combing of his mane and tail. He was the pride of the farm, a two-year-old, strong-limbed, white-maned, and he was just off to the town to be shown for the first time, in the colts' class. The farmer wanted to show him himself; but a tragedy had happened on the farm a few days before and he felt it was his duty to remain on the place until things had settled down again. What he meant by settling down Kersten himself did not know: nobody can restore the dead to life.

The colt took the business of being smartened up and groomed as an invitation to play; he danced about, plucked at the young man's shirt with his lips, laid back his ears and tried to snatch the farmer's hat. "Take care he doesn't kick, Bernd!" But Bernd did not listen. He was silent and abstracted. He looked so smart in his black suit and hard hat that Kersten couldn't help smiling. Then he remembered why the man had that drawn look of suspense about his eyes: he was thinking of the tragedy that had taken place on the farm. He himself had been haunted for some days past by the thought of retribution. Perhaps both of them—they were very alike in the hard, strong set of the chin, in their hair and high-set eyebrows—were full of the same thought that would not let them rest.

"Bernd!"—Bernd turned his head towards the farmyard, where the empty waggons were coupled. Kersten too glanced across; he knew now why the young man had that look of sinister gloom, a look, rather, of one who had been roused to fury: Johann Kortmann had come to fetch the borrowed waggons.

The carter crossed the yard, leading the colt. Their neighbour at the same moment bent over the waggon pole. It was just as well! The carter was to have married the dead girl and it was Kortmann's fault that all was over—it seemed to Kersten scarcely believable that a girl like her, always busy, always looking ahead, such a capable housekeeper, should have lost courage and taken her life. Kersten followed Bernd anxiously with his eyes as he led the colt towards the gate. At that moment he too felt the urge to wreak vengeance on their neighbour, even at the cost of life and liberty. The carter turned into the road without a word to Kortmann, untied the halter of the old chestnut mare, got on her back and rode off with the colt on a leading rein. The farmer was relieved to see him go.

Kersten lived on very close terms with his farm hands; he knew how to take them. As often happens in the north of Germany, he had followed a profession before retiring to the ancestral farm: he had been a barrister and got to know many sides of life, good and bad, just and unjust. His wife and son had died, one after the other, a few years before, and so, finding life out in the world distasteful, he came back to the farm with his daughter, who was still only a child. It was a fine big farm, just the place to tempt a man who had led a busy, varied life to try out new systems of farming. His years in the town lay far behind him: Kersten was a farmer again, and if ever he left the place it was either as a representative of the farming interest or to transact some business for someone in the village.

This time it was his own farm that was overtaken by misfortune; the maidservant—she was to have married the head-carter, Bernd Burmeister, that year—had taken her own life. Nobody would say why, but everybody knew.

Kersten hurried indoors as though pursued by his thoughts. He kept accounts of certain experiments in cropping the land and made careful reports on them to the County Council. This year he was proud of some colts he had bred. The one Bernd was taking to the show was the pick of them. But he wanted to report also on some other experiments he had made at Babenhof, particularly his maize, which even up there in the north he had sown for many years and succeeded with better every year.

He looked up from his writing table as he caught sight of an old cottage woman, who for the last few days since the girl's death had been housekeeper at the farm; she was calling the poultry, and little Marie, Kersten's child, was helping and shouting for joy. It was funny to see how the ducks tumbled over themselves in their haste; and the way the pigeons called to each other and swooped down from the dove-cote was a charming sight, and then the behaviour of the three cocks as they displayed the corn to their hens with as much astonishment as though they had only just discovered the providence that supplied their needs. Such a picking and pecking, scratching and chucking, such a scuttling and flutter of wings, all to be first where the corn fell thickest. The bright plumage and vainglory of the lords and masters of the farmyard made a brave show. The geese were late and came up in a rush, beating their wings, and even the turkey-cock, who scorned to be seen among the common fry, led up his three wives, taking good care at the same time that they did not strut with undue haste or break into a run. He approached with dignity, gobbling as he came, his throat flushed red with exertion or self-control, but his arrogance was rewarded; besides, he knew very well that he and his wives would not be forgotten.

But the child found his over-weening pride so comic that she suddenly emptied all the corn out of her skirt just to be able to laugh her fill. "Look at his lordship arriving!" she shouted, pointing with both hands.

Apparently a raised voice and laughter, even though a child's, were unseemly; for old Frau Dierk intervened at once: "Sh, sh!" Marie nodded, looked round and then ran quickly indoors. Why had she run away? Frau Dierk too drew herself up and looked fixedly across at the cart sheds. Johann Kortmann was coming along with a lurching stride. "He walks like a murderer," flashed through the farmer's head. What nonsense, he thought next moment; if you don't keep an open mind, who in the whole village is going to keep his head? But he could not help clenching his fists. If only, he thought, he might just give that fellow one punch in the jaw or spit in his face or do something outrageous!

Johann Kortmann was embarrassed by the old lady's greeting. She let him come up to her without saying a word: she just stood there without winking. The young man did not know what to say; he held out a cord that had broken, smiled sheepishly at the broken ends and looked up again at Frau Dierk. "Got a rope?" he asked at last. The old woman shook her head almost imperceptibly; she neither spoke nor moved. Johann Kortmann turned away abashed.

Kersten had marked the ingratiating smile; and now he was overcome by pity. He's not to be envied either, poor devil, he thought. Next moment he felt merciless. Hadn't Johann Kortmann known that the carter and the young servant-girl were going to be married? Everyone in the village knew that the drawings for their cottage on the farm had been passed and the stonemason told to get to work. What business had this neighbour of theirs to make free with what was another's?

No doubt the girl had her share in the blame, but no one spoke ill of the dead. She was a jolly girl with a passion for dancing and Bernd, head-carter on Kersten's farm, was dour, too serious altogether; but he was far and away a better fellow than Johann Kortmann. As soon as she had realised that she had been left in the lurch she had paid the bitterest penalty that youth can exact of itself. Guilt? Kersten pleaded the case as he might have done in court in days gone by: The man has the responsibility and must pay the penalty. He is not lord and master for nothing.

The living bear the blame, not the dead.

A brief autumn storm broke over the village at midday. The rain pattered on the leaves of the great walnut that stretched its boughs over the farmyard. Kersten, as he always did when a storm blew up, went anxiously to the stables and through the barns, as though that could ward off the lightning, and then went back into the farmhouse. Old Frau Dierk was in the passage holding the frightened child by the arm. "There's nothing to be afraid of," she was saying to comfort her. "The good God will protect us. And if anything did happen to us, you'd fly straight up to heaven, where Anna's gone." Kersten did not want the child to be reminded of the maid-servant. He shook his head angrily. "Yes, yes, Herr Kersten," the old lady said. "The parson's not always in the right of it. What do any of us know what the dear God has in store for us?"

"And Johann Kortmann—will he go to hell?" the child asked.

"Run along," Kersten said roughly, "you're talking nonsense." Marie rubbed her eyes and slipped away into the sitting-room. "Did you put that into her head?" Kersten asked. Mother Dierk stubbornly shook her head. She had a good conscience. She had said nothing, she had not spoken a word about the whole affair. She had kept her lips as tightly closed with everybody as she had just now when their neighbour's son came across the yard to her. "But this I do know," she permitted herself to say now, "Kortmann promised to make a farmer's wife of her and that's how he got her away from Bernd. Then he left her in the lurch."

"How do you know that?" Kersten asked.

"Because she told me so herself the night before. And Bernd, who was to have married her, knows it too. You'd best keep your eyes open, Master. In case anything happens between the men-folk."

Kersten walked silently on. Once more he saw himself in court and speeches for the prosecution and the defence ran through his head. He had the uncanny feeling that he had to speak in defence of someone—in his own defence, it suddenly flashed through his mind. It might be that in thought he had killed that man as he walked across the yard.

A warm rain succeeded the storm. That was good and also bad: the maize needed sun to ripen it, the winter barley was not yet sown. Kersten threw on a coat and tramped out to the Babenhof fields to see how the work was going. His way led through an avenue of young oaks; he had planted them himself; whoever followed after him on the farm would one day take pleasure in their rustling shade. After him? And suppose his daughter when she married lived in the town. Once more he was reminded of the maidservant. What a waste! He felt a sort of shyness as the thought of what his loneliness had meant to him shot through his mind. He too at moments had wished to have a son from that young spirited girl. Vain thoughts, which all the same are never far from a farmer's mind.

And there again it was his carter whose bride he had calmly thought of having for his own. He was fond of Bernd: he was as like himself as a younger brother; only he was too slow-witted and took life too hard. They would have to keep an eye on him.

The under-carter came up with the two horses and the seed drill. He had not sown the seed yet; he had noticed the storm coming up and had waited to see how bad the rain would be. Kersten said he had done quite right. "Has Bernd got back?" the lad asked, turning round on his horse, and when the farmer looked at him in perplexity, he added: "Bernd Burmeister with the colt."

"But he can't get back before dark, man." What was the fellow thinking of? But there—they all had their share in what was to be. Each feared the living on account of the dead.

Later in the day Kersten had a strange experience for which he could find no explanation. He had been reading some agricultural journals to take his mind off what had occurred; but the whole farm lay under the ban of an oppression, a suspense, and it had him too by the throat. Again and again he found himself embarked on imaginary discourses about Bernd or Johann Kortmann, defending the one while he hated the sight of the other. As in his days of legal practice he lived through all that had happened or that might have happened, linking up and considering at the same time all the possibilities, putting himself in the place of the people concerned and trying at the same time to restrain them. The hatred and every thought that possessed his carter were revealed to him in his own soul as though in duplicate.

Just as he was about to cross the sitting-room to his bedroom it suddenly occurred to him to lock his gun-cupboard, feeling it was himself for whom the temptation might be too strong. It was dusk and as he opened the door into the next room he saw someone in front of the cupboard. As he turned, it seemed to him that the other man looked round, a bolt clicked and then the man had gone. "Bernd!" Kersten called out. "Hello, Bernd!" But by that time he was through the side door, which was ajar. Kersten followed, but heard no sound of steps. He then hurried back, turned on the light to make sure that nothing was missing and went out across the yard to find the carter. He met old Frau Dierk and hastened to ask her, but Bernd was not back yet, she said.

But he must be. He had seen him. They went together to the stable. The colt was not there and the carter could not possibly have returned. Unless of course he had stabled the colt somewhere else and stolen back and into the house. Kersten was bewildered. He decided to say nothing about what he had seen and he could not in any case think of any explanation.

He went to bed and after he had lain awake for an hour he heard the clatter of hoofs. They had come at last. He thought of getting up at once to find out whether the colt had got a prize, but he decided to put it off until the morning, because he would have to ask the man about his visit to the cupboard and it all seemed vague and baffling. Then, after all, he got up, went to his gun-cupboard and methodically examined it. Nothing was missing, nothing was out of its proper place. His over-heated brain had played a trick on him. So he changed his mind and went out to the stable, where he found the carter unsaddling the mare, and asked about the show. The colt had not got a prize, only an honourable mention.

"Well, off to bed with you now, Bernd."

"Yes—in a moment."

A new day dawned over Babenhof, a day like any other, and Kersten was inclined to take himself to task for his hours of gloomy preoccupation and agonised questioning and cross-questioning. The dawn sky was clear; cloudless sunlight lay over the yellowing leaves of bush and hedge and on the loaded fruit trees in the orchard. Nothing had happened, all was quiet.

It was not until midday when he came back from a lengthy sitting of the County Council and the inspection of a long stretch of newly made road that Kersten heard that Johann Kortmann was missing. He must have gone to the town, people said.

The winter barley had been sown hours ago. Bernd and the handy under-carter had seen to that. They greeted the farmer with a laugh when he went out to the field and were pleased to have got it done quicker than he could have expected. The head carter told a bit more about the showing of the colt. The gentry there had thought him a bit too tall; there were a lot more fine animals there and the judges had to look hard to find any they could pick holes in. Now the colt was in harness, rather bewildered and clumsy at turning, but good natured and willing.

At night a woman came over from the Kortmanns' farm to see if anyone knew where Johann had got to: nothing had been seen of him all day. Kersten happened to be standing with his head carter, discussing the layout of the next day's work. The farmer felt the blood rush to his head. He sent the woman roughly about her business. Then, as he turned to Bernd, the apparition at the gun-cupboard came into his mind. It must have been the shadow of his own evil wishes! He glanced uneasily at the man beside him. But he only showed his teeth in a grin. Johann must be on the roads, Bernd called out after the woman, they had better enquire in the inns in all the villages round about. There was not a trace of agitation, not the slightest concern or confusion to be seen in him.

But nothing more was seen of Kortmann, and now, without a word being said, Babenhof was enclosed within a ring of silence. In spite of all the hard things that had been said of Johann Kortmann up to now, nobody would countenance such a revenge as that. Where was Johann? Nobody knew anything of him. He had gone to the Jug and Bottle at night as usual, since when there had been no trace of him. Murder? Nobody said the word outright, but all pointed a finger at the farm which had the motive for revenge. If Johann Kortmann had been beaten and left for dead, he would have been found; but his disappearance was a mystery that lay on them with the weight of an accursed thing. However much there was to reproach the missing man with, God alone was the disposer of life and death.

Feeling in the village changed. Excuses were made for Kortmann; people were already incensed against the Babenhof folk and waited tensely to know what would come out. Old Kortmann came and had a talk with Kersten. Kersten maintained roundly that no one on his farm knew anything about the disappearance of his son, and he asked the old man irritably whether it was he whom he suspected.

As a barrister Kersten had always played the part of judge too. He condemned the murderer if murder had been committed, but he understood the urge to exact a penalty from Kortmann because that urge had been too much for him himself. What man is free of his secret thoughts?

"But if you mean someone else on the farm," he advised the old man, "then be careful what you say. My men are incapable of deceiving me. I don't know, of course, what has happened to your son; perhaps—it is no wish of mine that it should be so—he has taken his own life. Forgive me," he added quickly, "but I must say it in case injustice should be done to others."

Old Kortmann shook his head. He knew that his son had not left the district and had not laid hands on himself. The secret remained.

But the village knew that old Kortmann had been to Babenhof and rumour got busy. Whatever Johann's guilt, fresh guilt was in the air and they sought out the man who had taken a lawless revenge. When Kersten went to the Jug and Bottle that night he noticed that he was avoided. They talked of other things when he asked about the missing man and they left at an early hour.

The host could not leave and so escape being questioned. "What do people say about it then?" Kersten asked with a casual air.

"They want to set a search on foot for Johann Kortmann, the fishermen in the lake, the rest in the woods."

"Quite right," Kersten replied with conviction. "That's what ought to be done. I was with Burmeister last night myself. I saw him when he got home with the horses from the town."

The innkeeper nodded awkwardly. "The policeman is coming tomorrow. It is no business of ours to discuss the business and perhaps blame the innocent."

It was not until he was on his way home that the apparition at the gun-cupboard started to Kersten's eyes; he had completely forgotten it because he had come to the conclusion that it must have been an illusion. Now he recollected it and at the same moment everything swam before his eyes. If Bernd had really been at the cupboard door, if he, Kersten, had been deceived by Bernd's air of trustworthiness— Was it not unjust to act as though it were not common knowledge that Bernd Burmeister had had his life and love treacherously destroyed? Would he not in Bernd's place have wanted to square accounts with Kortmann?

Kersten stood still; the uncertainty in which he was affected his feet and knees. He was honest enough to recall the aimless fancies the dead girl had aroused. He had looked upon her with the secret thought that all men indulge in who are left without sons and who consider the women about them as possible mothers; and he would dearly have liked to call the guilty to account for her fruitless death. Then what must have been his man's state of mind?

Kersten hurried home and went straight to his gun-cupboard to give it another careful look over.

How could he possibly have failed to notice before that his revolver was missing?

The discovery made his head whirl. The cupboard seemed to shrink together. Instantly he reproached himself bitterly. Why had he even in his own mind kept silence about what he had seen at the cupboard? It was partisanship: he had wanted to shield his own people. Murder had been committed—and he, he knew who had done it.

In the first shock of dismay Kersten took refuge in his room and collapsed into a chair. He saw himself in court and saw the eyes of the judge fixed keenly on him, as he asked: "How could you, knowing the feeling there was on your farm, leave the cupboard unlocked? How could you fail to make a thorough search as soon as ever Kortmann disappeared?"

He heard the carter in the passage and got up and turned on the light and went heavily out and pulled him by the hand into the room.

"Why did you do it, Bernd?" he asked without more ado. He could scarcely get his breath, he could hardly look the man in the eyes. "How did it happen?" he groaned. "You'd better tell me."

The man went as pale as death; he clasped his hands together and raised them as though he could not breathe. "It was not I, master."

"Tell me about it. I saw you last night at my cupboard. Tell me honestly how it happened. It's the best thing you can do."

"At the cupboard?" Burmeister stammered.

Kersten pushed him into a chair. He could hear his breathing as he sat opposite him. "How could you do such a thing? Tell me about it."

The door flew open and the kitchenmaid rushed in with her face as white as chalk. "The policeman's here. He wants to speak to Herr Kersten."

"Tell him to wait," Kersten was going to say, when the carter groaned out: "No, not the police!" He jumped up abruptly as though to make his escape and one hand went to his pocket.

Kersten was able to seize his hands and push him back onto the chair.

"Tell the policeman I am coming," he called out after the girl. He felt in the carter's pocket but found nothing there.

The girl came back: "The policeman cannot wait, Herr Kersten."

He followed on her heels and after scrutinising the two men seated at the table, he cleared his throat and drew nearer with a heavy, hesitant step. "Well," he said, "you seem to know what I've come about." The tone of his voice showed he was sorry. He looked from one to the other and turning round he pulled up a chair and sat down between the farmer and his man. "Bernd Burmeister?"

Bernd shook his head again distractedly. "No, no," he almost shouted. "You try it on. You'll never prove anything."

"Don't make it worse than it is," Kersten warned him. "I shall be put on my oath, you know, and I shall have to say you went to my gun-cupboard."

The man seemed utterly distraught. "But that was not—till afterwards——"

"Afterwards—after you'd done it?" the policeman put in quickly, taking advantage of the admission.

"Not till afterwards," Burmeister stammered. "And you can see for yourself that not a shot has been fired."

It was a senseless, crazy line of defence. "And what happened first?" the knowing old sergeant-major asked. He put one hand on Bernd Burmeister's shoulder, casually passed it down his side and produced the missing revolver from one of his pockets. He laid it down on the far side of the table. "Well, we can see about that all in good time. We'll soon know whether you have fired a shot or no. Meanwhile, tell me how it all came about and what happened first?" He took hold of the carter, who was sobbing convulsively, by the arm. "There, I know the man took your girl from you. He was a swine, a bad lot. But all the same I've got to know what happened after that."

Kersten wanted to put in a word; he envied the old sergeant-major his fatherly way of dealing with people; he himself at critical moments was always the observant barrister. When he saw that Burmeister was incapable of getting a word out, he tried to gain time for him by opening the breach and the chamber of the revolver. "Sergeant-major," he brought out, "it's true it has not been fired."

The cartridges were all there. The barrel when he held it up to the light was clean. "You must witness, sergeant-major, that he has not fired a shot," Kersten said again in agitation.

"Yes, but before," the policeman insisted, turning to Burmeister again. "Something happened before that, didn't it? And then you got hold of the revolver and thought to yourself you could always do yourself in if it came out."

The carter nodded his head convulsively.

He's not speaking the truth now, Kersten thought with annoyance, I saw him at the cupboard before anything happened. He was wrought up and in his excitement he became as much a part of the other man as if he had had a share in what he had done. Thirty years younger, he thought in a flash, thirty years less master of himself and what might not he have done? But after all, he reflected next moment, he is a murderer. How could he come to steal a firearm from me? How could he do it?

The carter now brought out a few sentences by fits and starts. When he had unsaddled the horses, he went back through the village. He might have meant to run across Johann Kortmann, or he might not—he didn't know why it was he went. He did run into him, however—just on the bridge it was—and they went for each other at once. They fell over the parapet together, and as they struggled in the water he had got the other man under.

The policeman glanced at Kersten. Kersten muttered in a groan: "I don't understand a word of it."

"Would you mind leaving us alone for a moment?" the old man asked. "But don't be far away, Herr Kersten. Wait in the next room."

The farmer got up reluctantly. He was already drawing up his speech for the defence; he was going to plead self-defence. But then—Burmeister was lying. He had caught him red-handed at the cupboard. He had gone out deliberately, taking the weapon with him. Kersten opened the door in order to go into the next room. As he did so the light fell on the cupboard and suddenly he saw, exactly as he had the night before, that someone was standing there and unmistakably turning round towards him.

He caught his breath in his agitation and wanted to stop the man, but he heard no sound of a step. So he went back and opened the door again. "There's a spook here," he stammered distractedly. The policeman shook his head: he couldn't make the man out. Kersten then for the third time opened the connecting door and now he distinctly saw that, as he entered, either a draught of air or a sinking of the floor boards made the glazed cupboard door swing open so that a dim shadow seemed to turn towards him—his own shadow.

"What was that you were saying?" the sergeant-major asked on second thought.

"Nothing, nothing, it was the cupboard door, that was all," Kersten muttered. He knew that he had never in his life looked such a fool; he shut the door behind him in a rage and stood in the darkness of the bedroom.

He thought it all over: so the night before he had made an assumption that had no foundation. He had seen the reflection in the cupboard door before Bernd Burmeister had come home. A warning apparition? Rubbish! A simple reflection, which had deceived him, which—perhaps—he had been expecting. His oppression did not leave him; it was clear to him that in his heart he was not without blame. He remembered his state of mind as he went about with clenched fists, wishing in his heart that he could bring destruction on the head of the man who had brought disaster on his farm. A reflection in the door—and at the same time an image of his heart's desire! He had seen his own inmost thought there; involuntarily and from a sense of what was just, he had been awaiting what the carter subsequently did.

He was overcome by a great weariness. He waited awhile longer and then he went back into the next room as though he had been summoned and sat down at the table.

"We've just about done," the sergeant-major said, surprised that the farmer had come in without being called. Then he added reluctantly: "I'm taking him to town tonight. There's no help for it."

"I'm coming too," Kersten said shortly, and when the sergeant-major got to his feet in perplexity, he added: "I'll stay there until it comes on."

The sergeant-major's face cleared. He had understood. "Oh, I see, because you used to be a barrister," he said, nodding.

Kersten shook his head. He wanted to explain himself, but said no more.

The carter had recovered his composure. He looked straight in front of him with a stolid and obstinate expression, but when he heard Kersten say he was coming too, he glanced up and nodded his gratitude.

"Perhaps he only did more or less what all of us wanted to see happen," Kersten said to the sergeant-major, "and so we must all take our share of the blame." He added under his breath: "I felt the same as he did. I must tell the court that."

THE KILLERS

(1898— )

---

THE DOOR of Henry's lunch-room opened and two men came in. They sat down at the counter.

"What's yours?" George asked them.

"I don't know," one of the men said. "What do you want to eat, Al?"

"I don't know," said Al. "I don't know what I want to eat."

Outside it was getting dark. The street-light came on outside the window. The two men at the counter read the menu. From the other end of the counter Nick Adams watched them. He had been talking to George when they came in.

"I'll have a roast pork tenderloin with apple sauce and mashed potatoes," the first man said.

"It isn't ready yet."

"What the hell do you put it on the card for?"

"That's the dinner," George explained. "You can get that at six o'clock." George looked at the clock on the wall behind the counter.

"It's five o'clock."

"The clock says twenty minutes past five," the second man said.

"It's twenty minutes fast."

"Oh, to hell with the clock," the first man said. "What have you got to eat?"

"I can give you any kind of sandwiches," George said. "You can have ham and eggs, bacon and eggs, liver and bacon, or a steak."

"Give me chicken croquettes with green peas and cream sauce and mashed potatoes."

"That's the dinner."

"Everything we want's the dinner, eh? That's the way you work it."

"I can give you ham and eggs, bacon and eggs, liver——"

"I'll take ham and eggs," the man called Al said. He wore a derby hat and a black overcoat buttoned across the chest. His face was small and white and he had tight lips. He wore a silk muffler and gloves.

"Give me bacon and eggs," said the other man. He was about the same size as Al. Their faces were different, but they were dressed like twins. Both wore overcoats too tight for them. They sat leaning forward, their elbows on the counter.

"Got anything to drink?" Al asked.

"Silver beer, bevo, ginger-ale," George said.

"I mean you got anything to drink?"

"Just those I said."

"This is a hot town," said the other. "What do they call it?"

"Summit."

"Ever hear of it?" Al asked his friend.

"No," said the friend.

"What do you do here nights?" Al asked.

"They eat the dinner," his friend said. "They all come here and eat the big dinner."

"That's right," George said.

"So you think that's right?" Al asked George.

"Sure."

"You're a pretty bright boy, aren't you?"

"Sure," said George.

"Well, you're not," said the other little man. "Is he, Al?"

"He's dumb," said Al. He turned to Nick. "What's your name?"

"Adams."

"Another bright boy," Al said. "Ain't he a bright boy, Max?"

"The town's full of bright boys," Max said.

George put the two platters, one of ham and eggs, the other of bacon and eggs, on the counter. He set down two side-dishes of fried potatoes and closed the wicket into the kitchen.

"Which is yours?" he asked Al.

"Don't you remember?"

"Ham and eggs."

"Just a bright boy," Max said. He leaned forward and took the ham and eggs. Both men ate with their gloves on. George watched them eat.

"What are you looking at?" Max looked at George.

"Nothing."

"The hell you were. You were looking at me."

"Maybe the boy meant it for a joke, Max," Al said.

George laughed.

"You don't have to laugh," Max said to him. "You don't have to laugh at all, see?"

"All right," said George.

"So he thinks it's all right." Max turned to Al. "He thinks it's all right. That's a good one."

"Oh, he's a thinker," Al said. They went on eating.

"What's the bright boy's name down the counter?" Al asked Max.

"Hey, bright boy," Max said to Nick. "You go around on the other side of the counter with your boy friend."

"What's the idea?" Nick asked.

"There isn't any idea."

"You better go around, bright boy," Al said. Nick went around behind the counter.

"What's the idea?" George asked.

"None of your damn business," Al said. "Who's out in the kitchen?"

"The nigger."

"What do you mean the nigger?"

"The nigger that cooks."

"Tell him to come in."

"What's the idea?"

"Tell him to come in."

"Where do you think you are?"

"We know damn well where we are," the man called Max said. "Do we look silly?"

"You talk silly," Al said to him. "What the hell do you argue with this kid for? Listen," he said to George, "tell the nigger to come out here."

"What are you going to do to him?"

"Nothing. Use your head, bright boy. What would we do to a nigger?"

George opened the slit that opened back into the kitchen. "Sam," he called. "Come in here a minute."

The door to the kitchen opened and the nigger came in. "What was it?" he asked. The two men at the counter took a look at him.

"All right, nigger. You stand right there," Al said.

Sam, the nigger, standing in his apron, looked at the two men sitting at the counter. "Yes, sir," he said. Al got down from his stool.

"I'm going back to the kitchen with the nigger and bright boy," he said. "Go on back to the kitchen, nigger. You go with him, bright boy." The little man walked after Nick and Sam, the cook, back into the kitchen. The door shut after them. The man called Max sat at the counter opposite George. He didn't look at George but looked in the mirror that ran along back of the counter. Henry's had been made over from a saloon into a lunch-counter.

"Well, bright boy," Max said, looking into the mirror, "why don't you say something?"

"What's it all about?"

"Hey, Al," Max called, "bright boy wants to know what it's all about."

"Why don't you tell him?" Al's voice came from the kitchen.

"What do you think it's all about?"

"I don't know."

"What do you think?"

Max looked into the mirror all the time he was talking.

"I wouldn't say."

"Hey, Al, bright boy says he wouldn't say what he thinks it's all about."

"I can hear you, all right," Al said from the kitchen. He had propped open the slit that dishes passed through into the kitchen with a catsup bottle. "Listen, bright boy," he said from the kitchen to George. "Stand a little further along the bar. You move a little to the left, Max." He was like a photographer arranging for a group picture.

"Talk to me, bright boy," Max said. "What do you think's going to happen?"

George did not say anything.

"I'll tell you," Max said. "We're going to kill a Swede. Do you know a big Swede named Ole Andreson?"

"Yes."

"He comes here to eat every night, don't he?"

"Sometimes he comes here."

"He comes here at six o'clock, don't he?"

"If he comes."

"We know all that, bright boy," Max said. "Talk about something else. Ever go to the movies?"

"Once in a while."

"You ought to go to the movies more. The movies are fine for a bright boy like you."

"What are you going to kill Ole Andreson for? What did he ever do to you?"

"He never had a chance to do anything to us. He never even seen us."

"And he's only going to see us once," Al said from the kitchen.

"What are you going to kill him for, then?" George asked.

"We're killing him for a friend. Just to oblige a friend, bright boy."

"Shut up," said Al from the kitchen. "You talk too goddam much."

"Well, I got to keep bright boy amused. Don't I, bright boy?"

"You talk too damn much," Al said. "The nigger and my bright boy are amused by themselves. I got them tied up like a couple of girl friends in the convent."

"I suppose you were in a convent."

"You never know."

"You were in a kosher convent. That's where you were."

George looked up at the clock.

"If anybody comes in you tell them the cook is off, and if they keep after it, you tell them you'll go back and cook yourself. Do you get that, bright boy?"

"All right," George said. "What you going to do with us afterward?"

"That'll depend," Max said. "That's one of those things you never know at the time."

George looked up at the clock. It was a quarter past six. The door from the street opened. A street-car motorman came in.

"Hello, George," he said. "Can I get supper?"

"Sam's gone out," George said. "He'll be back in about half an hour."

"I'd better go up the street," the motorman said. George looked at the clock. It was twenty minutes past six.

"That was nice, bright boy," Max said. "You're a regular little gentleman."

"He knew I'd blow his head off," Al said from the kitchen.

"No," said Max. "It ain't that. Bright boy is nice. He's a nice boy. I like him."

At six-fifty-five George said: "He's not coming."

Two other people had been in the lunch-room. Once George had gone out to the kitchen and made a ham-and-egg sandwich "to go" that a man wanted to take with him. Inside the kitchen he saw Al, his derby hat tipped back, sitting on a stool beside the wicket with the muzzle of a sawed-off shotgun resting on the ledge. Nick and the cook were back to back in the corner, a towel tied in each of their mouths. George had cooked the sandwich, wrapped it up in oiled paper, put it in a bag, brought it in, and the man had paid for it and gone out.

"Bright boy can do everything," Max said. "He can cook and everything. You'd make some girl a nice wife, bright boy."

"Yes?" George said. "Your friend, Ole Andreson, isn't going to come."

"We'll give him ten minutes," Max said.

Max watched the mirror and the clock. The hands of the clock marked seven o'clock, and then five minutes past seven.

"Come on, Al," said Max. "We better go. He's not coming."

"Better give him five minutes," Al said from the kitchen.

In the five minutes a man came in, and George explained that the cook was sick.

"Why the hell don't you get another cook?" the man asked. "Aren't you running a lunch-counter?" He went out.

"Come on, Al," Max said.

"What about the two bright boys and the nigger?"

"They're all right."

"You think so?"

"Sure. We're through with it."

"I don't like it," said Al. "It's sloppy. You talk too much."

"Oh, what the hell," said Max. "We got to keep amused, haven't we?"

"You talk too much, all the same," Al said. He came out from the kitchen. The cut-off barrels of the shotgun made a slight bulge under the waist of his too tight-fitting overcoat. He straightened his coat with his gloved hands.

"So long, bright boy," he said to George. "You got a lot of luck."

"That's the truth," Max said. "You ought to play the races, bright boy."

The two of them went out the door. George watched them, through the window, pass under the arc-light and cross the street. In their tight overcoats and derby hats they looked like a vaudeville team. George went back through the swinging-door into the kitchen and untied Nick and the cook.

"I don't want any more of that," said Sam, the cook. "I don't want any more of that."

Nick stood up. He had never had a towel in his mouth before.

"Say," he said. "What the hell?" He was trying to swagger it off.

"They were going to kill Ole Andreson," George said. "They were going to shoot him when he came in to eat."

"Ole Andreson?"

"Sure."

The cook felt the corners of his mouth with his thumbs.

"They all gone?" he asked.

"Yeah," said George. "They're gone now."

"I don't like it," said the cook. "I don't like any of it at all."

"Listen," George said to Nick. "You better go see Ole Andreson."

"All right."

"You better not have anything to do with it at all," Sam, the cook, said. "You better stay way out of it."

"Don't go if you don't want to," George said.

"Mixing up in this ain't going to get you anywhere," the cook said. "You stay out of it."

"I'll go see him," Nick said to George. "Where does he live?"

The cook turned away.

"Little boys always know what they want to do," he said.

"He lives up at Hirsch's rooming house," George said to Nick.

"I'll go up there."

Outside the arc-light shone through the bare branches of a tree. Nick walked up the street beside the car-tracks and turned at the next arc-light down a side-street. Three houses up the street was Hirsch's rooming house. Nick walked up the two steps and pushed the bell. A woman came to the door.

"Is Ole Andreson here?"

"Do you want to see him?"

"Yes, if he's in."

Nick followed the woman up a flight of stairs and back to the end of a corridor. She knocked on the door.

"Who is it?"

"It's somebody to see you, Mr. Andreson," the woman said.

"It's Nick Adams."

"Come in."

Nick opened the door and went into the room. Ole Andreson was lying on the bed with all his clothes on. He had been a heavyweight prizefighter and he was too long for the bed. He lay with his head on two pillows. He did not look at Nick.

"What was it?" he asked.

"I was up at Henry's," Nick said, "and two fellows came in and tied up me and the cook, and they said they were going to kill you."

It sounded silly when he said it. Ole Andreson said nothing.

"They put us out in the kitchen," Nick went on. "They were going to shoot you when you came in to supper."

Ole Andreson looked at the wall and did not say anything.

"George thought I better come and tell you about it."

"There isn't anything I can do about it," Ole Andreson said.

"I'll tell you what they were like."

"I don't want to know what they were like," Ole Andreson said. He looked at the wall. "Thanks for coming to tell me about it."

"That's all right."

Nick looked at the big man lying on the bed.

"Don't you want me to go and see the police?"

"No," Ole Andreson said. "That wouldn't do any good."

"Isn't there something I could do?"

"No. There ain't anything to do."

"Maybe it was just a bluff."

"No. It ain't just a bluff."

Ole Andreson rolled over toward the wall.

"The only thing is," he said, talking toward the wall, "I just can't make up my mind to go out. I been here all day."

"Couldn't you get out of town?"

"No," Ole Andreson said. "I'm through with all that running around."

He looked at the wall.

"There ain't anything to do now."

"Couldn't you fix it up some way?"

"No. I got in wrong." He talked in the same flat voice. "There ain't anything to do. After a while I'll make up my mind to go out."

"I better go back and see George," Nick said.

"So long," said Ole Andreson. He did not look toward Nick. "Thanks for coming around."

Nick went out. As he shut the door he saw Ole Andreson with all his clothes on, lying on the bed looking at the wall.

"He's been in his room all day," the landlady said downstairs. "I guess he don't feel well. I said to him: 'Mr. Andreson, you ought to go out and take a walk on a nice fall day like this,' but he didn't feel like it."

"He doesn't want to go out."

"I'm sorry he don't feel well," the woman said. "He's an awfully nice man. He was in the ring, you know."

"I know it."

"You'd never know it except from the way his face is," the woman said. They stood talking just inside the street door. "He's just as gentle."

"Well, good night, Mrs. Hirsch," Nick said.

"I'm not Mrs. Hirsch," the woman said. "She owns the place. I just look after it for her. I'm Mrs. Bell."

"Well, good night, Mrs. Bell," Nick said.

"Good night," the woman said.

Nick walked up the dark street to the corner under the arc-light, and then along the car-tracks to Henry's eating-house. George was inside, back of the counter.

"Did you see Ole?"

"Yes," said Nick. "He's in his room and he won't go out."

The cook opened the door from the kitchen when he heard Nick's voice.

"I don't even listen to it," he said and shut the door.

"Did you tell him about it?" George asked.

"Sure. I told him but he knows what it's all about."

"What's he going to do?"

"Nothing."

"They'll kill him."

"I guess they will."

"He must have got mixed up in something in Chicago."

"I guess so," said Nick.

"It's a hell of a thing."

"It's an awful thing," Nick said.

They did not say anything. George reached down for a towel and wiped the counter.

"I wonder what he did?" Nick said.

"Double-crossed somebody. That's what they kill them for."

"I'm going to get out of this town," Nick said.

"Yes," said George. "That's a good thing to do."

"I can't stand to think about him waiting in the room and knowing he's going to get it. It's too damned awful."

"Well," said George, "you better not think about it."

THE STRANGER

Katherine Mansfield

(1890-1923)

---

IT SEEMED to the little crowd on the wharf that she was never going to move again. There she lay, immense, motionless on the grey crinkled water, a loop of smoke above her, an immense flock of gulls screaming and diving after the galley droppings at the stern. You could just see little couples parading—little flies walking up and down the dish on the grey crinkled tablecloth. Other flies clustered and swarmed at the edge. Now there was a gleam of white on the lower deck—the cook's apron or the stewardess perhaps. Now a tiny black spider raced up the ladder on to the bridge.

In the front of the crowd a strong-looking, middle-aged man, dressed very well, very snugly in a grey overcoat, grey silk scarf, thick gloves and dark felt hat, marched up and down, twirling his folded umbrella. He seemed to be the leader of the little crowd on the wharf and at the same time to keep them together. He was something between the sheep-dog and the shepherd.

But what a fool—what a fool he had been not to bring any glasses! There wasn't a pair of glasses between the whole lot of them.

"Curious thing, Mr. Scott, that none of us thought of glasses. We might have been able to stir 'em up a bit. We might have managed a little signalling. Don't hesitate to land. Natives harmless. Or: A welcome awaits you. All is forgiven. What? Eh?"

Mr. Hammond's quick, eager glance, so nervous and yet so friendly and confiding, took in everybody on the wharf, roped in even those old chaps lounging against the gangways. They knew, every man-jack of them, that Mrs. Hammond was on that boat, and he was so tremendously excited it never entered his head not to believe that this marvellous fact meant something to them too. It warmed his heart towards them. They were, he decided, as decent a crowd of people— Those old chaps over by the gangways, too—fine, solid old chaps. What chests—by Jove! And he squared his own, plunged his thick-gloved hands into his pockets, rocked from heel to toe.

"Yes, my wife's been in Europe for the last ten months. On a visit to our eldest girl, who was married last year. I brought her up here, as far as Salisbury, myself. So I thought I'd better come and fetch her back. Yes, yes, yes." The shrewd grey eyes narrowed again and searched anxiously, quickly, the motionless liner. Again his overcoat was unbuttoned. Out came the thin, butter-yellow watch again, and for the twentieth—fiftieth—hundredth time he made the calculation.

"Let me see, now. It was two fifteen when the doctor's launch went off. Two fifteen. It is now exactly twenty-eight minutes past four. That is to say, the doctor's been gone two hours and thirteen minutes. Two hours and thirteen minutes! Whee-ooh!" He gave a queer little half-whistle and snapped his watch to again. "But I think we should have been told if there was anything up—don't you, Mr. Gaven?"

"Oh, yes, Mr. Hammond! I don't think there's anything to—anything to worry about," said Mr. Gaven, knocking out his pipe against the heel of his shoe. "At the same time——"

"Quite so! Quite so!" cried Mr. Hammond. "Dashed annoying!" He paced quickly up and down and came back again to his stand between Mr. and Mrs. Scott and Mr. Gaven. "It's getting quite dark, too," and he waved his folded umbrella as though the dusk at least might have had the decency to keep off for a bit. But the dusk came slowly, spreading like a slow stain over the water. Little Jean Scott dragged at her mother's hand.

"I wan' my tea, mammy!" she wailed.

"I expect you do," said Mr. Hammond. "I expect all these ladies want their tea." And his kind, flushed, almost pitiful glance roped them all in again. He wondered whether Janey was having a final cup of tea in the saloon out there. He hoped so; he thought not. It would be just like her not to leave the deck. In that case perhaps the deck steward would bring her up a cup. If he'd been there he'd have got it for her—somehow. And for a moment he was on deck, standing over her, watching her little hand fold round the cup in the way she had, while she drank the only cup of tea to be got on board. . . . But now he was back here, and the Lord only knew when that cursed Captain would stop hanging about in the stream. He took another turn, up and down, up and down. He walked as far as the cab-stand to make sure his driver hadn't disappeared; back he swerved again to the little flock huddled in the shelter of the banana crates. Little Jean Scott was still wanting her tea. Poor little beggar! He wished he had a bit of chocolate on him.

"Here, Jean!" he said. "Like a lift up?" And easily, gently, he swung the little girl on to a higher barrel. The movement of holding her, steadying her, relieved him wonderfully, lightened his heart.

"Hold on," he said, keeping an arm round her.

"Oh, don't worry about Jean, Mr. Hammond!" said Mrs. Scott.

"That's all right, Mrs. Scott. No trouble. It's a pleasure. Jean's a little pal of mine, aren't you, Jean?"

"Yes, Mr. Hammond," said Jean, and she ran her finger down the dent of his felt hat.

But suddenly she caught him by the ear and gave a loud scream. "Lo-ok, Mr. Hammond! She's moving! Look, she's coming in!"

By Jove! So she was. At last! She was slowly, slowly turning round. A bell sounded far over the water and a great spout of steam gushed into the air. The gulls rose; they fluttered away like bits of white paper. And whether that deep throbbing was her engines or his heart Mr. Hammond couldn't say. He had to nerve himself to bear it, whatever it was. At that moment old Captain Johnson, the harbour-master, came striding down the wharf, a leather portfolio under his arm.

"Jean'll be all right," said Mr. Scott. "I'll hold her." He was just in time. Mr. Hammond had forgotten about Jean. He sprang away to greet old Captain Johnson.

"Well, Captain," the eager, nervous voice rang out again, "you've taken pity on us at last."

"It's no good blaming me, Mr. Hammond," wheezed old Captain Johnson, staring at the liner. "You got Mrs. Hammond on board, ain't yer?"

"Yes, yes!" said Hammond, and he kept by the harbour-master's side. "Mrs. Hammond's there. Hul-lo! We shan't be long now!"

With her telephone ring-ringing, the thrum of her screw filling the air, the big liner bore down on them, cutting sharp through the dark water so that big white shavings curled to either side. Hammond and the harbour-master kept in front of the rest. Hammond took off his hat; he raked the decks—they were crammed with passengers; he waved his hat and bawled a loud, strange "Hul-lo!" across the water; and then turned round and burst out laughing and said something—nothing—to old Captain Johnson.

"Seen her?" asked the harbour-master.

"No, not yet. Steady—wait a bit!" And suddenly, between two great clumsy idiots—"Get out of the way there!" he signed with his umbrella—he saw a hand raised—a white glove shaking a handkerchief. Another moment, and—thank God, thank God!—there she was. There was Janey.

There was Mrs. Hammond, yes, yes, yes—standing by the rail and smiling and nodding and waving her handkerchief.

"Well, that's first class—first class! Well, well, well!" He positively stamped. Like lightning he drew out his cigar-case and offered it to old Captain Johnson. "Have a cigar, Captain! They're pretty good. Have a couple! Here"—and he pressed all the cigars in the case on the harbour-master—"I've a couple of boxes up at the hotel."

"Thanks, Mr. Hammond!" wheezed old Captain Johnson.

Hammond stuffed the cigar-case back. His hands were shaking, but he'd got hold of himself again. He was able to face Janey. There she was, leaning on the rail, talking to some woman and at the same time watching him, ready for him. It struck him, as the gulf of water closed, how small she looked on that huge ship. His heart was wrung with such a spasm that he could have cried out. How little she looked to have come all that long way and back by herself! Just like her, though. Just like Janey. She had the courage of a— And now the crew had come forward and parted the passengers; they had lowered the rails for the gangways.

The voices on shore and the voices on board flew to greet each other.

"All well?"

"All well."

"How's mother?"

"Much better."

"Hullo, Jean!"

"Hillo, Aun' Emily!"

"Had a good voyage?"

"Splendid!"

"Shan't be long now!"

"Not long now."

The engines stopped. Slowly she edged to the wharf-side.

"Make way there—make way—make way!" And the wharf hands brought the heavy gangways along at a sweeping run. Hammond signed to Janey to stay where she was. The old harbour-master stepped forward; he followed. As to "ladies first," or any rot like that, it never entered his head.

"After you, Captain!" he cried genially. And, treading on the old man's heels, he strode up the gangway on to the deck in a bee-line to Janey, and Janey was clasped in his arms.

"Well, well, well! Yes, yes! Here we are at last!" he stammered. It was all he could say. And Janey emerged, and her cool little voice—the only voice in the world for him—said,

"Well, darling! Have you been waiting long?"

No; not long. Or, at any rate, it didn't matter. It was over now. But the point was, he had a cab waiting at the end of the wharf. Was she ready to go off? Was her luggage ready? In that case they could cut off sharp with her cabin luggage and let the rest go hang until to-morrow. He bent over her and she looked up with her familiar half-smile. She was just the same. Not a day changed. Just as he'd always known her. She laid her small hand on his sleeve.

"How are the children, John?" she asked.

(Hang the children!) "Perfectly well. Never better in their lives."

"Haven't they sent me letters?"

"Yes, yes—of course! I've left them at the hotel for you to digest later on."

"We can't go quite so fast," said she. "I've got people to say good-bye to—and then there's the Captain." As his face fell she gave his arm a small understanding squeeze. "If the Captain comes off the bridge I want you to thank him for having looked after your wife so beautifully." Well, he'd got her. If she wanted another ten minutes— As he gave way she was surrounded. The whole first-class seemed to want to say good-bye to Janey.

"Good-bye, dear Mrs. Hammond! And next time you're in Sydney I'll expect you."

"Darling Mrs. Hammond! You won't forget to write to me, will you?"

"Well, Mrs. Hammond, what this boat would have been without you!"

It was as plain as a pikestaff that she was by far the most popular woman on board. And she took it all—just as usual. Absolutely composed. Just her little self—just Janey all over; standing there with her veil thrown back. Hammond never noticed what his wife had on. It was all the same to him whatever she wore. But to-day he did notice that she wore a black "costume"—didn't they call it?—with white frills, trimmings he supposed they were, at the neck and sleeves. All this while Janey handed him round.

"John, dear!" And then: "I want to introduce you to——"

Finally they did escape, and she led the way to her state-room. To follow Janey down the passage that she knew so well—that was so strange to him; to part the green curtains after her and to step into the cabin that had been hers gave him exquisite happiness. But—confound it!—the stewardess was there on the floor, strapping up the rugs.

"That's the last, Mrs. Hammond," said the stewardess, rising and pulling down her cuffs.

He was introduced again, and then Janey and the stewardess disappeared into the passage. He heard whisperings. She was getting the tipping business over, he supposed. He sat down on the striped sofa and took his hat off. There were the rugs she had taken with her; they looked good as new. All her luggage looked fresh, perfect. The labels were written in her beautiful little clear hand—"Mrs. John Hammond."

"Mrs. John Hammond!" He gave a long sigh of content and leaned back, crossing his arms. The strain was over. He felt he could have sat there for ever sighing his relief—the relief at being rid of that horrible tug, pull, grip on his heart. The danger was over. That was the feeling. They were on dry land again.

But at that moment Janey's head came round the corner.

"Darling—do you mind? I just want to go and say good-bye to the doctor."

Hammond started up. "I'll come with you."

"No, no!" she said. "Don't bother. I'd rather not. I'll not be a minute."

And before he could answer she was gone. He had half a mind to run after her; but instead he sat down again.

Would she really not be long? What was the time now? Out came the watch; he stared at nothing. That was rather queer of Janey, wasn't it? Why couldn't she have told the stewardess to say good-bye for her? Why did she have to go chasing after the ship's doctor? She could have sent a note from the hotel even if the affair had been urgent. Urgent? Did it—could it mean that she had been ill on the voyage—she was keeping something from him? That was it! He seized his hat. He was going off to find that fellow to wring the truth out of him at all costs. He thought he'd noticed just something. She was just a touch too calm—too steady. From the very first moment—

The curtains rang. Janey was back. He jumped to his feet.

"Janey, have you been ill on this voyage? You have!"

"Ill?" Her airy little voice mocked him. She stepped over the rugs, and came up close, touched his breast, and looked up at him.

"Darling," she said, "don't frighten me. Of course I haven't! Whatever makes you think I have? Do I look ill?"

But Hammond didn't see her. He only felt that she was looking at him and that there was no need to worry about anything. She was here to look after things. It was all right. Everything was.

The gentle pressure of her hand was so calming that he put his over hers to hold it there. And she said:

"Stand still. I want to look at you. I haven't seen you yet. You've had your beard beautifully trimmed, and you look—younger, I think, and decidedly thinner! Bachelor life agrees with you."

"Agrees with me!" He groaned for love and caught her close again. And again, as always, he had the feeling he was holding something that never was quite his—his. Something too delicate, too precious, that would fly away once he let go.

"For God's sake let's get off to the hotel so that we can be by ourselves!" And he rang the bell hard for someone to look sharp with the luggage.

Walking down the wharf together she took his arm. He had her on his arm again. And the difference it made to get into the cab after Janey—to throw the red-and-yellow striped blanket round them both—to tell the driver to hurry because neither of them had had any tea. No more going without his tea or pouring out his own. She was back. He turned to her, squeezed her hand, and said gently, teasingly, in the "special" voice he had for her: "Glad to be home again, dearie?" She smiled; she didn't even bother to answer, but gently she drew his hand away as they came to the brighter streets.

"We've got the best room in the hotel," he said. "I wouldn't be put off with another. And I asked the chambermaid to put in a bit of a fire in case you felt chilly. She's a nice, attentive girl. And I thought now we were here we wouldn't bother to go home to-morrow, but spend the day looking round and leave the morning after. Does that suit you? There's no hurry, is there? The children will have you soon enough. . . . I thought a day's sight-seeing might make a nice break in your journey—eh, Janey?"

"Have you taken the tickets for the day after?" she asked.

"I should think I have!" He unbuttoned his overcoat and took out his bulging pocket-book. "Here we are! I reserved a first-class carriage to Cooktown. There it is—'Mr. and Mrs. John Hammond.' I thought we might as well do ourselves comfortably, and we don't want other people butting in, do we? But if you'd like to stop here a bit longer——?"

"Oh, no!" said Janey quickly. "Not for the world! The day after to-morrow, then. And the children——"

But they had reached the hotel. The manager was standing in the broad, brilliantly lighted porch. He came down to greet them. A porter ran from the hall for their boxes.

"Well, Mr. Arnold, here's Mrs. Hammond at last!"

The manager led them through the hall himself and pressed the elevator-bell. Hammond knew there were business pals of his sitting at the little hall tables having a drink before dinner. But he wasn't going to risk interruption; he looked neither to the right nor the left. They could think what they pleased. If they didn't understand, the more fools they—and he stepped out of the lift, unlocked the door of their room, and shepherded Janey in. The door shut. Now, at last, they were alone together. He turned up the light. The curtains were drawn; the fire blazed. He flung his hat on to the huge bed and went towards her.

But—would you believe it?—again they were interrupted. This time it was the porter with the luggage. He made two journeys of it, leaving the door open in between, taking his time, whistling through his teeth in the corridor. Hammond paced up and down the room, tearing off his gloves, tearing off his scarf. Finally he flung his overcoat on to the bedside.

At last the fool was gone. The door clicked. Now they were alone. Said Hammond: "I feel I'll never have you to myself again. These cursed people! Janey"—and he bent his flushed, eager gaze upon her—"let's have dinner up here. If we go down to the restaurant we'll be interrupted, and then there's the confounded music" (the music he'd praised so highly, applauded so loudly last night!). "We shan't be able to hear each other speak. Let's have something up here in front of the fire. It's too late for tea. I'll order a little supper, shall I? How does that idea strike you?"

"Do, darling!" said Janey. "And while you're away—the children's letters——"

"Oh, later on will do!" said Hammond.

"But then we'd get it over," said Janey. "And I'd first have time to——"

"Oh, I needn't go down!" explained Hammond. "I'll just ring and give the order . . . you don't want to send me away, do you?"

Janey shook her head and smiled.

"But you're thinking of something else. You're worrying about something," said Hammond. "What is it? Come and sit here—come and sit on my knee before the fire."

"I'll just unpin my hat," said Janey, and she went over to the dressing-table. "A-ah!" She gave a little cry.

"What is it?"

"Nothing, darling. I've just found the children's letters. That's all right! They will keep. No hurry now!" She turned to him, clasping them. She tucked them into her frilled blouse. She cried quickly, gaily: "Oh, how typical this dressing-table is of you!"

"Why? What's the matter with it?" said Hammond.

"If it were floating in eternity I should say 'John!'" laughed Janey, staring at the big bottle of hair tonic, the wicker bottle of eau-de-Cologne, the two hair-brushes, and a dozen new collars tied with pink tape. "Is this all your luggage?"

"Hang my luggage!" said Hammond; but all the same he liked being laughed at by Janey. "Let's talk. Let's get down to things. Tell me"—and as Janey perched on his knees he leaned back and drew her into the deep, ugly chair—"tell me you're really glad to be back, Janey."

"Yes, darling, I am glad," she said.

But just as when he embraced her he felt she would fly away, so Hammond never knew—never knew for dead certain that she was as glad as he was. How could he know? Would he ever know? Would he always have this craving—this pang like hunger, somehow, to make Janey so much part of him that there wasn't any of her to escape? He wanted to blot out everybody, everything. He wished now he'd turned off the light. That might have brought her nearer. And now those letters from the children rustled in her blouse. He could have chucked them into the fire.

"Janey," he whispered.

"Yes, dear?" She lay on his breast, but so lightly, so remotely. Their breathing rose and fell together.

"Janey!"

"What is it?"

"Turn to me," he whispered. A slow, deep flush flowed into his forehead. "Kiss me, Janey! You kiss me!"

It seemed to him there was a tiny pause—but long enough for him to suffer torture—before her lips touched his, firmly, lightly—kissing them as she always kissed him, as though the kiss—how could he describe it?—confirmed what they were saying, signed the contract. But that wasn't what he wanted; that wasn't at all what he thirsted for. He felt suddenly, horribly tired.

"If you knew," he said, opening his eyes, "what it's been like—waiting to-day. I thought the boat never would come in. There we were, hanging about. What kept you so long?"

She made no answer. She was looking away from him at the fire. The flames hurried—hurried over the coals, flickered, fell.

"Not asleep, are you?" said Hammond, and he jumped her up and down.

"No," she said. And then: "Don't do that, dear. No, I was thinking. As a matter of fact," she said, "one of the passengers died last night—a man. That's what held us up. We brought him in—I mean, he wasn't buried at sea. So, of course, the ship's doctor and the shore doctor——"

"What was it?" asked Hammond uneasily. He hated to hear of death. He hated this to have happened. It was, in some queer way, as though he and Janey had met a funeral on their way to the hotel.

"Oh, it wasn't anything in the least infectious!" said Janey. She was speaking scarcely above her breath. "It was heart." A pause. "Poor fellow!" she said. "Quite young." And she watched the fire flicker and fall. "He died in my arms," said Janey.

The blow was so sudden that Hammond thought he would faint. He couldn't move; he couldn't breathe. He felt all his strength flowing—flowing into the big dark chair, and the big dark chair held him fast, gripped him, forced him to bear it.

"What?" he said dully. "What's that you say?"

"The end was quite peaceful," said the small voice. "He just"—and Hammond saw her lift her gentle hand—"breathed his life away at the end." And her hand fell.

"Who—else was there?" Hammond managed to ask.

"Nobody. I was alone with him."

Ah, my God, what was she saying! What was she doing to him! This would kill him! And all the while she spoke:

"I saw the change coming and I sent the steward for the doctor, but the doctor was too late. He couldn't have done anything anyway."

"But—why you, why you?" moaned Hammond.

At that Janey turned quickly, quickly searched his face.

"You don't mind, John, do you?" she asked. "You don't—— It's nothing to do with you and me."

Somehow or other he managed to shake some sort of smile at her. Somehow or other he stammered: "No—go—on, go on! I want you to tell me."

"But, John darling——"

"Tell me, Janey!"

"There's nothing to tell," she said, wondering. "He was one of the first-class passengers. I saw he was very ill when he came on board. . . . But he seemed to be so much better until yesterday. He had a severe attack in the afternoon—excitement—nervousness, I think, about arriving. And after that he never recovered."

"But why didn't the stewardess——"

"Oh, my dear—the stewardess!" said Janey. "What would he have felt? And besides . . . he might have wanted to leave a message . . . to——"

"Didn't he?" muttered Hammond. "Didn't he say anything?"

"No, darling, not a word!" She shook her head softly. "All the time I was with him he was too weak . . . he was too weak even to move a finger. . . ."

Janey was silent. But her words, so light, so soft, so chill, seemed to hover in the air, to rain into his breast like snow.

The fire had gone red. Now it fell in with a sharp sound and the room was colder. Cold crept up his arms. The room was huge, immense, glittering. It filled his whole world. There was the great blind bed, with his coat flung across it like some headless man saying his prayers. There was the luggage, ready to be carried away again, anywhere, tossed into trains, carted on to boats.

. . . "He was too weak. He was too weak to move a finger." And yet he died in Janey's arms. She—who'd never—never once in all these years—never on one single solitary occasion——

No; he mustn't think of it. Madness lay in thinking of it. No, he wouldn't face it. He couldn't stand it. It was too much to bear!

And now Janey touched his tie with her fingers. She pinched the edges of the tie together.

"You're not—sorry I told you, John darling? It hasn't made you sad? It hasn't spoilt our evening—our being alone together?"

But at that he had to hide his face. He put his face into her bosom and his arms enfolded her.

Spoilt their evening! Spoilt their being alone together! They would never be alone together again.

THE HOUSE OF MOURNING

Franz Werfel

(1890- )

TRANSLATED BY H. T. LOWE-PORTER

INTRODUCTION

UPON THE TRAGEDY follows the satyr-play: both equally grisly. Idea, empire, overthrow—what sounding words for a play that is always and ever the same! No downfall on earth is so great that it has not its comic side, its matter for laughter. A relief, that is all, a relief of the guard. One mid-day the company of the castle ward falls in with clatter and ring for the last time. The rolling drum thunders through the court; once more the snarling words of command bark like ravens through the air; once more the sentries with echoing tread parade to their last position on the stone-flagged pavement; the venerable, the glorious banner of a world-famous regiment, tattered in a hundred frays, sinks, with its golden tip pointing earthwards. Tomorrow, perhaps, it will already have begun to moulder in a museum. What has happened? Nothing. Time has cleared his throat, world-history batted an eye. But we, hurrah, we were there! Our children were not. And our brilliantly technicized grandchildren have not even an idea of the emotional experiences we went through.

The title of the following satyr-play in the form of a short story is once more a play upon words. That a house of mourning is a house where a death is being mourned goes without saying. But the German language possesses a pendant to the phrase: it speaks of a "house of joy." It might be inferred that such a place, as the literal opposite of a house of mourning, is one where a newcomer to the earthly scene is being given a joyous welcome. Not a maternity clinic, of course! No, nothing like that at all, language is not so logical. And in fact, the arrival of a new little citizen in a "house of joy" would be a painful incident and very awkward for the business. In other words, chosen with care so as not to offend fastidious ears, a house of joy is a shame-faced shelter for shameless pleasures, where one can procure at fixed prices both the joys of Bacchus and the joys of Venus. Even this definition sounds blatant and coarse, in contrast to the complacent French "maison." And how crude, too, as applied to the unique and singular establishment introduced to the reader in the story which follows!

Situated in a large provincial capital in the heart of the empire—the identity of the city will not be given with any more particularity—secluded in a romantic fastness, the establishment differed most emphatically from all others called by the same name. It was not only a house of joys, but one of intellectual pretensions too. The quite peculiar genius loci elevated it far above its kind, and its own nightly activities and raison d'être as well. It was more than a house, it was a meeting-place. Why should not the empire, which after all was the fading shadow of the Roman imperium, why should not it too possess a meeting-place which, strictly speaking, was a lupanar? At all events, such was the fact. It was the rather extraordinary rendezvous of both the young and the old of the upper classes—at least of such as did not cling to a puritanical morality or languish in too austere matrimonial bonds. Many of the guests, indeed, took small interest in the more questionable diversions of the place; they came to enjoy the relaxations of the prevailing atmosphere, so favourable to æsthetic and philosophical discussion. After all, not the worst sayings of the great Socrates were uttered in a group of hetæræ, flute-players, and fils de joie. Well, then, scholars, writers, and philosophers paid visits to this ancient establishment, to say nothing of the hereditary nobles, cavalry officers, officials, lawyers, and actors who were its prescriptive guests.

This memorable lupanar often harboured for some hours of the night the cream of the youth who would one day play an important role in the affairs of the empire. As for the corresponding femininity there active, it was less socially creamy, but on the other hand more highly coloured. All the peoples of the monarchy, the freshest, most unexhausted stocks, had sent thither their prettiest girls—many of them were peasants. The country innocence of soul, which strangely enough, these Magdalenes often preserved, was not inconsistent with their profession; indeed, a sturdy naïveté, even on this plane, was one of the mysteries of the Austrian temperament—in the grosser and more grasping resorts of western Europe one would hardly meet with their like.

Down to the very last hour before their deliverance, upon the polished parquetry of that most singular salon, these blithe and serviceable handmaids of the empire shrieked and sang and ate and drank and danced and wrangled with the guests of the house, unforced, symbolic. And destiny, in that very hour, found an easy way past the narrow door, narrow though it was; and, equally unforced and symbolic, turned the house of joy into a house of mourning. As I shall now relate.

I

It would have been a night like any other if two events had not broken into it and disturbed its course.

Four of the five tables in the Grand Salon were full at ten o'clock; also the Blue Salon, usually occupied by upper officialdom, noblemen of high rank, and the leading figures of finance and industry, was well frequented at any early hour. In the Blue Room one ordered only champagne; it was open only to guests above a certain rank, paying not less than a certain income tax. It was hung with tapestries and had an ingenious arrangement of mirrors which, so people said, were for the purpose of performance in common of the more raffiné kinds of vice. The guests in the Grand Salon knew only by hearsay what went on in the Blue Salon; even where they were, the drinking of a bottle of sour wine was an expensive amusement. But since the consumption of drinks was after all not the establishment's main source of income, regular habitués of the Grand Salon had certain quantities of coffee and brandy meted out to them.

This is not to dim the lustre of the Grand Salon. It was absolutely first-class: Renaissance furniture, heavily gilt; red velvet curtains and a parquet dance floor smooth as glass. This was, in short, an establishment which could tranquilly repudiate the name applied to it by a poverty-stricken and inarticulate vocabulary. And even if you used the word, you would have to put R.-and-I. in front of it. For everything here mirrored for the beholder—if rather self-consciously in such a setting—the period of the Dual Monarchy: the plush furniture, the gilded arabesques, the etchings (which depicted not only scenes of gallantry, all quite decorous, but also the noble sport of horse-racing), the dust-traps, the moth-eaten sumptuousness, even the Imperial portrait hanging in the kitchen—all these were a survival of the Renaissance splendours of a proud and vanished decade.

Until well on in the war there had been three institutions in the city which preserved in all its purity this quasi-official character. These were the pâtisserie Stutzig; the dancing-school founded by Herr Pirnik, in a beautiful baroque palace near the famous bridge—a place of great distinction where the youth of the upper bourgeoisie could learn the waltz, the polka, Sir Roger de Coverley, the tirolienne, and even the classic quadrille—and, finally, the establishment which is the scene of our story.

It was, I believe, the last to disappear.

II

The ladies, except those on private service, were all at their posts. They paced the room with swaying step, made rapturous eyes at themselves in the mirrors, coolly helped themselves to the guests' cigarettes, and now and then with detached and condescending air sat for a while at the tables. They seemed to be full of a consciousness of their own dignity, a dignity which communicated itself to every pensionnaire of this famous and superior establishment. To be received here was to have entry to the upper circles. The sense of dignity I mean found expression in various ways: for instance, these ladies differed from the ones in most other establishments in that they did not wear short frocks, but appeared in fantastic négligées, flowing morning garments; Valeska, the most magnificent, wore a proper ball-gown, which would certainly have received comment in the newspapers if it had appeared at the carnival ball. Despite these hampering garments one did sometimes get a glimpse of their legs as they took a cigarette-case or powder-puff out of their stockings.

Only one, Ludmilla, wore a short skirt; and with her slender childish figure she could scarcely have done otherwise. She noticeably lacked the superficial restlessness, the idle unquiet, which is characteristic of the profession of such ladies, which made them sit and stand by turns and neither for long, or urged them up and down the room like caged animals. Ludmilla sat still, on the right side of the military tables, attending with the utmost seriousness to Lieutenant Kohout's exposition, as though she did not want to lose any opportunity of being instructed. She gave no sign of mental disturbance.

Lieutenant Kohout, Twenty-Third Field-Artillery Regiment, had with him two young men of the same service, both of them one-year volunteers. Their intercourse had the false and insecure familiarity which characterizes relations between superiors and inferiors when they waive distinctions of rank and sit at the same table. The manœuvres were close at hand and with them the alarming spectre of the examinations for reserve officers.

The lieutenant, staring with his watery eyes straight at Ludmilla, was encouraging the two volunteers, who faced the future with qualms.

"Let me tell you," said he, looking to Ludmilla for approval, "I did not have it so easy with the ensign's exam, and you've been at school, you are educated. Colonel von Wurmser looks me sharp in the eye: 'Deputy Cadet-Officer Kohout!' says he. 'What do you know about Julius Cæsar?' I pull myself together and shout out: 'Your obedient servant, Herr Oberst—nothing!' Second question: 'Deputy Cadet-Officer Kohout! What do you know about Charlemagne?' I pull myself together a bit more and yell: 'Obedient servant, Herr Oberst—nothing!' The Colonel waits a bit, then he says: 'Deputy Cadet-Officer Kohout! What do you know about the Emperor Joseph?' But there I've got him. I clap my heels together so they crack: 'Obedient servant, Herr Oberst, but which Kaiser Joseph? aren't there two of them?' Colonel von Wurmser says: 'Well, well!' But I got through at that! So you see, one just has to act like a soldier, not a civilian. And that's all there is to it!"

Ludmilla looked at the lieutenant with sympathy and understanding. She did not laugh. Her childish brow was sternly concentrated beneath the heavy blond hair which God had given her. She seemed to be in full agreement with the healthy attitude taken by the lieutenant: military, not civil! In every respect she inclined to strictness in her views of the world-order.

One of the volunteers began to caress her legs under the table; she submitted, only moving a little aside. The clever girl full realized that military distinctions of rank, and the mutual embarrassment between superior and inferior, would put a damper on further advances and appetites—and just that was what she needed today.

Anyhow she felt better here than she would have felt at the next table, where Ilonka, the “fat Hungarian bitch,” was making up to two old men. And what old men! One of them surely came from the country, from some place that Ludmilla hated without ever having seen it. He had an enormous watch-chain across his paunch; you wondered whether the watch-chain was there for the paunch or the paunch for the watch-chain. She had seen such things before. In the hole she came from, a man was respected only after he had eaten himself a belly of the right proportions for a watch-chain. He was a proper “Baalboth,” that man.

It was Jenny, the Jewess, who had introduced this mysterious word: a legendary predecessor of the present ladies; she now lived in Vienna, where she owned a large coffee-house on the Franz-Josef Quay. Jenny was the pattern and prototype of a successful career in the profession. Hardly a day passed but her glorious record was cited as an example. As for the word Baalboth, it signified a rich man from the provinces, who came to the capital overnight to give full satisfaction to his need for “love-life,” but who never paid a penny over and above the tax.

And that pig of an Ilonka was sucking around the Baalboth. He was good for ten gulden. But Ludmilla granted that neither of the two old fools (shame on these fat-gutted old fathers of families for coming to a knocking-house!) was after Ilonka. The Baalboth never looked at her; he kept rolling his eyes towards Ludmilla, but she gave him not even a haughty glance. Clients like that were nothing to her. He might talk as loud as he liked to impress her with his self-important ideas. And actually he had raised his voice so high as to be heard all over the salon:

“Organization, Herr Kraus, organization,” he boomed, while his covetous eyes did not look at Herr Kraus but besought the favours of Ludmilla.

“When you look up at the sky, Herr Kraus, what do you see there? Organization! And when you look at an ant-heap? Ditto. Our German brother up in the Reich is right: Organization in economic and political life. But we here in Austria . . .”

The Baalboth sighed, depressed by the sorry state of the Fatherland and the defeat of his amorous approaches.

Herr Kraus sighed too, entirely convinced of the sad situation.

“Yes, I read something just like that in the newspaper today.”

Ludmilla tried to find some other direction for her eyes. There was the “young” table, good-naturedly boycotted by most of the girls, because the youngsters never could spend very much and used the Grand Salon mainly as a place where they stimulated themselves by dancing and discussion. Those two rhinoceros-hides, Manya and Anita, were sitting there, of course, laughing with his friends, who had just come in. But Oscar had not come, neither today nor yesterday nor the day before. For the first time! Ludmilla would sooner have thrown herself out of the window than gone up to the table and asked about him. She did not even answer the others' greetings. Manya laughed aloud, high and clear. Let her laugh; she was nothing but the daughter of the grave-digger of Rokycany, with her huge dirty legs which the year before had most likely been running after the village geese. Grave-digger; that was only a shade better than being a hangman or a knacker.

Ludmilla preferred to look over at the clever people in the corner, the Jews, who never drank wine or brandy but only coffee. Grete, the crazy girl from Berlin, was practising her charms upon them. She nodded pleasantly at Grete, a friendly gesture which surprised the other ladies no little. They were not used to it from the reserved creature. And Grete, on account of her "education," was an object of general aversion. But Ludmilla had seen Grete embracing and kissing her Doctor Schleissner. And she had suddenly felt a sort of good-natured envy and the impulse to send a signal of understanding across to her colleague. She did not envy her Schleissner. Certainly not. How can one love a man who talks all the time, who has got such an enormous nose, and wiry black hair which he keeps twisting in his fingers? What does the man do when he isn't talking? Can he keep quiet at all, can he sleep, can he love? Certainly a man like that knows nothing about tenderness.

But Grete's room was full of pictures of writers. And she had albums full of poems and signatures, which the odious female kept thrusting under the noses of the other ladies. A daft creature!

Ludmilla regretted her friendly gesture, for Grete squealed out in rapture over something Schleissner had said:

"That such a man must die! That such a brain must rot under the earth!"

Ludmilla was relieved when Fräulein Edith, the housekeeper, came in, bringing a fresh bottle of wine for the two old men and the coffee-tray for four people at the "clever" table in the corner.

The sight of Fräulein Edith's solid, fresh, and beaming personality always had power to raise Ludmilla's spirits.

In every human activity there is a natural hierarchy and order of precedence. What the command of the regiment was to Lieutenant Kohout, that, to the ladies of the house, at least to the decent ones, was the position of housekeeper. In this case the incumbent was pretty, not old, scarcely thirty; her muscular and expansive figure was at its best. She was exempt from duty. She need not respond, she might follow the dictates of her heart. She kept all the books, the boarders' accounts, pronounced on their value to the establishment, and her contract allowed her two subscription seats in the new Deutsches Theatre.

The girls were taken only every two weeks to enjoy a Sunday afternoon performance, but Edith sat twice a week in the parquet, and the girls jealously competed for the honour of occupying the other seat.

It was on such an occasion—they were giving The Violet Man—that Ludmilla saw Oscar for the first time. No one could have said that the lean, hollow-cheeked novice cut a good figure in the small role of a Prussian officer. But she, in her clear-sightedness, had fallen in love with the inconspicuous youth.

She got up from the table, left the protesting lieutenant, and went to Fräulein Edith. The housekeeper took her caressingly round the waist:

"The wretch hasn't come again!"

Ludmilla overcame her tears by giving vent to a strong word, though it went to her heart as she said it. Edith consoled her:

"Silly! You'll get over that. What is a man? When he is very genteel, a hundred crowns in trousers. And anybody like you! You wouldn't let him make a fool of you! Shame on you!"

"But what shall I do, Edith, if somebody wants to go with me? . . ."

Edith was already prepared. For Ludmilla's sake she was willing to shut her managerial eye:

"You know what, Milly," she whispered, "I'll screen you. Go upstairs and lock yourself in."

Ludmilla stamped her foot. "Jesus and Mary! I couldn't. I couldn't stand it upstairs."

Edith soothed her, one eye on her duties:

"I know all that. Been through it, darling. Has it hurt me? Look at me, and just don't care!"

The housekeeper turned away to her duties. There were more guests come, the Grand Salon was full. Laughter and ringing of glasses sounded from the Blue Room. But there was something not in order. Fräulein Edith flew into a rage, her deep voice had a threat in it:

"Where is Nejedli?"

At that very moment Herr Nejedli bobbed up and paid his compliments to the guests:

"Beg the assembled company's pardon. But I was engaged at a children's ball. Lasted a long time. Until now."

The housekeeper's stern eye countenanced no humbug. Nejedli's hand felt eagerly and guiltily about above the floor:

"Little children, no higher'n that, I tell you, Fräulein Edith, just sweet li'l' childr'n——"

The old man hurried to the piano and began to enliven the mood of the evening by thundering out Fucik's "Gladiators' March."

III

Herr Nejedli, the pianist, had four distinguishing characteristics. In the first place he wore a "tom-cat" over his bald spot; that is to say a sort of transformation, in his case of a quite different colour from the fringe of hair round the edge. The "tom-cat" was a chestnut-brown, the fringe snow-white. Who could expect that a man who plays piano at a night club could keep himself supplied with hair of enough colours to keep pace with his advancing age?

His second peculiarity was even stranger. It consisted of a composite aura which he spread abroad, composed of the scents of greasy pomade, aniseed brandy, and old age.

The third peculiarity was the description, with variations, of the accidents to which his daughter Rosalie had fallen victim. The tragedy of these accidents grew deeper in proportion to the number of drinks Herr Nejedli had had. Never had a more pitiable creature lived than this Rosa, of whom initiated souls asserted that she had really blossomed, and was not the mere monstrous creation of the alcoholic brain.

But whatever, and whether, she had been, according to her father she had died that very day of tuberculosis; yesterday she had fallen out of the window, or else a railway accident had to be conjured up to account for her demise. Whatever the cause of death, tears of deep and genuine feeling would pour down the old man's cheeks as he told his tale.

But the most striking of Herr Nejedli's peculiarities lay in the fact that as an eight-year-old boy he had been the "royal and imperial titular prodigy" at the former court of the Emperor Ferdinand the Good up on the Hradčany—it was thus that he himself designated his extraordinary rank. This brilliant past of his was often the subject of banter.

Herr Doktor Schleissner, who loved to play the part of habitu  and introducer of strangers, came up to the piano and presented a tall, gloomy, dignified man:

"May I present the gentlemen to each other? Our great virtuoso, Herr Nejedli, Herr President Mor ."

"No names, I beg you," whispered the gloomy man, with a face of anguish, as though somebody had trodden on his toe.

Schleissner begged pardon:

"Forget the name, Nejedli! But do not forget that the President of the Spinoza Society and Master of the Order of Sons of the League stands before you."

Old Nejedli sprang up.

"An honour, Herr President! I know the Herr President already if I may say so. I had the honour yesterday at the funeral of Imperial Counsellor Habrda . . ."

Mor  cut the interview short. He did not like to be reminded of funerals, since they stood in close connexion with his business, the nature of which he preferred to conceal. In other words, the President of the Spinoza Society was listed in trade journals as agent for gravestones and monuments. He formed a bridge between the sorrowing survivors, the monument business, and the reputation of the deceased in the community. It is not surprising that the large number of honorary offices on the one side and the business connexion with death on the other accounted for the President's serious bearing and his long priestlike coat.

He seemed to be here for the first time. He slowly carried a folded handkerchief to his mouth; the inadequate but symbolic gesture seemed to signify that a man like him, in such surroundings as these, would do well to conceal his too-familiar features.

But Doctor Schleissner wanted to give the President some entertainment. He turned to the pianist:

"Can you tell us about Kaiser Ferdinand the Good and your concerts, Nejedli?"

The old man bent nervously over the keys.

"Seems to me, gentlemen, you want me to commit high treason and lèse-majesté. There are nothing but balmilchomes here in the room——"

Moré gave him a sinister look.

Nejedli hastened to say:

"Balmilchome, Herr President, is what the Israelites call a soldier or an underling in active military service."

Schleissner tried to soothe him:

"In the first place, nobody can hear you, and in the second nobody has an idea who Kaiser Ferdinand was."

Nejedli eagerly explained:

"The dear departed uncle of our own Kaiser. They deposed him in the '48, in Olmütz. I remember him like today. He lived in the castle up there, and every day he came down in a coach and pair—Lipizzan white horses of course—and drove to the Baumgarten or in the Canal Park."

The President asked, in his deep, oratorical voice:

"And was he really so good?"

At the words his solemn countenance took on the flattered expression of a man whose thoughts are dwelling with emotion on illustrious personages.

Nejedli rolled his eyes mysteriously.

"No, he was not good, but he was cracked."

Schleissner encouraged him:

"You were an infant prodigy and gave concerts in the castle."

Nejedli's bony fingers executed a run on the piano.

"Trust me, Herr Doktor, I was in request as a prodigy. I gave concerts in the Spanish salon. The whole plenititulo nobility was there, court and society. There was His Grace Count Kolowrat; he sat here, and over there Her Serene Highness the Princess Lobkowitz. I can see her as though it were today. A beauty, she was, on my word. And then His Excellency the Governor of Bohemia and Corps-Commandant Count . . . Count . . . what the devil was his name?"

Doctor Schleissner bent forward inquisitively.

Nejedli's fingers trilled up the keyboard again.

"At that time, gentlemen, I had a memory; and fingers, if I may say so. I played off my whole programme by heart: 'Evening Bells,' Mon Souvenir, 'Overture to Wilhelm Tell,' and 'Arrangement from La Juive.' Yes, and today I can play only a little by heart, and not from notes at all, on account of my sight having gone wrong. I have wept my eyes out. Herr Doktor knows, since I had the misfortune with Roser! . . ."

Doctor Schleissner quickly and tactfully brought him back to his subject. Nejedli's hands executed a tune as he went on:

"Yes, gentlemen, in that day I really could play well. The court and company applauded and wanted it all da capo. The ladies looked at me through their glasses, all emotion. And His Majesty the Emperor applauded too and came up to me: 'Bravo, bravo!' he cried; and I make my little curtsy, small boy as I am and kiss his hand. He begins to pet me, in his condescension—but true as I am standing here, all of a sudden he jerks away his hand and fetches me a box on the ear——"

The President's eyes flashed darkly. But Nejedli went on with mild forbearance:

"Not that I mean to say anything against His Majesty. He could not help it. I could see him struggling against the blow which he had in his hand. Ear-boxings were a sort of specialty of his. His adjutant, General Herr Graf Kinsky, used to keep hold of his hand when they were driving, because you never could tell. They drove across the Stone Bridge, where the golden Lord God is, that a Jew had to put up because he had not taken off his hat to the Almighty. Though I'm not saying anything against the Jews.

"'Let me out, Your Excellency,' says His Majesty to the adjutant. But he kept on holding the Kaiser's hand, tighter than ever. His Majesty begs and begs: 'Let me out, Excellency, I must cross myself here.' So the General can't do anything more, because of the regulations, he has to let go of the august hand. And so he gets one good and hard!"

Doctor Schleissner was enchanted with his story. But his friend, the agent for monumental stonework, President Moré, seemed less edified. Under the mask of harmless anecdote were concealed subversive opinions and Czechoslovak treason against the imperial house, of which he was a devoted adherent.

Nejedli drove Anita and Manya from the piano.

"Get away, girlyies! I'll play some dance-music."

He turned to Schleissner.

"Does the Herr Doktor know the national anthem which was played at the time of the blessed Emperor Ferdinand in Vienna?"

And he sang, softly, accompanying himself only in the bass:

"In Schönbrunn,
He says,
Lives an ape,
He says,
Got a face,
He says,
Like a priest,
He says,
Eats no sugar,
He says,
Drinks no wine,
He says,
What ape,
He says,
Can that be?"

The pianist looked President Moré in the eyes, shaking his head sadly.

"Disrespectful lot, the Viennese! Really loyal imperialists are to be found only here."

"What is that you are singing? Louder!" Lieutenant Kohout called to Nejedli.

But the latter took a firm line:

"Herr Leutnant, just an old popular song, it would not interest the Herr Leutnant."

The lieutenant agreed:

"I only like the new ones. Come on, Nejedli, play us something brisk!"

And Nejedli began with his gouty fingers to reel out a waltz which was at least ten years old. The ladies danced, mostly with each other. Only Grete danced with Doctor Schleissner, towering above him, holding him in abandoned embrace.

Ludmilla stood in the doorway and kept her back turned to them all.

IV

All at once the girls disappeared out of the Grand Salon. Fräulein Edith was what one might call a past mistress of such unobtrusive movements of troops.

Illustrious guests seemed to have arrived, the sort that were usually led to a still more exclusive room than even the Blue Salon. This room, the existence of which has not been mentioned before, was called the Japanese Private; it was on the ground-floor, two doors right of the entrance.

This floor of the house was carefully arranged not to chill the ardours of the guest but rather to intensify them. So soon as the door opened, he was saluted by a wave of warm air and a fragrance whose individual character he would remember all his life: an odour like warm bath-water with perfume in it; of soap-suds, vaseline, face-cream, rouge, perspiration, alcohol, and highly seasoned food.

It could not remain a secret for long that very exalted personages were occupying the Japanese Private. Herr Doktor Schleissner had sharp ears; he could hear not only the thundering of fiacre wheels in the narrow street, but also the ringing of spurs on the ground floor. And all the girls had disappeared. Schleissner swiftly deduced: Serene Highnesses from the Brandeiser Dragoons. Moré's face wore an impenetrable expression. He looked as though he had not needed to guess, because the names of the personages who had come were already known to him. But indiscretion was not his weakness.

At that time there were none of those big dance palaces which dominate the night life of cities today. The number of "Tabarins," "Maxims," and "Alhambras" was very limited. For that reason probably it was that there was nothing very scandalous about visiting this house in the Gamsgasse. Officers could appear in full uniform; high functionaries, if they came, need encounter no reproach; guests of high station were no exception. The historical-minded explained this liberal attitude on the ground that in 1866 the Prussian generals had celebrated their victories in the Blue Salon and thus given the whole house a kind of accolade.

The ladies very soon returned to the Grand Salon. Only Anita, Valeska, and the Polish Jadwiga had had the good fortune to be invited by the elegant newcomers. Grete scolded:

"The ill-bred puppies!"

She flung herself again into the ready arms of Doctor Schleissner. But it was surprising that Ludmilla came back, she, the prize of the collection, the child-beauty of the house. It was to be hoped that none of her colleagues noticed how Edith, whose feeling heart remembered its own griefs, had hidden her away and denied her to the guests.

Ludmilla moved with her usual strikingly resolute tread across the room and made as though to sit down again at the harmless table with the artillery; but the Baalboth, that rumbling-voiced guest with the belly, the watch-chain, and the organization-mania, got up heavily and approached her, with the clumsy dancing-class bow of an elderly provincial:

"Fräulein, may I inquire after your health?"

He said that with sweat standing on his brow, the sweat of lust and self-conquest, and the sour uneasiness of a bad conscience. Ludmilla measured him up and down, like a good married woman flashing a look at a man who addresses her in the street. "Pah!" said she; and sat down in her former place. The humiliated man stood heavily, isolated, on the polished dance floor. Then with slow feet that seemed to be ashamed of their creaking tread he went back to his place; but in his staring gaze could be read something more than mere confusion.

Nobody had noticed this scene, for just then somebody said, in a high-pitched, chirping drawl:

"Evening, precious children, all of you!"

The owner of the sluggish voice and still more sluggish body was welcomed with applause and lively salutations. He was no other than the present owner and proprietor, Max Stein, a popular and an extraordinary figure, called "Maxl" by all the friends of the house.

It is popularly supposed that all old families are decadent. And Max came of an old family indeed, though he was hardly a scion of the aristocracy. But in the point of decadence he yielded nothing to the sons of princes.

The house in the Gamsgasse, though not a feudal estate, had a long history, and more than that, a legend all its own.

To that day there was still an alley in the New Town called the "Extra Street"; Charles IV, the famous city-builder, had so christened it in anger because it had not been arranged for and set down in his plans. The order for the building of a brothel had been issued by him in person; he had with his own hands marked the site on the plan. The political foresight of this great personage cannot be too highly praised; he it was who, in order to check the persecution at the beginning of the new puritan movement, set apart for the courtesans and their establishments one of the most charming quarters of the "little town" and named it Venice, after the city of Venus. The real home of the growing heresy, however, was nowhere else than in the university, which, the first to be founded on the soil of the German Holy Roman Empire, was famous far and wide. The conclusion is not too far-fetched, that His Pious Majesty conceived the idea of putting the Grand Salon in the immediate neighbourhood of the university, with no other aim in view than that of bringing those arrogant and ascetic heretics to a fall and thus perhaps to their senses. A building commission could show that subterranean passages led from the Gamsgasse into the Carolinen; and here students in doublet and jerkin had caroused. If one may trust the sources, even Wallenstein, when he held court in the capital, came often to the Grand Salon to taste a little fleeting pleasure.

Old businesses possess the same mysterious value as old wine and old violins. Rivals might give their firms the finest titles; it did not help them to call themselves "Napoleon"; they could get only rabble and off-scourings for clients.

The house and business had been in the Stein family for a very long time. The grandmother, born Busch, a well-known local benefactress, had had the establishment as part of her dowry; but before that Maxl's great-grandfather had been proprietor and host, protected by the police authorities; so that Herr Max himself might be considered the last representative of a long line.

His parents were dead. His brother, Adolf, had been in the business up to two years before; a dry, impossible sort of host, who, when things were lively in the Grand Salon but not showing any practical results, would grumble: "Come, come now, get down to business and go upstairs!" That sort of thing destroyed the romantic atmosphere. Fortunately Adolf had had the most pressing reasons for emigrating to America, and Maxl had now nobody but Edith. But Edith was a host in herself; she held the whole thing together magnificently, and as for honesty she was simply a jewel.

Maxl turned an indifferent ear to the applause which greeted him. His yellow face was like an old man's but also like a child's, so that nobody could have guessed his age. His glasses sat crooked on his bulbous, turned-up nose, and a lax, weak-willed lower lip hung down like wattles on his chin. The man was so flabby and exhausted that a stranger would have found it hard to understand why there was no compassion but simply conviviality in the welcome he got. He pushed over to the piano, with his shambling, pathetic gait, to take his place in his favourite seat on the bench next to Nejedli, followed on all sides by shouts of:

"Maxl, Maxl, tell us a joke!"

Max objected:

"Leave me out of it. I won't tell you anything today. I am too tired. I'm worn out sleeping——"

That was just artistic vanity, they paid no attention. Maxl turned to the pianist, his friend:

"Nejedli, they mustn't pick at me today. I am honestly tired. I slept wrong——"

But Nejedli gave him no sympathy either. So he began in his sickly drawl:

"Two Jews are walking along the street, they see a taking female coming along. The first says: 'I'd like to have her again.' The other says——" He broke off the tale, which they all knew by heart, and stared in the air, trying to remember. Then he finished:

"I've forgotten the point."

His audience burst into a roar, and Maxl chuckled:

"Pretty good, eh?"

They gave him no rest. Doctor Schleissner persuaded the gloomy President Moré to advance. He got up and went to the piano with his mincing, pompous walk.

"May I present myself, Sir? Will you not give us the pleasure of a song?"

Maxl made a horrified face at the black apparition:

"Herr President, you look like malach hamoves, the angel of death!"

The angel of death would not be denied. Maxl, vain as any artist, turned to Nejedli:

"Nejedli, you know my voice is no good today. I'm not well——"

The President encouraged him:

"We're not asking you to sing 'Celeste Aida'!"

The proprietor weakened.

"Well, what shall I sing?"

A chorus shouted the names of various popular songs: "Manzanares," "Les Dessous," "Sigismund," and "Weeping Like a Child."

Maxl chose the one whose languorous melody had special need of a powerful voice and a passionate delivery for its success. He consulted with Nejedli, cleared his throat for a whole minute, and then his low and quavering voice issued from his labouring wrinkled throat. In it trembled all the exhaustion of his ancient house, transmuted to a quality of plaintive resignation. And in that plaintive voice he sang, constantly forgetting and muddling up both words and tune:

"He played in the flood of her gold-blond hair;
Her eyes smiled up at him so clear—
Come with me, you marvellous darling—
To Manzanares, to Manza——"

The big head began to shake on the thin neck, the glasses fell ringing from the bulbous nose to the floor. Amid loud applause, Max crawled under the piano in a rage, and only came out after prolonged entreaties, pathetically wrought up. His yellow face was streaming with perspiration. He stormed:

"That's enough, that's enough! I have to kill myself, just because you are so pig-headed! I'd rather make bad business for myself: Edith, a round of cognacs on the house! And you, Nejedli, play us——"

Nejedli got up and announced:

"I will play the company the glorious aria out of the glorious opera La Juive."

Ludmilla, who adored sad music, approached the piano.

Max had a soft side for her; he babbled:

"Come on, Milly, sit on my lap."

But Ludmilla responded bluntly:

"Why, Herr Maxl?"

The connoisseur looked at her from head to foot, sentimentally, and issued the prophetic statement:

"One of these days, girly, we shall all be calling you 'My Lady'!"

Nejedli burst forth, singing to his own accompaniment:

"Almighty God, hear my prayer,
Hear my prayer, great God,
Give me back my child,
Give me Recha, my child!"

"Rosa, Rosa," the initiated corrected him. Nejedli squinted venomously at them over his glasses as he made a daring and impermissible transition into Offenbach's "Barcarole":

"Sweet night, thou night of love,
Oh, quench my longing!"

Max began to be uneasy, wriggled in his chair, put his hands over his ears, and blubbered:

"Stop, Nejedli. I can't stand it. It makes me weep like a child."

Repeated rounds of cognac were now having their effect on the house. A mood of passive enjoyment and muddle-headed surrender to the music settled on the company. Most of the ladies had taken off the flowing garments of respectability and danced in their shifts. The noise increased, augmented by a literary argument which had broken out at the "clever" table, where Grete, Doctor Schleissner, and President Moré were sitting. A new guest had added himself to it, Municipal Accountant Eduard von Peppler, who was also an author. The unhappy man was cursed by fate with the task of reconciling two conflicting claims in his nature: those of the regular duties of an official of the "ninth grade" and the desperate compulsions of a satanic poet. He was, one might say, a Baudelaire detailed to the duties of the royal and imperial municipal presidium. Herr von Peppler's blood was brought to fever-heat at the sight of one of his colleagues at the "young" table. The aspiring young man had already had some literary success. Herr von Peppler yelled that his generation had tried with all their might to find life, and they had found syphilis; this cowardly young one did not try hard to find life and instead they found publishers. Fiery red in the face he parried the ironic laughter of the young generation:

"You are all bourgeois! You are all vegetarian poets! All of you shipwrecked on the paternal hearth! Shame upon you, you boarders and lodgers!" He clutched furiously to right and left at Moré's and Schleissner's cognac glasses and drained them down.

Herr Doktor Schleissner sprang into the breach. He jumped up and declared that other times had to come, that humanity consisted for the most part of repression, and that in repression, in bad sexual digestion, lay the sickness of the world. There was only one goal: erotic liberation!

And, as it were, to make a beginning of this liberating process, he began, heedless of Moré's indignant gaze, to sing the song which he called the Hymn of the League, which was unfortunately more obscene than witty:

"As long as arses to trousers fit,
Nobody wants to do their bit . . ."

It must be said that the singer himself belied his own song and that the statement in his mouth was pure self-advertisement; for Doctor Julius Schleissner, partner in a very well-known firm of lawyers, was a hard-working and conscientious man, with not only juristic but also political and literary ambitions. This very year he was giving free to women artists in the public rooms of their club a course with the stimulating title: "French Immoralism from Stendhal to André Gide." After these lectures there took place a tango contest, when the exponent of immoralism took part with solemnity in the languishing contortions of the dance. President Moré, on the other hand, was neither a friend of the dance nor of French immoralism, and least of all of naked indecency. He was a confirmed student of Goethe. One of his favourite occupations was to ferret out in various editions of the first and second parts of Faust misprints, errors of style, negligent versification, and contradictions of thought. Schleissner's shameless song offended him; he hung his head.

With everything swaying and humming about him, Herr Maxl sat silent and sunken beside Nejedli, whose stiff-jointed fingers were pitilessly and unconsciously mangling the dance-music. The pianist listened as he laboured to the proprietor's complaining voice:

"You know, Nejedli, I sleep very fast. . . ."

Nejedli nodded to show that he understood.

But Maxl's manner displayed the mild annoyance of one who strives in vain to express a thought of peculiar subtlety:

"Please understand me, Nejedli. One can sleep slowly, one can sleep in the ordinary way, one can sleep fast, and one can sleep very fast. You know, my friend, there is no end to what one can sleep through in a quarter of an hour. . . ."

Nejedli grunted his assent, but the evidence of his understanding was insufficient. A sort of shudder passed over Maxl, a fevered dimness, like a scarcely perceptible movement over the dark surface of a pool. His eyes stared.

"You won't believe me, Nejedli. But as true as I live, I have slept ten years in a single hour, and that is why I am so tired."

Just then the Baalboth left the room with his creaking tread. The high spirits in the room were reaching their climax. A minute later Fräulein Edith came in and began to discuss something earnestly with Ludmilla.

v

In contrast to the more vulgar establishments such as the Napoleon, it was one of the sound customs of the house that the appointments were not made in public. A gentleman apparently took leave of his company, unobtrusively indicated to Edith the lady of his choice, and the house-keeper in her turn quietly arranged the blissful rendezvous, not without—in the case of a doubtful or strange guest—receiving beforehand the usual payment. It must be said that this very seldom happened, for only people of the upper classes frequented the house. Strangers hardly ever came; and Fräulein Edith had a very fair knowledge of men, relying a good deal on her own impressions. Just as seldom—this in contrast to the lower-class Napoleon—did any scandal occur. Of course, among the boarders there was faction, discord, hatred; but it was an unwritten law that peace and friendliness must prevail during business hours.

So that events like the following were practically unheard of. A discordant hubbub arose at the door of the Grand Salon. The hollow, beery voice of the clumsy provincial rose and thundered, till it seemed to shake the thin and infirm walls. At first there was the one angry voice alone; but after a while the ladies' good manners could not stand the strain: treble shrieks began to mingle with the angry bass.

Anyone who has ever seen a crowd collect, hungry for sensation, when a worn-out horse falls in the street, can imagine the avid curiosity with which, at this hour, in this place, everybody clustered round to revel in the fray. Even the patrons of the Blue Salon stuck out their heads with malicious enjoyment.

The trouble was this: the old farmer with the monstrous watch-chain had made of Fräulein Edith the customary request for Ludmilla's services. In vain Edith made excuses, brought out plausible explanations, in order to protect her young charge from the undesirable, even repellent encounter. To herself Fräulein Edith cursed Oscar's defection. There was nothing like an unhappy love to put the ladies off; it was the most frequent source of loss of discipline and neglect of duty. But all her quick-wittedness was of no avail. The Baalboth was not only knowing, he was extremely obstinate and spiteful. He was animated by the violent anger of the rejected man. Edith saw nothing else to do but put Ludmilla at his service. But Ludmilla said straight out, with the coldest indifference, to the Baalboth's face, that she would not think of acceding to his request. And then the storm broke.

The furious provincial had retreated to the landing and stood clinging to the gilt-bronze Venus posted there as the emblem of the establishment. (On the next lower landing stood an equally gilded Trumpeter of Säk-kingen—not precisely as an emblem.) The girls screamed all together, the guests laughed, and the humiliated man continued to shout, despite all Edith could do to calm him, that he must see the proprietor.

Herr Maxl finally dragged himself up, followed by Nejedli. It must be said that despite a thick tongue, deathly pallor, and physical weakness he bore himself not only with quick wit but also like a knightly defender of his ladies.

The Baalboth shrieked at him:

"Herr Proprietor! What sort of house is this?"

Maxl drawled:

"Edith, go downstairs and bring up the house-number."

The angry man was not to be put off.

"If I go into a bakery and want to buy a roll——"

Maxl's weary croak interrupted him:

"Go into a bakery and buy yourself a roll."

"What do you mean?"

"What should I mean?"

The Baalboth softened his roaring bass to the mildness of condescending argument:

"Herr Proprietor! Suppose a purchaser goes into a shop and they won't serve him with a piece of goods in stock——"

Max looked at the complainant with melancholy eye and repeated with a sigh:

"In stock . . ."

Patience was exhausted; there arose a roar:

"Good Lord in heaven, I won't be made a fool of! That's no way to treat a customer! Do you think there are no other houses as good as yours? There are better. Old Aunt Pohl in Aussig—there's something to be said for hers. They have organization too. I tell you, for the last time: my train goes tomorrow morning at seven thirty-five. I intend to spend the rest of the night in this house, and spend it with the girl that I pick out and pay for."

Maxl answered the screaming with extreme humility:

"Pardon, Herr . . . Forest Inspector . . . help yourself. Are you a human being? Of course you are a human being. And is Ludmilla a human being? She is a human being. Pardon, Herr . . . Inspector of Roads . . . a human being has to understand, when a human being won't go with him . . ."

An outburst of laughter. Maxl turned triumphantly to the laughers:

"Pretty good, eh?"

Ludmilla stood there all the time as though the affair had nothing to do with her. But now opinion began to veer. The girls' excitement was becoming spiteful. This haughty piece was going too far. Edith looked anxiously about her, wondering how to cope with the rising storm. They began to take sides, their hate and envy no longer under control, their self-possession gone.

Suddenly Ilonka, the fat Hungarian, planted herself before Ludmilla.

"Say, what are you a whore for?"

Grete interrupted her ecstatically:

"Let her alone! Haven't we got the rights of human beings too?"

Ilonka grew even more venomous.

"If everybody were to do that! Fine business that would be! Why, we might pick out the guests ourselves! It isn't always a joy to me either!"

Ludmilla said quietly:

"To you it is always a joy."

Grete, to Edith's dismay, made the situation infinitely worse with her exaggerated notions:

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself. Ludmilla is right: we must fight for our freedom."

This high-flown phrase, even more than Ludmilla's obstinacy, worked the ladies up to a high pitch. They hated in the Berlin woman the most intolerable of all species of arrogance, the arrogance of education.

Ilonka shrieked:

"We've just been waiting for you, you Meschuggene!"

Grete made her most demure face.

"It's not my fault that I've learned something. Everybody can't be brought up in a pigsty."

And now it came: Ilonka rushed at Grete, and with her pudgy little fist struck the tall girl in the face. The fight was on. Already some of the combatants were rolling on the floor. Their silk shirts ripped at the seams and the rounded flesh bulged out. Manya, the unwieldy damsel from Rokycany, simply tore her shirt off her back before she flung herself with a joyous cry into the fray. For even in anger she remained practical. The grave-digger's daughter cared not whom she hit. She was avenging herself on the whole troop.

One or two more debauched fellows, at the sight, deliberately fanned the flames. But the original incendiary, the Baalboth, struggled gasping in Ludmilla's direction, with the idea of taking her by force. She, however, had cleverly slipped away unseen.

The gentlemen were thrilled by the priceless spectacle, which raged to and fro in the corridor between the Grand Salon and the Blue Salon. Doctor Schleissner whinnied with joy. The municipal official and satanist Peppler stared with open eyes in which the joy of destruction shone; he urged the combatants on. Only Lieutenant Kohout and President Moré withdrew. The lieutenant was mindful of the regulations, which ordered officers as much as possible to dissociate themselves from dishonourable proceedings. Moré too had his professional honour to think of. Both gentlemen silently retreated behind the piano.

Nejedli, on the other hand, was one of the few who tried to part the engaged participants. He gasped with his efforts, his tom-cat sat askew and his cravat was twisted over to one side.

Edith stared in desperation, Maxl was stunned by the fray. Anything like this had never happened before. Up to now the ladies, despite any small episodes or lack of harmony, had always been mindful of the dignity of a first-class establishment.

Who knows what the end would have been if a tremendous event had not like a stroke of lightning struck the house?

Suddenly, as though he had risen out of the earth, a messenger stood there, an orderly from the Sixth Regiment of Dragoons. Usually, when for any reason a representative of the power of the state came to the house, a gentleman from the Health Department, or a police official, he knew how to be discreet about his entrance. But this soldier, a tall, blond Czech peasant lad, had towered abruptly upon the distracted scene. Rosy-cheeked, he stood in the middle of the witches' dance and brought into the smoke- and sweat-laden atmosphere a breath of fresh air. He looked actually ready for a campaign, in field uniform, with helmet, cartridge-pouch, cavalry sword, and great spurs.

The combat broke off in a flash. The ladies reduced themselves to order as though nothing had happened. A deep stillness suddenly yawned. Everybody felt that destiny was in the air. Even Maxl's storm-shaken figure stiffened with life. He in person led the orderly whither he demanded to be led.

Two minutes later the swift tread of cavalry boots rang on the ground floor and the house-door slammed shut. Slowly, rigidly, breathless, Max mounted the stair. He sobbed incomprehensible lamentations. By degrees they got out of him the frightful news. The Crown Prince had been murdered in Sarajevo.

Never had the respectable house in the Gamsgasse emptied more expeditiously than now. The dionysiac frenzy, the light-headed intoxication in the Grand Salon, seemed to have burned itself out; the gentlemen quickly settled down. Herr Doktor Schleissner, that intellectual corsair, became a serious person who looked with great concern into the future. He was a reserve officer. Herr President Moré brushed away the loose frivolity which, like a speck of dust on his coat, he had borne with for an hour. He murmured reproachfully: "This is what happens when one goes out nights." What he meant, or how he connected in his bitter thoughts the catastrophe with the light-hearted evening now at an end, remained unclear.

The Baalboth no longer felt he owed it to his pride to insist on Ludmilla's services.

Lieutenant Kohout and the two volunteers looked frozen-faced, as though as they were charged with presiding over a military commission. Herr von Peppler wrapped himself romantically in his rain-coat and in earnest of future events made peace with the younger generation. Everybody hurried down the steps. They wanted to go to the newspaper offices to get details of the tragedy. Some few shrinking figures slipped out seeking the shadows, after the main rout, either because they were mindful of a more sensitive reputation or had a more enviable married life than most.

In the forsaken salon the head of the house sat alone with Nejedli. He squatted quite collapsed on the piano-stool. He seemed already to have forgotten the frightful event, for he stammered: "Shall I go to bed, Nejedli?"

The pianist yawned.

"Yes, go to bed, Herr Maxl, nothing else will happen today."

He gave the old man an indignant glance.

"But I sleep too fast, Nejedli, I've slept for ten years. I am afraid to sleep, Nejedli."

Nejedli gave no answer, he was busy pouring all the remains of cognac into one glass, which he providently emptied. When he found nothing more to drink and saw the proprietor sitting there with his eyes closed, he took the music money from the table and slipped on tiptoe, muttering, out of the room.

He did not hear the anxious question that followed him:

"Shall I go to sleep, Nejedli?"

The large salon was full of wreckage. Broken glasses strewed the floor, chairs were upset, everywhere was the odour of spilt wine, coffee, brandy. Maxl blinked at the desolation. He took a deep breath, to call Edith and command that order be restored. Impotent angry wrinkles suddenly showed on his brow. But he only gasped for breath and no sound came from his loose lips. At last he got up and staggered from the room. His tapping, shuffling step sounded for a long time, before it died away upstairs.

As the last noise of the departing guests died away in the narrow street, Ludmilla could no longer contain herself; she did something that was sternly forbidden: opened the door and looked out into the night.

Oscar stood before her.

She would gladly have choked it back, but she had no power over the spasmodic scream which forced itself to her lips.

VI

Ludmilla sat beside Oscar at the supper-table in the kitchen.

The kitchen was the real shrine and hearthstone of the establishment; and a very fine room it was, with its tiled stove and four tables covered with white oil-cloth. He who might enter here was no more a client, a stranger, or a victim; he was tax-free in every respect, he belonged to the clan, he shared the secrets of the wide-flung order.

The dim four-o'clock hour of the summer dawn had now broken, the time of the principal meal was come. In importance this four-o'clock hour was exceeded only by the six-o'clock evening one when the ladies got themselves ready for society and the Figaro ran from one to the other with the curling-tongs. But the early-morning meal was nicer; one washed down all the bad alcohol and tobacco fumes with hot soup and looked forward to the joy of sleep.

At each place two plates stood on top of each other, a serviette rested in its ring, and silver forks and spoons shone at either side—such as even the best establishments do not show. This silver put one under an obligation. Whoever had only for a little while used it was ennobled for all time. He could hardly sink again to the level of Napoleon. Much oftener his path lay upwards.

Ludmilla had forgiven Oscar. Forgiven him? What a pompous word! What should she have done, what else was there for her to do? Sulk perhaps, make him smart, spoil the little time that he was by her side? When he went out of the door and with ten steps was in the Eisengasse, she was so much air for him, poorer than the poorest, could not threaten him as any other woman could, not give him presents nor frighten him, had not the slightest power over him for good or bad. If she had permission to go out, did he not have to refuse—and with perfect right—to spend the afternoon with her? She could understand that. How could she show herself at the side of the promising young actor without compromising him? She did not even want to go about with him outside, either in the street or in strange rooms. This was why she always gave up her afternoon out to the other girls.

Here alone, in this house, in this kitchen, could he find her. But she could not find him anywhere. Was it not a good deal, that he had come? Who forced him to come? (But if he married, his wife could force him.) She did not even know his address, so as to write him a letter. No, she had never asked him for his address. But he never noticed that—men are pigs!

And now he was here. She must be grateful, nothing but grateful. She felt a glow of joy that she had not surrendered, that she had held out for two days, here in this house, defying all her foes, and proved her strength and will-power. She said nothing about her fight, for Oscar would not have taken any particular interest in it.

But now that he sat beside her, it was all one, she was in heaven to be able to feed the hungry man and give him her soup. Oscar, not lifting his eyes, sat, audibly eating and swallowing; Ludmilla with quick stolen glances took in the features of her beloved, storing them up that she might possess of him as much as possible.

Meanwhile the other ladies had appeared. The late violent scrimmage had left no marks. A few little bruises and scratches were not worth mentioning. Strangely enough the outburst seemed to have cleared the air of hatred, and shame over the mortifying episode united even the late foes. A friendly and obliging spirit reigned, even a somewhat watchful and exaggerated cordiality. The grumpy Manya was humming the mournful notes of a Slavic folksong, to show that she was in a reconciled and pleasant mood.

The girls had taken off their alluring evening garments and wore bedraggled nightgowns and bed-jackets; instead of gilt and silver dancing-shoes they had on down-at-heel slippers; their hair was dishevelled and their stockings wrinkled.

They ate their soup languidly, audibly, and smacked their lips. Oscar, sitting beside Ludmilla among the ladies, explained to her in a low voice why he had not come for so long. The theatre manager had asked him to take over the part of one of the actors who was taken ill. It was a good role, a classic role, which had latterly been played by Kainz, and Oscar's first big part. He could not hesitate to give the last two nights to prepare himself in it.

Ludmilla, so lately unbelieving, looked at him with adoring eyes. She trusted him, with passion. His reasons were so convincing. Word for word she repeated Oscar's justification aloud, to prove to her colleagues that she need not be ashamed of her love.

Grete asked for the name of the play and did not omit to boast:

"My father always took me with him to all the plays. Did you know Christians, Herr Oscar?"

Oscar fell prey to embarrassment and could not answer for a moment. Ludmilla had not asked him the name of his part. He gave himself away by mentioning a play which was not being given at the time. He looked quickly at her. But she was all faith. She would not have minded an even bigger lie.

By degrees Oscar himself was affected by the girl's love and the nobility it imparted to her; instead of passively letting himself be loved he himself felt tenderness and began whispering sweet hopes in her ear.

Ilonka must have caught some of the whispering, for she laughed:

"Listen! He went to set her out!"

And turning to Ludmilla: "Set you out—yes, fine he will—with your behind out of the window!"

Ludmilla, with puckered brows and eyes cast down, thought for a long time; then suddenly spoke in a strange, deep voice:

"Do you know, Oscar, what was the worst thing you have done?"

And slowly she answered her own question:

"That you came back today, that is the worst thing you have done!"

But before Oscar and the others could understand this new turn, Edith came in, and said, betraying apprehension and horror in her voice:

"Children, I don't know what the matter is, but there is such a queer groaning from Herr Maxl's room. I daren't knock, but I was so frightened . . ."

They all looked at each other, and everybody had a vision of Herr Maxl's pathetic yellow face. They all knew at once, it seemed they had always known, that Herr Maxl was a very sick man. They had never thought about it, for even the oldest in service among them had never known a Herr Maxl who was not short-winded, yellow with jaundice, utterly exhausted, and yet funny. He was like that. And nobody had ever heard a complaint out of his mouth. They believed in the old country proverb which says: "If the nag eats it doesn't need a vet."

But now they saw that they must leave their pork and greens and noodles to get cold. They responded to Fräulein Edith's words with an outpouring of feminine concern.

The whole troop got up, even Ludmilla left Oscar's side. A procession of untidy females trooped up the stair, past the guardian Venus and the Trumpeter of Säkkingen; they moved forgetful of their usual alluring gait and the provocative posturings of their feminine backsides. They looked like a lot of servantmaids and untidy shop-girls climbing the steps to an employment bureau.

But the higher they got, the nearer to their master's chamber, the heavier and more inexplicable grew the dread which they felt round their throats like a wet cloth. They pressed close together, as Edith knocked in vain, three, four, five times. At last—the groaning had stopped—she cautiously opened the door, and before her hand had even found the switch of the electric light the boldest of them pressed behind her into the gloom of the chamber.

None of them ever came here. It was a strict rule of the house.

The light revealed an extraordinary array of madonnas and saints decorating the walls. Only after that did they see their employer, whose body was hanging half out of bed, without a sign of life.

Had he fainted, was he dead?

Edith and Valeska lifted the body back on the bed. The others ran wildly to and fro, fetching Cologne water, perfume, and useless bottles of medicine, pouring them recklessly over Maxl's yellow brow and between his open lips.

Grete screamed without stopping that she could not bear to see it. Ilonka was quite in her element, saying over and over that in these cases there was only one remedy, chopped onion mixed with spit rubbed on the patient's eyelids and put up his nose. She had the recipe from her grandmother, who knew more about such things than anybody else in the world. Edith thought of the framed notice that hung in the kitchen: "First aid to the injured." But she had not the courage to touch the strange form again.

Manya, however, the grave-digger's daughter, laughed contemptuously, went up to the bed, pushing the incompetents back with her strong arms, and lifted the figure's eyelids. Then she turned round and announced, in an official tone:

"He is dead!"

And the doctor, whom Edith sent for at once, could do no more than confirm Manya's words.

VII

Difficulties of all sorts multiplied. This was the first time—aside from some legendary stabbings in ancient times—that a dead person lay in the house. And a dead person who was not a guest overtaken by some violent or irregular death, but a member of the household, who had died, according to the doctor, from entirely natural causes.

Herr Maxl had left no instructions—which could surprise nobody who had seen him even once. The deceased had often lacked energy even to eat his dinner; where would he have got enough to occupy himself with the world and its interests when he was not there at all?

Years before he had sold his share in the other property of his parents to his brother Adolf for a mess of pottage; the latter indeed had very soon given it up in turn to mysterious creditors. Nothing remained for Herr Maxl but to move into the Gamsgasse; he had lived there ever since in a room above the boarders' quarters.

For the present nobody knew how things had been left. The legal heirs, who were only distant connexions, gave no sign of life until four days later—for reasons best known to themselves. So everything fell upon Fräulein Edith's shoulders. But they were very capable ones.

Of course the police and the inheritance authorities were particularly interested in a business enterprise of this kind, so suddenly left orphaned. But Edith's relations, not only with the police but with all the state and municipal authorities, were very independent, permanent, and assured. After a cursory examination they left her a free hand, and she had enough foresight to arrange matters to her own advantage and the boarders', and to the honour of the deceased as well.

She cannot be praised too highly for her action in one matter: she faithfully set aside the large sum which she had received the day before from her employer—he was in the habit of turning over to her with careless open-handedness the daily takings from the business—and which had not been entered in the books. She put it into an envelope and wrote tenderly on it "Herr Maxl" with a pious cross after the name. She was so little self-seeking as to devote this whole sum to the expenses of a funeral worthy of the deceased. But just here came in the greatest difficulty of all.

First and foremost the religious question.

Herr Maxl's origins were Jewish. She, Edith, had been brought up by the Ursulines; she always said that, without that stern discipline and the happiness of an inward faith, she could never have become housekeeper in one of the best houses in Europe. If anyone pointed out that the profession she had adopted did not accord with her religious tenets, she would tell the story of what had happened to her in the confessional. The young priest had consoled her as follows:

"My child," he said, "your life is certainly a very sinful one. But God has distributed properties and callings among men according to His will. Even your calling—strange as it is—He has always suffered. It would be better for you to find another. But if you cannot do that, then you must ever be mindful that you are a child of the Church. And then you will never despair. And never forget that the lowest vices of which mankind is guilty are born only of despair."

Fräulein Edith did not change her profession. She went on sinning, but also clinging fanatically to the Church.

But her fanaticism, of course, was at the bottom of the tendency to proselytizing which she displayed. Who was a more likely subject for her efforts than Herr Maxl? And it is true that the first time her employer went with her to Mass in the Church of Saint Gall he was as one transformed.

After that he went every Sunday with Edith to vespers—which was no small effort, considering how prolonged and trying the Saturday night sessions were at the house. But Edith achieved still more. She brought him to an understanding of the nature of the Holy Mother of God; and he hung the walls of his room full of saintly pictures. Daily Edith spoke to him of the final step, the baptism, that must be taken before his soul could be saved. But Herr Maxl met her most affecting appeals with the same words:

"But I've always been a good child!"

And when she began to plead, he croaked in his whining apathetic voice:

"Nebbich, what could they do with me?"

And when the zealous woman painted in fiery colours all the unpleasant metaphysical consequences of his unbaptized state, Maxl always closed the conversation with the remark:

"Listen, Edith! Once a Jew always a Jew."

Yet it is a fact and must be told, that long before Edith's time, for reasons no longer explainable, Maxl had procured the official document which is called declaration of non-confessional status, and which frees the citizen from religious duties and observances.

It would have been Edith's dearest wish to give the master of the house a Christian burial with all due and formal rites. She ran to the parish of Saint Gall. But however willing the good priest, his hands were tied: without a certificate of baptism there could be no church burial. But there were no such restrictions, he added, on Masses for the dead, and Edith straightway arranged for three. And as she went away the Reverend, all smiling and blithe, gave her to understand that the appearance of an officiating priest in such a place and in these unregenerate times would only give rise to anger and the mockery of free-thinkers.

For good or ill, Edith was forced to seek out the Jewish religious authorities, in whose register the name of the departed was inscribed. They told her that she must buy for the dead a lot in the Mosaic quarter of the Olschan Cemetery. But even so, a ceremonial funeral was out of the question. Herr Stein was an apostate; he had broken with his ancestral faith and besides that had not been in person any sort of ornament to any communion or community. If the funeral were permitted to take place from the burial hall of the Central Cemetery, then if the authorities were willing to shut their eyes, this or that might happen. But it was not to be expected that anyone entrusted with the care of souls could enter the house in the Gamsgasse.

When Edith obtained the order for the grave, the official asked her whether Herr Stein had left any sons; for somebody would have to say the Kaddish for him—the prayer in memory of the dead. It was explained to him that there would be no other mourners at the grave save a few women; he looked at the housekeeper mistrustfully over his spectacles and nodded ironically, as though to say: "No sons! That is what one would expect of Herr Stein."

But the firm of François Blum made no conditions to customers. Early in the afternoon they made personal offer of their services for a good and inexpensive funeral.

Anybody who grew up in the city which is our scene will remember the large sign over the door of "François Blum, entreprise de pompes funèbres." He will even remember the show-windows in black and silver which the firm had set up in various busy quarters of the town. In the middle was a huge coffin—large enough to accommodate a primeval giant in his last sleep—and on both sides others arranged according to size, down to tiny caskets for children. Effective draperies of black cloth surrounded the glittering horror, and palm branches, the dusty requisites of heavenly peace, adorned the whole.

The François Blum firm thus provided a well-assorted memento mori for the town as it hurried past on earthly occupations bent. The eye, after feasting on a display of lobsters, game, pineapple, and caviare, or admiring an arrangement of lingerie, jewels, or flowers, a temptation for the spirit in books or musical instruments, would suddenly recoil as black and silver death, pompous with dusty palm branches, stared at it from the show-window. It was not Thanatos, the boy with the drooping torch, not the reaper with his scythe; it was middle-class death, it was the death of the great cities, modern death, death without symbolism or image, a ridiculous thing made of silver paint, paper palms, black cloth, plaster, and decay.

But yet this death remained one of the few solemnities known to the life of man. Nobody was more aware of this than the ladies in the Gamsgasse. So that Fräulein Edith, despite considerable extra expense, resolved to order a funeral of the house of Blum.

After that first night of fear and trembling, with the knowledge of a corpse in the house, in their house, the girls managed to get adjusted to the sad situation.

The house had of course to remain closed until the evening after the funeral. The unexpected holiday, combined with all sorts of errands and issuings from the house, which upset the regular order of things, was an agreeable change and novelty. And then they had zealously set to work, within their scanty means, to make the necessary mourning garments. The kitchen was turned into a work-shop, sewing-machines rattled, scraps of stuff strewn the floor, stove and dishware retreated into the background. There was much work to do. The ladies were afraid to go upstairs, so all the noisy life collected in the lower story.

Night fell away like an illness from the denizens of this place. All these children of an early-rising folk, peasants, workmen, small business people, petty officials, conductors, waiters, eagerly enjoyed the forbidden luxury of daylight. Enfranchised by death, they ran joyously about in the streets and, mad with the joy of motion, rode recklessly in the electric street car from one end of the town to the other.

Even Ludmilla, despite her actor, was seized by the contagion. She sewed, altered, tried on with the rest. And that the slender black of a mourning maiden would become her best of all, not even Ilonka doubted in her heart.

The coffin would be set up in the Grand Salon. Though they might expect no guests, yet it was fitting that somewhere a little lunch should be ready and this was laid in the Blue Salon.

Next day workmen thumped in their big boots up the shaky stairs, and a wild clamouring and hammering began in the Grand Salon. This room had never seen daylight, it blinked uncomfortably like some sort of night animal disturbed in its lair. How little, how insignificant, in the dry light this animal seemed, that knew how to stretch itself so exuberantly at its own hour.

The ghosts of all the dances, songs, jokes good and bad, that had ever echoed in this room rose up in defiance along its walls. It was no use. The walls were covered in black, the catafalque rose by degrees from the floor, a grove of laurels and palms somewhat the worse for wear was dragged through the door, amid shouted directions. Edith even had a large unauthorized cross set up at the head of the bier.

The pompes funèbres did all honour to their good reputation. But it is uncertain whether it was they who inserted the notice in the newspaper, which struck some of its readers by reason of the paradox of human destiny it contained, the strange fate that had overtaken the house of joy:

"Yesterday in this city occurred the death of Herr Max Stein. The funeral will take place from the house of mourning, Number 5 Gamsgasse."

Everything followed its due course. There was only one rather untoward circumstance: the characteristic odour of the ground floor, that mingling of hot, scented bath-water, soap-suds, vaseline, face-cream, rouge, perspiration, alcohol, and highly seasoned food could not be got rid of. The ladies burned incense for hours, but the air became thereby only the more—there is only one word for it—indecent.

VIII

It belongs to the improbabilities which one admits in life but finds it hard to forgive in a story that Herr President Moré, certainly the most assiduous newspaper-reader in the city, overlooked that paradoxical death-notice. Some explanation for the circumstance lies in the fact that in those fateful and nerve-racking days all the news-sheets were full of the most crucial events and that in every line war and peace and the fate of the world were at stake.

Herr Moré had left his coffee-house deep in thought. His spirit was stirred by patriotic emotions and war floated before his mental eye. Moré's idea of war was a very backward one: there was no "modern emptiness of the battle-fields," no concrete trenches, squadrons of planes, or gas attacks; it was a tempestuous painting full of liveliness and cavalry. Glorious steeds reared heavenwards like equestrian statuary, hand-grenades burst red, green, yellow, and blue, like the most extravagant fireworks, the wounded clutched at their hearts like opera-singers reaching a high note.

Picturing the world-catastrophe in such lively colours as these, the President crossed the Fruit Market and went down the Eisengasse in front of the university; he saw on the right of the little square a third-class hearse with a team of horses and three mourning carriages. He wondered who had died hereabouts—such knowledge indeed belonged to his profession—and zealously ran through the names of the better firms and families of the district. He wondered himself that the news of a death had escaped him. But at the same time—directly he knew where he was—he was taken by a desire, to which in earlier years he had sometimes given way.

Herr Doktor Schleissner might flatter himself that it was he to whom the President owed his knowledge of "these sacred halls." It was not Moré's way to turn day into night and expose himself to the public eye. But, Lord, once in a way it might do.

And the truth was, he had known the house in the Gamsgasse a long time and in better hours than those devoted to the common herd. As a younger man he had often come here privately in the afternoon and always found satisfaction and enjoyment. His way of doing things seemed to him not only more discreet but also more moral and above all more hygienic than the usual practice.

The President stood still. He was conscious, with deep emotion, that a new day was dawning. It wore a double face. On the one side sombre, tragic, like a train of corpselike gentlemen in frock coats and top-hats; on the other very brisk, fresh, and rosy like a foot-soldier. Moré's fancy did actually conjure up foot-soldiers, and other figures out of the appropriate literature, such as vivandières, sergeants, dice-throwers, and camp prostitutes.

Moré looked at the hearse, thought of the hard times on the one hand and the loosening of morals on the other, and decided that, as he had nothing in particular on for the next few hours, there was nothing to stand in the way of his desires. He passed the waiting hearse and the horses with waving black plumes on their heads, and with his own mincing step entered the narrow street.

He found the always sternly closed and thick-curtained door wide open.

Meantime, in the house all was ready for the ceremony. The coffin stood on the bier, with a few loose flowers and a poverty-stricken wreath atop. Edith's money, so magnanimously put aside, had not been enough to do very much.

There had been besides a difference of opinion between Edith and the pompes funèbres, about the coffin. This was nothing but the simple wooden box prescribed by Jewish rites. God Himself had said: "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." And thus every decoration or beautification of the process ordained by God is impious and blasphemous. And yet the housekeeper had other views. A coffin must be splendid, ornamented with silver, adorned with emblems, and somewhere there must be a white lace "throw." She had to pay good money to have even such a box delivered. "That is regular Jewish," she cried. Even religion served to fleece the customer. It was hard to convince her in her excitement that the earth of the Hebrew burying-ground might not receive any but the prescribed coffin.

The ladies had foregathered in their meagre but rather striking mourning garb. Some poor people had come from the neighbourhood, but moved off at once on their tiptoes to the Blue Salon, where they were served with free drinks and loaf cake. Herr Nejedli did the honours there and did not need to urge the neighbours or the undertakers' men or himself to fall to.

Unfortunately there was no guest, no dragoon of the Sixth, no artilleryman, intellectual, night-bird, no Schleissner, no Peppler, no Oscar—in a word not an eye there to look with astonishment at the transformation of the Grand Salon. The dancing-floor was largely taken up by the catafalque; the shrouded electric bulbs cast a sombre glow; the amoretti over the looking-glasses had black négligées, a cross and tall candles stood at the head of the Jewish coffin, and a particularly large family of well-powdered little girls in deep mourning wept because that was the fitting thing, because they had known the deceased, because life was sad, death shattering to the feelings, and the unusual solemnity very agreeable on the whole.

Red noses were wiped and sobbings re-echoed; and amid these sights and sounds all the past of the Grand Salon was as though it had not been. And again a moment went past saturated with the lofty, the Shakespearian, inconsistencies of life.

But one could not sob and snuffle for ever or stare at the coffin. Something ought to happen, somebody must say something, make the dead a farewell address. Edith became more and more uneasy. The absence of the priest was painfully evident; it was the great gap in these arrangements to which she had sacrificed such a good round sum. She was beside herself: for without God and some sort of ceremony how were they to go on? Everything was splendid, everybody awaiting the sad final parting, yet here they were, all standing about, too long already, the air seemed thick with painful question: it was a dumb scandal. Edith bit her lips, no idea occurred to her. She glanced despairingly round.

And lo, suddenly her desperate eye fell upon President Moré, standing tall and black in the doorway. None of the "guests" had come; but his warm heart and noble mind had found the way hither. Edith thanked God for the wisdom of destiny and the soul of Moré.

His appearance fitted in marvellously with the funeral pomp; there was nothing more to be wished for, now that he had come, this incomparable functionary, whose very name reminded one of death. The housekeeper fell upon him with whispers and in ten seconds the situation was saved.

It goes without saying that the President of the Spinoza Society, the Master of Ceremonies of the Sons of the League, possessed a distinct oratorical gift. And that an agent for monumental stonework had cemetery oratory at his tongue's end was a matter of course. Besides, as a usual consequence of the talent, he had an uncontrollable itch to hold forth—on all occasions, at the opening and closing of sessions, gatherings, congresses, at solemn and not-solemn occasions, weddings, anniversaries, club meetings, and harmless parties everywhere, where a speech was indicated or not indicated. So that now Edith was not more delighted at the President's consent than he with her request.

With a swift inquiring glance round he assured himself that nobody unauthorized, above all no journalist, was present. Then only did he take his place by the bier, lift his head as though to listen for inspiration, and close his anguished eyes.

And now he began his harangue—which had just as much and just as little to do with the deceased under the pall as with anybody else in the world. But it was, and this was the main point, a fine speech.

The President began by quoting Goethe, to the effect that the suffering and struggling man was always on the way to salvation. The imminent danger, in sight of so many bayadères, to quote also the passage about "the fiery arms of the immortals" which "bear lost children up to heaven," he avoided in the nick of time and took refuge in that less suspect strophe, in which the novice at the gates of paradise challenges the houris to let him in without fear because he has always been a man. The audience, awed by the incomprehensible poetry, were not amazed by the President's invitation to picture Herr Maxl as an aspiring and struggling warrior before the gates of paradise.

Perhaps Herr Maxl himself was the only one to feel surprised at the picture—if we accept the esoteric doctrine of certain teachers, that the “intelligences” of the dead are present at their own funerals.

But the President did not stop at Goethe. He called in Spinoza, Lessing, Isaiah, and Haeckel, and on this sad occasion introduced the greatest spirits of the world into the Grand Salon in the Gamsgasse.

The speech rose to its climax; the President addressed the dead in stern and manly voice by name, making a prophecy about the stormy future; he praised in the departed the symbol of a blithe, free, and happy age, which now lay on its bier to pass away for ever. It was decreed in God's wisdom that one must now take leave of this good and kindly soul, and perhaps, who knew, also from one's own light-hearted youth for ever.

At this point the smouldering sobs burst into a conflagration of loud wails. Ludmilla, overcome by her hopeless love, screamed into her handkerchief. It was Oscar who lay there, waiting this very day to be buried.

Ilonka beat her breast in an access of frenzy. Manya, the callous daughter of grave-diggers, writhed in pain. Edith knelt with uncontrollable tears of contrition beside the catafalque. Only Grete, her eyes dry and burning, hung upon the speaker's compelling lips.

The speech ended on a solemn and consoling note.

The ladies, as though waked out of an anguished dream, behaved like awkward schoolgirls or maidservants as the President with stern sympathetic mien shook each of them by the hand.

Edith was the first to recover from her emotions. Gratefully she saw this ceremony, which was her own work and merit, take its edifying course. After such a moving discourse only music could have anything to say. The housekeeper urged Herr Nejedli towards the piano.

But it seemed that in the course of the years the repertory of the former imperial and royal titulary infant prodigy of Kaiser Ferdinand the Good had become very restricted. Dances, marches, popular songs, yes, those his fingers still knew, but it was impossible to accompany the funeral procession with the electrifying strains of the “Gladiators' March.”

So they were in a quandary. Herr Nejedli's hands were not capable either of a simple choral or of a Chopin funeral march. All together his programme was limited to three numbers: the wedding procession from Lohengrin, the aria from La Juive, and the “Barcarole” from the Tales of Hoffmann.

The old man unhesitatingly rejected Lohengrin and decided on La Juive:

“Almighty God, hear my prayer,
Hear my prayer, great God!”

Nobody took offence at the lively, almost enlivening passion of this allegro, and when Nejedli passed over by quite unauthorized modulations into the “Barcarole,” they all looked at each other; for the “Barcarole” had been Maxl's favourite piece, at which he always “had to weep like a little child." The services could not have closed more suitably or loftily than with these immortal strains, to which garlanded barks sailed over dark waters:

"Sweet night, thou night of love,
Oh, quench my longing . . ."

The bearers with the coffin groaned and blundered past the gilt-bronze Venus and the Trumpeter of Säkkingen, down the shaky, complaining stair. The ladies followed. But there were no more sounds of mourning, instead whispers and faint laughter. Had they not cried themselves out already? Tears, they quench the divine thirst of the soul, and thus we are happy and satisfied when we have wept.

The ladies were happy and satisfied. And more, they were full of the joy and pride that come from everything that has gone off well.

IX

The firm of Blum were not only very expeditious in the erection of their funeral pomp but also in taking down and dismantling the draperies, equipages, mourning-veils, and platforms. Swiftly, like good stage-managers, they accomplished the change of scene between death and life.

Particularly in the present case speed was necessary, for by evening the house must be open for pleasure and no reminder of death must oppress the spirits of the guests.

The thing happened like magic. Scarcely had the cortège set off when all the windows were flung open, calling and hammer-blows resounded, and the Grand Salon, freed from its unnatural bonds, came back to itself again. And the smell native to the house, which had been suppressed by the incense, candle-smoke, and unnatural odours, expanded to fill the lower floor as of yore. When two hours later the mourners returned in their landaus from the cemetery, no visible shadow lay upon the rooms and they were as they had always been.

With a slight feeling of strangeness the ladies passed through these rooms which were old and yet new, for every dwelling-place has its epochs and the dwellers therein feel it. Between today and today lay an abyss, the grave yawned, into which an hour ago they had seen lowered the naked unplaned box.

President Moré came back with the others from the interment. Out there in Olschan, where he was a well-known personage, he had held himself a little apart for the sake of his reputation, but his withdrawal might just as well have been accounted for by modesty.

The President received unlimited regard for his moving funeral oration. The girls looked up at him with shy respect. And besides he was the only one of all the guests who had found a human approach to themselves and their lives. He had come hither today with no other purpose than to pay reverence to the dead and express his sympathy with the survivors.

Fräulein Edith knew how to value the honour he had done them. With sincere gratitude in her eyes she went up to Moré, held his hand tenderly in hers, and declared that now she knew who of all the friends of the house was a true human being and a man with a heart.

The President gave a melancholy shrug of the shoulders and said that he knew life, he had understanding of the ways of the world. But that nobody else, not even Doctor Schleissner, had found his way hither, that surprised him. Edith expressed her view that a man was a man and pursued no other end than male beastliness. The President was an exception. She had known it all along. Nobody could fool her; she had nothing, but knowledge of mankind was not such bad capital after all.

Tears came into the eyes of the honest man, to think that fate had given him this opportunity to show himself more virtuous than his knower of men expected from them in general. The actual reason for his appearance was forgotten. He began to believe that humanity itself, the classic masters of which he served unrelenting, had brought him hither today.

The ladies stood round his dignified and gloomy figure as though he were a schoolmaster, listening to his words; and all the everyday phrases and sayings which had not been heard in this room for days, even now they did not dare to use them, though Ilonka felt an almost irresistible itch to fling into the talk a few professional phrases with sap and marrow.

The Grand Salon, the blinds of which were very properly closed, lay again in the light of the illumination peculiar to it, and awaited with red plush, marble tables, Renaissance mirrors, and fresh-waxed parquet floor the nightly conviviality. By degrees, and still in their weeds, the girls began to practise the weaving gait proper to the evening, which they had intermitted three whole days.

Only Ludmilla was absent; she had remained in a suburb to visit some relatives.

The President, highly self-satisfied, considered long whether as a business man he ought not to regard the house as a prospective client. Despite certain moral objections he came to the conclusion that it would be a sign of incipient incapacity and business negligence if he let escape so favourable an opportunity. So he girded himself up and began, this time without pathos but instead in a ringing and cordial tone.

"Children," said he, making Grete and Anita sit down beside him and fetching a sigh, "children, man dies, and we must all die. What this death is, nobody knows, and he who learns knows it no longer. Good, we must come to terms with it. But the business has another hitch. . . ."

His voice now took on a tone weighted with knowledge and resignation:

"A grave, when it is not tended, falls to decay; I give my word, inside a few months it is a dung-heap. I speak from experience."

Manya confirmed this view and Moré went on:

"But the care of a grave, ladies, costs money; ugly though it may be, it costs money to remember. Who gives this money? Decent and proper survivors. But if a man has nobody, what then?"

The President looked meaningfully from one to another, before he proceeded to touch their hearts:

"What then? Ask yourselves, if some day you will have anybody?"

The argument went home. Whom would they have then? Hospital, asylum, dissection, at best a hard crust, that was the end of the story, they had heard it all so often. The President smiled a fatherly smile.

"Well, at least Herr Max Stein has somebody left, he has girls with hearts like yours. But where will you all be dispersed, in the year to come? None of us know!"

This went home too. Today they were employed in the first-class establishment in the Gamsgasse and ate with silver forks and spoons. But the years pass, and not everybody can get to be housekeeper; prizes in life or in the lottery are hard to win. There had been dozens of Manyas, Anitas, Ilonkas, who had sunk to the Napoleon and then further still and finished up in the provinces.

The President had no wish to be depressing; his face suddenly brightened.

"But I have thought of something: How would it be, if you made a little collection among you, to put up a stone with his name on it? I speak from experience. A piece of marble like that—it does not have to be marble, sandstone is very nice—but marble keeps a grave green for ever. Of course it must be nicely done—no sculpture, just simple gilt lettering. But in the years to come the passer-by reads 'Max Stein,' says 'Aha!' and remembers him. What do you say? Shall we open a little fund? That is, only if you think well of it. For it is all the same to me. But I think of everything and I happen to have a price-list with me. From three hundred kronen upwards one can get quite fair stones. . . ."

The ladies' hearts were still oppressed by the weight of the last three days. Not yet did they feel at home on the parquetry of the Grand Salon. The vision of the cemetery was before them still. The question: Whom will you have? still rang in their ears. Gladly would they have bought themselves free of the fate that threatened them more than other people. And is not death, among all primitive peoples and persons, the thought that most rouses the instinct to sacrifice?

Thus the words of Moré fell on fruitful ground. More or less eagerly they all sought their rooms. Their cash in hand and savings were counted over and over. According to the measure of generosity, faith, greed, or caprice, they gave.

Valeska, the vainest and best-natured of them all, was undressing when the collection was made; either for that reason or just to show herself in her magnificence she came downstairs stark naked, to hand in personally to death's business representative the twenty-five kronen of her tribute to death. And it was a marvel to see how, when suddenly the joyful flesh-colour of this feminine body blossomed in the lingering gloom of the Grand Salon, the room seemed for the first time since Max's death to be coming back to itself. The exhausting space smiled wanly and drew faltering breath like an invalid who has turned the corner back to life. Valeska stood there revolving self-absorbed round her own lovely axis—it was a homely and a heartening sight.

During the next fifteen minutes Moré had entered most of the girls' real names in his lists with the amount promised appended. Only Fräulein Edith, who had already done all she could, and Manya, the initiated, who saw through the game, did not contribute.

The agent for monumental stone booked the order in his note-book and actually, moved by his own magnanimity, reduced his own commission from the usual fifteen to seven and a half percent.

The dressing-hour, and the hairdresser, had arrived. The wonted excitement possessed the ladies. They all rushed screaming upstairs to the dressing-room, Ilonka's voice ringing above the others in her favourite strong language, which burst like a freed torrent from her breast.

Grete stopped in the salon with the President. She seized his hand.

"A big hole! And you are chucked down it. Just dirt and that's all."

The presiding officer of the Spinoza Society avoided any precise statement of his views:

"That is not the important thing about it."

Grete asked, astonished:

"Why, Prexy, you don't mean you believe in heaven, like Edith?"

The President contented himself with quoting Goethe:

"'And lo, behold, we can know nothing.'"

But Grete had not got to the end of her metaphysical preoccupations; she looked sharply at Moré and emphasized each word:

"If it is true that we are going to go to heaven, then why does it rain every time anybody is buried?"

There was triumph in her voice. But the President disarmed her logic out of his professional experience:

"I have often in my practice seen funerals on beautiful days."

Grete asked suddenly:

"I say, Prexy, what did Spinoza say?"

"He said a great deal, my child."

"Did Spinoza say: 'Sire, give freedom of thought?'"

"No, that comes from Schiller. But that was just what Spinoza thought. For instance, he said: 'Happiness is virtue, not its reward.'"

"Happiness is not its reward! Nor mine either. That is divine."

Grete chuckled with satisfaction at Moré's quotation.

Her voice grew very confidential:

"Spinoza was Spanish, wasn't he? I had a Spaniard once. . . . No, twol!"

The President instructed her:

"Spinoza was a Dutchman."

Grete made a disgusted face:

"A Dutchman! Disgusting. I can't stand them. In Hamburg, you know, there were always a lot of Dutch."

The President, whose mind dwelt continually on the political situation, said:

"They will probably remain neutral."

Grete pressed herself close to him.

"You know I'm crazy about you? Much more than Schleissner. How can a man be called Schleissner? It was grand of you, Prexy, to come to-day!"

The President smiled benevolently. With his large hairy hand he delicately stroked Grete's long legs. She sighed against his breast:

"You shall be my lover, and you needn't give me any money."

But she misjudged the President.

He drew himself up to his full height and declared that he was a guest of the house, like any other and would not be made an exception of. He would go up with her now to her room. But he would take nothing as a present. How could she do that and how could he? There must be order in all things.

The pair disappeared.

At the same time Edith was hearing from Ludmilla the news that she would not be returning to the Gamsgasse.

X

Here it is time to draw to a close these brief and cursory notes, for as a matter of fact the story of the old established house in the Gamsgasse ends at this point. Even what is here set down is but an inconsiderable chronicle of last days, if we are to assume, without exaggerated historical assumptions, that the famous house was founded some time after the battle on the White Mountain. The magnificent assumption that Charles the Fourth of Luxembourg had some three centuries earlier been its founder probably belongs to legend. But that is the way with fame: it ascribes to famous names the deeds of unknown men. Why should not Charles, the great city-builder, to whom we owe the New Town, the university, and the old bridge, also have laid the foundation-stone of the Grand Salon in the Gamsgasse?

At all events it had a long and splendid life between the Thirty Years' War and the Great War: a life which deserved a more romantic ending than to terminate with the death of a decadent, half-witted last survivor. But do the great kingdoms of the earth perish more grandly? They think to survive, they carry on wars, and before they know it they are dissolved and divided up as booty.

In that paradoxical moment when Herr Max lay on his bier in the large salon, the establishment had fulfilled its destiny, however long it might linger on. The heirs were no good, as is sufficiently shown by the fact that Fräulein Edith, the most pious and cautious of all housekeepers, gave notice in the early days of the new regime. This notice, and the severity of the new laws, gave the coup de grâce.

The building still stands; but it has been absorbed by the neighbouring leather trade; even the peculiar, once indestructible odour in the vestibule is said to have been wholly drowned out by the stench of Russian leather.

Moreover, every death is a court of last appeal; and nothing dies whose time has not come. If today one passes by night through the streets glaring with electric signs, one reads at every corner the names of places dedicated not to joy but to the dance. The Negro saxophone wails. Real ladies go in and out through the glittering portals, and their magnificent free limbs are a plainer allure than was ever allowed in the Gamsgasse of yore.

Careworn, deprived of her bread by an unlimited, unlicensed competition, the street-walker drearily makes her round. Who knows whether "houses" still exist? Perhaps this account of mine may thus possess some historical value if no other.

No one will inquire into the unimportant fates of highly unimportant persons. In this picture they played only the part of supernumeraries. And the inquiry would embarrass the answerer. Of course he would at once burst out:

"You know, Oscar has become quite prominent; he owns the finest country-house in an American film city!"

But the question itself would be silly: even a Zulu knows Oscar's face on the films.

As for Ludmilla, she is to be seen at every première in the theatres. She has not grown fatter, only in the struggle with her double chin the chin seems to have got the upper hand. She may still be called pretty. Her slender, classic legs, much advantaged by present fashions, have a daily triumph on the street.

Her old friends long ago stopped venturing to greet her. She acknowledges the bow only of the gentlemen she knows, and it is exactly her old acquaintances whom she does not know. She looks them in the face with wide, childlike eyes and, however ingratiatingly they smile, she cannot, by the greatest effort, remember them.

It happened not otherwise even to Oscar, on his late triumphal tour of the world. The staring childlike eyes did not recognize him, he read nothing there but the disdain of a lady bored by importunate glances. The incident upset him, and deprived him of speech for quite a while—which proves, once more, that a man is vainer than a woman.

Who could reproach Ludmilla for her bad memory? The war washed away in blood many other memories as well. And she has long since become the wife of an influential deputy of the Republic. Chance would have it that in the enthusiastic days of the Revolution her husband was a member of a parliamentary commission which under the leadership of a well-known feminist successfully attacked the problem of prostitution and decided the fate of the Grand Salon. Frau Ludmilla's husband passes for an idealist, he was never involved in any of the numerous financial scandals, and is, so one hears, a great political hope. For her and for the state it is sincerely to be wished that he may become a minister in the next Cabinet.

A START IN LIFE

Ruth Suckow

(1892- )

---

THE SWITZERS were scurrying around to get Daisy ready by the time that Elmer Kruse should get through in town. They had known all week that Elmer might be in for her any day. But they hadn't done a thing until he appeared. "Oh, it was so rainy to-day, the roads were so muddy, they hadn't thought he'd get in until maybe next week." It would have been the same any other day.

Mrs. Switzer was trying now at the last moment to get all of Daisy's things into the battered telescope that lay open on the bed. The bed had not "got made"; and just as soon as Daisy was gone, Mrs. Switzer would have to hurry off to the Woodworths, where she was to wash to-day. Daisy's things were scattered over the dark brown quilt and the rumpled sheet that were dingy and clammy in this damp weather. So was the whole bedroom, with its sloping ceiling, and old-fashioned square-paned windows, the commode that they used for a dresser littered with pin trays, curlers, broken combs, ribbons, smoky lamp, all mixed up together; the door of the closet open, showing the confusion of clothes and shabby shoes. . . . They all slept in this room—Mrs. Switzer and Dwight in the bed, the two girls in the cot against the wall.

"Mama, I can't find the belt to that plaid dress."

"Oh, ain't it somewheres around? Well, I guess you'll have to let it go. If I come across it I can send it out to you. Someone'll be going past there."

She had meant to get Daisy all mended and "fixed up" before she went out to the country. But somehow . . . oh, there was always so much to see to when she came home. Gone all day, washing and cleaning for other people; it didn't leave her much time for her own house.

She was late now. The Woodworths liked to have her get the washing out early so that she could do some cleaning too before she left. But she couldn't help it. She would have to get Daisy off first. She had already had on her wraps ready to go, when Elmer came—her cleaning cap, of a blue faded almost into gray, and the ancient black coat with gathered sleeves that she wore over her work dress when she went out to wash.

"What's become of all your underclothes? They ain't all dirty, are they?"

"They are, too. You didn't wash for us last week, mama."

"Well, you'll just have to take along what you've got. Maybe there'll be some way of getting the rest to you."

"Elmers come in every week, don't they?" Daisy demanded.

"Yes, but maybe they won't always be bringing you in."

She jammed what she could into the telescope, thinking with her helpless, anxious fatalism that it would have to do somehow.

"Daisy, you get yourself ready now."

"I am ready. Mama, I want to put on my other ribbon."

"Oh, that's 'way down in the telescope somewhere. You needn't be so anxious to fix yourself up. This ain't like going visiting."

Daisy stood at the little mirror preening herself—such a homely child, "all Switzer," skinny, with pale sharp eyes set close together and thin, stringy, reddish hair. But she had never really learned yet how homely she was. She was the oldest, and she got the pick of what clothes were given to the Switzers. Goldie and Dwight envied her. She was important in her small world. She was proud of her blue coat that had belonged to Alice Brooker, the town lawyer's daughter. It hung unevenly above her bony little knees, and the buttons came down too far. Her mother had tried to make it over for her.

Mrs. Switzer looked at her, troubled, but not knowing how she could tell her all the things she ought to be told. Daisy had never been away before except to go to her Uncle Fred's at Lehigh. She seemed to think that this would be the same. She had so many things to learn. Well, she would find them out soon enough—only too soon. Working for other people—she would learn what that meant. Elmer and Edna Kruse were nice young people. They would mean well enough by Daisy. It was a good chance for her to start in. But it wasn't the same.

Daisy was so proud. She thought it was quite a thing to be "starting in to earn." She thought she could buy herself so much with that dollar and a half a week. The other children stood back watching her, round-eyed and impressed. They wished that they were going away, like Daisy.

They heard a car come splashing through the mud on low.

"There he is back! Have you got your things on? Goldie—go out and tell him she's coming."

"No, me tell him, me!" Dwight shouted jealously.

"Well—both of you tell him. Land! . . ."

She tried hastily to put on the cover of the bulging telescope and to fasten the straps. One of them broke.

"Well, you'll have to take it the way it is."

It was an old thing, hadn't been used since her husband, Mert, had "left off canvassing" before he died. And he had worn it all to pieces.

"Well, I guess you'll have to go now. He won't want to wait. I'll try and send you out what you ain't got with you." She turned to Daisy. Her face was working. There was nothing else to do, as everyone said. Daisy would have to help, and she might as well learn it now. Only, she hated to see Daisy go off, to have her starting in. She knew what it meant. "Well—you try and work good this summer, so they'll want you to stay. I hope they'll bring you in sometimes."

Daisy's homely little face grew pale with awe, suddenly, at the sight of her mother crying, at something that she dimly sensed in the pressure of her mother's thin strong arms. Her vanity in her new importance was somehow shamed and dampened.

Elmer's big new Buick, mud-splashed but imposing, stood tilted on the uneven road. Mud was thick on the wheels. It was a bad day for driving, with the roads a yellow mass, water lying in all the wheel ruts. This little road that led past these few houses on the outskirts of town, and up over the hill, had a cold rainy loneliness. Elmer sat in the front seat of the Buick, and in the back was a big box of groceries.

"Got room to sit in there?" he asked genially. "I didn't get out, it's so muddy here."

"No, don't get out," Mrs. Switzer said hastily. "She can put this right on the floor there in the back." She added, with a timid attempt at courtesy, "Ain't the roads pretty bad out that way?"

"Yes, but farmers get so they don't think so much about the roads."

"I s'pose that's so."

He saw the signs of tears on Mrs. Switzer's face, and they made him anxious to get away. She embraced Daisy hastily again. Daisy climbed over the grocery box and scrunched herself into the seat.

"I guess you'll bring her in with you some time when you're coming," Mrs. Switzer hinted.

"Sure. We'll bring her."

He started the engine. It roared, half died down as the wheels of the car spun in the thick wet mud.

In that moment, Daisy had a startled view of home—the small house standing on a rough rise of land, weathered to a dim color that showed dark streaks from the rain; the narrow sloping front porch whose edge had a soaked gnawed look; the chickens, grayish-black, pecking at the wet ground; their playthings, stones, a wagon, some old pail covers littered about; a soaked, discolored piece of underwear hanging on the line in the back yard. The yard was tussocky and overhung the road with shaggy long grass where the yellow bank was caved in under it. Goldie and Dwight were gazing at her solemnly. She saw her mother's face—a thin, weak, loving face, drawn with neglected weeping, with its reddened eyes and poor teeth . . . in the old coat and heavy shoes and cleaning cap, her work-worn hand with its big knuckles clutching at her coat. She saw the playthings they had used yesterday, and the old swing that hung from one of the trees, the ropes sodden, the seat in crooked. . . .

The car went off, slipping on the wet clay. She waved frantically, suddenly understanding that she was leaving them. They waved at her.

Mrs. Switzer stood there a little while. Then came the harsh rasp of the old black iron pump that stood out under the box elder tree. She was pumping water to leave for the children before she went off to work.

II

Daisy held on as the car skidded going down the short clay hill. Elmer didn't bother with chains. He was too used to the roads. But her eyes brightened with scared excitement. When they were down, and Elmer slowed up going along the tracks in the deep wet grass that led to the main road, she looked back, holding on her hat with her small scrawny hand.

Just down this little hill—and home was gone. The big car, the feel of her telescope on the floor under her feet, the fact that she was going out to the country, changed the looks of everything. She saw it all now.

Dunkels' house stood on one side of the road. A closed-up white house. The windows stared blank and cold between the old shutters. There was a chair with a broken straw seat under the fruit trees. The Dunkels were old Catholic people who seldom went anywhere. In the front yard was a clump of tall pines, the rough brown trunks wet, the green branches, dark and shining, heavy with rain, the ground underneath mournfully sodden and black.

The pasture on the other side. The green grass, lush, wet and cold, and the outcroppings of limestone that held little pools of rain water in all the tiny holes. Beyond, the low hills gloomy with timber against the lowering sky.

They slid out onto the main road. They bumped over the small wooden bridge above the swollen creek that came from the pasture. Daisy looked down. She saw the little swirls of foam, the long grass that swished with the water, the old rusted tin cans lodged between the rocks.

She sat up straight and important, her thin, homely little face strained with excitement, her sharp eyes taking in everything. The watery mud holes in the road, the little thickets of plum trees, low and wet, in dark interlacings. She held on fiercely, but made no sound when the car skidded.

She felt the grandeur of having a ride. One wet Sunday, Mr. Brooker had driven them all home from church, she and Goldie and Dwight packed tightly into the back seat of the car, shut in by the side curtains, against which the rain lashed, catching the muddy scent of the roads. Sometimes they could plan to go to town just when Mr. Pattey was going to work in his Ford. Then they would run out and shout eagerly, "Mr. Pattey! Are you going through town?" Sometimes he didn't hear them. Sometimes he said, with curt good nature, "Well, pile in"; and they all hopped into the truck back. "He says we can go along with him."

She looked at the black wet fields through which little leaves of bright green corn grew in rows, at showery bushes of sumach along the roadside. A gasoline engine pumping water made a loud desolate sound. There were somber-looking cattle in the wet grass, and lonely, thick-foliaged trees growing here and there in the pastures. She felt her telescope on the floor of the car, the box of groceries beside her. She eyed these with a sharp curiosity. There was a fresh pineapple—something the Switzers didn't often get at home. She wondered if Edna would have it for dinner. Maybe she could hint a little to Edna.

She was out in the country. She could no longer see her house even if she wanted to—standing dingy, streaked with rain, in its rough grass on the little hill. A lump came into her throat. She had looked forward to playing with Edna's children. But Goldie and Dwight would play all morning without her. She was still proud of being the oldest, of going out with Elmer and Edna; but now there was a forlornness in the pride.

She wished she were in the front seat with Elmer. She didn't see why he hadn't put her there. She would have liked to know who all the people were who lived on these farms; how old Elmer's babies were; and if he and Edna always went to the movies when they went into town on Saturday nights. Elmer must have lots of money to buy a car like this. He had a new house on his farm, too, and Mrs. Metzinger had said that it had plumbing. Maybe they would take her to the movies, too. She might hint about that.

When she had gone to visit Uncle Fred, she had had to go on the train. She liked this better. She hoped they had a long way to go. She called out to Elmer:

"Say, how much farther is your place?"

"What's that?" He turned around. "Oh, just down the road a ways. Scared to drive in the mud?"

"No, I ain't scared. I like to drive most any way."

She looked at Elmer's back, the old felt hat crammed down carelessly on his head, the back of his neck with the golden hair on the sunburned skin above the blue of his shirt collar. Strong and easy and slouched a little over the steering wheel that he handled so masterly. Elmer and Edna were just young folks; but Mrs. Metzinger said that they had more to start with than most young farmers did, and that they were hustlers. Daisy felt that the pride of this belonged to her too, now.

"Here we are!"

"Oh, is this where you folks live?" Daisy cried eagerly.

The house stood back from the road, beyond a space of bare yard with a little scattering of grass just starting—small, modern, painted a bright new white and yellow. The barn was new too, a big splendid barn of frescoed brick, with a silo of the same. There were no trees. A raw desolate wind blew across the back yard as they drove up beside the back door.

Edna had come out on the step. Elmer grinned at her as he took out the box of groceries, and she slightly raised her eyebrows. She said kindly enough:

"Well, you brought Daisy. Hello, Daisy, are you going to stay with us this summer?"

"I guess so," Daisy said importantly. But she suddenly felt a little shy and forlorn as she got out of the car and stood on the bare ground in the chilly wind.

"Yes, I brought her along," Elmer said.

"Are the roads very bad?"

"Kind of bad. Why?"

"Well, I'd like to get over to mama's some time to-day."

"Oh, I guess they aren't too bad for that."

Daisy pricked up her sharp little ears. Another ride. That cheered her.

"Look in the door," Edna said in a low fond voice, motioning with her head.

Two little round, blond heads were pressed tightly against the screen door. There was a clamor of "Daddy, daddy!" Elmer grinned with a bashful pride as he stood with the box of groceries, raising his eyebrows with mock surprise and demanding, "Who's this? What you shoutin' 'daddy' for? You don't think daddy's got anything for you, do you?" He and Edna were going into the kitchen together, until Edna remembered and called back hastily:

"Oh, come in, Daisy!"

Daisy stood, a little left out and solitary, there in the kitchen, as Billy, the older of the babies, climbed frantically over Elmer, demanding candy, and the little one toddled smilingly about. Her eyes took in all of it. She was impressed by the shining blue-and-white linoleum, the range with its nickel and enamel, the bright new woodwork. Edna was laughing and scolding at Elmer and the baby. Billy had made his father produce the candy. Daisy's sharp little eyes looked hungrily at the lemon drops until Edna remembered her.

"Give Daisy a piece of your candy," she said.

He would not go up to Daisy. She had to come forward and take one of the lemon drops herself. She saw where Edna put the sack, in a dish high in the cupboard. She hoped they would get some more before long.

"My telescope's out there in the car," she reminded them.

"Oh! Elmer, you go and get it and take it up for her," Edna said.

"What?"

"Her valise—or whatever it is—out in the car."

"Oh, sure," Elmer said with a cheerful grin.

"It's kind of an old telescope," Daisy said conversationally. "I guess it's been used a lot. My papa used to have it. The strap broke when mama was fastening it this morning. We ain't got any suitcase. I had to take this because it was all there was in the house, and mama didn't want to get me a new one."

Edna raised her eyebrows politely. She leaned over and pretended to spat the baby as he came toddling up to her, then rubbed her cheek against his round head with its funny fuzz of hair.

Daisy watched solemnly. "I didn't know both of your children was boys. I thought one of 'em was a girl. That's what there is at home now—one boy and one girl."

"Um-hm," Edna replied absently. "You can go up with Elmer and take off your things, Daisy," she said. "You can stop and unpack your valise now, I guess, if you'd like to. Then you can come down and help me in the kitchen. You know we got you to help me," she reminded.

Daisy, subdued, followed Elmer up the bright new stairs. In the upper hall, two strips of very clean rag rug were laid over the shining yellow of the floor. Elmer had put her telescope in one of the bedrooms.

"There you are!"

She heard him go clattering down the stairs, and then a kind of murmuring and laughing in the kitchen. The back door slammed. She hurried to the window in time to see Elmer go striding off toward the barn.

She looked about her room with intense curiosity. It too had a bright varnished floor. She had a bed all of her own—a small, old-fashioned bed, left from some old furnishings, that had been put in this room that had the pipes and the hot water tank. She had to see everything, but she had a stealthy look as she tiptoed about, started to open the drawers of the dresser, looked out of her window. She put her coat and hat on the bed. She would rather be down in the kitchen with Edna than unpack her telescope now.

She guessed she would go down where the rest of them were.

III

Elmer came into the house for dinner. He brought in a cold, muddy, outdoor breath with him. The range was going, but the bright little kitchen seemed chilly, with the white oilcloth on the table, the baby's varnished high chair and his little fat mottled hands.

Edna made a significant little face at Elmer. Daisy did not see. She was standing back from the stove, where Edna was at work, looking at the baby.

"He can talk pretty good, can't he? Dwight couldn't say anything but 'mama' when he was that little."

Edna's back was turned. She said meaningly:

"Now, Elmer's come in for dinner, Daisy, we'll have to hurry. You must help me get on the dinner. You can cut bread and get things on the table. You must help, you know. That's what you are supposed to do."

Daisy looked startled, a little scared and resentful. "Well, I don't know where you keep your bread."

"Don't you remember where I told you to put it this morning? Right over in the cabinet, in that big box. You must watch, Daisy, and learn where things are."

Elmer, a little embarrassed at the look that Edna gave him, whistled as he began to wash his hands at the sink.

"How's daddy's old boy?" he said loudly, giving a poke at the baby's chin.

As Edna passed him, she shook her head and her lips just formed, "Been like that all morning!"

He grinned comprehendingly. Then both their faces became expressionless.

Daisy had not exactly heard, but she looked from one to the other, silent and dimly wondering. The queer ache that had kept starting all through the morning, under her interest in Edna's things and doings, came over her again. She sensed something different in the atmosphere than she had ever known before—some queer difference between the position of herself and of the two babies, a faint notion of what mama had meant when she had said that this would not be visiting.

"I guess I'm going to have the toothache again," she said faintly.

No one seemed to hear her.

Edna whisked off the potatoes, drained the water. . . . "You might bring me a dish, Daisy." Daisy searched a long time while Edna turned impatiently and pointed. Edna put the rest of the things on the table herself. Her young, fresh, capable mouth was tightly closed, and she was making certain resolutions.

Daisy stood hesitating in the middle of the room, a scrawny, unappealing little figure. Billy—fat, blond, in funny, dark blue union-alls—was trotting busily about the kitchen. Daisy swooped down upon him and tried to bring him to the table. He set up a howl. Edna turned, looked astonished, severe.

"I was trying to make him come to the table," Daisy explained weakly.

"You scared him. He isn't used to you. He doesn't like it. Don't cry, Billy. The girl didn't mean anything."

"Here, daddy'll put him in his place," Elmer said hastily.

Billy looked over his father's shoulder at Daisy with suffused, resentful blue eyes. She did not understand it, and felt strangely at a loss. She had been left with Goldie and Dwight so often. She had always made Dwight go to the table. She had been the boss.

Edna said in a cool, held-in voice, "Put these things on the table, Daisy."

They sat down. Daisy and the other children had always felt it a great treat to eat away from home instead of at their own scanty, hastily set table. They had hung around Mrs. Metzinger's house at noon, hoping to be asked to stay, not offended when told that "it was time for them to run off now." Her pinched little face had a hungry look as she stared at the potatoes and fried ham and pie. But they did not watch and urge her to have more, as Mrs. Metzinger did, and Mrs. Brooker when she took pity on the Switzers and had them there. Daisy wanted more pie. But none of them seemed to be taking more, and so she said nothing. She remembered what her mother had said, with now a faint comprehension. "You must remember you're out working for other folks, and it won't be like it is at home."

After dinner, Edna said, "Now you can wash the dishes, Daisy."

She went into the next room with the children. Daisy, as she went hesitatingly about the kitchen alone, could hear Edna's low contented humming as she sat in there rocking, the baby in her lap. The bright kitchen was empty and lonely now. Through the window, Daisy could see the great barn looming up against the rainy sky. She hoped that they would drive to Edna's mother's soon.

She finished as soon as she could and went into the dining room where Edna was sewing on the baby's rompers. Edna went on sewing. Daisy sat down disconsolately. That queer low ache went all through her. She said in a small dismal voice:

"I guess I got the toothache again."

Edna bit off a thread.

"I had it awful hard awhile ago. Mama come pretty near taking me to the dentist."

"That's too bad," Edna murmured politely. But she offered no other condolence. She gave a little secret smile at the baby asleep on a blanket and a pillow in one corner of the shiny leather davenport.

"Is Elmer going to drive into town to-morrow?"

"To-morrow? I don't suppose so."

"Mama couldn't find the belt of my plaid dress and I thought if he was, maybe I could go along and get it. I'd like to have it."

Daisy's homely mouth drooped at the corners. Her toothache did not seem to matter to anyone. Edna did not seem to want to see that anything was wrong with her. She had expected Edna to be concerned, to mention remedies. But it wasn't toothache, that strange lonesome ache all over her. Maybe she was going to be terribly sick. Mama wouldn't come home for supper to be told about it.

She saw mama's face as in that last glimpse of it—drawn with crying, and yet trying to smile, under the old cleaning cap, her hand holding her coat together. . . .

Edna glanced quickly at her. The child was so mortally unattractive, unappealing even in her forlornness. Edna frowned a little, but said kindly:

"Now you might take Billy into the kitchen out of my way, Daisy, and amuse him."

"Well, he cries when I pick him up," Daisy said faintly.

"He won't cry this time. Take him out and help him play with his blocks. You must help me with the children, you know."

"Well, if he'll go with me."

"He'll go with you, won't he, Billy boy? Won't you go with Daisy, sweetheart?"

Billy stared and then nodded. Daisy felt a thrill of comfort as Billy put his little fat hand in hers and trotted into the kitchen beside her. He had the fattest hands, she thought. Edna brought the blocks and put the box down on the floor beside Daisy.

"Now, see if you can amuse him so that I can get my sewing done."

"Shall you and me play blocks, Billy?" Daisy murmured.

He nodded. Then he got hold of the box with one hand, tipped out all the blocks on the floor with a bang and a rattle, and looked at her with a pleased proud smile.

"Oh no, Billy. You mustn't spill out the blocks. Look, you're too little to play with them. No, now—now wait! Let Daisy show you. Daisy'll build you something real nice—shall she?"

He gave a solemn nod of consent.

Daisy set out the blocks on the bright linoleum. She had never had such blocks as these to handle before. Dwight's were only a few old, unmatched, broken ones. Her spirit of leadership came back, and she firmly put away that fat hand of Billy's whenever he meddled with her building. She could make something really wonderful with these blocks.

"No, Billy, you mustn't. See, when Daisy's got it all done, then you can see what the lovely building is."

She put the blocks together with great interest. She knew what she was going to make—it was going to be a new house; no, a new church. Just as she got the walls up, in came that little hand again, and then with a delighted grunt Billy swept the blocks pell-mell about the floor. At the clatter, he sat back, pursing his mouth to give an ecstatic "Ooh!"

"Oh, Billy—you mustn't, the building wasn't done! Look, you've spoiled it. Now you've got to sit 'way off here while I try to build it over again."

Billy's look of triumph turned to surprise and then to vociferous protest as Daisy picked him up and firmly transplanted him to another corner of the room. He set up a tremendous howl. He had never been set aside like that before. Edna came hurrying out. Daisy looked at Edna for justification, but instinctively on the defensive.

"Billy knocked over the blocks. He spoiled the building."

"Wah! Wah!" Billy gave loud heartbroken sobs. The tears ran down his fat cheeks and he held out his arms piteously toward his mother.

"I didn't hurt him," Daisy said, scared.

"Never mind, lover," Edna was crooning. "Of course he can play with his blocks. They're Billy's blocks, Daisy," she said. "He doesn't like to sit and see you put up buildings. He wants to play, too. See, you've made him cry now."

"Do' wanna stay here," Billy wailed.

"Well, come in with mother then." She picked him up, wiping his tears.

"I didn't hurt him," Daisy protested.

"Well, never mind now. You can pick up the blocks and then sweep up the floor, Daisy. You didn't do that when you finished the dishes. Never mind," she was saying to Billy. "Pretty soon daddy'll come in and we'll have a nice ride."

Daisy soberly picked up the blocks and got the broom. What had she done to Billy? He had tried to spoil her building. She always made Dwight keep back until she had finished. Of course it was Daisy, the oldest, who should lead and manage. There had been no one to hear her side. Everything was different. She winked back tears as she swept, poorly and carelessly.

Then she brightened up as Elmer came tramping up on the back porch and then through the kitchen.

"Edna!"

"She's in there," Daisy offered.

"Want to go now? What! Is the baby asleep?" he asked blankly.

Edna gave him a warning look and the door was closed.

Daisy listened hard. She swept very softly. She could catch only a little of what they said—"Kind of hate to go off . . . I know, but if we once start . . . not a thing all day . . . what we got her for . . ." She had no real comprehension of it. She hurried and put away the broom. She wanted to be sure and be ready to go.

Elmer tramped out, straight past her. She saw from the window that he was backing the car out from the shed. She could hear Edna and Billy upstairs, could hear the baby cry a little as he was wakened. Maybe she ought to go out and get on her wraps, too.

Elmer honked the horn. A moment later Edna came hurrying downstairs, in her hat and coat, and Billy in a knitted cap and a red sweater crammed over his union-alls, so that he looked like a little Brownie. The baby had on his little coat, too.

Edna called out, "Come in and get this boy, daddy." She did not look at Daisy, but said hurriedly, "We're going for a little ride, Daisy. Have you finished the sweeping? Well, then, you can pick up those pieces in the dining room. We won't be gone so very long. When it's a quarter past five, you start the fire, like I showed you this noon, and slice the potatoes that were left, and the meat. And set the table."

The horn was honked again.

"Yes! Well, we'll be back, Daisy. Come, lover, daddy's in a hurry."

Daisy stood looking after them. Billy clamored to sit beside his daddy. Edna took the baby from Elmer and put him beside her on the back seat. There was room—half of the big back seat. There wasn't anything, really, to be done at home. That was the worst of it. They just didn't want to take her. They all belonged together. They didn't want to take anyone else along. She was an outsider. They all—even the baby—had a freshened look of expectancy.

The engine roared—they had started; slipping on the mud of the drive, then forging straight ahead, around the turn, out of sight.

IV

She went forlornly into the dining room. The light from the windows was dim now in the rainy, late afternoon. The pink pieces from the baby's rompers were scattered over the gay rug. She got down on her hands and knees, slowly picking them up, sniffing a little. She heard the Big Ben clock in the kitchen ticking loudly.

That dreadful ache submerged her. No one would ask about it, no one would try to comfort her. Before, there had always been mama coming home, anxious, scolding sometimes, but worried over them if they didn't feel right, caring about them. Mama and Goldie and Dwight cared about her—but she was away out in the country, and they were at home. She didn't want to stay here, where she didn't belong. But mama had told her that she must begin helping this summer.

Her ugly little mouth contorted into a grimace of weeping. But silent weeping, without any tears; because she already had the cold knowledge that no one would notice or comfort it.

THE DESERT ISLANDER

Stella Benson

(1892-1933)

CONSTANTINE hopefully followed the Chinese servant through the unknown house. He felt hopeful of success in his plan of begging this Englishman for help, for he knew that an Englishman, alone among people of a different colour (as this Englishman was alone in this South China town), treated the helping of stray white men almost as part of the White Man's Burden. But even without his claim of one lonely white man upon another, Constantine would have felt hopeful. He knew himself to be a man of compelling manner in spite of his ugly, too long face, and his ugly, too short legs.

As Constantine stumped in on his hobnailed soles, Mr. White—who was evidently not a very tactful man—said, “Oh, are you another deserter from the Foreign Legion?”

“I am Constantine Andreievitch Soloviev,” said Constantine, surprised. He spoke and understood English almost perfectly (his mother had been English), yet he could not remember ever having heard the word another applied to himself. In fact it did not—could not possibly—so apply. There was only one of him, he knew.

Of course, in a way there was some sense in what this stupid Englishman said. Constantine had certainly been a légionnaire in Tonkin up till last Thursday—his narrow pipe-clayed helmet, stiff khaki greatcoat, shabby drill uniform, puttees, brass buttons, and inflexible boots were all the property of the French Government. But the core—the pearl inside this vulgar, horny shell—was Constantine Andreievitch Soloviev. That made all the difference.

Constantine saw that he must take this Didymus of an Englishman in hand at once and tell him a few exciting stories about his dangerous adventures between the Tonkin border and this Chinese city. Snakes, tigers, love-crazed Chinese princesses and brigands passed rapidly through his mind, and he chose the last, because he had previously planned several impressive things to do if he should be attacked by brigands. So now, though he had not actually met a brigand, those plans would come in useful. Constantine intended to write his autobiography some day when he should have married a rich wife and settled down. Not only did his actual life seem to him a very rare one but, also, lives were so interesting to make up.

Constantine was a desert islander—a spiritual Robinson Crusoe. He made up everything himself and he wasted nothing. Robinson Crusoe was his favourite book—in fact, almost the only book he had ever read—and he was proud to be, like his hero, a desert islander. He actually preferred clothing his spirit in the skins of wild thoughts that had been the prey of his wits and sheltering it from the world's weather in a leaky hut of his brain's own contriving, to enjoying the good tailoring and housing that dwellers on the mainland call experience and education. He enjoyed being barbarous, he enjoyed living alone on his island, accepting nothing, imitating nothing, believing nothing, adapting himself to nothing—implacably home-made. Even his tangible possessions were those of a marooned man rather than of a civilized citizen of this well-furnished world. At this moment his only luggage was a balalaika that he had made himself out of cigar-boxes, and to this he sang songs of his own composition—very imperfect songs. He would not have claimed that either his songs or his instrument were better than the songs and instruments made by song-makers and balalaika-makers; they were, however, much more rapturously his than any acquired music could have been and, indeed, in this as in almost all things, it simply never occurred to him to take rather than make. There was no mainland on the horizon of his desert island.

"I am not a beggar," said Constantine. "Until yesterday I had sixty piastres which I had saved by many sacrifices during my service in the Legion. But yesterday, passing through a dark forest of pines in the twilight, about twenty versts from here, I met——"

"You met a band of brigands," said Mr. White. "Yes, I know . . . you all say that."

Constantine stared at him. He had not lived, a desert islander, in a crowded and over-civilized world without meeting many rebuffs, so this one did not surprise him—did not even offend him. On the contrary, for a minute he almost loved the uncompromising Mr. White, as a sportsman almost loves the chamois on a peculiarly inaccessible crag. This was a friend worth a good deal of trouble to secure, Constantine saw. He realized at once that the desert islander's line here was to discard the brigands and to discard noble independence.

"Very well then," said Constantine. "I did not meet brigands. I am a beggar. I started without a penny and I still have no penny. I hope you will give me something. That is why I have come." He paused, drawing long pleased breaths through his large nose. This, he felt, was a distinctly self-made line of talk; it set him apart from all previous deserting légionnaires.

Mr. White evidently thought so too. He gave a short grunting laugh. "That's better," he said.

"These English," thought Constantine lovingly. "They are the next best thing to being originals, for they admire originals." "I like you," he added extravagantly, aloud. "I like the English. I am so glad I found an Englishman to beg of instead of an American—though an American would have been much richer than you are, I expect. Still, to a beggar a little is enough. I dislike Americans; I dislike their women's wet finger-nails."

"Wet finger-nails?" exclaimed Mr. White. "Oh, you mean their manicure polishes. Yes . . . they do always have wet finger-nails . . . ha, ha . . . so they do. I should never have thought of that myself."

"Of course not," said Constantine, genuinely surprised. "I thought of it. Why should you have thought of it?" After a moment he added, "I am not a gramophone."

Mr. White thought that he had said, "Have you got a gramophone?" and replied at once with some pleasure, "Yes, I have—it is a very precious companion. Are you musical? But of course you are, being Russian. I should be very lonely without my daily ration of Chopin. Would you like some music while the servants are getting you something to eat?"

"I should like some music," said Constantine, "but I should not like to hear a gramophone. I will play you some music—some unique and only music on a unique and only instrument."

"Thank you very much," said Mr. White, peering doubtfully through his glasses at the cigar-box balalaika. "What good English you speak," he added, trying to divert his guest's attention from his musical purpose. "But all Russians, of course, are wonderful linguists."

"I will play you my music," said Constantine. "But first I must tell you that I do not like you to say to me, 'Being Russian you are musical' or 'All Russians speak good English.' To me it seems so stupid to see me as one of many."

"Each one of us is one of many," sighed Mr. White patiently.

"You, perhaps—but I, not," said Constantine. "When you notice my English words instead of my thoughts it seems to me that you are listening wrongly—you are listening to sounds only, in the same way as you listen to your senseless gramophone——"

"But you haven't heard my gramophone," interrupted Mr. White, stung on his darling's behalf.

"What does it matter what sounds a man makes—what words he uses? Words are common to all men; thoughts belong to one man only."

Mr. White considered telling his guest to go to hell, but he said instead, "You're quite a philosopher, aren't you?"

"I am not quite an anything," said Constantine abruptly. "I am me. All people who like Chopin also say, 'You're quite a philosopher.'"

"Now you're generalizing, yourself," said Mr. White, clinging to his good temper. "Exactly what you've just complained of my doing."

"Some people are general," said Constantine. "Now I will play you my music, and you will admit that it is not one of many musics."

He sang a song with Russian words which Mr. White did not understand. As a matter of fact, such was Constantine's horror of imitating that the words of his song were just a list of the names of the diseases of horses, learned while Constantine was a veterinary surgeon in the Ukraine. His voice was certainly peculiar to himself; it was hoarse—so hoarse that one felt as if a light cough or a discreet blowing of that long nose would clear the hoarseness away; it was veiled, as though heard from behind an intervening stillness; yet with all its hoarseness and insonorousness, it was flexible, alive, and exciting. His instrument had the same quality of quiet ugliness and oddity; it was almost enchanting. It was as if an animal—say, a goat—had found a way to control its voice into a crude goblin concord.

"That's my music," said Constantine. "Do you like it?"

"Frankly," said Mr. White, "I prefer Chopin."

"On the gramophone?"

"On the gramophone."

"Yet one is a thing you never heard before and will never hear again—and the other is a machine that makes the same sound for millions."

"I don't care."

Constantine chewed his upper lip for a minute, thinking this over. Then he shook himself. "Nevertheless, I like you," he said insolently. "You are almost a person. Would you like me to tell you about my life, or would you rather I explained to you my idea about Zigzags?"

"I would rather see you eat a good meal," said Mr. White, roused to a certain cordiality—as almost all Anglo-Saxons are—by the opportunity of dispensing food and drink.

"I can tell you my Zigzag idea while I eat," said Constantine, leading the way towards the table at the other end of the room. "Are you not eating too?"

"I'm not in the habit of eating a meat meal at ten o'clock at night."

"Is 'not being in the habit' a reason for not doing it now?"

"To me it is."

"Oh—oh—oh—I wish I were like you," said Constantine vehemently. "It is so tiring being me—having no guide. I do like you."

"Help yourself to spinach," said Mr. White crossly.

"Now shall I tell you my Zigzag idea?"

"If you can eat as well as talk."

Constantine was exceedingly hungry; he bent low over his plate, though he sat sideways to the table, facing Mr. White, ready to launch a frontal attack of talk. His mouth was too full for a moment to allow him to begin to speak, but quick, agonized glances out of his black eyes implored his host to be silent till his lips should be ready. "You know," he said, swallowing hurriedly, "I always think of a zigzag as going downwards. I draw it in the air, so . . . a straight honest line, then—see—a diagonal subtle line cuts the air away from under it—so . . . Do you see what I mean? I will call the zig a to, and the zag a from. Now—"

"Why is one of your legs fatter than the other?" asked Mr. White.

"It is bandaged. Now, I think of this zigzag as a diagram of human minds. Always human minds are zigs or zags—a to or a from—the brave zig is straight, so . . . the cleverer, crueller zag cuts away below. So are men's——"

"But why is it bandaged?"

"It was kicked by a horse. Well, so are men's understandings. Here I draw the simple, faithful understanding—and here—zag—the easy, clever understanding that sees through the simple faith. Now below that—see—zig once more—the wise, the serene, and now a zag contradicts once more; this is the cynic who knows all answers to serenity. Then below, once more——"

"May I see your leg?" asked Mr. White. "I was in an ambulance unit during the war."

"Oh, what is this talk of legs?" cried Constantine. "Legs are all the same; they belong to millions. All legs are made of blood and bone and muscle—all vulgar things. Your ambulance cuts off legs, mends legs, fits bones together, corks up blood. It treats men like bundles of bones and blood. This is so dull. Bodies are so dull. Minds are the only onliness in men."

"Yes," said Mr. White. "But minds have to have legs to walk about on. Let me see your leg."

"Very well, then, let us talk of legs. We have at least legs in common, you and I."

"Hadn't you got more sense than to put such a dirty rag round an open wound?"

"It is not dirty; it is simply of a grey colour. I washed it in a rice field." Constantine spoke in a muffled voice from somewhere near his knee-cap, for he was now bent double, wholeheartedly interested in his leg. "I washed the wound too, and three boils which are behind my knee. This blackness is not dirt; it is a blackness belonging to the injury."

Mr. White said nothing, but he rose to his feet as though he had heard a call. Constantine, leaving his puttee in limp coils about his foot like a dead snake, went on eating. He began to talk again about the zigzag while he stuffed food into his mouth, but he stopped talking soon, for Mr. White was walking up and down the long room and not pretending to listen. Constantine, watching his host restively pacing the far end of the room, imagined that he himself perhaps smelled disagreeable, for this was a constant fear of his—that his body should play his rare personality this horrid trick. "What is the matter?" he asked anxiously, with a shamed look. "Why are you so far?"

Mr. White's lazy, mild manner was quite changed. His voice seemed to burst out of seething irritation. "It's a dam nuisance just now. It couldn't happen at a worse time. I've a great deal of work to do—and this fighting all over the province makes a journey so dam——"

"What is so dam?" asked Constantine, his bewilderment affecting his English.

"I'll tell you what," said Mr. White, standing in front of Constantine with his feet wide apart and speaking in an angry voice. "You're going to bed now in my attic, and to-morrow at daylight you're going to be waked up and driven down in my car, by me (damn it!) to Lao-chow, to the hospital—a two days' drive—three hundred miles—over the worst roads you ever saw."

Constantine's heart gave a sickening lurch. "Why to hospital? You think my leg is dangerous?"

"If I know anything of legs," said Mr. White rather brutally, "the doctor won't let you keep that one an hour longer than he has to."

Constantine's mouth began instantly to tremble so much that he could scarcely speak. He thought, "I shall die—I shall die like this—of a stupid black leg—this valuable lonely me will die." He glared at Mr. White, hungry for consolation. "He isn't valuable—he's one of many . . . of course he could easily be brave."

Mr. White, once more indolent and indifferent, led the little Russian to the attic and left him there. As soon as Constantine saw the white sheets neatly folded back, the pleasant blue rugs squarely set upon the floor, the open wardrobe fringed with hangers, he doubted whether, after all, he did value himself so much. For in this neat room he felt betrayed by this body of his—this unwashed, unshaven, tired body, encased in coarse dirty clothes, propped on an offensive, festering leg. He decided to take all his clothes off, even though he had no other garment with him to put on; he would feel more appropriate to the shiny linen in his own shiny skin, he thought. He would have washed, but his attention was diverted as he pulled his clothes off by the wound on his leg. Though it was not very painful, it made him nearly sick with disgust now. Every nerve in his body seemed on tiptoe, alert to feel agony, as he studied the wound. He saw that a new sore place was beginning, well above the knee. With only his shirt on, he rushed downstairs, and in at the only lighted doorway. "Look—look," he cried. "A new sore place. . . . Does this mean the danger is greater even than we thought?"

Mr. White, in neat blue-and-white pyjamas, was carefully pressing a tie in a tie-press. Constantine had never felt so far away from a human being in his life as he felt on seeing the tie-press, those pyjamas, those monogrammed silver brushes, that elastic apparatus for reducing exercises that hung upon the door.

"Oh, go to bed," said Mr. White irascibly. "For God's sake, show a little sense."

Constantine was back in his attic before he thought, "I ought to have said, 'For God's sake, show a little nonsense yourself.' Sense is so vulgar."

Sense, however, was to drive him three hundred miles to safety, next day.

All night the exhausted Constantine, sleeping only for a few minutes at a time, dreamed trivial, broken dreams about establishing his own superiority, finding, for instance, that he had after all managed to bring with him a suitcase full of clean, fashionable clothes, or noticing that his host was wearing a filthy bandage round his neck instead of a tie.

Constantine was asleep when Mr. White, fully dressed, woke him next morning. A clear, steely light was slanting in at the window. Constantine was always fully conscious at the second of waking, and he was immediately horrified to see Mr. White looking expressionlessly at the disorderly heap of dirty clothes that he had thrown in disgust on the floor the night before. Trying to divert his host's attention, Constantine put on a merry and courageous manner. "Well, how is the weather for our motor-car jaunt?"

"It could hardly be worse," said Mr. White placidly. "Sheets of rain. God knows what the roads will be like."

"Well, we are lucky to have roads at all, in this benighted China."

"I don't know about that. If there weren't any roads we shouldn't be setting off on this beastly trip."

"I shall be ready in two jiffies," said Constantine, springing naked out of bed and shuffling his dreadful clothes out of Mr. White's sight. "But just tell me," he added as his host went through the door, "why do you drive three hundred miles on a horrible wet day just to take a perfect stranger—a beggar too—to hospital?" (He thought, "Now he must say something showing that he recognizes my value.")

"Because I can't cut off your leg myself," said Mr. White gloomily. Constantine did not press his question because this new reference to the cutting off of legs set his nerves jangling again; his hands trembled so that he could scarcely button his clothes. Service in the Foreign Legion, though it was certainly no suitable adventure for a rare and sensitive man, had never obliged him to face anything more frightening than non-appreciation, coarse food, and stupid treatment. None of these things could humiliate him—on the contrary, all confirmed him in his persuasion of his own value. Only the thought of being at the mercy of his body could humiliate the excited and glowing spirit of Constantine. Death was the final, most loathsome triumph of the body; death meant dumbness and decay—yet even death he could have faced courageously could he have been flattered to its very brink.

The car, a ramshackle Ford, stood in the rain on the bald gravel of the compound, as Constantine, white with excitement, limped out through the front door. His limp, though not consciously assumed, had developed only since last night. His whole leg now felt dangerous, its skin shrinking and tingling. Constantine looked into the car. In the back seat sat Mr. White's coolie, clasping a conspicuously neat little white canvas kit-bag with leather straps. The kit-bag held Constantine's eye and attacked his self-respect as the tie-press had attacked and haunted him the night before. Every one of his host's possessions was like a perfectly well-balanced, indisputable statement in a world of fevered conjecture. "And a camp-bed—so nicely rolled," said Constantine, leaning into the car, fascinated and humiliated. "But only one. . . ."

"I have only one," said Mr. White.

"And you are bringing it—for me?" said Constantine, looking at him ardently, overjoyed at this tribute.

"I am bringing it for myself," said Mr. White with his unamused and short-sighted smile. "I am assuming that a légionnaire is used to sleeping rough. I'm not. I'm rather fixed in my habits and I have a horror of the arrangements in Chinese inns."

"He is morally brave," thought Constantine, though, for the first time, it occurred to him how satisfactory it would be to slap his host's face. "A man less brave would have changed his plans about the camp-bed at once and said, 'For you, my dear man, of course—why not?'" Constantine chattered nervously as he took his seat in the car next to his host, the driver. "I feel such admiration for a man who can drive a motor-car. I adore the machine when it does not—like the gramophone—trespass on matters outside its sphere. The machine's sphere is space, you see—it controls space—and that is so admirable—even when the machine is so very unimpressive as this one. Mr. White, your motor-car is very unimpressive indeed. Are you sure it will run three hundred miles?"

"It always seems to," said Mr. White. "I never do anything to it except pour petrol, oil, and water into the proper openings. I am completely unmechanical."

"You cannot be if you work a gramophone."

"You seem to have my gramophone on your mind. To me it doesn't answer the purpose of a machine—it simply is Chopin, to me."

Constantine stamped his foot in almost delighted irritation, for this made him feel a god beside this groundling. After a few minutes of self-satisfaction, however, a terrible thought invaded him. He became obsessed with an idea that he had left fleas in his bed in Mr. White's attic. That smug, immaculate Chinese servant would see them when he made the bed, and on Mr. White's return would say, "That foreign soldier left fleas in our attic bed." How bitterly did Constantine wish that he had examined the bed carefully before leaving the room, or alternatively, that he could invent some elaborate lie that would prevent Mr. White from believing this revolting accusation. Constantine's mind, already racked with the fear of pain and death and with the agony of his impotence to impress his companion, became overcast with the hopelessness and remorselessness of everything. Everything despairing seemed a fact beyond dispute; everything hopeful, a mere dream. His growing certainty about the fleas, the persistence of the rain, combined with the leakiness of the car's side-curtains, the skiddiness of the road, the festering of his leg, the thought of the surgeon's saw, the perfection of that complacent kit-bag in the back seat, with the poor cigar-box balalaika tinkling beside it, the overstability and overrightness of his friend in need—there was not one sweet or flattering thought to which his poor trapped mind could turn.

The absurdly inadequate bullock-trail only just served the purpose of a road for the Ford. The wheels slid about, wrenching themselves from groove to groove. Constantine's comment on the difficulties of the road was silenced by a polite request on the part of Mr. White. "I can't talk while I'm driving, if you don't mind. I'm not a good driver, and I need all my attention, especially on such a bad road."

"I will talk and you need not answer. That is my ideal plan of conversation. I will tell you why I joined the Foreign Legion. You must have been wondering about this. It will be a relief for me from my misfortunes, to talk."

"I'd rather not, if you don't mind," said his host serenely.

"Mean old horse," thought Constantine passionately, his heart contracting with offence. "It is so English to give away nothing but the bare, bald, stony fact of help—no decorations of graciousnesses and smilings. A Russian would be a much poorer helper, but a how much better friend."

The car ground on. Constantine turned over again and again in his mind the matter of the fleas. The wet ochre-and-green country of South China streamed unevenly past, the neat, complex shapes of rice fields altering, disintegrating and re-forming, like groups in a country dance. Abrupt horns of rock began piercing through the flat rain-striped valley, and these, it seemed, were the heralds of a mountain range that barred the path of the travellers, for soon cliffs towered above the road. A village which clung to a slope at the mouth of a gorge was occupied by soldiers. "This is where our troubles begin," said Mr. White peacefully. The soldiers were indolent, shabby, ineffectual-looking creatures, scarcely distinguishable from coolies, but their machine-guns, straddling mosquito-like about the forlorn village street, looked disagreeably wideawake and keen. Constantine felt as if his precious heart were the cynosure of all the machine-guns' waspish glances, as the car splashed between them. "Is this safe?" he asked. "Motoring through a Chinese war?"

"Not particularly," smiled Mr. White. "But it's safer than neglecting that leg of yours."

Constantine uttered a small, shrill, nervous exclamation—half a curse. "Is a man nothing more than a leg to you?"

As he spoke, from one side of the gorge along which they were now driving, a rifle shot cracked, like the breaking of a taut wire. Its echoes were overtaken by the sputtering of more shots from a higher crag.

Constantine had been tensely held for just such an attack on his courage as this—and yet he was not ready for it. His body moved instantly by itself, without consulting his self-respect; it flung its arms round Mr. White. The car, thus immobilized at its source of energy, swerved, skidded, and stood still askew upon the trail. Constantine, sweating violently, recalled his pride and reassembled his sprawling arms. Mr. White said nothing, but he looked with a cold benevolence into Constantine's face and shook his head slightly. Then he started the car again and drove on in silence. There was no more firing.

"Oh, oh, I do wish you had been a little bit frightened too," said Constantine, clenching his fists. He was too much of a desert islander to deny his own fright, as a citizen of the tradition-ruled mainland might have denied it. Brave or afraid, Constantine was his own creation; he had made himself, he would stand or fall by this self that he had made. It was indeed, in a way, more interesting to have been afraid than to have been brave. Only, unfortunately, this exasperating benefactor of his did not think so.

The noon-light was scarcely brighter than the light of early morning. The unremitting rain slanted across the grey air. Trees, skies, valleys, mountains, seen through the rain-spotted windshield, were like a distorted, stippled landscape painted by a beginner who has not yet learned to wring living colour from his palette. However, sun or no sun, noontime it was at last, and Mr. White, drawing his car conscientiously to the side of the bullock trail, as if a procession of Rolls-Royces might be expected to pass, unpacked a neat jigsaw puzzle of a sandwich-box.

"I brought a few caviare sandwiches for you," he said gently: "I know Russians like caviare."

"Are your sandwiches then made of Old England's Rosbif?" asked Constantine crossly, for it seemed to him that this man used nothing but collective nouns.

"No; of bloater paste."

They said nothing more but munched in a rather sullen silence. Constantine had lost his desire to tell Mr. White why he had joined the Foreign Legion—or to tell him anything else, for that matter. There was something about Mr. White that destroyed the excitement of telling ingenious lies—or even the common truth; and this something Constantine resented more and more, though he was uncertain how to define it. Mr. White leaned over the steering-wheel and covered his eyes with his hands, for driving tired him. The caviare, and his host's evident weariness, irritated Constantine more and more; these things seemed like a crude insistence on his increasing obligation. "I suppose you are tired of the very sight of me," he felt impelled to say bitterly.

"No, no," said Mr. White politely but indifferently. "Don't worry about me. It'll all be the same a hundred years hence."

"Whether my leg is off or on—whether I die in agony or live—it will all be the same a hundred years hence, I suppose you would say," said Constantine, morbidly goading his companion into repeating this insult to the priceless mystery of personality.

"My good man, I can't do more than I am doing about your leg, can I?" said Mr. White irritably, as he restarted the car.

"A million times more—a million times more," thought Constantine hysterically, but with an effort he said nothing.

As the wet evening light smouldered to an ashen twilight, they drove into Mo-ming, which was to be their night's stopping-place. Outside the city wall they were stopped by soldiers; for Mo-ming was being defended against the enemy's advance. After twenty minutes' talk in the clanking Cantonese tongue, the two white men were allowed to go through the city gate on foot, leaving the Ford in a shed outside, in the care of Mr. White's coolie. Mr. White carried his beautiful little kit-bag and expected Constantine to carry the camp-bed.

"What—and leave my balalaika in the car?" protested Constantine childishly.

"I think it would be safe," said Mr. White, only faintly ironic. "Hurry up. I must go at once and call on the general in charge here. I don't want to have my car commandeered."

Constantine limped along behind him, the camp-bed on one shoulder, the balalaika faintly tinkling under his arm. They found the inn in the centre of a tangle of looped, frayed, untidy streets—a box-like gaunt house, one corner of which was partly ruined, for the city had been bombarded that day. The inn, which could never have been a comfortable place, was wholly disorganized by its recent misfortune; most of the servants had fled, and the innkeeper was entirely engrossed in counting and piling up on the verandah his rescued possessions from the wrecked rooms. An impudent little boy, naked down to the waist—the only remaining servant—showed Mr. White and Constantine to the only room the inn could offer.

"One room between us?" cried Constantine, thinking of his shameful, possibly verminous, clothes and his unwashed body. He felt unable to bear the idea of unbuttoning even the greasy collar of his tunic within sight of that virgin-new kit-bag. Its luminous whiteness would seem in the night like triumphant civilization's eye fixed upon the barbarian—like the smug beam of a lighthouse glowing from the mainland upon that uncouth obstruction, a desert island. "I'm not consistent," thought Constantine. "That's my trouble. I ought to be proud of being dirty. At least that is a home-made condition."

"Yes—one room between us," said Mr. White tartly. "We must do the best we can. You look after things here, will you, while I go and see the general and make the car safe."

Left alone, Constantine decided not to take off any clothes at all—even his coarse greatcoat—but to say that he had fever and needed all the warmth he could get. No sooner had he come to this decision than he felt convinced that he actually was feverish; his head and his injured leg ached and throbbed as though all the hot blood in his body had concentrated in those two regions, while ice seemed to settle round his heart and loins. The room was dreary and very sparsely furnished with an ugly, too high table and rigid chairs to match. The beds were simply recesses in the wall, draped with dirty mud-brown mosquito-veils. Constantine, however, stepped more bravely into this hard, matted coffin than he had into Mr. White's clean attic bed. As he lay down, his leg burned and throbbed more fiercely than ever, and he began to imagine the amputation—the blood, the yawning of the flesh, the scraping of the saw upon the bone. His imagination did not supply an anaesthetic. Fever came upon him now in good earnest; he shook so much that his body seemed to jump like a fish upon the unyielding matting, he seemed to breathe in heat, without being able to melt the ice in his bones. Yet he remained artistically conscious all the time of his plight, and even exaggerated the shivering spasms of his limbs. He was quite pleased to think that Mr. White would presently return and find him in this condition, and so be obliged to be interested and compassionate. Yet as he heard Mr. White's heavy step on the stair, poor Constantine's eye fell on the fastidious white kit-bag, and he suddenly remembered all his fancies and fears about vermin and smells. By the time Mr. White was actually standing over him, Constantine was convinced that the deepest loathing was clearly shown on that superior, towering face.

"I can't help it—I can't help it," cried Constantine, between his chattering teeth.

Mr. White seemed to ignore the Russian's agitation. "I think the car'll be all right now," he said. "I left the coolie sleeping in it, to make sure. The general was quite civil and gave me a permit to get home; but it seems it's utterly impossible for us to drive on to Lao-chow. Fighting on the road is particularly hot, and the bridges are all destroyed. The enemy have reached the opposite side of the river, and they've been bombarding the city all day. I told the general about your case; he suggests you go by river in a sampan down to Lao-chow to-morrow. You may be fired on just as you leave the city, but nothing to matter, I dare say. After that, you'd be all right—the river makes a stiff bend south here, and gets right away from the country they're fighting over. It would take you only about eighteen hours to Lao-chow, going down stream. I've already got a sampan for you. . . . Oh, Lord, isn't this disgusting?" he added, looking round the dreadful room and wrinkling his nose. "How I loathe this kind of thing!"

"I can't help it. I can't help it." Constantine began first to moan and then to cry. He was by now in great pain, and he did not try to control his distress. It passed through his mind that crying was the last thing a stupid

Englishman would expect of a légionnaire; so far so good, therefore—he was a desert islander even in his degradation. Yet he loathed himself; all his morbid fears of being offensive were upon him, and the unaccustomed exercise of crying, combined with the fever, nauseated him. Mr. White, still wearing his expression of repugnance, came to his help, loosened that greasy collar, lent a handkerchief, ordered some refreshing hot Chinese tea.

“You should have known me in Odessa,” gasped Constantine in an interval between his paroxysms. “Three of the prettiest women in the town were madly in love with me. You know me only at my worst.”

Mr. White, soaking a folded silk handkerchief in cold water, before laying it on Constantine’s burning forehead, did not answer. He unrolled the pillow from his camp-bed and put it under Constantine’s head. As he did so, he recoiled a little, but after a second’s hesitation, he pushed the immaculate little pillow into place with a heroic firmness.

“I wore only silk next the skin then,” snuffled Constantine. The fever rose in a wave in his brain, and he shouted curses upon his cruelly perfect friend.

Mr. White lay only intermittently on his camp-bed that night. He was kept busy making use of his past experience as a member of an ambulance unit. Only at daylight he slept for an hour or so.

Constantine, awakened from a short sleep by the sound of firing outside, lay on his side and watched Mr. White’s relaxed, sleeping face. The fever had left Constantine, and he was now sunk in cold, limp depression and fear. Luckily, he thought, there was no need to stir, for certainly he could not be expected—a sick man—to set forth in a sampan through such dangers as the persistent firing suggested. At least in this inn he knew the worst, he thought wearily, and his companion knew the worst too. “I will not leave him,” Constantine vowed, “until I have somehow cured him of these frightful memories of me—somehow amputated his memory of me. . . .” He lay watching his companion’s face—hating it—obscurely wishing that those eyes, which had seen the worst during this loathsome night, might remain for ever shut.

Mr. White woke up quite suddenly. “Good Lord!” he said, peering at his watch. “Nearly seven. I told the sampan man to be at the foot of the steps at daylight.”

“Are you mad?” asked Constantine shrilly. “Listen to the firing—quite near. Besides—I’m a very sick man, as you should know by now. I couldn’t even walk—much less dodge through a crowd of Chinese assassins.”

Mr. White, faintly whistling Chopin, laboriously keeping his temper, left the room, and could presently be heard hee-hawing in the Chinese language on the verandah to the hee-hawing innkeeper.

When he came back, he said, “The sampaneer’s there, waiting—only too anxious to get away from the bombing they’re expecting to-day. He’s tied up only about a hundred yards away. You'll be beyond the reach of the firing as soon as you're round the bend. Hurry up, man; the sooner you get down to hospital, and I get off on the road home, the better for us both."

Constantine, genuinely exhausted after his miserable night, did not speak, but lay with his eyes shut and his face obstinately turned to the wall. He certainly felt too ill to be brave or to face the crackling dangers of the battle-ridden streets, but he was conscious of no plan except a determination to be as obstructive as he could—to assert at least this ignoble power over his tyrant.

"Get up, you damn fool," shouted Mr. White, suddenly plucking the pillow from under the sick man's head, "or I'll drag you down to the river by the scruff of your dirty neck."

Dirty neck! Instantly Constantine sat up—hopeless now of curing this man's contempt, full of an almost unendurable craving to be far away from him—to wipe him from his horizon—to be allowed to imagine him dead. Invigorated by this violent impulse, he rolled out of bed and sullenly watched Mr. White settle up with the innkeeper and take a few packages out of that revoltingly refined kit-bag.

"A small tin of water-biscuits," said Mr. White, almost apologetically, "and the remains of the bloater paste. It's all I have with me, but it ought to keep you alive till you get to Lao-chow to-morrow morning. . . . I'll see you down to the river first and then pick up these things." He spoke as if he were trying to make little neat plans still against this disorderly and unwonted background. He brushed his splashed coat with a silver clothes-brush, wearing the eagerly safe expression Constantine had seen on his face as he bent over the tie-press the night before last. The orderly man was trying to maintain his quiet impersonal self-respect amid surroundings that humiliated him. Even Constantine understood vaguely that his attacker was himself being attacked. "Well, I've done my best," added Mr. White, straightening his back after buckling the last strap of the kit-bag, and looking at Constantine with an ambiguous, almost appealing look.

They left the inn. The steep street that led down to the river between mean, barricaded shops was deserted. The air of it was outraged by the whipping sound of rifle fire—echoes clanked sharply from wall to wall.

"It is not safe—it is not safe," muttered Constantine, suddenly standing rooted, feeling that his next step must bring him into the path of a bullet.

"It's safer than a gangrenous leg." With his great hand, Mr. White seized the little Russian's arm and dragged him almost gaily down the steps. Constantine was by now so hopelessly mired in humiliation that he did not even try to disguise his terror. He hung back like a rebellious child, but he was tweaked and twitched along, stumbling behind his rescuer. He was pressed into the little boat. "Here, take the biscuits—good-bye—good luck," shouted Mr. White, and a smile of real gaiety broke out at last upon his face. The strip of rainy air and water widened between the two friends.

"Strike him dead, God!" said Constantine.

The smile did not fade at once from the Englishman's face, as his legs curiously crumpled into a kneeling position. He seemed trying to kneel on air; he clutched at his breast with one hand while the other hand still waved good-bye; he turned his alert, smiling face towards Constantine as though he were going to say again—"Good-bye—good luck." Then he fell, head downward, on the steps, the bald crown of his head just dipping into the water. Mud was splashed over the coat he had brushed only five minutes before.

There was a loud outcry from the sampan man and his wife. They seemed to be calling Constantine's already riveted attention to the fallen man—still only twenty yards away; they seemed uncertain whether he would now let them row yet more quickly away, as they desired, or insist on returning to the help of his friend.

"Row on—row on," cried Constantine in Russian and, to show them what he meant, he snatched up a spare pole and tried to increase the speed of the boat as it swerved into the current. Spaces of water were broadening all about the desert islander—home on his desert island again at last. As Constantine swayed over the pole, he looked back over his shoulder and flaunted his head, afraid no more of the firing now that one blessed bullet had carried away unpardonable memory out of the brain of his friend.

BIG BLONDE

Dorothy Parker

(1893— )

---

HAZEL MORSE was a large, fair woman of the type that incites some men when they use the word "blonde" to click their tongues and wag their heads roguishly. She prided herself upon her small feet and suffered for her vanity, boxing them in snub-toed, high-heeled slippers of the shortest bearable size. The curious things about her were her hands, strange terminations to the flabby white arms splattered with pale tan spots—long, quivering hands with deep and convex nails. She should not have disfigured them with little jewels.

She was not a woman given to recollections. At her middle thirties, her old days were a blurred and flickering sequence, an imperfect film, dealing with the actions of strangers.

In her twenties, after the deferred death of a hazy widowed mother, she had been employed as a model in a wholesale dress establishment—it was still the day of the big woman, and she was then prettily colored and erect and high-breasted. Her job was not onerous, and she met numbers of men and spent numbers of evenings with them, laughing at their jokes and telling them she loved their neckties. Men liked her, and she took it for granted that the liking of many men was a desirable thing. Popularity seemed to her to be worth all the work that had to be put into its achievement. Men liked you because you were fun, and when they liked you they took you out, and there you were. So, and successfully, she was fun. She was a good sport. Men like a good sport.

No other form of diversion, simpler or more complicated, drew her attention. She never pondered if she might not be better occupied doing something else. Her ideas, or, better, her acceptances, ran right along with those of the other substantially built blondes in whom she found her friends.

When she had been working in the dress establishment some years she met Herbie Morse. He was thin, quick, attractive, with shifting lines about his shiny, brown eyes and a habit of fiercely biting at the skin around his finger nails. He drank largely; she found that entertaining. Her habitual greeting to him was an illusion to his state of the previous night.

"Oh, what a peach you had," she used to say, through her easy laugh. "I thought I'd die, the way you kept asking the waiter to dance with you."

She liked him immediately upon their meeting. She was enormously amused at his fast, slurred sentences, his interpolations of apt phrases from vaudeville acts and comic strips; she thrilled at the feel of his lean arm tucked firm beneath the sleeve of her coat; she wanted to touch the wet, flat surface of his hair. He was as promptly drawn to her. They were married six weeks after they had met.

She was delighted at the idea of being a bride; coquetted with it, played upon it. Other offers of marriage she had had, and not a few of them, but it happened that they were all from stout, serious men who had visited the dress establishment as buyers; men from Des Moines and Houston and Chicago and, in her phrase, even funnier places. There was always something immensely comic to her in the thought of living elsewhere than New York. She could not regard as serious proposals that she share a Western residence.

She wanted to be married. She was nearing thirty now, and she did not take the years well. She spread and softened, and her darkening hair turned her to inexpert dabbings with peroxide. There were times when she had little flashes of fear about her job. And she had had a couple of thousand evenings of being a good sport among her male acquaintances. She had come to be more conscientious than spontaneous about it.

Herbie earned enough, and they took a little apartment far uptown. There was a Mission-furnished dining room with a hanging central light globed in liver-colored glass; in the living room were an "overstuffed suite," a Boston fern, and a reproduction of the Henner Magdalene with the red hair and the blue draperies; the bedroom was in gray enamel and old rose, with Herbie's photograph on Hazel's dressing table and Hazel's likeness on Herbie's chest of drawers.

She cooked—and she was a good cook—and marketed and chatted with the delivery boys and the colored laundress. She loved the flat, she loved her life, she loved Herbie. In the first months of their marriage she gave him all the passion she was ever to know.

She had not realized how tired she was. It was a delight, a new game, a holiday, to give up being a good sport. If her head ached or her arches throbbed, she complained piteously, babyishly. If her mood was quiet, she did not talk. If tears came to her eyes, she let them fall.

She fell readily into the habit of tears during the first year of her marriage. Even in her good sport days she had been known to weep lavishly and disinterestedly on occasion. Her behavior at the theater was a standing joke. She could weep at anything in a play—tiny garments, love both unrequited and mutual, seduction, purity, faithful servitors, wedlock, the triangle.

"There goes Haze," her friends would say, watching her. "She's off again."

Wedded and relaxed, she poured her tears freely. To her who had laughed so much, crying was delicious. All sorrows became her sorrows; she was Tenderness. She would cry long and softly over newspaper accounts of kidnaped babies, deserted wives, unemployed men, strayed cats, heroic dogs. Even when the paper was no longer before her, her mind revolved upon these things and the drops slipped rhythmically over her plump cheeks.

"Honestly," she would say to Herbie, "all the sadness there is in the world when you stop to think about it!"

"Yeah," Herbie would say.

She missed nobody. The old crowd, the people who had brought her and Herbie together, dropped from their lives, lingeringly at first. When she thought of this at all it was only to consider it fitting. This was marriage. This was peace.

But the thing was that Herbie was not amused.

For a time he had enjoyed being alone with her. He found the voluntary isolation novel and sweet. Then it palled with a ferocious suddenness. It was as if one night, sitting with her in the steam-heated living room, he would ask no more; and the next night he was through and done with the whole thing.

He became annoyed by her misty melancholies. At first, when he came home to find her softly tired and moody, he kissed her neck and patted her shoulder and begged her to tell her Herbie what was wrong. She loved that. But time slid by, and he found that there was never anything really, personally, the matter.

"Ah, for God's sake," he would say. "Crabbing again. All right, sit here and crab your head off. I'm going out."

And he would slam out of the flat and come back late and drunk.

She was completely bewildered by what happened to their marriage. First they were lovers; and then, it seemed without transition, they were enemies. She never understood it.

There were longer and longer intervals between his leaving his office and his arrival at the apartment. She went through agonies of picturing him run over and bleeding, dead and covered with a sheet. Then she lost her fears for his safety and grew sullen and wounded. When a person wanted to be with a person he came as soon as possible. She desperately wanted him to want to be with her; her own hours only marked the time till he would come. It was often nearly nine o'clock before he came home to dinner. Always he had had many drinks, and their effect would die in him, leaving him loud and querulous and bristling for affronts.

He was too nervous, he said, to sit and do nothing for an evening. He boasted, probably not in all truth, that he had never read a book in his life.

"What am I expected to do—sit around this dump on my tail all night?" he would ask rhetorically. And again he would slam out.

She did not know what to do. She could not manage him. She could not meet him.

She fought him furiously. A terrific domesticity had come upon her, and she would bite and scratch to guard it. She wanted what she called "a nice home." She wanted a sober, tender husband, prompt at dinner, punctual at work. She wanted sweet, comforting evenings. The idea of intimacy with other men was terrible to her; the thought that Herbie might be seeking entertainment in other women set her frantic.

It seemed to her that almost everything she read—novels from the drug-store lending library, magazine stories, women's pages in the papers—dealt with wives who lost their husbands' love. She could bear those, at that, better than accounts of neat, companionable marriage and living happily ever after.

She was frightened. Several times when Herbie came home in the evening he found her determinedly dressed—she had had to alter those of her clothes that were not new, to make them fasten—and rouged.

"Let's go wild to-night, what do you say?" she would hail him. "A person's got lots of time to hang around and do nothing when they're dead."

So they would go out, to chop houses and the less expensive cabarets. But it turned out badly. She could no longer find amusement in watching Herbie drink. She could not laugh at his whimsicalities, she was so tensely counting his indulgences. And she was unable to keep back her remonstrances—"Ah, come on, Herb, you've had enough, haven't you? You'll feel something terrible in the morning."

He would be immediately enraged. All right, crab; crab, crab, crab, that was all she ever did. What a lousy sport she was! There would be scenes, and one or the other of them would rise and stalk out in fury.

She could not recall the definite day that she started drinking, herself. There was nothing separate about her days. Like drops upon a window-pane, they ran together and trickled away. She had been married six months; then a year; then three years.

She had never needed to drink, formerly. She could sit for most of a night at a table where the others were imbibing earnestly and never droop in looks or spirits, nor be bored by the doings of those about her. If she took a cocktail, it was so unusual as to cause twenty minutes or so of jocular comment. But now anguish was in her. Frequently, after a quarrel, Herbie would stay out for the night, and she could not learn from him where the time had been spent. Her heart felt tight and sore in her breast, and her mind turned like an electric fan.

She hated the taste of liquor. Gin, plain or in mixtures, made her promptly sick. After experiment, she found that Scotch whisky was best for her. She took it without water, because that was the quickest way to its effect.

Herbie pressed it on her. He was glad to see her drink. They both felt it might restore her high spirits, and their good times together might again be possible.

"'Atta girl," he would approve her. "Let's see you get boiled, baby."

But it brought them no nearer. When she drank with him there would be a little while of gayety and then, strangely without beginning, they would be in a wild quarrel. They would wake in the morning not sure what it had all been about, foggy as to what had been said and done, but each deeply injured and bitterly resentful. There would be days of vengeful silence.

There had been a time when they had made up their quarrels, usually in bed. There would be kisses and little names and assurances of fresh starts . . . "Oh, it's going to be great now, Herb. We'll have swell times. I was a crab. I guess I might have been tired. But everything's going to be swell. You'll see."

Now there were no gentle reconciliations. They resumed friendly relations only in the brief magnanimity caused by liquor, before more liquor drew them into new battles. The scenes became more violent. There were shouted invectives and pushes, and sometimes sharp slaps. Once she had a black eye. Herbie was horrified next day at sight of it. He did not go to work; he followed her about, suggesting remedies and heaping dark blame on himself. But after they had had a few drinks—"to pull themselves together"—she made so many wistful references to her bruise that he shouted at her, and rushed out, and was gone for two days.

Each time he left the place in rage he threatened never to come back. She did not believe him, nor did she consider separation. Somewhere in her head or her heart was the lazy, nebulous hope that things would change and she and Herbie settle suddenly into soothing married life. Here were her home, her furniture, her husband, her station. She summoned no alternatives.

She could no longer bustle and potter. She had no more vicarious tears; the hot drops she shed were for herself. She walked ceaselessly about the rooms, her thoughts running mechanically round and round Herbie. In those days began the hatred of being alone that she was never to overcome. You could be by yourself when things were all right, but when you were blue you got the howling horrors.

She commenced drinking alone, little, short drinks all through the day. It was only with Herbie that alcohol made her nervous and quick in offense. Alone, it blurred sharp things for her. She lived in a haze of it. Her life took on a dream-like quality. Nothing was astonishing.

A Mrs. Martin moved into the flat across the hall. She was a great blonde woman of forty, a promise in looks of what Mrs. Morse was to be. They made acquaintance, quickly became inseparable. Mrs. Morse spent her days in the opposite apartment. They drank together, to brace themselves after the drinks of the nights before.

She never confided her troubles about Herbie to Mrs. Martin. The subject was too bewildering to her to find comfort in talk. She let it be assumed that her husband's business kept him much away. It was not regarded as important; husbands, as such, played but shadowy parts in Mrs. Martin's circle.

Mrs. Martin had no visible spouse; you were left to decide for yourself whether he was or was not dead. She had an admirer, Joe, who came to see her almost nightly. Often he brought several friends with him—"The Boys," they were called. The Boys were big, red, good-humored men, perhaps forty-five, perhaps fifty. Mrs. Morse was glad of invitations to join the parties—Herbie was scarcely ever at home at night now. If he did come home, she did not visit Mrs. Martin. An evening alone with Herbie meant inevitably a quarrel, yet she would stay with him. There was always her thin and wordless idea that, maybe, this night, things would begin to be all right.

The boys brought plenty of liquor along with them whenever they came to Mrs. Martin's. Drinking with them, Mrs. Morse became lively and good-natured and audacious. She was quickly popular. When she had drunk enough to cloud her most recent battle with Herbie, she was excited by their approbation. Crab, was she? Rotten sport, was she? Well, there were some that thought different.

Ed was one of The Boys. He lived in Utica—had “his own business” there, was the awed report—but he came to New York almost every week. He was married. He showed Mrs. Morse the then current photographs of Junior and Sister, and she praised them abundantly and sincerely. Soon it was accepted by the others that Ed was her particular friend.

He staked her when they all played poker; sat next her and occasionally rubbed his knee against hers during the game. She was rather lucky. Frequently she went home with a twenty-dollar bill or a ten-dollar bill or a handful of crumpled dollars. She was glad of them. Herbie was getting, in her words, something awful about money. To ask him for it brought an instant row.

“What the hell do you do with it?” he would say. “Shoot it all on Scotch?”

“I try to run this house halfway decent,” she would retort. “Never thought of that, did you? Oh, no, his lordship couldn’t be bothered with that.”

Again, she could not find a definite day to fix the beginning of Ed’s proprietorship. It became his custom to kiss her on the mouth when he came in, as well as for farewell, and he gave her little quick kisses of approval all through the evening. She liked this rather more than she disliked it. She never thought of his kisses when she was not with him.

He would run his hand lingeringly over her back and shoulders.

“Some dizzy blonde, eh?” he would say. “Some doll.”

One afternoon she came home from Mrs. Martin’s to find Herbie in the bedroom. He had been away for several nights, evidently on a prolonged drinking bout. His face was gray, his hands jerked as if they were on wires. On the bed were two old suitcases, packed high. Only her photograph remained on his bureau, and the wide doors of his closet disclosed nothing but coat hangers.

“I’m blowing,” he said. “I’m through with the whole works. I got a job in Detroit.”

She sat down on the edge of the bed. She had drunk much the night before, and the four Scotches she had had with Mrs. Martin had only increased her foginess.

“Good job?” she said.

“Oh, yeah,” he said. “Looks all right.”

He closed a suitcase with difficulty, swearing at it in whispers.

“There’s some dough in the bank,” he said. “The bank book’s in your top drawer. You can have the furniture and stuff.”

He looked at her, and his forehead twitched.

"God damn it, I'm through, I'm telling you," he cried. "I'm through."

"All right, all right," she said. "I heard you, didn't I?"

She saw him as if he were at one end of a cañon and she at the other. Her head was beginning to ache bumpingly, and her voice had a dreary, tiresome tone. She could not have raised it.

"Like a drink before you go?" she asked.

Again he looked at her, and a corner of his mouth jerked up.

"Cockeyed again for a change, aren't you?" he said. "That's nice. Sure, get a couple of shots, will you?"

She went to the pantry, mixed him a stiff highball, poured herself a couple of inches of whisky, and drank it. Then she gave herself another portion and brought the glasses into the bedroom. He had strapped both suitcases and had put on his hat and overcoat.

He took his highball.

"Well," he said, and he gave a sudden, uncertain laugh. "Here's mud in your eye."

"Mud in your eye," she said.

They drank. He put down his glass and took up the heavy suitcase.

"Got to get a train around six," he said.

She followed him down the hall. There was a song, a song that Mrs. Martin played doggedly on the phonograph, running loudly through her mind. She had never liked the thing.

Night and daytime,
Always playtime.
Ain't we got fun?

At the door he put down the bags and faced her.

"Well," he said. "Well, take care of yourself. You'll be all right, will you?"

"Oh, sure," she said.

He opened the door, then came back to her, holding out his hand.

"Bye, Haze," he said. "Good luck to you."

She took his hand and shook it.

"Pardon my wet glove," she said.

When the door had closed behind him she went back to the pantry.

She was flushed and lively when she went in to Mrs. Martin's that evening. The Boys were there, Ed among them. He was glad to be in town, frisky and loud and full of jokes. But she spoke quietly to him for a minute.

"Herbie blew to-day," she said. "Going to live out West."

"That so?" he said. He looked at her and played with the fountain pen clipped to his waistcoat pocket.

"Think he's gone for good, do you?" he asked.

"Yeah," she said. "I know he is. I know. Yeah."

"You going to live on across the hall just the same?" he said. "Know what you're going to do?"

"Gee, I don't know," she said. "I don't give much of a damn."

"Oh, come on, that's no way to talk," he told her. "What you need—you need a little snifter. How about it?"

"Yeah," she said. "Just straight."

She won forty-three dollars at poker. When the game broke up Ed took her back to her apartment.

"Got a little kiss for me?" he asked.

He wrapped her in his big arms and kissed her violently. She was entirely passive. He held her away and looked at her.

"Little tight, honey?" he asked anxiously. "Not going to be sick, are you?"

"Me?" she said. "I'm swell."

II

When Ed left in the morning he took her photograph with him. He said he wanted her picture to look at, up in Utica. "You can have that one on the bureau," she said.

She put Herbie's picture in a drawer, out of her sight. When she could look at it she meant to tear it up. She was fairly successful in keeping her mind from racing around him. Whisky slowed it for her. She was almost peaceful, in her mist.

She accepted her relationship with Ed without question or enthusiasm. When he was away she seldom thought definitely of him. He was good to her; he gave her frequent presents and a regular allowance. She was even able to save. She did not plan ahead of any day, but her wants were few, and you might as well put money in the bank as have it lying around.

When the lease of her apartment neared its end it was Ed who suggested moving. His friendship with Mrs. Martin and Joe had become strained over a dispute at poker; a feud was impending.

"Let's get the hell out of here," Ed said. "What I want you to have is a place near the Grand Central. Make it easier for me."

So she took a little flat in the Forties. A colored maid came in every day to clean and to make coffee for her—she was "through with that house-keeping stuff," she said, and Ed, twenty years married to a passionately domestic woman, admired this romantic uselessness and felt doubly a man of the world in abetting it.

The coffee was all she had until she went out to dinner, but alcohol kept her fat. Prohibition she regarded only as a basis for jokes. You could always get all you wanted. She was never noticeably drunk and seldom nearly sober. It required a larger daily allowance to keep her misty-minded. Too little, and she was achingly melancholy.

Ed brought her to Jimmy's. He was proud, with the pride of the transient who would be mistaken for a native, in his knowledge of small, recent restaurants occupying the lower floors of shabby brownstone houses; places where, upon mentioning the name of an habitué friend, might be obtained strange whisky and fresh gin in many of their ramifications. Jimmy's place was the favorite of his acquaintances.

There, through Ed, Mrs. Morse met many men and women, formed quick friendships. The men often took her out when Ed was in Utica. He was proud of her popularity.

She fell into the habit of going to Jimmy's alone when she had no engagement. She was certain to meet some people she knew, and join them. It was a club for her friends, both men and women.

The women at Jimmy's looked remarkably alike, and this was curious, for, through feuds, removals and opportunities of more profitable contacts, the personnel of the group changed constantly. Yet always the newcomers resembled those whom they replaced. They were all big women and stout, broad of shoulder and abundantly breasted, with faces thickly clothed in soft, high-colored flesh. They laughed loud and often, showing opaque and lusterless teeth like squares of crockery. There was about them the health of the big, yet a slight, unwholesome suggestion of stubborn preservation. They might have been thirty-six or forty-five or anywhere between.

They composed their titles of their own first names with their husband's surnames—Mrs. Florence Miller, Mrs. Vera Riley, Mrs. Lilian Block. This gave at the same time the solidity of marriage and the glamour of freedom. Yet only one or two were actually divorced. Most of them never referred to their dimmed spouses; some, a shorter time separate, described them in terms of great biological interest. Several were mothers, each of an only child—a boy at school somewhere, or a girl being cared for by a grandmother. Often, well on toward morning, there would be displays of kodak portraits and of tears.

They were comfortable women, cordial and friendly and irrepressibly matronly. Theirs was the quality of ease. Become fatalistic, especially about money matters, they were unworried. Whenever their funds dropped alarmingly, a new donor appeared; this had always happened. The aim of each was to have one man, permanently, to pay all her bills, in return for which she would have immediately given up other admirers and probably would have become exceedingly fond of him; for the affections of all of them were, by now, unexacting, tranquil, and easily arranged. This end, however, grew increasingly difficult yearly. Mrs. Morse was regarded as fortunate.

Ed had a good year, increased her allowance and gave her a sealskin coat. But she had to be careful of her moods with him. He insisted upon gayety. He would not listen to admissions of aches or weariness.

"Hey, listen," he would say, "I got worries of my own, and plenty. Nobody wants to hear other people's troubles, sweetie. What you got to do, you got to be a sport and forget it. See? Well, slip us a little smile, then. That's my girl."

She never had enough interest to quarrel with him as she had with Herbie, but she wanted the privilege of occasional admitted sadness. It was strange. The other women she saw did not have to fight their moods. There was Mrs. Florence Miller who got regular crying jags, and the men sought only to cheer and comfort her. The others spent whole evenings in grieved recitals of worries and ills; their escorts paid them deep sympathy. But she was instantly undesirable when she was low in spirits. Once, at Jimmy's, when she could not make herself lively, Ed had walked out and left her.

"Why the hell don't you stay home and not go spoiling everybody's evening?" he had roared.

Even her slightest acquaintance seemed irritated if she were not conspicuously light-hearted.

"What's the matter with you, anyway?" they would say. "Be your age, why don't you? Have a little drink and snap out of it."

When her relationship with Ed had continued nearly three years he moved to Florida to live. He hated leaving her; he gave her a large check and some shares of a sound stock, and his pale eyes were wet when he said good-bye. She did not miss him. He came to New York infrequently, perhaps two or three times a year, and hurried directly from the train to see her. She was always pleased to have him come and never sorry to see him go.

Charley, an acquaintance of Ed's that she had met at Jimmy's, had long admired her. He had always made opportunities of touching her and leaning close to talk to her. He asked repeatedly of all their friends if they had ever heard such a fine laugh as she had. After Ed left Charley became the main figure in her life. She classified him and spoke of him as "not so bad." There was nearly a year of Charley; then she divided her time between him and Sydney, another frequenter of Jimmy's; then Charley slipped away altogether.

Sydney was a little, brightly dressed, clever Jew. She was perhaps nearest contentment with him. He amused her always; her laughter was not forced.

He admired her completely. Her softness and size delighted him. And he thought she was great, he often told her, because she kept gay and lively when she was drunk.

"Once I had a gal," he said, "used to try to throw herself out of the window every time she got a can on. Jee-zuss," he added feelingly.

Then Sydney married a rich and watchful bride, and then there was Billy. No—after Sydney came Ferd, then Billy. In her haze she never recalled how men entered her life and left it. There were no surprises. She had no thrill at their advent nor woe at their departure. She seemed to be always able to attract men. There was never another as rich as Ed, but they were all generous to her, in their means.

Once she had news of Herbie. She met Mrs. Martin dining at Jimmy's, and the old friendship was vigorously renewed. The still admiring Joe, while on a business trip, had seen Herbie. He had settled in Chicago, he looked fine, he was living with some woman—seemed to be crazy about her. Mrs. Morse had been drinking vastly that day. She took the news with mild interest, as one hearing of the sex peccadilloes of somebody whose name is, after a moment's groping, familiar.

"Must be damn near seven years since I saw him," she commented. "Gee. Seven years."

More and more her days lost their individuality. She never knew dates, nor was sure of the day of the week.

"My God, was that a year ago!" she would exclaim, when an event was recalled in conversation.

She was tired so much of the time. Tired and blue. Almost everything could give her the blues. Those old horses she saw on Sixth Avenue—struggling and slipping along the car tracks, or standing at the curb, their heads dropped level with their worn knees. The tightly stored tears would squeeze from her eyes as she teetered past on her aching feet in the stubby, champagne-colored slippers.

The thought of death came and stayed with her and lent her a sort of drowsy cheer. It would be nice, nice and restful, to be dead.

There was no settled, shocked moment when she first thought of killing herself; it seemed to her as if the idea had always been with her. She pounced upon all the accounts of suicides in the newspapers. There was an epidemic of self-killings—or maybe it was just that she searched for the stories of them so eagerly that she found many. To read of them roused reassurance in her; she felt a cozy solidarity with the big company of the voluntary dead.

She slept, aided by whisky, till deep into the afternoons, then lay abed, a bottle and glass at her hand, until it was time to dress to go out for dinner. She was beginning to feel toward alcohol a little puzzled distrust, as toward an old friend who has refused a simple favor. Whisky could still soothe her for most of the time, but there were sudden, inexplicable moments when the cloud fell treacherously away from her, and she was sawn by the sorrow and bewilderment and nuisance of all living. She played voluptuously with the thought of cool, sleepy retreat. She had never been troubled by religious belief, and no vision of an after-life intimidated her. She dreamed by day of never again putting on tight shoes, of never having to laugh and listen and admire, of never more being a good sport. Never.

But how would you do it? It made her sick to think of jumping from heights. She could not stand a gun. At the theater, if one of the actors drew a revolver, she crammed her fingers into her ears and could not even look at the stage until after the shot had been fired. There was no gas in her flat. She looked long at the bright blue veins in her slim wrists—a cut with a razor blade, and there you'd be. But it would hurt, hurt like hell, and there would be blood to see. Poison—something tasteless and quick and painless—was the thing. But they wouldn't sell it to you in the drug stores, because of the law.

She had few other thoughts.

There was a new man now—Art. He was short and fat and exacting and hard on her patience when he was drunk. But there had been only occasions for some time before him, and she was glad of a little stability. Too, Art must be away for weeks at a stretch, selling silks, and that was restful. She was convincingly gay with him, though the effort shook her viciously.

"The best sport in the world," he would murmur, deep in her neck. "The best sport in the world."

One night, when he had taken her to Jimmy's, she went into the dressing room with Mrs. Florence Miller. There, while designing curly mouths on their faces with lip rouge, they compared experiences of insomnia.

"Honestly," Mrs. Morse said, "I wouldn't close an eye if I didn't go to bed full of Scotch. I lie there and toss and turn and toss and turn. Blue! Does a person get blue lying awake that way!"

"Say, listen, Hazel," Mrs. Miller said impressively, "I'm telling you I'd be awake for a year if I didn't take veronal. That stuff makes you sleep like a fool."

"Isn't it poison or something?" Mrs. Morse asked.

"Oh, you take too much and you're out for the count," said Mrs. Miller. "I just take five grains—they come in tablets. I'd be scared to fool around with it. But five grains and you cork off pretty."

"Can you get it anywhere?" Mrs. Morse felt superbly Machiavellian.

"Get all you want in Jersey," said Mrs. Miller. "They won't give it to you here without you have a doctor's prescription. Finished? We'd better go back and see what the boys are doing."

That night Art left Mrs. Morse at the door of her apartment; his mother was in town. Mrs. Morse was still sober, and it happened that there was no whisky left in her cupboard. She lay in bed, looking up at the black ceiling.

She rose early, for her, and went to New Jersey. She had never taken the tube, and did not understand it. So she went to the Pennsylvania Station and bought a railroad ticket to Newark. She thought of nothing in particular on the trip out. She looked at the uninspired hats of the women about her and gazed through the smeared window at the flat, gritty scene.

In Newark, in the first drug store she came to, she asked for a tin of talcum powder, a nail brush, and a box of veronal tablets. The powder and the brush were to make the hypnotic seem also a casual need. The clerk was entirely unconcerned. "We only keep them in bottles," he said, and wrapped up for her a little glass vial containing ten white tablets, stacked one on another.

She went to another drug store and bought a face cloth, an orange-wood stick, and a bottle of veronal tablets. The clerk was also uninterested.

"Well, I guess I got enough to kill an ox," she thought, and went back to the station.

At home, she put the little vials in the drawer of her dressing table and stood looking at them with a dreamy tenderness.

"There they are, God bless them," she said, and she kissed her finger tip and touched each bottle.

The colored maid was busy in the living room.

"Hey, Nettie," Mrs. Morse called. "Be an angel, will you? Run around to Jimmy's and get me a quart of Scotch."

She hummed while she awaited the girl's return.

During the next few days, whisky ministered to her as tenderly as it had done when she first turned to its aid. Alone, she was soothed and vague, at Jimmy's she was the gayest of the groups. Art was delighted with her.

Then, one night, she had an appointment to meet Art at Jimmy's for an early dinner. He was to leave afterward on a business excursion, to be away for a week. Mrs. Morse had been drinking all the afternoon; while she dressed to go out she felt herself rising pleasurably from drowsiness to high spirits. But as she came out into the street the effects of the whisky deserted her completely, and she was filled with a slow, grinding wretchedness so horrible that she stood swaying on the pavement, unable for a moment to move forward. It was a gray night with spurts of mean, thin snow, and the streets shone with dark ice. As she slowly crossed Sixth Avenue consciously dragging one foot past the other, a big, scarred horse pulling a rickety express wagon crashed to his knees before her. The driver swore and screamed and lashed the beast insanely, bringing the whip back over his shoulder for every blow, while the horse struggled to get a footing on the slippery asphalt. A group gathered and watched with interest.

Art was waiting, when Mrs. Morse reached Jimmy's.

"What's the matter with you, for God's sake?" was his greeting to her.

"I saw a horse," she said. "Gee, I—a person feels sorry for horses. I—it isn't just horses. Everything's kind of terrible, isn't it? I can't help getting sunk."

"Ah, sunk, me eye," he said. "What's the idea of all the bellyaching? What have you got to be sunk about?"

"I can't help it," she said.

"Ah, help it, me eye," he said. "Pull yourself together, will you? Come on and sit down, and take that face off you."

She drank industriously and she tried hard, but she could not overcome her melancholy. Others joined them and commented on her gloom, and she could do no more for them than smile weakly. She made little dabs at her eyes with her handkerchief, trying to time her movements so they would be unnoticed, but several times Art caught her and scowled and shifted impatiently in his chair.

When it was time for him to go to his train she said she would leave, too, and go home.

"And not a bad idea, either," he said. "See if you can't sleep yourself out of it. I'll see you Thursday. For God's sake, try and cheer up by then, will you?"

"Yeah," she said. "I will."

In her bedroom she undressed with a tense speed wholly unlike her usual slow uncertainty. She put on her nightgown, took off her hair net, and passed the comb quickly through her dry, varicolored hair. Then she took the two little vials from the drawer and carried them into the bathroom. The splintering misery had gone from her, and she felt the quick excitement of one who is about to receive an anticipated gift.

She uncorked the vials, filled a glass with water, and stood before the mirror, a tablet between her fingers. Suddenly she bowed graciously to her reflection and raised the glass to it.

"Well, here's mud in your eye," she said.

The tablets were unpleasant to take, dry and powdery and sticking obstinately halfway down her throat. It took her a long time to swallow all twenty of them. She stood watching her reflection with deep, impersonal interest, studying the movements of the gulping throat. Once more she spoke aloud to it.

"For God's sake, try and cheer up by Thursday, will you?" she said. "Well, you know what he can do. He and the whole lot of them."

She had no idea how quickly to expect effect from the veronal. When she had taken the last tablet she stood uncertainly, wondering, still with a courteous, vicarious interest, if death would strike her down then and there. She felt in no way strange, save for a slight stirring of sickness from the effort of swallowing the tablets, nor did her reflected face look at all different. It would not be immediate, then; it might even take an hour or so.

She stretched her arms high and gave a vast yawn.

"Guess I'll go to bed," she said. "Gee, I'm nearly dead."

That struck her as comic, and she turned out the bathroom light and went in and laid herself down in her bed, chuckling softly all the time.

"Gee. I'm nearly dead," she quoted. "That's a hot one!"

III

Nettie, the colored maid, came in late the next afternoon to clean the apartment and found Mrs. Morse in her bed. But then, that was not unusual. Usually, though, the sounds of cleaning waked her, and she did not like to wake up. Nettie, an agreeable girl, had learned to move softly about her work.

But when she had done the living room and stolen in to tidy the little square bedroom, she could not avoid a tiny clatter as she arranged the objects on the dressing table. Instinctively she glanced over her shoulder at the sleeper, and without warning a sickly uneasiness crept over her. She came to the bed and stared down at the woman lying there.

Mrs. Morse lay on her back, one flabby white arm flung up, the wrist against her forehead. Her stiff hair hung untenderly along her face. The bed covers were pushed down, exposing a deep square of soft neck and a pink nightgown, its fabric worn uneven by many launderings; her great breasts, freed from their tight confiner, sagged beneath her armpits. Now and then she made knotted, snoring sounds, and from the corner of her opened mouth to the blurred turn of her jaw ran a lane of crusted spittle.

"Mis' Morse," Nettie called. "Oh, Mis' Morse! It's terrible late."

Mrs. Morse made no move.

"Mis' Morse," said Nettie. "Look, Mis' Morse. How'm I goin' get this bed made?"

Panic sprang upon the girl. She shook the woman's hot shoulder.

"Ah, wake up, will yuh?" she whined. "Ah, please wake up."

Suddenly the girl turned and ran out in the hall to the elevator door, keeping her thumb firm on the black, shiny button until the elderly car and its Negro attendant stood before her. She poured a jumble of words over the boy and led him back to the apartment. He tiptoed creakingly in to the bedside; first gingerly, then so lustily that he left marks in the soft flesh, he prodded the unconscious woman.

"Hey, there!" he cried, and listened intently, as for an echo.

"Jeez. Out like a light," he commented.

At his interest in the spectacle, Nettie's panic left her. Importance was big in both of them. They talked in quick, unfinished whispers, and it was the boy's suggestion that he fetch the young doctor who lived on the ground floor. Nettie hurried along with him. They looked forward to the limelited moment of breaking their news of something untoward, something pleasurably unpleasant. Mrs. Morse had become the medium of drama. With no ill wish to her, they hoped that her state was serious, that she would not let them down by being awake and normal on their return. A little fear of this determined them to make the most, to the doctor, of her present condition. "Matter of life and death" returned to Nettie from her thin store of reading. She considered startling the doctor with the phrase.

The doctor was in and none too pleased at interruption. He wore a yellow and blue striped dressing gown, and he was lying on his sofa, laughing, with a dark girl, her face scaly with inexpensive powder, who perched on the arm. Half-emptied highball glasses stood beside them, and her coat and hat were neatly hung up with the comfortable implication of a long stay.

Always something, the doctor grumbled. Couldn't let anybody alone after a hard day. But he put some bottles and instruments into a case, changed his dressing gown for his coat, and started out with the Negroes.

"Snap it up there, big boy," the girl called after him. "Don't be all night."

The doctor strode loudly into Mrs. Morse's flat and on to the bedroom, Nettie and the boy right behind him. Mrs. Morse had not moved; her sleep was as deep, but soundless, now. The doctor looked sharply at her, then plunged his thumbs into the lidded pits above her eyeballs and threw his weight upon them. A high, sickened cry broke from Nettie.

"Look like he tryin' to push her right on th'ough the bed," said the boy. He chuckled.

Mrs. Morse gave no sign under the pressure. Abruptly the doctor abandoned it, and with one quick movement swept the covers down to the foot of the bed. With another he flung her nightgown back and lifted the thick, white legs, cross-hatched with blocks of tiny, iris-colored veins. He pinched them repeatedly, with long, cruel nips, back of the knees. She did not awaken.

"What's she been drinking?" he asked Nettie, over his shoulder.

With the certain celerity of one who knows just where to lay hands on a thing, Nettie went into the bathroom, bound for the cupboard where Mrs. Morse kept her whisky. But she stopped at the sight of the two vials, with their red and white labels, lying before the mirror. She brought them to the doctor.

"Oh, for the Lord Almighty's sweet sake!" he said. He dropped Mrs. Morse's limp legs and pushed them impatiently across the bed. "What did she want to go taking that tripe for? Rotten yellow trick, that's what a thing like that is. Now we'll have to pump her out, and all that stuff. Nuisance, a thing like that is; that's what it amounts to. Here, George, take me down in the elevator. You wait here, maid. She won't do anything."

"She won't die on me, will she?" cried Nettie.

"No," said the doctor. "God, no. You couldn't kill her with an ax."

IV

After two days Mrs. Morse came back to consciousness, dazed at first, then with a comprehension that brought with it the slow, saturating wretchedness.

"Oh, Lord, oh, Lord," she moaned, and tears for herself and for life striped her cheeks.

Nettie came in at the sound. For two days she had done the ugly, incessant tasks in the nursing of the unconscious, for two nights she had caught broken bits of sleep on the living room couch. She looked coldly at the big, blown woman in the bed.

"What you been tryin' to do, Mis' Morse?" she said. "What kine o' work is that, takin' all that stuff?"

"Oh, Lord," moaned Mrs. Morse again, and she tried to cover her eyes with her arms. But the joints felt stiff and brittle, and she cried out at their ache.

"Tha's no way to ack, takin' them pills," said Nettie. "You can thank you' stars you heah at all. How you feel now?"

"Oh, I feel great," said Mrs. Morse. "Swell, I feel."

Her hot, painful tears fell as if they would never stop.

"Tha's no way to take on, cryin' like that," Nettie said. "After what you done. The doctor, he says he could have you arrested, doin' a thing like that. He was fit to be tied, here."

"Why couldn't he let me alone?" wailed Mrs. Morse. "Why the hell couldn't he have?"

"That's terr'ble, Mis' Morse, swearin' an' talkin' like that," said Nettie, "after what people done for you. Here I ain' had no sleep at all, an' I had to give up goin' out to my other ladies!"

"Oh, I'm sorry, Nettie," she said. "You're a peach. I'm sorry I've given you so much trouble. I couldn't help it. I just got sunk. Didn't you ever feel like doing it? When everything looks just lousy to you?"

"I wouldn't think o' no such thing," declared Nettie. "You got to cheer up. Tha's what you got to do. Everybody's got their troubles."

"Yeah," said Mrs. Morse. "I know."

"Come a pretty picture card for you," Nettie said. "Maybe that will cheer you up."

She handed Mrs. Morse a post card. Mrs. Morse had to cover one eye with her hand, in order to read the message; her eyes were not yet focusing correctly.

It was from Art. On the back of a view of the Detroit Athletic Club he had written:

Greeting and salutations. Hope you have lost that gloom. Cheer up and don't take any rubber nickels. See you on Thursday.

She dropped the card to the floor. Misery crushed her as if she were between great smooth stones. There passed before her a slow, slow pageant of days spent lying in her flat, of evenings at Jimmy's being a good sport, making herself laugh and coo at Art and other Arts; she saw a long parade of weary horses and shivering beggars and all beaten, driven, stumbling things. Her feet throbbed as if she had crammed them into the stubby champagne-colored slippers. Her heart seemed to swell and fester.

"Nettie," she cried, "for heaven's sake, pour me a drink, will you?"

The maid looked doubtful.

"Now you know, Mis' Morse," she said, "you been near daid. I don' know if the doctor he let you drink nothin' yet."

"Oh, never mind him," she said. "You get me one and bring in the bottle. Take one yourself."

"Well," said Nettie.

She poured them each a drink, deferentially leaving hers in the bathroom to be taken in solitude, and brought Mrs. Morse's glass in to her.

Mrs. Morse looked into the liquor and shuddered back from its odor. Maybe it would help. Maybe, when you had been knocked cold for a few days, your very first drink would give you a lift. Maybe whisky would be her friend again. She prayed without addressing a God, without knowing a God. Oh, please, please, let her be able to get drunk, please keep her always drunk.

She lifted the glass.

"Thanks, Nettie," she said. "Here's mud in your eye."

The maid giggled. "Tha's the way, Mis' Morse," she said. "You cheer up, now."

"Yeah," said Mrs. Morse. "Sure."

ORPHANT ANNIE

I

YESTERDAY, for the first time in perhaps, yes, at least five years, I saw Annie Robinson. Seeing her startled me just a little. It brought back so many things, mostly about Annie herself.

Strangely, Annie had not changed in the five years since I last saw her, nor, for that matter, was she in any outward way different from the Annie of five years before that, when I first met her. Somehow, when we see old friends, after a space of years, we expect to see upon them some definite signs of disintegration and decay, even while each of us says to himself, "I haven't gone down like that—why, I've hardly changed at all—in years."

Perhaps there were signs of age in Annie that I did not observe, but the usual signs were missing. There were no sagging of throat muscles, or lines around the eyes, or loosening of contour. She was, so far as I could tell, the same Orphant Annie of Rutgers & Olds, Advertising; Bingham & Son, Brokers—the others.

"How are you, Annie?" I asked. "What have you been doing?" The usual questions.

She was quite well, she told me. Yes, she was still working—had an awfully good position—confidential secretary to S. B. Hubbard of the S. B. Hubbard Company. Yes, her family was well. Did I remember Ethel, her sister? Ethel was married—an awfully nice chap—they were housekeeping—an apartment in West Seventy-eighth Street. Lester was married, too. Yes, thank you, her father was better—he always felt better when warm weather came. The family was living on Long Island now. Yes, they were buying a home in Flushing—liked it there, awfully well—the country air was good for her mother, too. Yes, it was pleasant, after all these years. . . .

Looking at Orphant Annie, and later, thinking about her, after we parted, her story came back to me, much as stories often come back to us, pieced out, a patchquilt of information and hints and intuitions. Paths cross and break, a stranger, here, offers his bit of color, an old acquaintance, two months later, fits in a missing pattern. Annie . . .

She was nicknamed Orphant Annie when I first met her, at Rutgers & Olds. I've no idea that the nickname stuck to her nor that anyone else remembers it. She was named, perhaps, because of the old jest—that she was not an orphan. At that, she had supposed orphan-like attributes. She was, as she is now, a little thing, slender, with grey eyes set wide apart. Although she is, in a way, even plump, because she is small-boned she has always given the impression of extreme fragility. She was, and is, pale, too, though her mouth is full and ripe-looking. Her face is a bit broad, her cheek-bones a trifle high for artistic perfection. Her skin is smooth and delicate-looking and her hair an unnoticeable light brown and straight. Her nose is slender and straight, with just a suspicion of a tilt to it, and, though her hips and waist are slender, her breasts are well rounded.

I wonder if I have given you a complete enough description. Perhaps her greatest characteristic is that, when you first meet her, she seems to fade completely into her background. It is only after you have seen her often, a dozen times, that she becomes complete, a person. Her clothes, of the most modest type, her soft voice, her little air of self-depreciation, all add to her neutral qualities, on first acquaintance. She is the type of whom it is so natural to say:

"Don't mind Miss Robinson, my confidential secretary, you know; say what you like in front of her—"

One, then, does ignore Annie, quite logically, at first. It is only at subsequent meetings that Annie's personality unfolds, that she becomes even Orphant Annie—Orphant Annie of a tenement in Sixteenth Street, an apartment uptown, now, a home in Flushing, Long Island. Orphant Annie—the perfect flower of our best urban civilization.

II

ANNIE ROBINSON was born in Tenth Street. She never remembered the house in which she was born, but it is safe to say that it was much like those which became subsequently her homes. By the time she was fourteen and began to think seriously about things, the family had progressed uptown as far as West Sixteenth Street. The house she lived in, which resembled every other house in which Annie had ever lived in, except in street number, was of dingy red brick, called, by courtesy, an apartment house. The difference between it and a tenement was, perhaps, an almost imperceptible degree of cleanliness, an attempt at janitor service, an every-third-year papering and painting. The house was one of a long row of four-storied houses, which, in a previous, more prosperous era, had been "private homes," each house being occupied, unbelievable to the present tenants, by a single family. Now, each house was divided and subdivided, made over into apartments by the additions of kitchens, hall toilets and running water on each floor. Each floor was given over to one or two families, depending upon the comparative opulence of the occupants.

The first floor fronts had not been remodeled. Each house still had a neat bay window to the left of the once-white stone steps. Now, each bay window inevitably gave signs of a more commercial tenancy than the original dwellers could ever have dreamed of. Dingy hair-dyeing establishments, doubtful beauty parlors, doctors of little-known but vaguely unpleasant diseases were sandwiched between purveyors of imitation pearls and of other wares far less genuine.

Children were always tumbling out of the doors of these houses or getting under the feet of pedestrians. They were well-nourished children, their paleness due more to over- than to under-feeding. They were always dressed in rather thick, unfitting clothes with soiled neckbands. Their stockings were forever coming down, their hair rough, their noses unpleasantly moist. They were usually sucking too-red lollypops or hinting for pennies for a new supply. They were sometimes accompanied by dogs of spiritless disposition and uncertain breed which ran mostly to short grey hair, occasionally black spotted.

This, then, was the atmosphere in which Annie Robinson lived until and when she was fourteen. Her own family lived in the third floor front of one of the red houses. The family had three rooms. The front room, logically called "the front room," was the living room and served as a bedroom for the two daughters, Annie and Ethel, who slept together on the wide cot which served, day times, disguised with a rather dirty half of a pair of portieres, as a couch. There was a big red-plush rocker in the room, outlined elaborately with machine carving, three smaller chairs of lesser beauty, a big golden oak table with carved legs and, in the corner, a sort of whatnot, a bit wobbly, bought, second-hand a few years before and containing various art treasures: an enormous shell, a doll from Coney Island, a small set of dishes with handle-less cups and a book of Whittier's poems, mysteriously come by. There was a red rug in the room, violently patterned in spots but worn in other places to a softer gentility, torn, near the door, where you were apt to get your foot caught, if you happened to forget it.

The second room, opening off this, with the other half of the pair of portieres ready to provide privacy, if ever necessary, was the bedroom of Mr. and Mrs. Robinson. The furniture here was, on account of the size of the room, necessarily limited to a huge brass bed and a less elegant chest of drawers. Maud, the youngest child, also shared this room with her parents until she was about seven, when she moved into the front room with her sisters.

The third room was the kitchen, complete with stove, sink and table. The family ate in the kitchen. In the general hall were the necessary toilet facilities. The hall and the stairs were always dark, lit by a small, flickering gas flame and full of a horrible mingling of smells, each one unpleasant.

The head of the house was most inappropriately named Harold, which had shortened to Hal and which seemed to fit him poorly enough, even then. He was a big man, with a sort of pulpy quality. In his youth he had been a longshoreman and exceedingly proud of his muscle. As with many longshoremen, he had taken up boxing as a fad. He had belonged to several athletic clubs, which had combined politics and sports most advantageously to both elements. He had been a big fellow with long arms, but not especially "game" or courageous. He had never become more than a fairly interesting amateur. He had a quarrelsome nature that prevented those higher up from taking an interest in him. He was forever engaging in some long and stupid dispute. He always "had it in" for someone or was "getting ready to settle with that fellow."

After his marriage, the occupation of longshoreman became too strenuous for him. Gradually, his muscle disappeared and in its place came unhealthy-looking fat. Now, he was employed in the freight department of one of the big steamship companies whose docks extend, stretched out for blocks, along the North River. He was always getting rheumatism, complaining that he couldn't work along the river, laying off, spending a couple of weeks at home as a most quarrelsome and cursing invalid, and then, when the money disappeared, getting another job at the docks. There really was nothing else, now, that he could do. He walked with a peculiar swaying, boneless sort of gait and his skin, though tanned, had a spongy quality, too. His nose was large and red-veined. His mouth had a childish, weak-looking expression and his chin was a series of loose, pulp-like folds. His hair was light and thin—he was bald at forty—and his eyes were small and light and weak, too.

Mrs. Robinson had come from slightly better stock, though she, as well as her husband, had been born in New York's East Side. She had married Robinson when he was a husky and athletic longshoreman. She had admired him tremendously and had felt unbelievably happy and lucky when she found that he really wanted to marry her. Never very bright nor acquisitive and believing that the man, especially her man, was head of the family, she had, through years of child-bearing and motherhood and housework, lapsed into an almost silent, rather timid wisp of a woman. She always felt lucky because she didn't have to go to work, the way so many married women did. Her husband supported her, he did! Even Robinson's gradual disintegration did not bother her. She had always been taken care of—she'd be looked out for.

She had simple beliefs. She did her buying of clothes at the end of the season and put them away for the next year, when she could. You got better material that way. She thought that a girl who had "gone wrong" was better off dead. She dismissed every new idea—and this included night school, music, books of all kinds and everything with any possible cultural trend as "nonsense." She saw that her children had one good hot meal a day—usually a stew—and she drank innumerable cups of tea and coffee. One or the other of these beverages was always simmering on her kitchen stove.

Lester was the oldest of the family. Two years older than Annie, at sixteen, he was starting to be "wild," not an entirely undesirable trait in a boy, his parents felt. He hung around the corner cigar store and poolroom, smoked cigarettes and made remarks about girls. He worked, with fair stability, in a paper box factory, but had already been in one shady deal, which required police investigation and ended in a warning.

Annie followed Lester in age, to be followed in turn by Ethel, who at twelve was still at the loose-socking, moist-nose age. So was Frank, who was ten, and, nights, with Lester, slept in the kitchen. Maud, about seven, was the beauty of the family and had thin, pale curls. There had been a younger child who had died.

Annie, at fourteen, was pale and thin and mouse-like, no more noticeable at first glance then than later. There is no reason to start her history at fourteen, in fact, save that at that age she made to her parents her first unusual and unassisted request. Needless to say it was dismissed immediately.

Annie dared to ask that she be allowed to go to High School! High School, mind you! When the family had been waiting for her to "graduate" from the public school so she could start to work. One can start to work when one has reached the age of sixteen, no matter what one's scholastic accomplishments, or, more grandly, at whatever younger age one may have finished the work laid out by the Board of Education for the Grammar Schools. Annie was graduated from School Number One Hundred Something, a dingy, red-brick school with a treeless, grassless yard when she was fourteen. Instead of great joy at this release from a formal education she had actually asked to go on—to go to High School. Three weeks later she had a very good job in a paper pattern house in lower Sixth Avenue.

III

THE FAMILY WATCHED ANNIE a bit closely for a while. Something unusual, here. Still, she seemed all right. There were no outbursts. She brought her money home, regularly, Saturdays, and only made the usual requests for unnecessary finery. Of course, she did take walks by herself way over to Fifth Avenue—and to Fourteenth Street—you got to watch girls like that—Fourteenth Street at night is no place for a young girl, alone—might go wrong—still, outside of that. It wasn't as if Annie was one of these flashy girls—a quiet little thing like Annie—

If it hadn't been for those walks, Annie might have settled down to years of the factory by day, neighborhood gossip or boys from the factory or neighborhood by night, a courtship, then, kissed in dark, unsavory halls, amusements at places just a trifle more pleasant, marriage, another dingy apartment, children. But Fourteenth was but two blocks to the South—and Fifth Avenue just a little more than two long blocks away.

Funny, Annie thought, even then, why so few of the girls she knew ever walked over to Fifth Avenue. Her own home was just West of Seventh Avenue. The girls walked farther every day. They walked as far East as Sixth, all the time. Somehow, something about Fifth frightened them. It didn't frighten Annie. She liked the width of it and the quiet and the dignified, smooth traffic—the buses. She went for bus rides, by herself, Saturday afternoons and Sundays. The girls she knew didn't think that was any fun. It wasn't fun, exactly. It wasn't that. It left you even unhappier than you were when you started. Yet it drove you on. Seated on top of a bus, Saturday afternoon, her clothes never quite warm enough except in the warmest weather, Annie drank in what she saw—the people mostly. Not that her thoughts about them were kind and gentle, nor even just mildly curious. She hated them all. One after another.

"How I hate that old thing," she would mutter about a woman, fur clad, and not necessarily old. "Nasty little child," she'd say to herself, "nasty, fat little thing."

She would poke her nose in the air disdainfully at people in automobiles and think, "I hate you, old fools," after they had passed.

Yet, too, she had a sharp curiosity about these very people. As the bus jogged up Fifth Avenue or Riverside Drive she would peer into apartment-house windows. In winter, when the days grew dark early, she was glad when folks forgot to pull down the window shades.

"Lace curtains," she'd tell herself, "big pictures there, in wide gold frames—a big blue lamp shade—rich folks," and then, "Gee, I hate them all. They don't know me, not one of them."

Sometimes she would, wistfully, put herself in the way of people, hoping to be discovered, somehow, a West Sixteenth Street Cinderella. She would be pushed aside with a careless, "look where you're going, child." No one ever discovered her.

She even tried to pretend that she was adopted, asked her mother artful questions that might lead to a disclosure of her true origin. Well she knew that the Robinsons wouldn't have adopted anyone. There were too many Robinsons as it was. She looked too much like Ethel and Frank to be an adopted child, anyhow.

Annie grew ambitious in an unformed sort of way, restless, perhaps, more than ambitious. If she had had money, a few decent pleasures, a fairly comfortable home, she might have been satisfied. Folding paper patterns in a Sixth Avenue loft by day, not especially savory food and West Sixteenth Street by night did not make life seem especially complete at fourteen.

Annie kept to the pattern of things. It's hard to break away at fourteen, at fifteen, even. She grew a bit sullen, a bit more envious of people who were more prosperous. Now, in Fifth Avenue she would issue pathetic and—she knew it, too—empty defiance to the street and the well-dressed crowds who passed her, there—"you just wait—I'll show you—I'll have nice things—"

How do you get nice things? That's it. Other folks' fathers provide them. Robinson grew more pulpy every day. His periods of being out of work grew longer. His weak, droopy mouth issued more frequent curses. No help there.

Ethel, at fourteen, went to work, too. Ethel was "fresh," a gayer, saucier type than Annie, though looking like her, in a way. Ethel worked at a milliner's and was forever bringing home rather wild and not entirely truthful stories of her adventures. Lester, who had changed jobs several times a year, now clerked in a chain cigar store and assumed a set of manners which fitted not at all with his usual behavior. At eighteen, he had already "got into trouble over a girl" and only the fact that the girl was older than he was and was wild, too, kept him from paying for his folly.

When Annie was sixteen she had passed from the loft in Sixth Avenue to a press clipping bureau and then to a Sixth Avenue department store. She didn't like the department store, really, but it was better than anything she had done. She was a cash girl for the basement aluminum ware and had a promise of being put "on the floor" when she was a year or two older.

Annie disliked the girls she worked with, much as she disliked her neighbors. They seemed stupid, dull, without any sort of an urge or inner feeling. Sometimes she would try to put out feelers, to see if the other girls felt the restless rebellion that she felt so frequently. There was never a response of any kind. They thought the store was "all right," the hours "kind-a-long." They spoke of "fellas" and "steadies" and clothes. Marriage, perhaps only a few years off, was the only thing they looked forward to. Sometimes, looking into their complacent or shallow, petulant faces, Annie wanted to stick pins into them to find out if they would squeal or scream. They laughed at her, called her a queer one, let it go at that.

Annie went to the store's school. She was not especially ambitious, now, in a scholastic way, as she had been at fourteen. Still, the more you know the faster you get ahead. She had a quick mind. She never said much about the school, at home.

When she was seventeen, Annie discovered boys—or boys discovered her. Anyhow, she found herself suddenly with masculine attention. Until then, she hadn't thought much about boys. They were all right, in a way. She hated boys of Lester's type, fresh and forward. She "couldn't stand" the slovenly youths of West Sixteenth Street. She was so quiet and mouse-like that other types never presented themselves to her. Ethel, at fifteen, already had beaux. But then, Ethel was a "fresh kid" and, besides, was satisfied with almost any kind of youthful masculine attention.

At seventeen, Annie found that the peculiar chemistry of sex brought her unconsciously with boys and men. Some young clerk or wrapper or delivery boy was always waiting at the side door of the store for her at closing time. She wasn't one of the "awfully popular" girls, and yet there was always someone.

She liked these boys, for a while. They were "good company." They were full of a sort of comfortable repartee. They took her to the movies, nights, and bought innumerable sodas. Beyond that they could not go. What could they do? Most of them lived at home and helped support a home quite similar to the one Annie came from. They certainly were not marriageable, and, if they had been, the marriage would have meant a transfer from one poor apartment to another. They were a transient pleasure. Some of them got fresh. They didn't get far with Annie. One didn't mind a kiss or two. That sort of paid for the evening's entertainment. They didn't go farther than that. Annie knew how to hold her own. You can't live in West Sixteenth Street without learning something about the world.

Roger Burson clerked in the silk department. He was a most elegant young fellow, with long white fingers. Quite unobtrusively Annie brought herself to his notice. She was clerking in the second-floor dress-notions, now. There was something different about Roger Burson. Annie watched him, when she could, at his work. He unrolled long bolts of silk, letting the material slip through his fingers. She watched him talking to feminine customers—jealous of them as she watched—and was always surprised at his smooth flow of conversation, his little deferences to his customers, his smile. He put back his head and half closed his eyes when he smiled—he seemed mysterious—deep, then. She liked his writing on his checks, a sort of large, clear, round writing. She kept a check that he had written and discarded. She was as familiar with his store number as most girls are with the telephone number of more fortunate young men.

After a seemingly long period of indifference, Burson began paying attention to Annie. He waited for her, after closing hours. She was just a bit dizzy when she saw him waiting, the first time, his sleek brown hair, his slender rather pale face. What a nice fellow he was!

Of course she couldn't ask Burson to call! He lived in an uptown apartment with a widowed mother, who had a little money. She didn't dare let him see the Sixteenth Street apartment. She did meet him, after supper, on several occasions. He took her to the theatre a couple of times. She encouraged him as much as she could. He held her hand in the theatre. He hinted at further and more violent love-making. What could come of it? He couldn't marry—had to do his share toward supporting his mother—it took all they had just to get along. His conversation was not as thrilling as Annie had hoped it would be. It was quite dull, in fact, little rather feminine gossipy things about the store and about styles, tales of his yearly two weeks' vacation, tales of his bowling club, which met once each week. She tried to get him to talk about some of the vague, restless things that were in her own mind. He never seemed to know what she was talking about.

One warm Spring evening they took a bus-ride to Central Park and then walked through the park slowly. Annie walked close to Burson, took his arm, encouraged him in every way. He kissed her. Oh, what of it? What if he did kiss her? Could anything come of it all? She'd better be careful—falling in love would be easy enough—too easy. That wouldn't get her anywhere. After that, Annie avoided Burson. It was easy enough, after all.

A few nights afterward, Annie, all alone, walked up Fourteenth Street. It was a hot night and the white lights of the street, the cheap colors from the shows and the shop windows seemed suddenly to sicken her. She was eighteen! Eighteen! She used to think, when she was a little girl, that something grand would happen to her. Nothing would. Not unless she made things happen. It was like waking up, somehow, just walking down Fourteenth Street. Her street—two blocks from her home!

In one store there was an auction. A man with a persuasive voice was begging customers to bid on an elaborately boxed tea-set of red and white Japanese china. Annie ventured inside the door. Half a dozen youths smiled invitingly, even moved toward her. She waited for a minute, hurried out again. Idly enough, she ventured into a penny arcade two doors away. The place was full of a poorly dressed, shuffling crowd, leering men, bold-eyed women. A mechanical piano blared out a popular song. A wax figure, dirty, slightly melted, held a sign which told of a fortune to be had for a penny.

There were peep-shows for pennies, too, showing partly nude women of generous proportions, music for pennies, with long and unbelievably unsanitary tubes to be fitted into your ears if you cared to receive music in this fashion. There were weighing machines and machines which told your strength or gave you a penny's worth of electricity. A fellow in a sailor's uniform grinned at Annie and pointed toward one of the peep-shows.

"Seen this?" he asked. "It's hot stuff!"

Annie gave him what she hoped was a reproving stare, hurried down the street, turned up Fifth Avenue.

IV

YES, here she was—eighteen—and she had nothing. They were getting poorer and poorer all the time. Lester was always getting into trouble or out of work, grumbling when he had to help at home and threatening to go elsewhere to live. Ethel put her money on her back and wouldn't do a great deal to support the family. Her father's rheumatism, which usually disappeared in summer, seemed worse than ever, now. At least, he had more time at home for cursing and complaining about it. Even now, she knew he was sitting, a huge sponge which overflowed the red plush chair, cursing the weather and his rheumatism and his family. She couldn't exactly blame him. After all, he didn't get a great deal out of life.

Well, what did she get out of life? Working all day in the store wasn't fun, either. She wasn't the type who got ahead, got to be a buyer. She knew that. She might stay there forever, just behind a counter. Marriage? Whom could she get? Oh, any one of half a dozen fellows, if she tried hard enough. What would she have then? A home like she had now and babies—or no babies and a job, if she found a man who believed that a woman should keep on working after she was married. That wasn't much fun.

Men? They were easy enough—easy to get them interested, but they wouldn't do anything for you. There was old Blakeman. He had seemed interested. He had been awfully insulting, even offered her an apartment—he had pulled a lot of stuff about "making an old man happy." He hadn't helped her get ahead in the store. Of course not. Men don't help girls in that way. And women don't help other women, unless you happen to be the type—know how to get in with them and sympathize and kow-tow. Well, she wasn't the type. Men though—simple things—if there was some way—if she knew anything. Men—why of course—if she knew anything. The girl who got ahead was the girl who had a profession and knew men—how to manage things—there was Leah Fisher—a stenographer—she had married her boss, finally. There were other ways of getting ahead, too, no doubt. A stenographer. Good money, right there. Of course. Why hadn't she thought of it? All of these years wasted—and she was eighteen.

When Annie told her parents that she was going to night school they did not protest as much as she had thought they would. Going to High School, day times, was one thing. Going to a free night school, after you had already earned money during the day, that was something else. Why any big, overgrown girl of eighteen would want to keep on going to school. . . . Still, if what Annie said was true—if she really could make more money that way—well, she ought to be able to know her own mind at eighteen—time most girls were marrying and settling down. . . .

Her parents encouraged Annie, as a matter of fact. If she married, they would be deprived of her earnings. If, on the other hand, night school would mean larger earnings. . . .

Learning stenography, when one has been out of school four years and only went through grade school, then, isn't an easy job. Especially, it isn't easy, if one has stood up all day selling things in a noisy store, where the air isn't any too good. Still, others did it. It took Annie a year to learn to be a stenographer. It was a year of long days in the store, long hours on her feet, her head aching, frequently, a hurried and not especially good supper and then more hours in a bare schoolroom at an uncomfortable desk, an impatient teacher, impossible fellow students. That year remained a memory of never quite enough sleep or rest, trudging dully from one task to another, trying to learn word-signs between sales, during the day, and trying to keep awake sufficiently to recall those same word-signs at night. The year ended, finally. Annie was a stenographer!

Hunting for a position, then. It wasn't as easy as she had supposed. How many stenographers there were! Girls, just out of high school, not much younger than she was, but so much fresher and seemingly more eager and so full of the knowledge that high school must surely bring. There were college girls looking for jobs, even!

Annie gave up her job in the store—they wouldn't give her a trial as a stenographer there, though that didn't bother her a great deal. She had tried, at first, hunting a job in her lunch-hour. That didn't do. All good jobs were taken, by noon.

She would read the want-ads, the first thing in the morning, snatch a bite of breakfast, a roll spread with gelatinous factory-made preserves and coffee, usually, and start out looking for a job. She wore neat, colorless clothes, rather faded into the background.

Her parents were rather difficult, those weeks. She had been the steady one of the family. Her father and Lester had always been more or less out of work. Ethel couldn't be depended upon. Annie's money had come in steadily, without a question. Now, it almost seemed to her as if they thought her the whole support of the family. They made fun of her ambitions to better herself, even while they urged that she find something to do. To hear her father, melting out over the red plush rocker, you would have thought that Annie had already entered into a life of vice and crime because, for a week or two, she didn't contribute to the family's upkeep.

"Shut up about me," she said, finally. "I don't know why I'm the family goat, but if I am, I am, and that's all there is to it. I'll get something."

She did. She got a stenographic position in a small hardware company. The proprietor insulted her, finally, so she quit. She could have "called him down," kept on with her job. What was the use? There were other jobs. There weren't any possibilities there, anyhow, excepting the small salary—a salary only a degree better than she had had as a clerk in the department store. That proprietor! What a stupid, lazy, dusty fellow! If she wanted to be insulted she'd never had chosen him to do it. Certainly not. Oh, well . . . might as well get experience. . . .

She was a better stenographer now. A few weeks more of idleness and Annie was with the Cutter Rubber Company, in lower Broadway.

This was something like it—a clean office, with glass partitions, brisk girls, sleek young men, busy, pompous officials. For the first time in her life Annie felt that she fitted in. This was what she had wanted all of the time—in a way. At least she had always wanted cleanliness and order. You can't afford those when you are poor. She rather liked the work, even. She developed into rather a good stenographer, a bit uncertain, perhaps, as to punctuation, but always willing enough to consult the dictionary as to the spelling of a difficult word.

Annie began to wear the neat, unobtrusive business clothes that became almost a part of her personality later. Up to that time she had worn odds and ends of things that did not seem to belong together—a suit bought at a closing-out sale, a blouse her mother had picked up at a bargain. Annie insisted that she had to dress well now. As her salary was larger, her mother began to respect her almost enough to allow her to buy clothes without reproach for the money she was "throwing away on style."

For some time, Annie was satisfied at the office. She always arrived on time. She did her work fairly well, almost eagerly. She spent the usual amount of time gossiping with other girls in the rest room, of course, but this was more from a desire to see how the other girls lived and to find out what they knew than from any time-wasting motive. She had always had a curiosity about people.

At home things were just as bad. Lester and her father worked spasmodically, with wonderfully good excuses for their idleness. Ethel still cared for cheap finery. Frank had a job as messenger boy, but didn't make much money. Maud, the beauty of the family, wore yellow curls still, and, of course, had to have wearing apparel harmonious with her loveliness. Mrs. Robinson had dreams for Maud.

There ought to be some way to improve things. Certainly things couldn't go on that way always, that disordered apartment, never quite enough money for actual necessities, never any touch of pleasant living. Annie thought about this a lot. Her position was pleasant enough, in a way. It wasn't exciting, now that she was accustomed to the routine of the office.

Certainly, in the normal course of events, no great change would take place. She might get a slight raise once or twice a year. She might keep her position for years and years. There were several stenographers at the Cutter Rubber Company who had been there for ten years. They received only a slightly larger salary than Annie, were laughed at a bit for their faithfulness—certainly nothing to look forward to.

Occasionally a girl in the office got married. Annie would meet the "lucky man," like as not. When he was a fellow employee, his salary was just about the size of Annie's own. She couldn't afford to marry a man like that. Once in a while one of the girls managed a vacation to one of the nearby summer resorts and returned engaged and with stories of great luxuries ahead. Annie found that these summer-vacation catches were invariably old and homely and not as rich as they were supposed to be. Anyhow, Annie couldn't have managed a summer-resort vacation if it would have resulted in an engagement to the Prince of Wales.

Yes, marriage was all right—if you could afford it—if you had only yourself to look out for or if you found a rich man. Certainly no rich man was going to marry Annie. She knew that. Occasionally girls did find rich men—married their bosses, even. No such luck for her.

Then Margery Miller had an "affair." It was not the most savory sort of an affair, but Annie drank in the details eagerly. Old Man Bruntage—the last person in the world you'd suspect, unless you were familiar with business offices—took the dashing Miss Miller to Atlantic City for the week-end. Actually. Before going, he bought Miss Miller an entirely new outfit of clothes, which, rumor said, she needed badly, especially the silk under-neaths. Well, Bruntage and Miss Miller returned, after the week-end, but Bruntage's wife got wind of the affair—that does happen sometimes—and, though she wasn't the sort who wanted a divorce, preferring the money and position which went with being Bruntage's wife, she did insist on "something being done about it." Something was done about it. Miss Miller was fired.

The girls talked it over in the rest room.

"What a fool she was!" Lucile Stork volunteered. "She ought to have known it would get out. Those things always do, sooner or later. And when a girl's reputation is gone, there is just nothing she can do." Lucile was holding out for matrimony.

"There's another thing, too," this from Mabel Foster, "as soon as you give in to a man he doesn't care for you any more. He's interested only as long as you keep him guessing. All Margery has got is a few clothes. You bet, if I was going to do a thing like that—though of course I wouldn't think of such a thing . . ."

The girls were right. Annie felt that. And yet, if you didn't do anything at all—excepting your work, day after day . . .

Of course if you weren't a Margery Miller—if you kept your head—well, that might be a way, too.

Annie was given the position made vacant by Miss Miller's departure. Annie was Bruntage's private secretary!

V

ANNIE was a little mouse. Of course. She dropped her eyes when Bruntage spoke to her suddenly. She said "yes, sir," and "no, sir," with unnecessary frequency. She saw that her blouses were always fresh and dainty. She pouted her lips over her pencil when she was thinking. Bruntage told her that she was "very good, indeed. Quite satisfactory in the position." Was that all? What a plain thing Margery Miller was, actually! Wasn't Annie even that nice looking? It worried her just a little—Bruntage was awfully respectful.

Perhaps men were simpler than she had imagined them to be. At least Bruntage was. Annie found that out. She began wearing rather thin stockings to the office. Bad taste? She had thought so, from things she had read in "advice to the working girl." After all, though, perhaps she and the woman who wrote the advice weren't quite in accord as to results, after all.

Annie's nice office oxfords gave way to thin slippers with buckles on them. She crossed her legs a bit. Simple? Of course. Weren't men simple? She continued wearing her plain little clothes. Occasionally her hand touched his as she was taking dictation. She would pull it away and say, "Oh, pardon me," rather dreadfully embarrassed. She kept one flower on her desk, in a glass of water.

There were a lot of questions Annie had to ask Bruntage. Men are so much wiser and more sensible than girls!

"Oh, thank you, sir—I knew you'd know. I'm sorry I had to take up your time. There was no one else around here who could have told me." And, "I don't mind working overtime, really. I know how particular you are about the reports, sir. I'd rather take a lot of time and feel that they were right."

One day she was crying. She brushed tears away, unobtrusively, as she typed a letter.

Oh, dear! Had Mr. Bruntage noticed? Annie was so sorry. It wasn't anything—anything he could do, really. Her—her father was ill—had been ill a long time and now there were doctors' bills. Quite a lot of them. Oh, yes, she helped pay the expenses—had the burden of things, rather . . . had worked since she was fourteen . . . went to night school to learn stenography. Oh, she had wanted to ask someone there—didn't know who to ask . . . oh, if she could . . . if there were some way to—to get some money . . . yes, it was awful to be poor . . . not a great deal—nothing to Mr. Bruntage . . . two hundred dollars . . . she'd pay it off . . . pay it every week . . . a few dollars at a time.

It was lovely of Mr. Bruntage! She could pay him—not have it go through the office at all. Oh, he was lovely to her . . . she hadn't dreamed . . .

Bruntage gave Annie the money, a little roll of bills not very new ones. Annie started a bank account the next day, at noon. Not a great deal, of course. Still! She put three one-dollar bills on Mr. Bruntage's desk every Friday, after the cashier came around with the pay-envelopes. She hadn't signed any paper, of course—this had been too personal for that—just between them. How good of Mr. Bruntage!

It was a few weeks later that Mr. Bruntage proposed a trip to Atlantic City. He'd be more discreet this time. Anyhow, what if he was found out—though he wouldn't be, of course. A nice, discreet little thing, Miss Robinson. Young, too, and innocent. There were preliminary things, of course. Then, plans.

Annie would need clothes, of course. She dropped her eyes. A tear showed in the corner of one of them.

"I've—I've never had any pretty things," she said.

That could be remedied easily enough—easily enough. After they got to Atlantic City . . .

Annie shook her head. She didn't like to say anything—she—she was ashamed of the things she had . . . wouldn't embarrass Mr. Bruntage by being seen with him. Still—she didn't know much about buying things. . . .

Mr. Bruntage was clever about buying things, it seemed. Three days later, on a Thursday, he met Annie, by appointment, in a little tea shop in East Fifty-seventh Street. He took her to some shops he knew about . . . yes, Annie had naturally good taste, it seemed—the saleswoman said so. She chose rather plain things—her style, really, but awfully expensive and well-made. Bruntage paid cash for the things. Annie had them sent to her home. Her mother wasn't clever about things like that—if clothes didn't have a lot of trimming her mother wouldn't think they were expensive.

Friday, modest and shy as ever Annie appeared at the Cutter Rubber Company. Sometimes, during the day, she caught Mr. Bruntage's eyes, dropped her own eyes, smiled. There was a delicious secret between them. They were to meet at two, on Saturday, at the Pennsylvania Station, to begin their holiday.

That evening, Annie ate the half-cold stew without protest. She didn't have anything to say when her father set forth his usual complaints—his rheumatism was worse, it seemed, and some freight that was being unloaded at the docks had gone wrong and of course he had been unjustly blamed for it.

After the evening meal, Annie wrote a letter. Letters were written seldom enough in the apartment-house in West Sixteenth Street. They were almost an event, in fact. Annie had brought home a new box of writing paper, a new bottle of ink and an office pen for the occasion. Now, she cleared off the table herself, put an old Saturday Evening Post on it, in lieu of a desk blotter, and sat down to write.

"Writing a letter?" asked her mother, with a nice mixture of social interest and curiosity.

"Why, yes," said Annie simply, and didn't explain. She had learned that you don't have to explain, if you don't want to.

"You needn't be so grumpy about it," her mother answered, with quite unnecessary anger, considering her question and Annie's reply. "A lot of pleasure I get from my children . . . running around at all hours . . . doing all kinds of things under my very nose. . . . It seems to me that your mother . . ."

Annie was writing her letter. She wrote it in pencil, first, on a piece of Maud's tablet paper, crossing out one sentence, substituting another. Then she copied it carefully in ink on her new paper. It was plain white paper and the ink was black. When she had copied her letter she addressed an envelope, put the letter in and sealed it. She started to tear up the first penciled draft, thought better of it, tucked it into her purse instead. After all, she had tried hard on that letter. This is what Annie had written:

MY DEAR MR. BRUNTAGE:

I don't know how to tell you, after all of your kindness to me. I can't go—that's the easiest way of saying it. I just can't. I've thought it over and over. Maybe it's because of the home training I had when I was a little girl. I don't know. It just doesn't seem RIGHT, that's all. I never could come back to my parents and my little sister, if I did such a thing. I hope you will understand how I feel. I'm not coming back to the office, but I want you to know that I shall always remember your kindness to me—we have always been poor and never before have I ever had any pretty things—and your goodness to my father during his illness.

Sincerely,

ANNIE ROBINSON

Annie put on her hat and coat and called to her mother.

"I'm going out to mail my letter, Ma, and I may take a bus ride before I come back."

It was customary, in the Robinson household, to make some explanation of one's departure.

At the corner, Annie dropped the letter into a letter-box. She smiled as she saw, in her mind, Bruntage's expression as he read it. He'd open it himself—she had marked it "Personal" and he always opened personal mail. That stupid little Martin girl would probably be in his office, in her place. What an old fool Bruntage was! Well, he'd never show that letter to his wife, at any rate.

VI

ANNIE CLIMBED onto a bus at the corner and chose a seat on top. She had always liked bus-riding. Now, as she rode uptown, she thought over things much as she had done when she was a little girl. She was a little more definite about things now. She felt a certain exaltation, a slight wave of success, such as she had never felt before. After all—she had accomplished something. Old Bruntage! What a fool he was! Yet she knew from office gossip that he had taken at least four other girls on week-end trips, besides the stupid Miss Miller, who had preceded her as private secretary. None of the other girls had rebelled. Silly little flies—they had walked into his net, perhaps even grateful to get the few things he had given them, the couple of days at a good hotel. Horrid old man! Ugh! How mad he'd be at that letter! She'd chosen expensive clothes, too, and had paid back only a trifle of that two hundred dollars. Well, he had picked her out as a poor, simple little office worm. Let him be more careful next time—the old fool.

Not that he'd see through it. He'd probably just wish she hadn't been so virtuous. That was just as well. She hoped she'd never see him again. At that, the office would have to give her good recommendations. She'd telephone in the morning—say she was ill. Bruntage wouldn't dare say anything. Not he! The old fool.

There were days ahead . . . other things. For the first time life offered a pleasant pathway, with a narrow, glittering lane of possibilities. Of course, there were limits. Annie knew she wasn't the type her employer married. Anyhow, few enough employers really married their stenographers—outside of romantic short stories. Of course offices weren't devilish holes of iniquity. Certainly not. There were thousands of business men who never noticed a pretty face during business hours. Of course. Still, there were thousands more not above a stolen kiss, awfully susceptible to flattery, easy to prey upon, no doubt because they thought that they were the stronger power. Perhaps. She would see.

As the bus jostled her uptown, Annie looked into shop windows and then into homes and apartments much as she had done when she was a little girl. She still hated these people, their comfort and their smugness. Each of these families with some man at the head earning money. Imagine her father earning enough money for the family. Cleanliness . . . nice, smooth-flowing lives . . . pretty things. Oh, well.

She could get a good salary. She was a good stenographer now, had learned about offices. Lower New York, of course. Brokers, advertising men, officials, men like that. Big offices. That was where to go. Men who dealt in abstract things—stupid men who thought they were "deep" because they knew a few seemingly important facts. Those were the men who believed silly things, who looked for a sort of pseudo-romantic relation mixed in with their dry business facts. A conference in the morning, a long luncheon with a couple of men, peppered with seemingly important business details, letters dictated during the afternoon to a sympathetic little secretary. Of course.

If she had only herself! That would be easy enough. These girls who spoke so much about being self-supporting, when all they had to do was to support themselves! Of course—she could get away—it would be physically possible just to get out—out of the whole thing, out of helping to support the family and keeping an eye on Ethel and trying to put some sort of ideas into Maud's head. The family would get along somehow. Families always did, she supposed. However, the burden of support, started when Annie was fourteen, couldn't be thus easily swept aside. After all, she was, in a way, fond of her family, even—certainly she was fond of Frank and Maud! yes, even of Lester and Ethel and her mother and father. After all, none of them had any too much, either. Maybe they liked nice things, too.

Two hundred dollars! In the bank! To do with what she wanted to! Nice clothes, too, a good coat and dress and blouses and a couple of hats. She could give Ethel a hat and a blouse and still have nicer things than she had ever had before.

Two hundred dollars! The bus lumbered past apartment-houses, blank, factory-like, solidly respectable, each with its little squares of light to indicate the families who lived, in cliff-dwelling fashion, each in its own little portion. How funny—all of these little families, each member of each family coming home each day, like little homing pigeons to a particular little nest in the cliff. Nice little nests! Why, if her family could live like this—clean and respectable—if Frank and Maud could have a chance. Why not? There was even the university up here—classes at night—you don't even have to be graduated from a high school—Annie had heard that. If Maud could come up here to live and go to school—If Frank could "get" this neighborhood—Ethel and Lester, even. Why, the only reason Ethel and Lester liked cheap things, probably, was because they hadn't ever had any better to like, if they had wanted to. After all—Annie knew she had had to fight for everything she had—stenography even. Even now—oh, well, there wasn't any better way that she could think of.

Why not? The two hundred dollars would pay for moving and for . . . Moving—that old trash? The broken-down table, the hideous brass bed—the red-plush rocker her father melted into and went to sleep in every night after dinner—the cot in the living-room. It would be great—living up here—up-town—in a new apartment, clean and new—with a bedroom for the girls and another for Lester and Frank and one for her parents—and a living-room for—why, for company even . . . and a regular dining-room and a clean—may-be even a white kitchen. It could be done! Why not? The most that could happen was that they could be put out. Even that might be more fun than Sixteenth Street.

Annie knew that her father had always been against moving, had said that the Sixteenth Street apartment was near his work. Let him complain. Why, he was out of work most of the time, anyhow. Let him take a subway to work. And he would work! She'd see to that. She'd be boss now. Lester would work, too, or he couldn't come home. Absolutely. As for the others —well, her mother would agree, dough-like, with the strongest—and the kids would welcome anything, even if they couldn't see that it would help them.

Annie nodded abstractedly to her mother when she came in. Her father was asleep in the red rocker, a big, awkward figure, his weak mouth slightly open, a three-days' growth of hair on his face. Maud was the only young person at home. Maud was thirteen now, and finishing grade school, a round-faced girl, pretty in a dull, usual sort of way, but with good features. Her mother still considered Maud a beauty.

Annie called to Maud:

"Come out in the kitchen while I get a drink."

Wondering, Maud followed her elder sister. She rather obeyed Annie.

Drinking from the kitchen tin cup, Annie said:

"Now, don't yell about this—not one word to anyone else, understand. You're the only one I'm going to tell."

"All right," nodded Maud, importantly, eager for a confidence.

"If you lived in a swell—I mean, well, a grand apartment uptown, which had a bathroom and a big living-room where you could have company and near the park and all, would you keep on going to school—to high school, I mean?"

"Say, who's going to leave the family a fortune?" asked Maud.

"Nobody. You answer me. Give me your word of honor you'll keep on going to school—clear through high school—and—and college, maybe?"

"Sure," said Maud. She'd just as soon go to school. She never made very good grades, but, anyhow, it certainly was better than working. Then:

"But say, what's that got to do with us? Thinking of moving? A swell chance this family has got for anything. What's it all about, anyhow?"

"Nothing," said Annie, "only you go in there—and not a word out of you—understand. Only you got something to think about."

VII

ANNIE WENT TO SLEEP that night with a wonderfully warm feeling of sacrifice. She was going to do a lot of things—for her little sister—for the rest of the family. Yet even, through all this she sensed something else. Of course it wasn't all for her little sister—not quite all—it was more than that—a desire for nice things, a few comforts—and under that—a desire to try her own skill—to sort of get into a battle.

She dreamed about apartments and new furniture—kept walking up steps that tumbled down as she walked on them and woke up with a horrible picture in her mind, of herself struggling with a man who had a knife in his hand. The picture would have frightened her even more if she hadn't remembered that she had seen that same picture in front of a show on Fourteenth Street just a day before. Oh, well, hadn't she heard some place that dreams go by contraries or that they show your disposition or something?

She didn't tell her family she had quit working. She left, dressed in her new coat and hat, at her usual hour, but took a bus uptown. Annie was apartment hunting!

At ten, as a slow-moving janitor was showing her through a far too elaborate eight-room apartment—might as well look at all kinds and get an idea of how other folks live—Annie glanced at her cheap wristwatch and laughed. At ten was the time Bruntage got to the office and looked over his mail. What a fool the man was, anyhow.

Annie found a six-room apartment three days later. It was in One Hundred and Twelfth Street and was convenient to the One Hundred and Tenth Street Subway station, the buses, Central Park and Columbia University. To city dwellers with exacting tastes, the apartment might not have been exactly without faults. Annie dared not consider anything more expensive.

Anyhow, it was quite a step from West Sixteenth Street. The long, rather dark hall might not have been the last word in apartment buildings, but there was a nice, though not extremely large, front living-room, with three windows, three bedrooms, with a court window to each of them, a bathroom with quite modern appointments, a square dining-room with a dome, a plate rail and two court windows, and a nice kitchen, complete with gas stove, ice-box and built-in cupboards. Annie examined it carefully, spoke about decorations, gave her father's business address, explained that he was "in the shipping business" and made a deposit.

A few days later she called at the apartment again, made final arrangements for decorating—as much ivory paint as the owner would allow and tan wall-paper throughout the house—she hadn't read magazines all these years without profiting by them. The renting agent was glad enough to get the apartment rented, it seemed. He had not inquired too closely into the references. Annie paid a month's rent in advance.

Well, that was done! She'd get the money somehow. She'd always worked, when it came to that—always expected to . . . probably. Lots of men had made advances—men always did that—what had she ever got out of it? She'd see.

A few pleasant, exciting days, now, of applying for positions in the morning—or writing letters of application—and furniture hunting in the afternoon. Life was fun these days!

A job then—at a better salary than she had ever had. Nothing doing there. She found that out in a few days. Such respectable people. Still, she had to have something—expenses went on—the apartment was nearly ready.

During her lunch hour, one day, she made final arrangements about the furniture. She bought it at a large time-payment house. An instalment would be due the first of every month. If there were more than two lapses in payment—she believed it was two—the furniture would be taken away. Fair enough! She gave her father's business address—he was working, temporarily, again—Ethel's employer's name and her own. She made a first payment on the furniture. There would be just enough of the two hundred dollars left for moving the small amount of wearing apparel, the few things her mother probably wouldn't part with.

She liked the furniture she picked out. There was a davenport, covered in a cotton tapestry, though the design wasn't half bad. This opened out into, the salesman assured her, "a full-sized bed." This was for Maud. You couldn't put three people into one of those tiny bedrooms! There was a wing chair to match it, and another chair covered in blue velour. After all, her father had to have some chair in which he could sprawl—relax after his day's work or his day's idleness. There were several smaller chairs, a stylish "library table," a small, open book-shelf, though, so far, the family owned no books, a plain tan rug. For the bedrooms there were inexpensive "sets," nearly alike, in grey, white and ivory enamel. For the dining-room there was a plain round oak table, a buffet, ten chairs—three extra for possible company. The Robinsons had never had company at mealtime. The kitchen needed no furniture save a plain table and a couple of chairs. Well, that was done.

The furniture was delivered on Saturday. Saturday was a half-holiday for Annie. She went to the apartment on the Subway, sitting in a nervous tension the whole way. She reached the apartment before the furniture did. The floors had been varnished. The smell of paint was clean. The empty rooms were fresh with the cheap tan paper. Annie had a pleasant, electric feeling of adventure. What would the family say? How had she dared?

The men came with the furniture. There was much untying of string, setting of bedroom mirrors in the dressing-table frames. The furniture was in place! The papers were pushed onto the dumbwaiters. The apartment was finished!

To Annie it looked perfect. Cheap, perhaps. What of it? There was a floor lamp, with a yellow silk shade. There were bright rag rugs for each room. How well the tapestry pieces looked and the big blue chair! Empty—well, perhaps. Still, when the family got in, put a scarf on the table, get a Victrola, maybe, later, and a few books and magazines. Gee, what would the family say?

Annie had arranged for gas and electricity and—yes—a telephone. She could hardly believe her own daring. She didn't know anyone to telephone to, excepting a few girls who had worked where she had. What of that? She'd meet people. It would be nice for Maud and Ethel, too. It's awfully hard for girls to get invitations to things if they haven't a telephone.

She closed the apartment, opened it again with her own key, to see if it were really there, took a bus home. A cheap apartment—what could it mean to all of these people in cars, who passed, smug in expensive clothes,

What did they know—of—anything, those fat-faced women who never earned a cent in their lives, with their sleek husbands next to them.

She looked hate at them, as she had when she was a little girl. She'd—no—she couldn't show them—it wasn't that . . . exactly . . . she'd get things . . . her way—something, anyhow.

ANNIE WAS TREMBLING when she got home. She took off her coat, hung it carefully on a hanger in the crowded closet—she and Ethel would have a closet all of their own now. . . .

She went into the kitchen, began, mechanically, to set the table.

"Time you're getting home," her mother growled at her. "Saturday afternoon, and you and Ethel walk the streets all day . . . a lot of help you are to me. . . ."

She didn't answer. She peeled potatoes.

All of the family were home except Lester. She waited until they had finished the thin fried steak and the watery potatoes. She started, mechanically, to eat the canned peaches. Then:

"We—we move tomorrow," she said.

"What do you mean . . . ? What are you talking about?"

Annie felt triumphant, a bit dizzy. She went on:

"I don't want one word out of anyone here. I'm tired of—this dirt and—everything. Sixteenth Street—it isn't good for Maud—or Ethel, either. I've got a place all picked out—"

"You've got a place picked out," her mother said, "you—"

"Yes, I have," said Annie. "I got the furniture, too. Everything. It's ready this minute. The family can come with me or not, as you want to. I'm going. Not one cent of mine goes into this house again. You keep that place up nice or I'm gone. I bring in the money and I'm boss. I spoke to Thompson—on the corner—he's coming for the things. You can get boxes from the grocer in the morning. Thompson will give you a price on things. I'm—I'm boss in this family."

There were squeaks, groans, curses. Annie felt as if she were living in a sort of dream. She loved it. It was the first big dramatic moment she had ever had. And to think—she had been able to create this—this scene—out of her own mind! Anything was possible!

Mrs. Robinson, Ethel and Maud were finally moved to inspect the apartment at once. Annie went with them. They got into their coats and made the trip on the Subway. Annie never found out what they thought of it—they were too incoherent for that. At least they were going to move!

At twelve that night, Hal Robinson was swearing and saying things about "an ungrateful daughter—after all the years I've spent working for this family. . . ." At one, the next day—there were so few things to move it might as well be done right away, if it was Sunday—Robinson was bawling out orders to Thompson and talking about "his new apartment" and what he was "getting ready to do, moving uptown." Annie was boss, though. The family recognized that. If her mother wailed a bit about "girls who don't confide in their mothers" and "girls who go wrong, these days," her wails were tempered a bit and became almost a gentle accompaniment to living. After all—it was rather nice, having a six-room apartment uptown . . . easier to keep clean, too, though Annie did seem to be getting an awful crank about wanting things too particular.

Annie left the new job after three months of it. Outside of borrowing one hundred dollars for an operation for her mother—she was to pay it back three dollars at a time until the sympathetic boss told her "not to mind" after the fifth pitiful payment—Annie's relations with the firm were quite businesslike. They were only too glad to give her excellent recommendations when she found a more remunerative position.

It was at Rutgers & Olds, Advertising, that Annie got it. It was a good position, secretary to Rutgers, the president, a bluff old man, though with rather a good reputation. He liked to drink a bit, but then, didn't most men of his age? He was nearly sixty, with heavy white hair and a white mustache of which he was perhaps unnecessarily proud. Mrs. Rutgers was an invalid who traveled rather constantly. Rutgers accompanied her frequently—that is, he was always able to get away for a six weeks' winter vacation at Palm Beach or Lake Placid, a two months' European trip in the summer. He seemed fairly content, so far as his friends could tell, with both his domestic and business arrangements.

The office force at Rutgers & Olds knew that Annie came in answer to an advertisement. She came in quiet, mouse-like, unobtrusive. A slender little thing, with mild grey eyes and a nice mouth, a pale little thing with a low, gentle voice. Certainly no one to make a fuss about. You could tell why the old man picked her out from among the dozens who applied for the position. She was just the sort of a private secretary a man would pick out if he wanted his work done well and quietly, without any nonsense.

It was at Rutgers & Olds that she got her nickname. It was quite probable that she knew of it right away. She learned soon enough, and, for some reason, didn't seem to resent it. It is certain that she never altered her manner nor her mode of dressing.

It was Quigley, one of the usual and always present smart alecks, who named her.

"What's the new stenog's name?" he asked, elegantly.

"Robinson—Annie Robinson, I believe," someone told him.

"I thought so—Annie . . . as I live, 'Little Orphant Annie' to the life. To think that Orphant Annie's come to our office to play! Ain't she grand?"

The office force all rather resented Quigley. We—for it was there that I first met Orphant Annie—took up for her. A nice little thing—did her work well—quiet and shy. Well, what of it—better than the usual office vamp who hung around trying to start something. Orphant Annie never tried anything with the office force, that hard-working, small-salaried contingent which did all of the work except the “conferences.”

“Orphant Annie isn’t an orphan at all,” Miss Drucker, Olds’ secretary, reported, a few weeks later. “She’s got a lot of parents—two of them—and she lives up near Columbia and studies nights”—we somehow felt that she did—“and her father’s awfully ill and about to have an operation.”

No one knew how Miss Drucker found out about the operation. It came to several hundred dollars, it seemed. Rutgers lent her the money.

It was the furniture, next, I believe. Everyone felt sorry about that. It leaked out as such things usually do. Little Orphant Annie—who would have been better off, doubtless, if she had been an orphan, but who was supporting invalid parents, instead, was buying furniture on the instalment plan. She had paid the first instalment and perhaps even the second one. Then illness had come to the household—the illness that had necessitated the operation on her father. Now the furniture was threatened—every piece was to be taken away. Rutgers wasn’t in town—Palm Beach, I believe. I think we were all ready to add our names to a subscription when someone—perhaps Olds—came to the rescue. Anyhow, the furniture was not removed. Orphant Annie, smaller and more mouse-like than ever, continued at the office. She had Rutgers’ private room, all alone, now, and seated at his enormous desk, took care of all of his private correspondence while he was away.

A little thing, then—a rumor—scarcely that—concerning a certain Jacobson, one of the firm’s clients—yes, the collar man—and our little Orphant Annie. Jacobson had a way of breezing in—which meant a “conference,” when Rutgers or Olds was about. Now, he would go into Rutgers’ office and have a chat with Orphant Annie—business, of course. If it had been anyone else except Orphant Annie, with her pale face and candid eyes, everyone in the office would have gossiped—that Miss Flint, now, who used too much rouge—or the young and quite too flip Bailey girl. Orphant Annie! We all felt that someone ought to warn Annie—Jacobson’s reputation—all that. She seemed too young and untouched. No one had the indelicacy to say anything.

Someone saw them together at luncheon—it could have been a business luncheon, of course. Another time, one of the less important and perhaps quite jealous stenographers was sure she saw the two of them pass her, Saturday afternoon, in Jacobson’s limousine. That was about all—excepting Jacobson’s reputation and the fact that he was married.

The book-keeper, a quiet, rather lanky and certainly slow and stupid chap named Western, rather fell in love with Orphant Annie. We could see him, mooning around after her. We were a trifle surprised because she didn’t encourage him more—after all, he was a nice boy—only a book-keeper and not apt to go higher, but young and pleasant . . . after all, Orphant Annie was only a stenographer, herself. He quite forced his attentions on her—little things—flowers and candy and a book, occasionally. Finally, he confessed to someone that Annie had allowed him to give her a ring—not a large diamond, you know—they really weren't engaged—but, if she had the diamond he felt that she'd be prejudiced a bit in his favor. He'd been out to call, too, awfully nice, their apartment—he'd met the mother and a younger sister or two.

IX

WE ALL FELT SORRY when Orphant Annie left Rutgers & Olds. In a way, in spite of her quiet, mouse-like personality, she had added interest to the place. Rutgers had got back by that time and he and Olds were sorry, too. We heard that they even called off the small debts she owed them—she'd been paying a couple of dollars at a time. Western took it hardest of all. He knew a lot of inside stuff, it seemed, though gradually a little of it leaked out to the rest of us. Jacobson was at the bottom of it. If we had only warned her! We were all sorry enough. We hadn't wanted to worry her. So, Jacobson, dog that he was, had led her on, tempted her with a promise of—well, of things a girl like Annie doesn't have. We remembered things she had said, little things, "I've never had anything pretty all of my life"—things like that. A sick father and a mother who wasn't strong! Worked since she was fourteen! Going to school at night! Little and quiet and grey-eyed! And Jacobson had tempted her!

She had nearly yielded to him, it seemed. Western didn't blame her for that any more than the rest of us did. Poor little Orphant Annie. Jacobson had given her presents—had planned a trip—the trip was to Paris—we heard even that—had bought her things preparatory to sailing—had helped her when her father needed a second operation. Then . . . well, she couldn't go on. . . .

We never knew how Western found out about it all—even about the note Annie had written.

"He won't forget that in a hurry," Western told us. "She was noble, that little girl. Only outside, in a most superficial way, was she tempted at all. You can see how that was. The things she said in her letter—how she couldn't go through with it. At the last minute she saw it wasn't right—told him so. She—she don't care for me—but she said she'd keep my ring—and if she ever did care . . ."

It is so easy to lose track of a mere office acquaintance in New York. I lost track of Orphant Annie for over a year, then. Then, it happened that a friend of mine, a Miss Dorset, was employed by the firm of Bingham & Sons, Brokers. Calling for her, one afternoon, I saw Orphant Annie—nice little Annie—in a big office . . . clad in a neat little frock, her smooth hair as tidy and her eyes as candid as ever. Somehow, Annie and I got to talking, a talk that was continued over a dozen teacups and Annie told me, in a most fragmentary way, the things that I have put down here . . . other things, too. Rutgers, for instance—sly old Rutgers with the white hair and white whiskers—to think that he. . . .

Miss Dorset told me, at the time, that Annie was well liked at Bingham & Sons. No—she didn't know anything about her history—hadn't heard that she was called Orphant Annie, even. I didn't tell Miss Dorset more than that. To be truthful, she didn't ask me. She was all sympathy for Annie, all full of little tales about her. Annie's oldest brother—his name was Lester, it seemed—had got into trouble over money—hadn't quite understood about it—and was threatened with arrest—a jail sentence, even. Annie had come to Mr. Bingham, the youngest Mr. Bingham, about it, and of course he had loaned Annie the money—he had an awfully good heart. Annie had started to pay the money back, a little at a time, every week—it was just pitiful the way she tried—but Miss Dorset had heard that Bingham was just going to call the debt settled. After all, a poor little thing like Miss Robinson—did I know that her mother was an invalid?

I didn't keep up with Orphant Annie, I wish, now, that I had had more time for her. She was—and is—worth cultivating, I'm sure. A year after I talked with her at Bingham & Sons, her name came up, at a business luncheon one day. A man was telling a story.

"It served the fellow right," he was saying. "Men try to get away with too much in business. If the girl had been the usual office vamp, I'd have thought it was blackmail and might even have sympathized with the fellow, but in this case the conditions were exactly the opposite. You could tell by the way the girl acted. At that, she escaped just in time—probably always will carry the memory of the thing—the nicest sort of a girl—modest—lives at home with her folks—her mother is ailing—some sort of an incurable disease. . . . Well, I'm glad she got some money out of the fellow—under the circumstances. . . ."

What was the girl's name? I wanted to know.

Ordinarily, he couldn't have told me, of course, but as long as she was so absolutely innocent, absolutely without blame—everyone who knew the details was in absolute sympathy with her—Robinson or Robertson the name was . . . girl's first name was Annie—oh, a nice, decent little thing. Did I know her?

The name sounded familiar. I admitted that. Yes—an ordinary enough name, to be sure.

The other bits that have come to me about Annie have fitted in, as such things always fit in, as we always meet just the one old friend we think we never will see again—just as we always come across old acquaintances and old names—forming more complete pictures than we had ever thought it possible to form, when we were young.

Recently, at a dinner, a woman said, "I want you to meet someone you used to know," and there was a stranger who turned out to be a former certain little Rose Smith, whom I'd gone to school with—second grade public school, St. Louis, when I was seven. Last week I had a picture postcard from India with the signature of an Irish lad I'd known fifteen years ago—he'd been a Russian dancer in vaudeville, then.

So there is nothing odd, then, in the fact that yesterday, I should have seen Orphant Annie. I shall see her again, I hope, through the years. Perhaps, too, when I do not see her I shall hear little things, like the things I have heard that complete, in a way, the picture of her that I carry with me . . . the story of Hanson, the builder, who fell in love with her and wanted to divorce his wife—the story of Dewit, who fell at her feet and apologized—and was overheard—because he had misjudged her . . . Pinnet, who sent Annie's little sister through college.

A house in the country—Lester and Ethel married—Frank well established in business—little Maud grown up and graduated from college. I almost shed a tear over Orphant Annie—a sentimental tear for her goodness and her gentleness—a shy little thing in quiet clothes, a dear little thing with big grey eyes and a pale eager little face. Then I thought of Hilden and the money he lent her for that always-necessary family operation, of Lewis and the letter his wife received by mistake.

But, after all, Orphant Annie doesn't need any sort of a tear, I'm sure. She did what she could, in her way.

"I wouldn't have made things the way they are," she told me, one day, "I just tried to get something out of the world, the best way I can."

I see her, jogging along up Fifth Avenue, on top of a bus, looking into windows to see how "nice folks" live, hating folks that had things without even wishing for them, wondering about things. How many of us . . . well . . . who are we to say? . . .

NUNS AT LUNCHEON

Aldous Huxley

(1894- )

---

WHAT HAVE I BEEN DOING since you saw me last?" Miss Penny repeated my question in her loud, emphatic voice. "Well, when did you see me last?"

"It must have been June," I computed.

"Was that after I'd been proposed to by the Russian General?"

"Yes; I remember hearing about the Russian General."

Miss Penny threw back her head and laughed. Her long ear-rings swung and rattled—corpses hanging in chains; an agreeably literary simile. And her laughter was like brass, but that had been said before.

"That was an uproarious incident. It's sad you should have heard of it. I love my Russian General story. 'Vos yeux me rendent fou.'" She laughed again.

Vos yeux—she had eyes like a hare's, flush with her head and very bright with a superficial and expressionless brightness. What a formidable woman. I felt sorry for the Russian General.

"'Sans cœur et sans entrailles,'" she went on quoting the poor devil's words. "Such a delightful motto, don't you think? Like 'Sans peur et sans reproche.' But let me think; what have I been doing since then?" Thoughtfully she bit into the crust of her bread with long, sharp, white teeth.

"Two mixed grills," I said parenthetically to the waiter.

"But of course," exclaimed Miss Penny suddenly. "I haven't seen you since my German trip. All sorts of adventures. My appendicitis; my nun."

"Your nun?"

"My marvellous nun. I must tell you all about her."

"Do." Miss Penny's anecdotes were always curious. I looked forward to an entertaining luncheon.

"You knew I'd been in Germany this autumn?"

"Well, I didn't, as a matter of fact. But still——"

"I was just wandering round." Miss Penny described a circle in the air with her gaudily jewelled hand. She always twinkled with massive and improbable jewellery. "Wandering round, living on three pounds a week, partly amusing myself, partly collecting material for a few little articles. 'What it Feels Like to be a Conquered Nation'—sob-stuff for the Liberal press, you know—and 'How the Hun is Trying to Wriggle out of the Indemnity,' for the other fellows. One has to make the best of all possible worlds, don't you find? But we mustn't talk shop. Well, I was wandering round, and very pleasant I found it. Berlin, Dresden, Leipzig. Then down to Munich and all over the place. One fine day I got to Grauburg. You know Grauburg? It's one of those picture-book German towns with a castle on a hill, hanging beer-gardens, a Gothic church, an old university, a river, a pretty bridge, and forests all round. Charming. But I hadn't much opportunity to appreciate the beauties of the place. The day after I arrived there—bang!—I went down with appendicitis—screaming, I may add."

"But how appalling!"

"They whisked me off to hospital, and cut me open before you could say knife. Excellent surgeon, highly efficient Sisters of Charity to nurse me—I couldn't have been in better hands. But it was a bore being tied there by the leg for four weeks—a great bore. Still, the thing had its compensations. There was my nun, for example. Ah, here's the food, thank Heaven!"

The mixed grill proved to be excellent. Miss Penny's description of the nun came to me in scraps and snatches. A round, pink, pretty face in a winged coif; blue eyes and regular features; teeth altogether too perfect—false, in fact; but the general effect extremely pleasing. A youthful Teutonic twenty-eight.

"She wasn't my nurse," Miss Penny explained. "But I used to see her quite often when she came in to have a look at the tolle Engländerin. Her name was Sister Agatha. During the war, they told me, she had converted any number of wounded soldiers to the true faith—which wasn't surprising, considering how pretty she was."

"Did she try and convert you?" I asked.

"She wasn't such a fool." Miss Penny laughed, and rattled the miniature gallows of her ears.

I amused myself for a moment with the thought of Miss Penny's conversion—Miss Penny confronting a vast assembly of Fathers of the Church, rattling her earrings at their discourses on the Trinity, laughing her appalling laugh at the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, meeting the stern look of the Grand Inquisitor with a flash of her bright, emotionless hare's eyes. What was the secret of the woman's formidableness?

But I was missing the story. What had happened? Ah yes, the gist of it was that Sister Agatha had appeared one morning, after two or three days' absence, dressed, not as a nun, but in the overalls of a hospital charwoman, with a handkerchief instead of a winged coif on her shaven head.

"Dead," said Miss Penny; "she looked as though she were dead. A walking corpse, that's what she was. It was a shocking sight. I shouldn't have thought it possible for anyone to change so much in so short a time. She walked painfully, as though she had been ill for months, and she had great burnt rings round her eyes and deep lines in her face. And the general expression of unhappiness—that was something quite appalling."

She leaned out into the gangway between the two rows of tables, and caught the passing waiter by the end of one of his coat-tails. The little Italian looked round with an expression of surprise that deepened into terror on his face.

"Half a pint of Guinness," ordered Miss Penny. "And, after this, bring me some jam roll."

"No jam roll to-day, madam."

"Damn!" said Miss Penny. "Bring me what you like, then."

She let go of the waiter's tail and resumed her narrative.

"Where was I? Yes, I remember. She came into my room, I was telling you, with a bucket of water and a brush, dressed like a charwoman. Naturally I was rather surprised. 'What on earth are you doing, Sister Agatha?' I asked. No answer. She just shook her head, and began to scrub the floor. When she'd finished, she left the room without so much as looking at me again. 'What's happened to Sister Agatha?' I asked my nurse when she next came in. 'Can't say.'—'Won't say,' I said. No answer. It took nearly a week to find out what really had happened. Nobody dared tell me; it was strengst verboten, as they used to say in the good old days. But I wormed it out in the long run. My nurse, the doctor, the charwomen—I got something out of all of them. I always get what I want in the end." Miss Penny laughed like a horse.

"I'm sure you do," I said politely.

"Much obliged," acknowledged Miss Penny. "But to proceed. My information came to me in fragmentary whispers. 'Sister Agatha ran away with a man.'—Dear me!—'One of the patients.'—You don't say so.—'A criminal out of the jail.'—The plot thickens.—'He ran away from her.'—It seems to grow thinner again.—'They brought her back here; she's been disgraced. There's been a funeral service for her in the chapel—coffin and all. She had to be present at it—her own funeral. She isn't a nun any more. She has to do charwoman's work now, the roughest in the hospital. She's not allowed to speak to anybody, and nobody's allowed to speak to her. She's regarded as dead.' " Miss Penny paused to signal to the harassed little Italian. "My small 'Guinness,' " she called out.

"Coming, coming," and the foreign voice cried "Guinness" down the lift, and from below another voice echoed, "Guinness."

"I filled in the details bit by bit. There was our hero, to begin with; I had to bring him into the picture, which was rather difficult, as I had never seen him. But I got a photograph of him. The police circulated one when he got away; I don't suppose they ever caught him." Miss Penny opened her bag. "Here it is," she said. "I always carry it about with me; it's become a superstition. For years, I remember, I used to carry a little bit of heather tied up with string. Beautiful, isn't it? There's a sort of Renaissance look about it, don't you think? He was half-Italian, you know."

Italian. Ah, that explained it. I had been wondering how Bavaria could have produced this thin-faced creature with the big dark eyes, the finely modelled nose and chin, and the fleshy lips so royally and sensually curved.

"He's certainly very superb," I said, handing back the picture.

Miss Penny put it carefully away in her bag. "Isn't he?" she said. "Quite marvellous. But his character and his mind were even better. I see him as one of those innocent, childlike monsters of iniquity who are simply unaware of the existence of right and wrong. And he had genius—the real Italian genius for engineering, for dominating and exploiting nature. A true son of the Roman aqueduct builders he was, and a brother of the electrical engineers. Only Kuno—that was his name—didn't work in water; he worked in women. He knew how to harness the natural energy of passion; he made devotion drive his mills. The commercial exploitation of love-power, that was his specialty. I sometimes wonder," Miss Penny added in a different tone, "whether I shall ever be exploited, when I get a little more middle-aged and celibate, by one of these young engineers of the passions. It would be humiliating, particularly as I've done so little exploiting from my side."

She frowned and was silent for a moment. No, decidedly, Miss Penny was not beautiful; you could not even honestly say that she had charm or was attractive. That high Scotch colouring, those hare's eyes, the voice, the terrifying laugh, and the size of her, the general formidableness of the woman. No, no, no.

"You said he had been in prison," I said. The silence, with all its implications, was becoming embarrassing.

Miss Penny sighed, looked up, and nodded. "He was fool enough," she said, "to leave the straight and certain road of female exploitation for the dangerous courses of burglary. We all have our occasional accesses of folly. They gave him a heavy sentence, but he succeeded in getting pneumonia, I think it was, a week after entering jail. He was transferred to the hospital. Sister Agatha, with her known talent for saving souls, was given him as his particular attendant. But it was he, I'm afraid, who did the converting."

Miss Penny finished off the last mouthful of the ginger pudding which the waiter had brought in lieu of jam roll.

"I suppose you don't smoke cheroots," I said, as I opened my cigar-case.

"Well, as a matter of fact, I do," Miss Penny replied. She looked sharply round the restaurant. "I must just see if there are any of those horrible little gossip paragraphers here to-day. One doesn't want to figure in the social and personal column to-morrow morning: 'A fact which is not so generally known as it ought to be is, that Miss Penny, the well-known woman journalist, always ends her luncheon with a six-inch Burma cheroot. I saw her yesterday in a restaurant—not a hundred miles from Carmelite Street—smoking like a house on fire.' You know the touch. But the coast seems to be clear, thank goodness."

She took a cheroot from the case, lit it at my proffered match, and went on talking.

"Yes, it was young Kuno who did the converting. Sister Agatha was converted back into the worldly Melpomene Fugger she had been before she became the bride of holiness."

"Melpomene Fugger?"

"That was her name. I had her history from my old doctor. He had seen all Grauburg, living and dying and propagating, for generations. Melpomene Fugger—why, he had brought little Melpel into the world, little Melpchen. Her father was Professor Fugger, the great Professor Fugger, the berühmter Geolog. Oh, yes, of course, I know the name. So well . . . He was the man who wrote the standard work on Lemuria—you know, the hypothetical continent where the lemurs come from. I showed due respect. Liberal-minded he was, a disciple of Herder, a world-burgher, as they beautifully call it over there. Anglophile, too, and always ate porridge for breakfast—up till August 1914. Then, on the radiant morning of the fifth, he renounced it for ever, solemnly and with tears in his eyes. The national food of a people who had betrayed culture and civilisation—how could he go on eating it? It would stick in his throat. In future he would have a lightly boiled egg. He sounded, I thought, altogether charming. And his daughter, Melpomene—she sounded charming, too; and such thick, yellow pigtailed when she was young! Her mother was dead, and a sister of the great Professor's ruled the house with an iron rod. Aunt Bertha was her name. Well, Melpomene grew up, very plump and appetising. When she was seventeen, something very odious and disagreeable happened to her. Even the doctor didn't know exactly what it was; but he wouldn't have been surprised if it had had something to do with the then professor of Latin, an old friend of the family's, who combined, it seems, great erudition with a horrid fondness for very young ladies."

Miss Penny knocked half an inch of cigar ash into her empty glass.

"If I wrote short stories," she went on reflectively "(but it's too much bother), I should make this anecdote into a sort of potted life history, beginning with a scene immediately after this disagreeable event in Melpomene's life. I see the scene so clearly. Poor little Melpel is leaning over the bastions of Grauburg Castle, weeping into the June night and the mulberry trees in the garden thirty feet below. She is besieged by the memory of what happened this dreadful afternoon. Professor Engelmann, her father's old friend, with the magnificent red Assyrian beard . . . Too awful—too awful! But then, as I was saying, short stories are really too much bother; or perhaps I'm too stupid to write them. I bequeath it to you. You know how to tick these things off."

"You're generous."

"Not at all," said Miss Penny. "My terms are ten per cent commission on the American sale. Incidentally there won't be an American sale. Poor Melpchen's history is not for the chaste public of Those States. But let me hear what you propose to do with Melpomene now you've got her on the castle bastions."

"That's simple," I said. "I know all about German university towns and castles on hills. I shall make her look into the June night, as you suggest; into the violet night with its points of golden flame. There will be the black silhouette of the castle, with its sharp roofs and hooded turrets, behind her. From the hanging beer-gardens in the town below the voices of the students, singing in perfect four-part harmony, will float up through the dark-blue spaces. "Röslein, Röslein, Röslein rot' and 'Das Ringlein sprang in zwei'—the heart-rendingly sweet old songs will make her cry all the more. Her tears will patter like rain among the leaves of the mulberry trees in the garden below. Does that seem to you adequate?"

"Very nice," said Miss Penny. "But how are you going to bring the sex problem and all its horrors into your landscape?"

"Well, let me think." I called to memory those distant foreign summers when I was completing my education. "I know I shall suddenly bring a swarm of moving candles and Chinese lanterns under the mulberry trees. You imagine the rich lights and shadows, the jewel-bright leafage, the faces and moving limbs of men and women, seen for an instant and gone again. They are students and girls of the town come out to dance, this windless, blue June night, under the mulberry trees. And now they begin, thumping round and round in a ring, to the music of their own singing:

"Wir können spielen
Vio-vio-vio-lin,
Wir können spielen
Vi-o-lin.

Now the rhythm changes, quickens:

"Und wir können tanzen Bumstarara,
Bumstarara, Bumstarara,
Und wir können tanzen Bumstarara,
Bumstarara-rara.

The dance becomes a rush, an elephantine prancing on the dry lawn under the mulberry trees. And from the bastion Melpomene looks down and perceives, suddenly and apocalyptically, that everything in the world is sex, sex, sex. Men and women, male and female—always the same, and all, in the light of the horror of the afternoon, disgusting. That's how I should do it, Miss Penny."

"And very nice, too. But I wish you could find a place to bring in my conversation with the doctor. I shall never forget the way he cleared his throat, and coughed before embarking on the delicate subject. 'You may know, ahem, gracious Miss,' he began—'you may know that religious phenomena are often, ahem, closely connected with sexual causes.' I replied that I had heard rumours which might justify me in believing this to be true among Roman Catholics, but that in the Church of England—and I for one was a practitioner of Anglicanism—it was very different. That might be, said the doctor; he had had no opportunity in the course of his long medical career of personally studying Anglicanism. But he could vouch for the fact that among his patients, here in Grauburg, mysticism was very often mixed up with the Geschlechtsleben. Melpomene was a case in point. After that hateful afternoon she had become extremely religious; the Professor of Latin had diverted her emotions out of their normal channels. She rebelled against the placid Agnosticismus of her father, and at night, in secret, when Aunt Bertha's dragon eyes were closed, she would read such forbidden books as The Life of St. Theresa, The Little Flowers of St. Francis, The Imitation of Christ, and the horribly enthralling Book of Martyrs. Aunt Bertha confiscated these works whenever she came upon them; she considered them more pernicious than the novels of Marcel Prévost. The character of a good potential housewife might be completely undermined by reading of this kind. It was rather a relief for Melpomene when Aunt Bertha shuffled off, in the summer of 1911, this mortal coil. She was one of those indispensables of whom one makes the discovery, when they are gone, that one can get on quite as well without them. Poor Aunt Bertha!"

"One can imagine Melpomene trying to believe she was sorry, and horribly ashamed to find that she was really, in secret, almost glad." The suggestion seemed to me ingenious, but Miss Penny accepted it as obvious.

"Precisely," she said; "and the emotion would only further confirm and give new force to the tendencies which her aunt's death left her free to indulge as much as she liked. Remorse, contrition—they would lead to the idea of doing penance. And for one who was now wallowing in the martyrology, penance was the mortification of the flesh. She used to kneel for hours, at night, in the cold; she ate too little, and when her teeth ached, which they often did,—for she had a set, the doctor told me, which had given trouble from the very first,—she would not go and see the dentist, but lay awake at night, savouring to the full her excruciations, and feeling triumphantly that they must, in some strange way, be pleasing to the Mysterious Powers. She went on like that for two or three years, till she was poisoned through and through. In the end she went down with gastric ulcer. It was three months before she came out of hospital, well for the first time in a long space of years, and with a brand new set of imperishable teeth, all gold and ivory. And in mind, too, she was changed—for the better, I suppose. The nuns who nursed her had made her see that in mortifying herself she had acted supererogatively and through spiritual pride; instead of doing right, she had sinned. The only road to salvation, they told her, lay in discipline, in the orderliness of established religion, in obedience to authority. Secretly, so as not to distress her poor father, whose Agnosticism was extremely dogmatic, for all its unobtrusiveness, Melpomene became a Roman Catholic. She was twenty-two. Only a few months later came the war and Professor Fugger's eternal renunciation of porridge. He did not long survive the making of that patriotic gesture. In the autumn of 1914 he caught a fatal influenza. Melpomene was alone in the world. In the spring of 1915 there was a new and very conscientious Sister of Charity at work among the wounded in the hospital of Grauburg. Here," explained Miss Penny, jabbing the air with her forefinger, "you put a line of asterisks or dots to signify a six years' gulf in the narrative. And you begin again right in the middle of a dialogue between Sister Agatha and the newly convalescent Kuno."

"What's their dialogue to be about?" I asked.

"Oh, that's easy enough," said Miss Penny. "Almost anything would do. What about this, for example? You explain that the fever has just abated; for the first time for days the young man is fully conscious. He feels himself to be well, reborn, as it were, in a new world—a world so bright and novel and jolly that he can't help laughing at the sight of it. He looks about him; the flies on the ceiling strike him as being extremely comic. How do they manage to walk upside down? They have suckers on their feet, says Sister Agatha, and wonders if her natural history is quite sound. Suckers on their feet—ha, ha! What an uproarious notion! Suckers on their feet—that's good, that's damned good! You can say charming, pathetic, positively tender things about the irrelevant mirth of convalescents—the more so in this particular case, where the mirth is expressed by a young man who is to be taken back to jail as soon as he can stand firmly on his legs. Ha, ha! Laugh on, unhappy boy! It is the quacking of the Fates, the Parcæ, the Norns!"

Miss Penny gave an exaggerated imitation of her own brassy laughter. At the sound of it the few lunchers who still lingered at the other tables looked up, startled.

"You can write pages about Destiny and its ironic quacking. It's tremendously impressive, and there's money in every line."

"You may be sure I shall."

"Good! Then I can get on with my story. The days pass and the first hilarity of convalescence fades away. The young man remembers and grows sullen; his strength comes back to him, and with it a sense of despair. His mind broods incessantly on the hateful future. As for the consolations of religion, he won't listen to them. Sister Agatha perseveres—oh, with what anxious solicitude!—in the attempt to make him understand and believe and be comforted. It is all so tremendously important, and in this case, somehow, more important than in any other. And now you see the Geschlechtsleben working yeastily and obscurely, and once again the quacking of the Norns is audible. By the way," said Miss Penny, changing her tone and leaning confidentially across the table, "I wish you'd tell me something. Tell me, do you really—honestly, I mean—do you seriously believe in literature?"

"Believe in literature?"

"I was thinking," Miss Penny explained, "of Irony and the quacking of the Norns and all that."

"M yes."

"And then there's this psychology and introspection business; and construction and good narrative and word pictures and le mot juste and verbal magic and striking metaphors."

I remembered that I had compared Miss Penny's tinkling ear-rings to skeletons hanging in chains.

"And then, finally, and to begin with—Alpha and Omega—there's ourselves: two professionals gloating, with an absolute lack of sympathy, over a seduced nun, and speculating on the best method of turning her misfortunes into cash. It's all very curious, isn't it?—when one begins to think about it dispassionately."

"Very curious," I agreed. "But, then, so is everything else if you look at it like that."

"No, no," said Miss Penny. "Nothing's so curious as our business. But I shall never get to the end of my story if I get started on first principles."

Miss Penny continued her narrative. I was still thinking of literature. Do you believe in it? Seriously? Ah! Luckily the question was quite meaningless. The story came to me rather vaguely, but it seemed that the young man was getting better; in a few more days, the doctor had said, he would be well—well enough to go back to jail. No, no. The question was meaningless. I would think about it no more. I concentrated my attention again.

"Sister Agatha," I heard Miss Penny saying, "prayed, exhorted, indoctrinated. Whenever she had half a minute to spare from her other duties she would come running into the young man's room. 'I wonder if you fully realise the importance of prayer?' she would ask, and, before he had time to answer, she would give him a breathless account of the uses and virtues of regular and patient supplication. Or else, it was: 'May I tell you about St. Theresa?' or 'St. Stephen, the first martyr—you know about him, don't you?' Kuno simply wouldn't listen at first. It seemed so fantastically irrelevant, such an absurd interruption to his thoughts, his serious, despairing thoughts about the future. Prison was real, imminent and this woman buzzed about him with her ridiculous fairy-tales. Then, suddenly, one day he began to listen, he showed signs of contrition and conversion. Sister Agatha announced her triumph to the other nuns, and there was rejoicing over the one lost sheep. Melpomene had never felt so happy in her life, and Kuno, looking at her radiant face, must have wondered how he could have been such a fool as not to see from the first what was now so obvious. The woman had lost her head about him. And he had only four days now—four days in which to tap the tumultuous love power, to canalise it, to set it working for his escape. Why hadn't he started a week ago? He could have made certain of it then. But now? There was no knowing. Four days was a horribly short time."

"How did he do it?" I asked, for Miss Penny had paused.

"That's for you to say," she replied, and shook her ear-rings at me. "I don't know. Nobody knows, I imagine, except the two parties concerned and perhaps Sister Agatha's confessor. But one can reconstruct the crime, as they say. How would you have done it? You're a man, you ought to be familiar with the processes of amorous engineering."

"You flatter me," I answered. "Do you seriously suppose——" I extended my arms. Miss Penny laughed like a horse. "No. But, seriously, it's a problem. The case is a very special one. The person, a nun; the place, a hospital; the opportunities, few. There could be no favourable circumstances—no moonlight, no distant music; and any form of direct attack would be sure to fail. That audacious confidence which is your amorist's best weapon would be useless here."

"Obviously," said Miss Penny. "But there are surely other methods. There is the approach through pity and the maternal instincts. And there's the approach through Higher Things, through the soul. Kuno must have worked on those lines, don't you think? One can imagine him letting himself be converted, praying with her, and at the same time appealing for her sympathy and even threatening—with a great air of seriousness—to kill himself rather than go back to jail. You can write that up easily and convincingly enough. But it's the sort of thing that bores me so frightfully to do. That's why I can never bring myself to write fiction. What is the point of it all? And the way you literary men think yourselves so important—particularly if you write tragedies. It's all very queer, very queer indeed."

I made no comment. Miss Penny changed her tone and went on with the narrative.

"Well," she said, "whatever the means employed, the engineering process was perfectly successful. Love was made to find out a way. On the afternoon before Kuno was to go back to prison, two Sisters of Charity walked out of the hospital gates, crossed the square in front of it, glided down the narrow streets towards the river, boarded a tram at the bridge, and did not descend till the car had reached its terminus in the farther suburbs. They began to walk briskly along the high road out into the country. 'Look!' said one of them, when they were clear of the houses; and with the gesture of a conjurer produced from nowhere a red leather purse. 'Where did it come from?' asked the other, opening her eyes. Memories of Elisha and the ravens, of the widow's cruse, of the loaves and fishes, must have floated through the radiant fog in poor Melpomene's mind. 'The old lady I was sitting next to in the tram left her bag open. Nothing could have been simpler.' 'Kuno! You don't mean to say you stole it?' Kuno swore horribly. He had opened the purse. 'Only sixty marks. Who'd have thought that an old camel, all dressed up in silk and furs, would only have sixty marks in her purse. And I must have a thousand at least to get away.' It's easy to reconstruct the rest of the conversation down to the inevitable, 'For God's sake, shut up,' with which Kuno put an end to Melpomene's dismayed moralising. They trudge on in silence. Kuno thinks desperately. Only sixty marks; he can do nothing with that. If only he had something to sell, a piece of jewellery, some gold or silver—anything, anything. He knows such a good place for selling things. Is he to be caught again for lack of a few marks? Melpomene is also thinking. Evil must often be done that good may follow. After all, had not she herself stolen Sister Mary of the Purification's clothes when she was asleep after night duty? Had not she run away from the convent, broken her vows? And yet how convinced she was that she was doing rightly! The mysterious Powers emphatically approved; she felt sure of it. And now there was the red purse. But what was a red purse in comparison with a saved soul—and, after all, what was she doing but saving Kuno's soul?" Miss Penny, who had adopted the voice and gestures of a debater asking rhetorical questions, brought her hand with a slap on to the table. "Lord, what a bore this sort of stuff is!" she exclaimed. "Let's get to the end of this dingy anecdote as quickly as possible. By this time, you must imagine, the shades of night were falling fast—the chill November twilight, and so on; but I leave the natural descriptions to you. Kuno gets into the ditch at the roadside and takes off his robes. One imagines that he would feel himself safer in trousers, more capable of acting with decision in a crisis. They tramp on for miles. Late in the evening they leave the high road and strike up through the fields towards the forest. At the fringe of the wood they find one of those wheeled huts where the shepherds sleep in the lambing season.

"The real 'Maison du Berger.'"

"Precisely," said Miss Penny, and she began to recite:

"Si ton coeur gémissant du poids de notre vie Se traîne et se débat comme un aigle blessé. . . ."

How does it go on? I used to adore it all so much when I was a girl:

*"Le seuil est parfumé, l'alcôve est large et sombre,
Et là parmi les fleurs, nous trouverons dans l'ombre,
Pour nos cheveux unis un lit silencieux."*

I could go on like this indefinitely."

"Do," I said.

"No, no. No, no. I'm determined to finish this wretched story. Kuno broke the padlock of the door. They entered. What happened in that little hut?" Miss Penny leaned forward at me. Her large hare's eyes glittered, the long ear-rings swung and faintly tinkled. "Imagine the emotions of a virgin of thirty, and a nun at that, in the terrifying presence of desire. Imagine the easy, familiar brutalities of the young man. Oh, there's pages to be made out of this—the absolutely impenetrable darkness, the smell of straw, the voices, the strangled crying, the movements! And one likes to fancy that the emotions pulsing about in that confined space made palpable vibrations like a deep sound that shakes the air. Why, it's ready-made literature, this scene. In the morning," Miss Penny went on, after a pause, "two woodcutters on their way to work noticed that the door of the hut was ajar. They approached the hut cautiously, their axes raised and ready for a blow if there should be need of it. Peeping in, they saw a woman in a black dress lying face downward in the straw. Dead? No; she moved, she moaned. 'What's the matter?' A blubbered face, smeared with streaks of tear-clotted grey dust, it lifted towards them. 'What's the matter?'—'He's gone!' What a queer, indistinct utterance. The woodcutters regard one another. What does she say? She's a foreigner, perhaps. 'What's the matter?' they repeat once more. The woman bursts out violently crying. 'Gone, gone! He's gone,' she sobs out in her vague, inarticulate way. 'Oh, gone.' That's what she says.

'Who's gone?'—'He's left me.'—'What?'—'Left me . . .'—'What the devil . . . ? Speak a little more distinctly.'—'I can't,' she wails; 'he's taken my teeth.'—'Your what?'—'My teeth!'—and the shrill voice breaks into a scream, and she falls back sobbing into the straw. The woodcutters look significantly at one another. They nod. One of them applies a thick yellow-nailed forefinger to his forehead."

Miss Penny looked at her watch.

"Good heavens!" she said, "it's nearly half-past three. I must fly. Don't forget about the funeral service," she added, as she put on her coat. "The tapers, the black coffin in the middle of the aisle, the nuns in their white-winged coifs, the gloomy chanting, and the poor cowering creature without any teeth, her face all caved in like an old woman's, wondering whether she wasn't really and in fact dead—wondering whether she wasn't already in hell. Good-bye."

THE RICH BOY

F. Scott Fitzgerald

(1896— )

BEGIN WITH AN INDIVIDUAL, and before you know it you find that you have created a type; begin with a type, and you find that you have created—nothing. That is because we are all queer fish, queerer behind our faces and voices than we want any one to know or than we know ourselves. When I hear a man proclaiming himself an "average, honest, open fellow," I feel pretty sure that he has some definite and perhaps terrible abnormality which he has agreed to conceal—and his protestation of being average and honest and open is his way of reminding himself of his misprision.

There are no types, no plurals. There is a rich boy, and this is his and not his brothers' story. All my life I have lived among his brothers but this one has been my friend. Besides, if I wrote about his brothers I should have to begin by attacking all the lies that the poor have told about the rich and the rich have told about themselves—such a wild structure they have erected that when we pick up a book about the rich, some instinct prepares us for unreality. Even the intelligent and impassioned reporters of life have made the country of the rich as unreal as fairy-land.

Let me tell you about the very rich. They are different from you and me. They possess and enjoy early, and it does something to them, makes them soft where we are hard, and cynical where we are trustful, in a way that unless you were born rich, it is very difficult to understand. They think, deep in their hearts, that they are better than we are because we had to discover the compensations and refuges of life for ourselves. Even when they enter deep into our world or sink below us, they still think that they are better than we are. They are different. The only way I can describe young Anson Hunter is to approach him as if he were a foreigner and cling stubbornly to my point of view. If I accept his for a moment I am lost—I have nothing to show but a preposterous movie.

II

Anson was the eldest of six children who would some day divide a fortune of fifteen million dollars, and he reached the age of reason—is it seven?—at the beginning of the century when daring young women were already gliding along Fifth Avenue in electric “mobiles.” In those days he and his brother had an English governess who spoke the language very clearly and crisply and well, so that the two boys grew to speak as she did—their words and sentences were all crisp and clear and not run together as ours are. They didn’t talk exactly like English children but acquired an accent that is peculiar to fashionable people in the city of New York.

In the summer the six children were moved from the house on 71st Street to a big estate in Northern Connecticut. It was not a fashionable locality—Anson’s father wanted to delay as long as possible his children’s knowledge of that side of life. He was a man somewhat superior to his class, which composed New York society, and to his period, which was the snobbish and formalized vulgarity of the Gilded Age, and he wanted his sons to learn habits of concentration and have sound constitutions and grow up into right-living and successful men. He and his wife kept an eye on them as well as they were able until the two older boys went away to school, but in huge establishments this is difficult—it was much simpler in the series of small and medium-sized houses in which my own youth was spent—I was never far out of the reach of my mother’s voice, of the sense of her presence, her approval or disapproval.

Anson’s first sense of his superiority came to him when he realized the half-grudging American deference that was paid to him in the Connecticut village. The parents of the boys he played with always inquired after his father and mother, and were vaguely excited when their own children were asked to the Hunters’ house. He accepted this as the natural state of things, and a sort of impatience with all groups of which he was not the center—in money, in position, in authority—remained with him for the rest of his life. He disdained to struggle with other boys for precedence—he expected it to be given him freely, and when it wasn’t he withdrew into his family. His family was sufficient, for in the East money is still a somewhat feudal thing, a clan-forming thing. In the snobbish West, money separates families to form "sets."

At eighteen, when he went to New Haven, Anson was tall and thick-set, with a clear complexion and a healthy color from the ordered life he had led in school. His hair was yellow and grew in a funny way on his head, his nose was beaked—these two things kept him from being handsome—but he had a confident charm and a certain brusque style, and the upper-class men who passed him on the street knew without being told that he was a rich boy and had gone to one of the best schools. Nevertheless, his very superiority kept him from being a success in college—the independence was mistaken for egotism, and the refusal to accept Yale standards with the proper awe seemed to belittle all those who had. So, long before he graduated, he began to shift the center of his life to New York.

He was at home in New York—there was his own house with "the kind of servants you can't get any more"—and his own family, of which, because of his good humor and a certain ability to make things go, he was rapidly becoming the center, and the débutante parties, and the correct manly world of the men's clubs, and the occasional wild spree with the gallant girls whom New Haven only knew from the fifth row. His aspirations were conventional enough—they included even the irreproachable shadow he would some day marry, but they differed from the aspirations of the majority of young men in that there was no mist over them, none of that quality which is variously known as "idealism" or "illusion." Anson accepted without reservation the world of high finance and high extravagance, of divorce and dissipation, of snobbery and of privilege. Most of our lives end as a compromise—it was as a compromise that his life began.

He and I first met in the late summer of 1917 when he was just out of Yale, and, like the rest of us, was swept up into the systematized hysteria of the war. In the blue-green uniform of the naval aviation he came down to Pensacola, where the hotel orchestras played "I'm Sorry, Dear," and we young officers danced with the girls. Everyone liked him, and though he ran with the drinkers and wasn't an especially good pilot, even the instructors treated him with a certain respect. He was always having long talks with them in his confident, logical voice—talks which ended by his getting himself, or, more frequently, another young officer, out of some impending trouble. He was convivial, bawdy, robustly avid for pleasure, and we were all surprised when he fell in love with a conservative and rather proper girl.

Her name was Paula Legendre, a dark, serious beauty from somewhere in California. Her family kept a winter residence just outside of town, and in spite of her primness she was enormously popular; there is a large class of men whose egotism can't endure humor in a woman. But Anson wasn't that sort, and I couldn't understand the attraction of her "sincerity"—that was the thing to say about her—for his keen and somewhat sardonic mind.

Nevertheless, they fell in love—and on her terms. He no longer joined the twilight gathering at the De Sota bar, and whenever they were seen together they were engaged in a long, serious dialogue, which must have gone on several weeks. Long afterward he told me that it was not about anything in particular but was composed on both sides of immature and even meaningless statements—the emotional content that gradually came to fill it grew up not out of the words but out of its enormous seriousness. It was a sort of hypnosis. Often it was interrupted, giving way to that emasculated humor we call fun; when they were alone it was resumed again, solemn, low-keyed, and pitched so as to give each other a sense of unity in feeling and thought. They came to resent any interruptions of it, to be unresponsive to facetiousness about life, even to the mild cynicism of their contemporaries. They were only happy when the dialogue was going on, and its seriousness bathed them like the amber glow of an open fire. Toward the end there came an interruption they did not resent—it began to be interrupted by passion.

Oddly enough, Anson was as engrossed in the dialogue as she was and as profoundly affected by it, yet at the same time aware that on his side much was insincere, and on hers much was merely simple. At first, too, he despised her emotional simplicity as well, but with his love her nature deepened and blossomed, and he could despise it no longer. He felt that if he could enter into Paula's warm safe life he would be happy. The long preparation of the dialogue removed any constraint—he taught her some of what he had learned from more adventurous women, and she responded with a rapt holy intensity. One evening after a dance they agreed to marry, and he wrote a long letter about her to his mother. The next day Paula told him that she was rich, that she had a personal fortune of nearly a million dollars.

III

It was exactly as if they could say "Neither of us has anything: we shall be poor together"—just as delightful that they should be rich instead. It gave them the same communion of adventure. Yet when Anson got leave in April, and Paula and her mother accompanied him North, she was impressed with the standing of his family in New York and with the scale on which they lived. Alone with Anson for the first time in the rooms where he had played as a boy, she was filled with a comfortable emotion, as though she were pre-eminently safe and taken care of. The pictures of Anson in a skull cap at his first school, of Anson on horseback with the sweetheart of a mysterious forgotten summer, of Anson in a gay group of ushers and bridesmaids at a wedding, made her jealous of his life apart from her in the past, and so completely did his authoritative person seem to sum up and typify these possessions of his that she was inspired with the idea of being married immediately and returning to Pensacola as his wife.

But an immediate marriage wasn't discussed—even the engagement was to be secret until after the war. When she realized that only two days of his leave remained, her dissatisfaction crystallized in the intention of making him as unwilling to wait as she was. They were driving to the country for dinner and she determined to force the issue that night.

Now a cousin of Paula's was staying with them at the Ritz, a severe, bitter girl who loved Paula but was somewhat jealous of her impressive engagement, and as Paula was late in dressing, the cousin, who wasn't going to the party, received Anson in the parlor of the suite.

Anson had met friends at five o'clock and drunk freely and indiscreetly with them for an hour. He left the Yale Club at a proper time, and his mother's chauffeur drove him to the Ritz, but his usual capacity was not in evidence, and the impact of the steam-heated sitting-room made him suddenly dizzy. He knew it, and he was both amused and sorry.

Paula's cousin was twenty-five but she was exceptionally naïve, and at first failed to realize what was up. She had never met Anson before, and she was surprised when he mumbled strange information and nearly fell off his chair, but until Paula appeared it didn't occur to her that what she had taken for the odor of a dry-cleaned uniform was really whisky. But Paula understood as soon as she appeared; her only thought was to get Anson away before her mother saw him, and at the look in her eyes the cousin understood too.

When Paula and Anson descended to the limousine they found two men inside, both asleep; they were the men with whom he had been drinking at the Yale Club, and they were also going to the party. He had entirely forgotten their presence in the car. On the way to Hempstead they awoke and sang. Some of the songs were rough, and though Paula tried to reconcile herself to the fact that Anson had few verbal inhibitions, her lips tightened with shame and distaste.

Back at the hotel the cousin, confused and agitated, considered the incident, and then walked into Mrs. Legendre's bedroom, saying: "Isn't he funny?"

"Who is funny?"

"Why—Mr. Hunter. He seemed so funny."

Mrs. Legendre looked at her sharply.

"How is he funny?"

"Why, he said he was French. I didn't know he was French."

"That's absurd. You must have misunderstood." She smiled: "It was a joke."

The cousin shook her head stubbornly.

"No. He said he was brought up in France. He said he couldn't speak any English, and that's why he couldn't talk to me. And he couldn't!"

Mrs. Legendre looked away with impatience just as the cousin added thoughtfully, "Perhaps it was because he was so drunk," and walked out of the room.

This curious report was true. Anson, finding his voice thick and uncontrollable, had taken the unusual refuge of announcing that he spoke no English. Years afterwards he used to tell that part of the story, and he invariably communicated the uproarious laughter which the memory aroused in him.

Five times in the next hour Mrs. Legendre tried to get Hempstead on the phone. When she succeeded, there was a ten-minute delay before she heard Paula's voice on the wire.

"Cousin Jo told me Anson was intoxicated."

"Oh, no. . . ."

"Oh, yes. Cousin Jo says he was intoxicated. He told her he was French, and fell off his chair and behaved as if he was very intoxicated. I don't want you to come home with him."

"Mother, he's all right! Please don't worry about——"

"But I do worry. I think it's dreadful. I want you to promise me not to come home with him."

"I'll take care of it, mother. . . ."

"I don't want you to come home with him."

"All right, mother. Good-by."

"Be sure now, Paula. Ask some one to bring you."

Deliberately Paula took the receiver from her ear and hung it up. Her face was flushed with helpless annoyance. Anson was stretched asleep out in a bedroom upstairs, while the dinner-party below was proceeding lamely toward conclusion.

The hour's drive had sobered him somewhat—his arrival was merely hilarious—and Paula hoped that the evening was not spoiled, after all, but two imprudent cocktails before dinner completed the disaster. He talked boisterously and somewhat offensively to the party at large for fifteen minutes, and then slid silently under the table; like a man in an old print—but, unlike an old print, it was rather horrible without being at all quaint. None of the young girls present remarked upon the incident—it seemed to merit only silence. His uncle and two other men carried him upstairs, and it was just after this that Paula was called to the phone.

An hour later Anson awoke in a fog of nervous agony, through which he perceived after a moment the figure of his uncle Robert standing by the door.

". . . I said are you better?"

"What?"

"Do you feel better, old man?"

"Terrible," said Anson.

"I'm going to try you on another bromo-seltzer. If you can hold it down, it'll do you good to sleep."

With an effort Anson slid his legs from the bed and stood up.

"I'm all right," he said dully.

"Take it easy."

"I thin' if you gave me a glassbrandy I could go down-stairs."

"Oh, no——"

"Yes, that's the only thin'. I'm all right now. . . . I suppose I'm in Dutch do' there."

"They know you're a little under the weather," said his uncle deprecatingly. "But don't worry about it. Schuyler didn't even get here. He passed away in the locker-room over at the Links."

Indifferent to any opinion, except Paula's, Anson was nevertheless determined to save the débris of the evening, but when after a cold bath he made his appearance most of the party had already left. Paula got up immediately to go home.

In the limousine the old serious dialogue began. She had known that he drank, she admitted, but she had never expected anything like this—it seemed to her that perhaps they were not suited to each other, after all. Their ideas about life were too different, and so forth. When she finished speaking, Anson spoke in turn, very soberly. Then Paula said she'd have to think it over; she wouldn't decide tonight; she was not angry but she was terribly sorry. Nor would she let him come into the hotel with her, but just before she got out of the car she leaned and kissed him unhappily on the cheek.

The next afternoon Anson had a long talk with Mrs. Legendre while Paula sat listening in silence. It was agreed that Paula was to brood over the incident for a proper period and then, if mother and daughter thought it best, they would follow Anson to Pensacola. On his part he apologized with sincerity and dignity—that was all; with every card in her hand Mrs. Legendre was unable to establish any advantage over him. He made no promises, showed no humility, only delivered a few serious comments on life which brought him off with rather a moral superiority at the end. When they came South three weeks later, neither Anson in his satisfaction nor Paula in her relief at the reunion realized that the psychological moment had passed forever.

IV

He dominated and attracted her, and at the same time filled her with anxiety. Confused by his mixture of solidity and self-indulgence, of sentiment and cynicism—incongruities which her gentle mind was unable to resolve—Paula grew to think of him as two alternating personalities. When she saw him alone, or at a formal party, or with his casual inferiors, she felt a tremendous pride in his strong, attractive presence, the paternal, understanding stature of his mind. In other company she became uneasy when what had been a fine imperviousness to mere gentility showed its other face. The other face was gross, humorous, reckless of everything but pleasure. It startled her mind temporarily away from him, even led her into a short covert experiment with an old beau, but it was no use—after four months of Anson's enveloping vitality there was an anæmic pallor in all other men.

In July he was ordered abroad, and their tenderness and desire reached a crescendo. Paula considered a last-minute marriage—decided against it only because there were always cocktails on his breath now, but the parting itself made her physically ill with grief. After his departure she wrote him long letters of regret for the days of love they had missed by waiting. In August Anson's plane slipped down into the North Sea. He was pulled onto a destroyer after a night in the water and sent to hospital with pneumonia; the armistice was signed before he was finally sent home.

Then, with every opportunity given back to them, with no material obstacle to overcome, the secret weavings of their temperaments came between them, drying up their kisses and their tears, making their voices less loud to one another, muffling the intimate chatter of their hearts until the old communication was only possible by letters, from far away. One afternoon a society reporter waited for two hours in the Hunters' house for a confirmation of their engagement. Anson denied it; nevertheless an early issue carried the report as a leading paragraph—they were "constantly seen together at Southampton, Hot Springs, and Tuxedo Park." But the serious dialogue had turned a corner into a long-sustained quarrel, and the affair was almost played out. Anson got drunk flagrantly and missed an engagement with her, whereupon Paula made certain behavioristic demands. His despair was helpless before his pride and his knowledge of himself: the engagement was definitely broken.

"Dearest," said their letters now, "Dearest, Dearest, when I wake up in the middle of the night and realize that after all it was not to be, I feel that I want to die. I can't go on living any more. Perhaps when we meet this summer we may talk things over and decide differently—we were so excited and sad that day, and I don't feel that I can live all my life without you. You speak of other people. Don't you know there are no other people for me, but only you. . . ."

But as Paula drifted here and there around the East she would sometimes mention her gayeties to make him wonder. Anson was too acute to wonder. When he saw a man's name in her letters he felt more sure of her and a little disdainful—he was always superior to such things. But he still hoped that they would some day marry.

Meanwhile he plunged vigorously into all the movement and glitter of post-bellum New York, entering a brokerage house, joining half a dozen clubs, dancing late, and moving in three worlds—his own world, the world of young Yale graduates, and that section of the half-world which rests one end on Broadway. But there was always a thorough and infractible eight hours voted to his work in Wall Street, where the combination of his influential family connection, his sharp intelligence, and his abundance of sheer physical energy brought him almost immediately forward. He had one of those invaluable minds with partitions in it; sometimes he appeared at his office refreshed by less than an hour's sleep, but such occurrences were rare. So early as 1920 his income in salary and commissions exceeded twelve thousand dollars.

As the Yale tradition slipped into the past he became more and more of a popular figure among his classmates in New York, more popular than he had ever been in college. He lived in a great house, and had the means of introducing young men into other great houses. Moreover, his life already seemed secure, while theirs, for the most part, had arrived again at precarious beginnings. They commenced to turn to him for amusement and escape, and Anson responded readily, taking pleasure in helping people and arranging their affairs.

There were no men in Paula's letters now, but a note of tenderness ran through them that had not been there before. From several sources he heard that she had "a heavy beau," Lowell Thayer, a Bostonian of wealth and position, and though he was sure she still loved him, it made him uneasy to think that he might lose her, after all. Save for one unsatisfactory day she had not been in New York for almost five months, and as the rumors multiplied he became increasingly anxious to see her. In February he took his vacation and went down to Florida.

Palm Beach sprawled plump and opulent between the sparkling sapphire of Lake Worth, flawed here and there by house-boats at anchor, and the great turquoise bar of the Atlantic Ocean. The huge bulks of the Breakers and the Royal Poinciana rose as twin paunches from the bright level of the sand, and around them clustered the Dancing Glade, Bradley's House of Chance, and a dozen modistes and milliners with goods at triple prices from New York. Upon the trellised veranda of the Breakers two hundred women stepped right, stepped left, wheeled, and slid in that then celebrated calisthenic known as the double-shuffle, while in half-time to the music two thousand bracelets clicked up and down on two hundred arms.

At the Everglades Club after dark Paula and Lowell Thayer and Anson and a casual fourth played bridge with hot cards. It seemed to Anson that her kind, serious face was wan and tired—she had been around now for four, five, years. He had known her for three.

"Two spades."

"Cigarette? . . . Oh, I beg your pardon. By me."

"By."

"I'll double three spades."

There were a dozen tables of bridge in the room, which was filling up with smoke. Anson's eyes met Paula's, held them persistently even when Thayer's glance fell between them. . . .

"What was bid?" he asked abstractedly.

"Rose of Washington Square," sang the young people in the corners:

"I'm withering there
In basement air——"

The smoke banked like fog, and the opening of a door filled the room with blown swirls of ectoplasm. Little Bright Eyes streaked past the tables seeking Mr. Conan Doyle among the Englishmen who were posing as Englishmen about the lobby.

"You could cut it with a knife."

". . . cut it with a knife."

". . . a knife."

At the end of the rubber Paula suddenly got up and spoke to Anson in a tense, low voice. With scarcely a glance at Lowell Thayer, they walked out the door and descended a long flight of stone steps—in a moment they were walking hand in hand along the moonlit beach.

"Darling, darling. . . ." They embraced recklessly, passionately, in a shadow. . . . Then Paula drew back her face to let his lips say what she wanted to hear—she could feel the words forming as they kissed again. . . . Again she broke away, listening, but as he pulled her close once more she realized that he had said nothing—only "Darling! Darling!" in that deep, sad whisper that always made her cry. Humbly, obediently, her emotions yielded to him and the tears streamed down her face, but her heart kept on crying: "Ask me—oh, Anson, dearest, ask me!"

"Paula. . . . Paula!"

The words wrung her heart like hands, and Anson, feeling her tremble, knew that emotion was enough. He need say no more, commit their destinies to no practical enigma. Why should he, when he might hold her so, biding his own time, for another year—forever? He was considering them both, her more than himself. For a moment, when she said suddenly that she must go back to her hotel, he hesitated, thinking, first, "This is the moment, after all," and then: "No, let it wait—she is mine. . . ."

He had forgotten that Paula too was worn away inside with the strain of three years. Her mood passed forever in the night.

He went back to New York next morning filled with a certain restless dissatisfaction. Late in April, without warning, he received a telegram from Bar Harbor in which Paula told him that she was engaged to Lowell Thayer, and that they would be married immediately in Boston. What he never really believed could happen had happened at last.

Anson filled himself with whisky that morning, and going to the office, carried on his work without a break—rather with a fear of what would happen if he stopped. In the evening he went out as usual, saying nothing of what had occurred; he was cordial, humorous, unabstracted. But one thing he could not help—for three days, in any place, in any company, he would suddenly bend his head into his hands and cry like a child.

v

In 1922 when Anson went abroad with the junior partner to investigate some London loans, the journey intimated that he was to be taken into the firm. He was twenty-seven now, a little heavy without being definitely stout, and with a manner older than his years. Old people and young people liked him and trusted him, and mothers felt safe when their daughters were in his charge, for he had a way, when he came into a room, of putting himself on a footing with the oldest and most conservative people there. "You and I," he seemed to say, "we're solid. We understand."

He had an instinctive and rather charitable knowledge of the weaknesses of men and women, and, like a priest, it made him the more concerned for the maintenance of outward forms. It was typical of him that every Sunday morning he taught in a fashionable Episcopal Sunday-school—even though a cold shower and a quick change into a cut-away coat were all that separated him from the wild night before.

After his father's death he was the practical head of his family, and, in effect, guided the destinies of the younger children. Through a complication his authority did not extend to his father's estate, which was administered by his Uncle Robert, who was the horsy member of the family, a good-natured, hard-drinking member of that set which centers about Wheatley Hills.

Uncle Robert and his wife, Edna, had been great friends of Anson's youth, and the former was disappointed when his nephew's superiority failed to take a horsy form. He backed him for a city club which was the most difficult in America to enter—one could only join if one's family had "helped to build up New York" (or, in other words, were rich before 1880)—and when Anson, after his election, neglected it for the Yale Club, Uncle Robert gave him a little talk on the subject. But when on top of that Anson declined to enter Robert Hunter's own conservative and somewhat neglected brokerage house, his manner grew cooler. Like a primary teacher who has taught all he knew, he slipped out of Anson's life.

There were so many friends in Anson's life—scarcely one for whom he had not done some unusual kindness and scarcely one whom he did not occasionally embarrass by his bursts of rough conversation or his habit of getting drunk whenever and however he liked. It annoyed him when anyone else blundered in that regard—about his own lapses he was always humorous. Odd things happened to him and he told them with infectious laughter.

I was working in New York that spring, and I used to lunch with him at the Yale Club, which my university was sharing until the completion of our own. I had read of Paula's marriage, and one afternoon, when I asked him about her, something moved him to tell me the story. After that he frequently invited me to family dinners at his house and behaved as though there was a special relation between us, as though with his confidence a little of that consuming memory had passed into me.

I found that despite the trusting mothers, his attitude toward girls was not indiscriminately protective. It was up to the girl—if she showed an inclination toward looseness, she must take care of herself, even with him.

"Life," he would explain sometimes, "has made a cynic of me."

By life he meant Paula. Sometimes, especially when he was drinking, it became a little twisted in his mind, and he thought that she had callously thrown him over.

This "cynicism," or rather his realization that naturally fast girls were not worth sparing, led to his affair with Dolly Karger. It wasn't his only affair in those years, but it came nearest to touching him deeply, and it had a profound effect upon his attitude toward life.

Dolly was the daughter of a notorious "publicist" who had married into society. She herself grew up into the Junior League, came out at the Plaza, and went to the Assembly; and only a few old families like the Hunters could question whether or not she "belonged," for her picture was often in the papers, and she had more enviable attention than many girls who undoubtedly did. She was dark-haired, with carmine lips and a high, lovely color, which she concealed under pinkish-gray powder all through the first year out, because high color was unfashionable—Victorian-pale was the thing to be. She wore black, severe suits and stood with her hands in her pockets, leaning a little forward, with a humorous restraint on her face. She danced exquisitely—better than anything she liked to dance—better than anything except making love. Since she was ten she had always been in love, and, usually, with some boy who didn't respond to her. Those who did—and there were many—bored her after a brief encounter, but for her failures she reserved the warmest spot in her heart. When she met them she would always try once more—sometimes she succeeded, more often she failed.

It never occurred to this gypsy of the unattainable that there was a certain resemblance in those who refused to love her—they shared a hard intuition that saw through to her weakness, not a weakness of emotion but a weakness of rudder. Anson perceived this when he first met her, less than a month after Paula's marriage. He was drinking rather heavily, and he pretended for a week that he was falling in love with her. Then he dropped her abruptly and forgot—immediately he took up the commanding position in her heart.

Like so many girls of that day Dolly was slackly and indiscreetly wild. The unconventionality of a slightly older generation had been simply one facet of a post-war movement to discredit obsolete manners—Dolly's was both older and shabbier, and she saw in Anson the two extremes which the emotionally shiftless woman seeks, an abandon to indulgence alternating with a protective strength. In his character she felt both the sybarite and the solid rock, and these two satisfied every need of her nature.

She felt that it was going to be difficult, but she mistook the reason—she thought that Anson and his family expected a more spectacular marriage, but she guessed immediately that her advantage lay in his tendency to drink.

They met at the large débutante dances, but as her infatuation increased they managed to be more and more together. Like most mothers, Mrs. Karger believed that Anson was exceptionally reliable, so she allowed Dolly to go with him to distant country clubs and suburban houses without inquiring closely into their activities or questioning her explanations when they came in late. At first these explanations might have been accurate, but Dolly's worldly ideas of capturing Anson were soon engulfed in the rising sweep of her emotion. Kisses in the back of taxis and motor-cars were no longer enough; they did a curious thing:

They dropped out of their world for a while and made another world just beneath it where Anson's tipling and Dolly's irregular hours would be less noticed and commented on. It was composed, this world, of varying elements—several of Anson's Yale friends and their wives, two or three young brokers and bond salesmen and a handful of unattached men, fresh from college, with money and a propensity to dissipation. What this world lacked in spaciousness and scale it made up for by allowing them a liberty that it scarcely permitted itself. Moreover, it centered around them and permitted Dolly the pleasure of a faint condescension—a pleasure which Anson, whose whole life was a condescension from the certitudes of his childhood, was unable to share.

He was not in love with her, and in the long feverish winter of their affair he frequently told her so. In the spring he was weary—he wanted to renew his life at some other source—moreover, he saw that either he must break with her now or accept the responsibility of a definite seduction. Her family's encouraging attitude precipitated his decision—one evening when Mr. Karger knocked discreetly at the library door to announce that he had left a bottle of old brandy in the dining room, Anson felt that life was hemming him in. That night he wrote her a short letter in which he told her that he was going on his vacation, and that in view of all the circumstances they had better meet no more.

It was June. His family had closed up the house and gone to the country, so he was living temporarily at the Yale Club. I had heard about his affair with Dolly as it developed—accounts salted with humor, for he despised unstable women, and granted them no place in the social edifice in which he believed—and when he told me that night that he was definitely breaking with her I was glad. I had seen Dolly here and there, and each time with a feeling of pity at the hopelessness of her struggle, and of shame at knowing so much about her that I had no right to know. She was what is known as "a pretty little thing," but there was a certain recklessness which rather fascinated me. Her dedication to the goddess of waste would have been less obvious had she been less spirited—she would most certainly throw herself away, but I was glad when I heard that the sacrifice would not be consummated in my sight.

Anson was going to leave the letter of farewell at her house next morning. It was one of the few houses left open in the Fifth Avenue district, and he knew that the Kargers, acting upon erroneous information from Dolly, had foregone a trip abroad to give their daughter her chance. As he stepped out the door of the Yale Club into Madison Avenue the postman passed him, and he followed back inside. The first letter that caught his eye was in Dolly's hand.

He knew what it would be—a lonely and tragic monologue, full of the reproaches he knew, the invoked memories, the "I wonder if's"—all the immemorial intimacies that he had communicated to Paula Legendre in what seemed another age. Thumbing over some bills, he brought it on top again and opened it. To his surprise it was a short, somewhat formal note, which said that Dolly would be unable to go to the country with him for the week-end, because Perry Hull from Chicago had unexpectedly come to town. It added that Anson had brought this on himself: "—if I felt that you loved me as I love you I would go with you at any time, any place, but Perry is so nice, and he so much wants me to marry him——"

Anson smiled contemptuously—he had had experience with such decoy epistles. Moreover, he knew how Dolly had labored over this plan, probably sent for the faithful Perry and calculated the time of his arrival—even labored over the note so that it would make him jealous without driving him away. Like most compromises, it had neither force nor vitality but only a timorous despair.

Suddenly he was angry. He sat down in the lobby and read it again. Then he went to the phone, called Dolly and told her in his clear, compelling voice that he had received her note and would call for her at five o'clock as they had previously planned. Scarcely waiting for the pretended uncertainty of her "Perhaps I can see you for an hour," he hung up the receiver and went down to his office. On the way he tore his own letter into bits and dropped it in the street.

He was not jealous—she meant nothing to him—but at her pathetic ruse everything stubborn and self-indulgent in him came to the surface. It was a presumption from a mental inferior and it could not be overlooked. If she wanted to know to whom she belonged she would see.

He was on the door-step at quarter past five. Dolly was dressed for the street, and he listened in silence to the paragraph of "I can only see you for an hour," which she had begun on the phone.

"Put on your hat, Dolly," he said, "we'll take a walk."

They strolled up Madison Avenue and over to Fifth while Anson's shirt dampened upon his portly body in the deep heat. He talked little, scolding her, making no love to her, but before they had walked six blocks she was his again, apologizing for the note, offering not to see Perry at all as an atonement, offering anything. She thought that he had come because he was beginning to love her.

"I'm hot," he said when they reached 71st Street. "This is a winter suit. If I stop by the house and change, would you mind waiting for me downstairs? I'll only be a minute."

She was happy; the intimacy of his being hot, of any physical fact about him, thrilled her. When they came to the iron-grated door and Anson took out his key she experienced a sort of delight.

Downstairs it was dark, and after he ascended in the lift Dolly raised a curtain and looked out through opaque lace at the houses over the way. She heard the lift machinery stop, and with the notion of teasing him pressed the button that brought it down. Then on what was more than an impulse she got into it and sent it up to what she guessed was his floor.

"Anson," she called, laughing a little.

"Just a minute," he answered from his bedroom . . . then after a brief delay: "Now you can come in."

He had changed and was buttoning his vest. "This is my room," he said lightly. "How do you like it?"

She caught sight of Paula's picture on the wall and stared at it in fascination, just as Paula had stared at the pictures of Anson's childish sweethearts five years before. She knew something about Paula—sometimes she tortured herself with fragments of the story.

Suddenly she came close to Anson, raising her arms. They embraced. Outside the area window a soft artificial twilight already hovered, though the sun was still bright on a back roof across the way. In half an hour the room would be quite dark. The uncalculated opportunity overwhelmed them, made them both breathless, and they clung more closely. It was eminent, inevitable. Still holding one another, they raised their heads—their eyes fell together upon Paula's picture, staring down at them from the wall.

Suddenly Anson dropped his arms, and sitting down at his desk tried the drawer with a bunch of keys.

"Like a drink?" he asked in a gruff voice.

"No, Anson."

He poured himself half a tumbler of whisky, swallowed it, and then opened the door into the hall.

"Come on," he said.

Dolly hesitated.

"Anson—I'm going to the country with you tonight, after all. You understand that, don't you?"

"Of course," he answered brusquely.

In Dolly's car they rode on to Long Island, closer in their emotions than they had ever been before. They knew what would happen—not with Paula's face to remind them that something was lacking, but when they were alone in the still, hot Long Island night they did not care.

The estate in Port Washington where they were to spend the weekend belonged to a cousin of Anson's who had married a Montana copper operator. An interminable drive began at the lodge and twisted under imported poplar saplings toward a huge, pink, Spanish house. Anson had often visited there before.

After dinner they danced at the Linx Club. About midnight Anson assured himself that his cousins would not leave before two—then he explained that Dolly was tired; he would take her home and return to the dance later. Trembling a little with excitement, they got into a borrowed car together and drove to Port Washington. As they reached the lodge he stopped and spoke to the night watchman.

"When are you making a round, Carl?"

"Right away."

"Then you'll be here till everybody's in?"

"Yes, sir."

"All right. Listen: if any automobile, no matter whose it is, turns in at this gate, I want you to phone the house immediately." He put a five-dollar bill into Carl's hand. "Is that clear?"

"Yes, Mr. Anson." Being of the Old World, he neither winked nor smiled. Yet Dolly sat with her face turned slightly away.

Anson had a key. Once inside he poured a drink for both of them—Dolly left hers untouched—then he ascertained definitely the location of the phone, and found that it was within easy hearing distance of their rooms, both of which were on the first floor.

Five minutes later he knocked at the door of Dolly's room.

"Anson?" He went in, closing the door behind him. She was in bed, leaning up anxiously with elbows on the pillow; sitting beside her he took her in his arms.

"Anson, darling."

He didn't answer.

"Anson. . . . Anson! I love you. . . . Say you love me. Say it now—can't you say it now? Even if you don't mean it?"

He did not listen. Over her head he perceived that the picture of Paula was hanging here upon this wall.

He got up and went close to it. The frame gleamed faintly with thrice-reflected moonlight—within was a blurred shadow of a face that he saw he did not know. Almost sobbing, he turned around and stared with abomination at the little figure on the bed.

"This is all foolishness," he said thickly. "I don't know what I was thinking about. I don't love you and you'd better wait for somebody that loves you. I don't love you a bit, can't you understand?"

His voice broke, and he went hurriedly out. Back in the salon he was pouring himself a drink with uneasy fingers, when the front door opened suddenly, and his cousin came in.

"Why, Anson, I hear Dolly's sick," she began solicitously. "I hear she's sick. . . ."

"It was nothing," he interrupted, raising his voice so that it would carry into Dolly's room. "She was a little tired. She went to bed."

For a long time afterward Anson believed that a protective God sometimes interfered in human affairs. But Dolly Karger, lying awake and staring at the ceiling, never again believed in anything at all.

VI

When Dolly married during the following autumn, Anson was in London on business. Like Paula's marriage, it was sudden, but it affected him in a different way. At first he felt that it was funny, and had an inclination to laugh when he thought of it. Later it depressed him—it made him feel old.

There was something repetitive about it—why, Paula and Dolly had belonged to different generations. He had a foretaste of the sensation of a man of forty who hears that the daughter of an old flame has married. He wired congratulations and, as was not the case with Paula, they were sincere—he had never really hoped that Paula would be happy.

When he returned to New York, he was made a partner in the firm, and, as his responsibilities increased, he had less time on his hands. The refusal of a life-insurance company to issue him a policy made such an impression on him that he stopped drinking for a year, and claimed that he felt better physically, though I think he missed the convivial recounting of those Celliniesque adventures which, in his early twenties, had played such a part of his life. But he never abandoned the Yale Club. He was a figure there, a personality, and the tendency of his class, who were now seven years out of college, to drift away to more sober haunts was checked by his presence.

His day was never too full nor his mind too weary to give any sort of aid to anyone who asked it. What had been done at first through pride and superiority had become a habit and a passion. And there was always something—a younger brother in trouble at New Haven, a quarrel to be patched up between a friend and his wife, a position to be found for this man, an investment for that. But his specialty was the solving of problems for young married people. Young married people fascinated him and their apartments were almost sacred to him—he knew the story of their love affair, advised them where to live and how, and remembered their babies' names.

Toward young wives his attitude was circumspect: he never abused the trust which their husbands—strangely enough in view of his unconcealed irregularities—invariably reposed in him.

He came to take a vicarious pleasure in happy marriages, and to be inspired to an almost equally pleasant melancholy by those that went astray. Not a season passed that he did not witness the collapse of an affair that perhaps he himself had fathered. When Paula was divorced and almost immediately remarried to another Bostonian, he talked about her to me all one afternoon. He would never love any one as he had loved Paula, but he insisted that he no longer cared.

"I'll never marry," he came to say; "I've seen too much of it, and I know a happy marriage is a very rare thing. Besides, I'm too old."

But he did believe in marriage. Like all men who spring from a happy and successful marriage, he believed in it passionately—nothing he had seen would change his belief, his cynicism dissolved upon it like air. But he did really believe he was too old. At twenty-eight he began to accept with equanimity the prospect of marrying without romantic love; he resolutely chose a New York girl of his own class, pretty, intelligent, congenial, above reproach—and set about falling in love with her. The things he had said to Paula with sincerity, to other girls with grace, he could no longer say at all without smiling, or with the force necessary to convince.

"When I'm forty," he told his friends, "I'll be ripe. I'll fall for some chorus girl like the rest."

Nevertheless, he persisted in his attempt. His mother wanted to see him married, and he could now well afford it—he had a seat on the Stock Exchange, and his earned income came to twenty-five thousand a year. The idea was agreeable: when his friends—he spent most of his time with the set he and Dolly had evolved—closed themselves in behind domestic doors at night, he no longer rejoiced in his freedom. He even wondered if he should have married Dolly. Not even Paula had loved him more, and he was learning the rarity, in a single life, of encountering true emotion.

Just as this mood began to creep over him a disquieting story reached his ear. His aunt Edna, a woman just this side of forty, was carrying on an open intrigue with a dissolute, hard-drinking young man named Cary Sloane. Everyone knew of it except Anson's Uncle Robert, who for fifteen years had talked long in clubs and taken his wife for granted.

Anson heard the story again and again with increasing annoyance. Something of his old feeling for his uncle came back to him, a feeling that was more than personal, a reversion toward that family solidarity on which he had based his pride. His intuition singled out the essential point of the affair, which was that his uncle shouldn't be hurt. It was his first experiment in unsolicited meddling, but with his knowledge of Edna's character he felt that he could handle the matter better than a district judge or his uncle.

His uncle was in Hot Springs. Anson traced down the sources of the scandal so that there should be no possibility of mistake and then he called Edna and asked her to lunch with him at the Plaza next day. Something in his tone must have frightened her, for she was reluctant, but he insisted, putting off the date until she had no excuse for refusing.

She met him at the appointed time in the Plaza lobby, a lovely, faded, gray-eyed blonde in a coat of Russian sable. Five great rings, cold with diamonds and emeralds, sparkled on her slender hands. It occurred to Anson that it was his father's intelligence and not his uncle's that had earned the fur and the stones, the rich brilliance that buoyed up her passing beauty.

Though Edna scented his hostility, she was unprepared for the directness of his approach.

"Edna, I'm astonished at the way you've been acting," he said in a strong, frank voice. "At first I couldn't believe it."

"Believe what?" she demanded sharply.

"You needn't pretend with me, Edna. I'm talking about Cary Sloane. Aside from any other consideration, I didn't think you could treat Uncle Robert——"

"Now look here, Anson——" she began angrily, but his peremptory voice broke through hers:

"—and your children in such a way. You've been married eighteen years, and you're old enough to know better."

"You can't talk to me like that! You——"

"Yes, I can. Uncle Robert has always been my best friend." He was tremendously moved. He felt a real distress about his uncle, about his three young cousins.

Edna stood up, leaving her crab-flake cocktail untasted.

"This is the silliest thing——"

"Very well, if you won't listen to me I'll go to Uncle Robert and tell him the whole story—he's bound to hear it sooner or later. And afterward I'll go to old Moses Sloane."

Edna faltered back into her chair.

"Don't talk so loud," she begged him. Her eyes blurred with tears. "You have no idea how your voice carries. You might have chosen a less public place to make all these crazy accusations."

He didn't answer.

"Oh, you never liked me, I know," she went on. "You're just taking advantage of some silly gossip to try and break up the only interesting friendship I've ever had. What did I ever do to make you hate me so?"

Still Anson waited. There would be the appeal to his chivalry, then to his pity, finally to his superior sophistication—when he had shouldered his way through all these there would be admissions, and he could come to grips with her. By being silent, by being impervious, by returning constantly to his main weapon, which was his own true emotion, he bullied her into frantic despair as the luncheon hour slipped away. At two o'clock she took out a mirror and a handkerchief, shined away the marks of her tears and powdered the slight hollows where they had lain. She had agreed to meet him at her own house at five.

When he arrived she was stretched on a chaise-longue which was covered with cretonne for the summer, and the tears he had called up at luncheon seemed still to be standing in her eyes. Then he was aware of Cary Sloane's dark anxious presence upon the cold hearth.

"What's this idea of yours?" broke out Sloane immediately. "I understand you invited Edna to lunch and then threatened her on the basis of some cheap scandal."

Anson sat down.

"I have no reason to think it's only scandal."

"I hear you're going to take it to Robert Hunter, and to my father."

Anson nodded.

"Either you break it off—or I will," he said.

"What God damned business is it of yours, Hunter?"

"Don't lose your temper, Cary," said Edna nervously. "It's only a question of showing him how absurd——"

"For one thing, it's my name that's being handed around," interrupted Anson. "That's all that concerns you, Cary."

"Edna isn't a member of your family."

"She most certainly is!" His anger mounted. "Why—she owes this house and the rings on her fingers to my father's brains. When Uncle Robert married her she didn't have a penny."

They all looked at the rings as if they had a significant bearing on the situation. Edna made a gesture to take them from her hand.

"I guess they're not the only rings in the world," said Sloane.

"Oh, this is absurd," cried Edna. "Anson, will you listen to me? I've found out how the silly story started. It was a maid I discharged who went right to the Chilicheffs—all these Russians pump things out of their servants and then put a false meaning on them." She brought down her fist angrily on the table: "And after Tom lent them the limousine for a whole month when we were South last winter——"

"Do you see?" demanded Sloane eagerly. "This maid got hold of the wrong end of the thing. She knew that Edna and I were friends, and she carried it to the Chilicheffs. In Russia they assume that if a man and a woman——"

He enlarged the theme to a disquisition upon social relations in the Caucasus.

"If that's the case it better be explained to Uncle Robert," said Anson dryly, "so that when the rumors do reach him he'll know they're not true."

Adopting the method he had followed with Edna at luncheon he let them explain it all away. He knew that they were guilty and that presently they would cross the line from explanation into justification and convict themselves more definitely than he could ever do. By seven they had taken the desperate step of telling him the truth—Robert Hunter's neglect, Edna's empty life, the casual dalliance that had flamed up into passion—but like so many true stories it had the misfortune of being old, and its enfeebled body beat helplessly against the armor of Anson's will. The threat to go to Sloane's father sealed their helplessness, for the latter, a retired cotton broker out of Alabama, was a notorious fundamentalist who controlled his son by a rigid allowance and the promise that at his next vagary the allowance would stop forever.

They dined at a small French restaurant, and the discussion continued—at one time Sloane resorted to physical threats, a little later they were both imploring him to give them time. But Anson was obdurate. He saw that Edna was breaking up, and that her spirit must not be refreshed by any renewal of their passion.

At two o'clock in a small night-club on 53rd Street, Edna's nerves suddenly collapsed, and she cried to go home. Sloane had been drinking heavily all evening, and he was faintly maudlin, leaning on the table and weeping a little with his face in his hands. Quickly Anson gave them his terms. Sloane was to leave town for six months, and he must be gone within forty-eight hours. When he returned there was to be no resumption of the affair, but at the end of a year Edna might, if she wished, tell Robert Hunter that she wanted a divorce and go about it in the usual way.

He paused, gaining confidence from their faces for his final word.

"Or there's another thing you can do," he said slowly, "if Edna wants to leave her children, there's nothing I can do to prevent your running off together."

"I want to go home!" cried Edna again. "Oh, haven't you done enough to us for one day?"

Outside it was dark, save for a blurred glow from Sixth Avenue down the street. In that light those two who had been lovers looked for the last time into each other's tragic faces, realizing that between them there was not enough youth and strength to avert their eternal parting. Sloane walked suddenly off down the street and Anson tapped a dozing taxi-driver on the arm.

It was almost four; there was a patient flow of cleaning water along the ghostly pavement of Fifth Avenue, and the shadows of two night women flitted over the dark façade of St. Thomas's church. Then the desolate shrubbery of Central Park where Anson had often played as a child, and the mounting numbers, significant as names, of the marching streets. This was his city, he thought, where his name had flourished through five generations. No change could alter the permanence of its place here, for change itself was the essential substratum by which he and those of his name identified themselves with the spirit of New York. Resourcefulness and a powerful will—for his threats in weaker hands would have been less than nothing—had beaten the gathering dust from his uncle's name, from the name of his family, from even this shivering figure that sat beside him in the car.

Cary Sloane's body was found next morning on the lower shelf of a pillar of Queensboro Bridge. In the darkness and in his excitement he had thought that it was the water flowing black beneath him, but in less than a second it made no possible difference—unless he had planned to think one last thought of Edna, and to call out her name as he struggled feebly in the water.

VII

Anson never blamed himself for his part in this affair—the situation which brought it about had not been of his making. But the just suffer with the unjust, and he found that his oldest and somehow his most precious friendship was over. He never knew what distorted story Edna told, but he was welcome in his uncle's house no longer.

Just before Christmas Mrs. Hunter retired to a select Episcopal heaven, and Anson became the responsible head of his family. An unmarried aunt who had lived with them for years ran the house, and attempted with helpless inefficiency to chaperone the younger girls. All the children were less self-reliant than Anson, more conventional both in their virtues and in their shortcomings. Mrs. Hunter's death had postponed the début of one daughter and the wedding of another. Also it had taken something deeply material from all of them, for with her passing the quiet, expensive superiority of the Hunters came to an end.

For one thing, the estate, considerably diminished by two inheritance taxes and soon to be divided among six children, was not a notable fortune any more. Anson saw a tendency in his youngest sisters to speak rather respectfully of families that hadn't "existed" twenty years ago. His own feeling of precedence was not echoed in them—sometimes they were conventionally snobbish, that was all. For another thing, this was the last summer they would spend on the Connecticut estate; the clamor against it was too loud: "Who wants to waste the best months of the year shut up in that dead old town?" Reluctantly he yielded—the house would go into the market in the fall, and the next summer they would rent a smaller place in Westchester County. It was a step down from the expensive simplicity of his father's idea, and, while he sympathized with the revolt, it also annoyed him; during his mother's lifetime he had gone up there at least every other week-end—even in the gayest summers.

Yet he himself was part of this change, and his strong instinct for life had turned him in his twenties from the hollow obsequies of that abortive leisure class. He did not see this clearly—he still felt that there was a norm, a standard of society. But there was no norm, it was doubtful if there had ever been a true norm in New York. The few who still paid and fought to enter a particular set succeeded only to find that as a society it scarcely functioned—or, what was more alarming, that the Bohemia from which they fled sat above them at table.

At twenty-nine Anson's chief concern was his own growing loneliness. He was sure now that he would never marry. The number of weddings at which he had officiated as best man or usher was past all counting—there was a drawer at home that bulged with the official neckties of this or that wedding-party, neckties standing for romances that had not endured a year, for couples who had passed completely from his life. Scarf-pins, gold pencils, cuff-buttons, presents from a generation of grooms had passed through his jewel-box and been lost—and with every ceremony he was less and less able to imagine himself in the groom's place. Under his hearty good-will toward all those marriages there was despair about his own.

And as he neared thirty he became not a little depressed at the inroads that marriage, especially lately, had made upon his friendships. Groups of people had a disconcerting tendency to dissolve and disappear. The men from his own college—and it was upon them that he had expended the most time and affection—were the most elusive of all. Most of them were drawn deep into domesticity, two were dead, one lived abroad, one was in Hollywood writing continuities for pictures that Anson went faithfully to see.

Most of them, however, were permanent commuters with an intricate family life centering around some suburban country club, and it was from these that he felt his estrangement most keenly.

In the early days of their married life they had all needed him; he gave them advice about their slim finances, he exorcised their doubts about the advisability of bringing a baby into two rooms and a bath, especially he stood for the great world outside. But now their financial troubles were in the past and the fearfully expected child had evolved into an absorbing family. They were always glad to see old Anson, but they dressed up for him and tried to impress him with their present importance, and kept their troubles to themselves. They needed him no longer.

A few weeks before his thirtieth birthday the last of his early and intimate friends was married. Anson acted in his usual role of best man, gave his usual silver tea-service, and went down to the usual Homeric to say good-by. It was a hot Friday afternoon in May, and as he walked from the pier he realized that Saturday closing had begun and he was free until Monday morning.

"Go where?" he asked himself.

The Yale Club, of course; bridge until dinner, then four or five raw cocktails in somebody's room and a pleasant confused evening. He regretted that this afternoon's groom wouldn't be along—they had always been able to cram so much into such nights: they knew how to attach women and how to get rid of them, how much consideration any girl deserved from their intelligent hedonism. A party was an adjusted thing—you took certain girls to certain places and spent just so much on their amusement; you drank a little, not much, more than you ought to drink, and at a certain time in the morning you stood up and said you were going home. You avoided college boys, sponges, future engagements, fights, sentiment, and indiscretions. That was the way it was done. All the rest was dissipation.

In the morning you were never violently sorry—you made no resolutions, but if you had overdone it and your heart was slightly out of order, you went on the wagon for a few days without saying anything about it, and waited until an accumulation of nervous boredom projected you into another party.

The lobby of the Yale Club was unpopulated. In the bar three very young alumni looked up at him, momentarily and without curiosity.

"Hello there, Oscar," he said to the bartender. "Mr. Cahill been around this afternoon?"

"Mr. Cahill's gone to New Haven."

"Oh . . . that so?"

"Gone to the ball game. Lot of men gone up."

Anson looked once again into the lobby, considered for a moment, and then walked out and over to Fifth Avenue. From the broad window of one of his clubs—one that he had scarcely visited in five years—a gray man with watery eyes stared down at him. Anson looked quickly away—that figure sitting in vacant resignation, in supercilious solitude, depressed him. He stopped and, retracing his steps, started over 47th Street toward Teak Warden's apartment. Teak and his wife had once been his most familiar friends—it was a household where he and Dolly Karger had been used to go in the days of their affair. But Teak had taken to drink, and his wife had remarked publicly that Anson was a bad influence on him. The remark reached Anson in an exaggerated form—when it was finally cleared up, the delicate spell of intimacy was broken, never to be renewed.

"Is Mr. Warden at home?" he inquired.

"They've gone to the country."

The fact unexpectedly cut at him. They were gone to the country and he hadn't known. Two years before he would have known the date, the hour, come up at the last moment for a final drink, and planned his first visit to them. Now they had gone without a word.

Anson looked at his watch and considered a week-end with his family, but the only train was a local that would jolt through the aggressive heat for three hours. And tomorrow in the country, and Sunday—he was in no mood for porch-bridge with polite undergraduates, and dancing after dinner at a rural roadhouse, a diminutive of gayety which his father had estimated too well.

"Oh, no," he said to himself. . . . "No."

He was a dignified, impressive young man, rather stout now, but otherwise unmarked by dissipation. He could have been cast for a pillar of something—at times you were sure it was not society, at others nothing else—for the law, for the church. He stood for a few minutes motionless on the sidewalk in front of a 47th Street apartment house; for almost the first time in his life he had nothing whatever to do.

Then he began to walk briskly up Fifth Avenue, as if he had just been reminded of an important engagement there. The necessity of dissimulation is one of the few characteristics that we share with dogs, and I think of Anson on that day as some well-bred specimen who had been disappointed at a familiar back door. He was going to see Nick, once a fashionable bartender in demand at all private dances, and now employed in cooling non-alcoholic champagne among the labyrinthine cellars of the Plaza Hotel.

"Nick," he said, "what's happened to everything?"

"Dead," Nick said.

"Make me a whisky sour." Anson handed a pint bottle over the counter. "Nick, the girls are different; I had a little girl in Brooklyn and she got married last week without letting me know."

"That a fact? Ha-ha-ha," responded Nick diplomatically. "Slipped it over on you."

"Absolutely," said Anson. "And I was out with her the night before."

"Ha-ha-ha," said Nick, "ha-ha-ha!"

"Do you remember the wedding, Nick, in Hot Springs where I had the waiters and the musicians singing 'God save the King'?"

"Now where was that, Mr. Hunter?" Nick concentrated doubtfully. "Seems to me that was——"

"Next time they were back for more, and I began to wonder how much I'd paid them," continued Anson.

"—seems to me that was at Mr. Trenholm's wedding."

"Don't know him," said Anson decisively. He was offended that a strange name should intrude upon his reminiscences; Nick perceived this.

"Naw—aw—" he admitted, "I ought to know that. It was one of your crowd—Brakins . . . Baker——"

"Bicker Baker," said Anson responsively. "They put me in a hearse after it was over and covered me up with flowers and drove me away."

"Ha-ha-ha," said Nick. "Ha-ha-ha."

Nick's simulation of the old family servant paled presently and Anson went up-stairs to the lobby. He looked around—his eyes met the glance of an unfamiliar clerk at the desk, then fell upon a flower from the morning's marriage hesitating in the mouth of a brass cuspidor. He went out and walked slowly toward the blood-red sun over Columbus Circle. Suddenly he turned around and, retracing his steps to the Plaza, immured himself in a telephone-booth.

Later he said that he tried to get me three times that afternoon, that he tried everyone who might be in New York—men and girls he had not seen for years, an artist's model of his college days whose faded number was still in his address book—Central told him that even the exchange existed no longer. At length his quest roved into the country, and he held brief disappointing conversations with emphatic butlers and maids. So-and-so was out, riding, swimming, playing golf, sailed to Europe last week. Who shall I say phoned?

It was intolerable that he should pass the evening alone—the private reckonings which one plans for a moment of leisure lose every charm when the solitude is enforced. There were always women of a sort, but the ones he knew had temporarily vanished, and to pass a New York evening in the hired company of a stranger never occurred to him—he would have considered that that was something shameful and secret, the diversion of a traveling salesman in a strange town.

Anson paid the telephone bill—the girl tried unsuccessfully to joke with him about its size—and for the second time that afternoon started to leave the Plaza and go he knew not where. Near the revolving door the figure of a woman, obviously with child, stood sideways to the light—a sheer beige cape fluttered at her shoulders when the door turned and, each time, she looked impatiently toward it as if she were weary of waiting. At the first sight of her a strong nervous thrill of familiarity went over him, but not until he was within five feet of her did he realize that it was Paula.

"Why, Anson Hunter!"

His heart turned over.

"Why, Paula——"

"Why, this is wonderful. I can't believe it, Anson!"

She took both his hands, and he saw in the freedom of the gesture that the memory of him had lost poignancy to her. But not to him—he felt that old mood that she evoked in him stealing over his brain, that gentleness with which he had always met her optimism as if afraid to mar its surface.

"We're at Rye for the summer. Pete had to come East on business—you know of course I'm Mrs. Peter Hagerty now—so we brought the children and took a house. You've got to come out and see us."

"Can I?" he asked directly. "When?"

"When you like. Here's Pete." The revolving door functioned, giving up a fine tall man of thirty with a tanned face and a trim mustache. His immaculate fitness made a sharp contrast with Anson's increasing bulk, which was obvious under the faintly tight cut-away coat.

"You oughtn't to be standing," said Hagerty to his wife. "Let's sit down here." He indicated lobby chairs, but Paula hesitated.

"I've got to go right home," she said. "Anson, why don't you—why don't you come out and have dinner with us tonight? We're just getting settled, but if you can stand that——"

Hagerty confirmed the invitation cordially.

"Come out for the night."

Their car waited in front of the hotel, and Paula with a tired gesture sank back against silk cushions in the corner.

"There's so much I want to talk to you about," she said, "it seems hopeless."

"I want to hear about you."

"Well"—she smiled at Hagerty—"that would take a long time too. I have three children—by my first marriage. The oldest is five, then four, then three." She smiled again. "I didn't waste much time having them, did I?"

"Boys?"

"A boy and two girls. Then—oh, a lot of things happened, and I got a divorce in Paris a year ago and married Pete. That's all—except that I'm awfully happy."

In Rye they drove up to a large house near the Beach Club, from which there issued presently three dark, slim children who broke from an English governess and approached them with an esoteric cry. Abstractedly and with difficulty Paula took each one into her arms, a caress which they accepted stiffly, as they had evidently been told not to bump into Mummy. Even against their fresh faces Paula's skin showed scarcely any weariness—for all her physical languor she seemed younger than when he had last seen her at Palm Beach seven years ago.

At dinner she was preoccupied, and afterward, during the homage to the radio, she lay with closed eyes on the sofa, until Anson wondered if his presence at this time were not an intrusion. But at nine o'clock when Hagerty rose and said pleasantly that he was going to leave them by themselves for a while, she began to talk slowly about herself and the past.

"My first baby," she said—"the one we call Darling, the biggest little girl—I wanted to die when I knew I was going to have her, because Lowell was like a stranger to me. It didn't seem as though she could be my own. I wrote you a letter and tore it up. Oh, you were so bad to me, Anson."

It was the dialogue again, rising and falling. Anson felt a sudden quickening of memory.

"Weren't you engaged once?" she asked—"a girl named Dolly something?"

"I wasn't ever engaged. I tried to be engaged, but I never loved anybody but you, Paula."

"Oh," she said. Then after a moment: "This baby is the first one I ever really wanted. You see, I'm in love now—at last."

He didn't answer, shocked at the treachery of her remembrance. She must have seen that the "at last" bruised him, for she continued:

"I was infatuated with you, Anson—you could make me do anything you liked. But we wouldn't have been happy. I'm not smart enough for you. I don't like things to be complicated like you do." She paused. "You'll never settle down," she said.

The phrase struck at him from behind—it was an accusation that of all accusations he had never merited.

"I could settle down if women were different," he said. "If I didn't understand so much about them, if women didn't spoil you for other women, if they had only a little pride. If I could go to sleep for a while and wake up into a home that was really mine—why, that's what I'm made for, Paula, that's what women have seen in me and liked in me. It's only that I can't get through the preliminaries any more."

Hagerty came in a little before eleven; after a whisky Paula stood up and announced that she was going to bed. She went over and stood by her husband.

"Where did you go, dearest?" she demanded.

"I had a drink with Ed Saunders."

"I was worried. I thought maybe you'd run away."

She rested her head against his coat.

"He's sweet, isn't he, Anson?" she demanded.

"Absolutely," said Anson, laughing.

She raised her face to her husband.

"Well, I'm ready," she said. She turned to Anson: "Do you want to see our family gymnastic stunt?"

"Yes," he said in an interested voice.

"All right. Here we go!"

Hagerty picked her up easily in his arms.

"This is called the family acrobatic stunt," said Paula. "He carries me up-stairs. Isn't it sweet of him?"

"Yes," said Anson.

Hagerty bent his head slightly until his face touched Paula's.

"And I love him," she said, "I've just been telling you, haven't I, Anson?"

"Yes," he said.

"He's the dearest thing that ever lived in this world; aren't you, darling?"

... Well, good night. Here we go. Isn't he strong?"

"Yes," Anson said.

"You'll find a pair of Pete's pajamas laid out for you. Sweet dreams—see you at breakfast."

"Yes," Anson said.

VIII

The older members of the firm insisted that Anson should go abroad for the summer. He had scarcely had a vacation in seven years, they said. He was stale and needed a change. Anson resisted.

"If I go," he declared, "I won't come back any more."

"That's absurd, old man. You'll be back in three months with all this depression gone. Fit as ever."

"No." He shook his head stubbornly. "If I stop, I won't go back to work. If I stop, that means I've given up—I'm through."

"We'll take a chance on that. Stay six months if you like—we're not afraid you'll leave us. Why, you'd be miserable if you didn't work."

They arranged his passage for him. They liked Anson—everyone liked Anson—and the change that had been coming over him cast a sort of pall over the office. The enthusiasm that had invariably signaled up business, the consideration toward his equals and his inferiors, the lift of his vital presence—within the past four months his intense nervousness had melted down these qualities into the fussy pessimism of a man of forty. On every transaction in which he was involved he acted as a drag and a strain.

"If I go I'll never come back," he said.

Three days before he sailed Paula Legendre Hagerty died in childbirth. I was with him a great deal then, for we were crossing together, but for the first time in our friendship he told me not a word of how he felt, nor did I see the slightest sign of emotion. His chief preoccupation was with the fact that he was thirty years old—he would turn the conversation to the point where he could remind you of it and then fall silent, as if he assumed that the statement would start a chain of thought sufficient to itself. Like his partners, I was amazed at the change in him, and I was glad when the Paris moved off into the wet space between the worlds, leaving his principality behind.

"How about a drink?" he suggested.

We walked into the bar with that defiant feeling that characterizes the day of departure and ordered four Martinis. After one cocktail a change came over him—he suddenly reached across and slapped my knee with the first joviality I had seen him exhibit for months.

"Did you see that girl in the red tam?" he demanded, "the one with the high color who had the two police dogs down to bid her good-by."

"She's pretty," I agreed.

"I looked her up in the purser's office and found out that she's alone. I'm going down to see the steward in a few minutes. We'll have dinner with her tonight."

After a while he left me, and within an hour he was walking up and down the deck with her, talking to her in his strong, clear voice. Her red tam was a bright spot of color against the steel-green sea, and from time to time she looked up with a flashing bob of her head, and smiled with amusement and interest, and anticipation. At dinner we had champagne, and were very joyous—afterward Anson ran the pool with infectious gusto, and several people who had seen me with him asked me his name. He and the girl were talking and laughing together on a lounge in the bar when I went to bed.

I saw less of him on the trip than I had hoped. He wanted to arrange a foursome, but there was no one available, so I saw him only at meals. Sometimes, though, he would have a cocktail in the bar, and he told me about the girl in the red tam, and his adventures with her, making them all bizarre and amusing, as he had a way of doing, and I was glad that he was himself again, or at least the self that I knew, and with which I felt at home. I don't think he was ever happy unless someone was in love with him, responding to him like filings to a magnet, helping him to explain himself, promising him something. What it was I do not know. Perhaps they promised that there would always be women in the world who would spend their brightest, freshest, rarest hours to nurse and protect that superiority he cherished in his heart.

THE IMPOSITION

L. A. G. Strong

(1896- )

SIX."

"Sir!"

"Very well, then. Five."

"Sir!"

"You know perfectly well by now, Russell, that if you are dissatisfied with my marking I'm always ready to revise it—in the downward direction."

"Oh, sir!"

"Are you satisfied, or do you wish me to revise still further?"

The victim sighed, rolling his eyes with every symptom of polite ill-usage.

Roger Champernown looked down at his book. He took a grip on himself, digging his nails into the palms of his hands. The moment had arrived. He glanced at the next few lines of the text. No, they were not unfairly hard. No one could say that he was deliberately choosing them because they were hard. Even supposing they contained opportunities for just the sort of mistake that the boy would be likely to make . . .

Was it fair for a man, whispered some inner voice, to use his psychological knowledge, his knowledge of a boy's character, in a guess to the boy's undoing? Nonsense, he retorted. Nonsense. It was the boy's business to know the whole piece, every word of it!

"Henderson. Translate."

A fair-haired, handsome boy looked up with an air of surprise.

"Me, sir?"

"Your name is Henderson, I believe."

"Quite right, sir."

"What did you say?"

"Yes, sir."

Champernown ventured to look up, and glared into the blue eyes that with deceptive frankness met his own.

"Translate, then—if you will be so good."

The boy smiled. He stretched out his arms, as if shooting imaginary cuffs; pulled up his trousers; settled himself erect at his desk; smiled once more obligingly; and gave the passage his attention. He looked at it for a couple of seconds, then raised his eyebrows. The man must be humoured, said his gesture. It contrived also subtly to suggest that what was being asked of him was unreasonable.

"Let me see, now," he murmured, as if to himself.

"Get on," exclaimed Champernown thickly, and stopped, saying savagely to himself, Fool, fool; don't let yourself be drawn.

"I beg your pardon, sir."

"Get on," said Champernown.

The boy looked again at the text, inclining his head first to one side and then to the other.

"Inde," he began. "Thence—or thenceforward."

He paused, and looked expectantly at Champernown, like a dog who has done a trick, and expects applause. Champernown kept his eyes fixed on his book.

"Inde," repeated Henderson. "Thenceforward, or thence. No, thenceforward, I think. Thenceforward. Atrocious certamen." He hesitated. "The atrocious strife . . ."

Champernown uttered a noise between a growl and a hiss.

"Isn't that right, sir?" asked the boy, leaning forward, as one deeply disappointed by the failure of his effort to please.

"Tacitus, as you may possibly have noticed," observed the master with sarcasm, "has an occasional habit of leaving out the verb."

"Yes, sir. So thoughtless of him."

"What?"

"Yes, sir. I had noticed."

"It is a pity, then, Henderson, that you do not learn by experience."

"Mr. Bernard Shaw says that we never learn by experience, sir."

Champernown saw red. The boy was deliberately provoking him. Never mind. He would not be led into making a fool of himself again before the class. Henderson did not know his piece. He had probably concentrated upon the difficult bit near the end, the bit with the hard words in it, supposing that Champernown would give it to him out of spite. Champernown had guessed he would, and outwitted him by giving him this earlier, apparently easier bit. Evidently, the guess had been sound. All that was necessary was to sit tight and let the wretched boy establish his ignorance.

Champernown sat tight, refusing every red rag, every bait, until he was able legitimately to pass sentence.

"Since you have omitted the formality of preparing your lesson, Henderson, you will remain and repair the omission this afternoon."

"Repair what, sir?"

"Do the lesson which you have not done."

"I'm awfully sorry, sir, but I'm afraid that's impossible."

Shaking his head from side to side, the boy regarded him with sad blue eyes.

"Impossible?"

"Quite, I'm afraid, sir. You see, I have to attend fielding practice with Mr. Bevan."

Champernown swallowed.

"Very well, then. You will do it to-morrow afternoon."

"Impossible too, sir, I'm afraid. The Silchester match."

It was a point of principle, and Champernown was not going to let it go. He had had Henderson on his nerves for weeks. He had been ready to like the boy, to be friendly with him. He hadn't begun all this. Yet, for no reason at all, the boy baited him, without mercy, seldom giving him a loophole for open action. Even so, he told himself, this was not the reason for pursuing him. It was a point of principle.

As he expected, the day after the match found Henderson equally elusive. Apparently he had another rendezvous with the headmaster. Doggedly, Champernown made his way after lunch to Bevan's study. He felt at a disadvantage before he had begun, but persisted, face and ears reddening.

"Oh, come." The bluff, prematurely bald man eyed him tolerantly. "Oh, come. Rather ancient history, isn't it?"

Champernown swallowed. He had known before he started that he was on a difficult errand. Henderson was the apple of the cricketing headmaster's eye, and, to make matters worse, he had made seventy-four in the match.

"Very well," Champernown was saying in a few minutes. "As you wish, of course. It will make matters difficult for me with my form if I have to show preferential treatment, but . . ."

The headmaster raised his eyebrows, but refused to be ruffled.

"Hardly preferential treatment, Champernown," he said benignly. "Boys are understanding creatures, you know. They'll understand all right."

"You are making this very difficult for me, sir."

"Oh come, Champernown, you exaggerate." The headmaster spoke heartily. "You take these little matters too seriously. A good fault, my dear fellow, but, nevertheless, a fault."

Champernown stood, pale, dogged.

"It has happened before, sir."

"What has?"

"Only a couple of weeks ago, when I had occasion to keep Henderson in, you—you excused him the imposition. The boy is clearly presuming on it. He defies me openly. I'm afraid he—and the others—may get the impression that you support him."

The headmaster's face crimsoned. He turned impatiently on his heel.

"Oh, very well," he snapped over his shoulder. "Have it your own way, Champernown. Have it your own way."

At twenty past three, two afternoons later, Champernown decided he must have a breath of air. Even with the windows wide open, the empty classroom was stifling. Henderson's exercise book lay open before him. He had taken twenty minutes over it, looking closely for faults, then over-marking the boy in his morbid, self-exculpatory anxiety to be fair. Henderson had not yet done his imposition. Bevan had found various reasons for keeping him on the cricket field. But he should do it. He should do it, by God he should! Champernown set his jaw. He would resign, he would pull the whole place up by the roots, sooner than allow that imposition to be evaded.

With an overwrought gesture, he put the pile of exercise books inside the desk, slammed down the lid, and made for the field. Coming out round the corner of the chapel, he ran straight into a small and white-faced procession carrying a limp figure.

"Henderson. . . . In the nets. . . . Ball came smack through . . . I always said that net was dangerous. . . . Full on the temple. . . . Yes, one of Lacey's hardest. . . ."

The whole school, buildings, playing fields, and all, lay under a cloud till five, when it was announced that the victim was sitting up, declaring that he felt perfectly all right, and demanding to be allowed to return to ordinary life. The doctor had seen him, and could find no injury.

At about half past six, Champernown, after long debate, nerved himself to go up to the sick bay and inquire how the boy was getting on. He might even be allowed to see him. After all, why shouldn't he? It was only natural he should want to know. He was the boy's form master.

With beating heart, he went up the leaded stairs, and down the long, bare passage, decorated only with fire extinguishers. Opening the green baize door, he heard voices in the ante-room, and stopped short.

"Very well, then, Matron. Keep him where he is till bedtime, and let him go back to the dormitory."

"No thank you, Mr. Bevan. I'm going to keep him where he is all night, and sit up with him too."

"Really, Matron, I must say, I think you're making too much of this."

You've heard Dr. Slater's opinion. Fussing like this will only create a bad impression. The school is quite sufficiently upset as it is. You'd much better let him go down."

"No thank you, Mr. Bevan. This is my responsibility."

"Really, Matron——"

Stepping back, Champernown silently closed the door. It would be injudicious to go in at the moment. He could inquire again later.

He was a little late for breakfast the next morning, and made his way self-consciously up the big hall between the tables, half annoyed and half pleased at the occasional cries of "Good morning, sir," which greeted him as he passed. He never knew whether to acknowledge them or not.

When he reached the top table, he noticed with surprise that the headmaster was absent. Only three of the men were there, silent, with long faces.

"Haven't you heard?"

"Heard what?"

"About Henderson."

"Henderson? What about him?"

"Died in the night."

"No. . . . Good God!"

"Yes. Sat up suddenly in bed, squinted, cried out, and then fell back dead."

The room began to spin around Champernown. Half conscious, he heard the hushed voices.

"By Jove, it's a feather in Matron's cap, anyway. Lucky she insisted on sitting up with him. Bevan will be thankful enough to her when it comes to the inquest."

As soon as he regained proper consciousness of his surroundings, Champernown felt himself unable to eat. He swallowed a few mouthfuls of his coffee, then made his way out. As he did so, he passed the Matron coming in, grimly justified. Two minutes later, he was knocking at the door of the headmaster's study.

"I really can't see you now, Champernown. I'm—that is, there's a great deal to do."

"I've only just come to tell you . . . to hand in my resignation."

The man was not listening. His back was turned. He was ferreting among papers. He looked pale, ill, blotchy, and old.

"Yes, yes, yes. Well, come later on, Champernown. I really can't see you now."

Suddenly Champernown stamped uncontrollably.

"I resign, I tell you," he shouted. "I resign! Do you understand? I resign!"

Then he turned round, and ran away, blundering down the passage, talking to himself and sobbing. At a corner, he charged into a colleague. The younger man's pupils contracted to pin-points. He stared after the retreating figure, then uttered a long, low whistle.

"Well," he exclaimed. "Whoever would have thought he'd take it like that!"

But Champernown was not weeping for the dead. He was weeping because, in a sudden searing flash, he had seen what his calling had made of him. He did not feel sorrow. He felt simply that Henderson had escaped him, that he had been cheated. In a mad corner of his mind, he would have wished that afternoon to go up to the sick bay, take the corpse, and set it at its desk in the empty class-room, that justice might be satisfied.

TURN ABOUT

William Faulkner

(1897- )

THE AMERICAN—the older one—wore no pink Bedfords. His breeches were of plain whipcord, like the tunic. And the tunic had no long London-cut skirts, so that below the Sam Browne the tail of it stuck straight out like the tunic of a military policeman beneath his holster belt. And he wore simple putties and the easy shoes of a man of middle age, instead of Savile Row boots, and the shoes and the putties did not match in shade, and the ordnance belt did not match either of them, and the pilot's wings on his breast were just wings. But the ribbon beneath them was a good ribbon, and the insigne on his shoulders were the twin bars of a captain. He was not tall. His face was thin, a little aquiline; the eyes intelligent and a little tired. He was past twenty-five; looking at him, one thought, not Phi Beta Kappa exactly, but Skull and Bones perhaps, or possibly a Rhodes scholarship.

One of the men who faced him probably could not see him at all. He was being held on his feet by an American military policeman. He was quite drunk, and in contrast with the heavy-jawed policeman who held him erect on his long, slim, boneless legs, he looked like a masquerading girl. He was possibly eighteen, tall, with a pink-and-white face and blue eyes, and a mouth like a girl's mouth. He wore a pea-coat, buttoned awry and stained with recent mud, and upon his blond head, at that unmistakable and rakish swagger which no other people can ever approach or imitate, the cap of a Royal Naval officer.

"What's this, Corporal?" the American captain said. "What's the trouble? He's an Englishman. You'd better let their M. P.'s take care of him."

"I know he is," the policeman said. He spoke heavily, breathing heavily, in the voice of a man under physical strain; for all his girlish delicacy of limb, the English boy was heavier—or more helpless—than he looked. "Stand up!" the policeman said. "They're officers!"

The English boy made an effort then. He pulled himself together, focusing his eyes. He swayed, throwing his arm about the policeman's neck, and with the other hand he saluted, his hand flicking, fingers curled a little, to his right ear, already swaying again and catching himself again. "Cheerio, sir," he said. "Name's not Beatty, I hope."

"No," the captain said.

"Ah," the English boy said. "Hoped not. My mistake. No offense, what?"

"No offense," the captain said quietly. But he was looking at the policeman. The second American spoke. He was a lieutenant, also a pilot. But he was not twenty-five and he wore the pink breeches, the London boots, and his tunic might have been a British tunic save for the collar.

"It's one of those navy eggs," he said. "They pick them out of the gutters here all night long. You don't come to town often enough."

"Oh," the captain said. "I've heard about them. I remember now." He also remarked now that, though the street was a busy one—it was just outside a popular café—and there were many passers, soldier, civilian, women, yet none of them so much as paused, as though it were a familiar sight. He was looking at the policeman. "Can't you take him to his ship?"

"I thought of that before the captain did," the policeman said. "He says he can't go aboard his ship after dark because he puts the ship away at sundown."

"Puts it away?"

"Stand up, sailor!" the policeman said savagely, jerking at his lax burden. "Maybe the captain can make sense out of it. Damned if I can. He says they keep the boat under the wharf. Run it under the wharf at night, and that they can't get it out again until the tide goes out tomorrow."

"Under the wharf? A boat? What is this?" He was now speaking to the lieutenant. "Do they operate some kind of aquatic motorcycles?"

"Something like that," the lieutenant said. "You've seen them—the boats. Launches, camouflaged and all. Dashing up and down the harbor. You've seen them. They do that all day and sleep in the gutters here all night."

"Oh," the captain said. "I thought those boats were ship commanders' launches. You mean to tell me they use officers just to——"

"I don't know," the lieutenant said. "Maybe they use them to fetch hot water from one ship to another. Or buns. Or maybe to go back and forth fast when they forget napkins or something."

"Nonsense," the captain said. He looked at the English boy again.

"That's what they do," the lieutenant said. "Town's lousy with them all night long. Gutters full, and their M.P.'s carting them away in batches, like nursemaids in a park. Maybe the French give them the launches to get them out of the gutters during the day."

"Oh," the captain said, "I see." But it was clear that he didn't see, wasn't listening, didn't believe what he did hear. He looked at the English boy. "Well, you can't leave him here in that shape," he said.

Again the English boy tried to pull himself together. "Quite all right, 'sure you," he said glassily, his voice pleasant, cheerful almost, quite courteous. "Used to it. Confounded rough pavé, though. Should force French do something about it. Visiting lads jolly well deserve decent field to play on, what?"

"And he was jolly well using all of it too," the policeman said savagely. "He must think he's a one-man team, maybe."

At that moment a fifth man came up. He was a British military policeman. "Nah then," he said. "What's this? What's this?" Then he saw the American's shoulder bars. He saluted. At the sound of his voice the English boy turned, swaying, peering.

"Oh, hullo, Albert," he said.

"Nah then, Mr. Hope," the British policeman said. He said to the American policeman, over his shoulder: "What is it this time?"

"Likely nothing," the American said. "The way you guys run a war. But I'm a stranger here. Here. Take him."

"What is this, Corporal?" the captain said. "What was he doing?"

"He won't call it nothing," the American policeman said, jerking his head at the British policeman. "He'll just call it a thrush or a robin or something. I turn into this street about three blocks back a while ago, and I find it blocked with a line of trucks going up from the docks, and the drivers all hollering ahead what the hell the trouble is. So I come on, and I find it is about three blocks of them, blocking the cross streets too; and I come on to the head of it where the trouble is, and I find about a dozen of the drivers out in front, holding a caucus or something in the middle of the street, and I come up and I say, 'What's going on here?' and they leave me through and I find this egg here laying——"

"Yer talking about one of His Majesty's officers, my man," the British policeman said.

"Watch yourself, Corporal," the captain said. "And you found this officer——"

"He had done gone to bed in the middle of the street, with an empty basket for a pillow. Laying there with his hands under his head and his knees crossed, arguing with them about whether he ought to get up and move or not. He said that the trucks could turn back and go around by another street, but that he couldn't use any other street, because this street was his."

"His street?"

The English boy had listened, interested, pleasant. "Billet, you see," he said. "Must have order, even in war emergency. Billet by lot. This street mine; no poaching, eh? Next street Jamie Wutherspoon's. But trucks can go by that street because Jamie not using it yet. Not in bed yet. Insomnia. Knew so. Told them. Trucks go that way. See now?"

"Was that it, Corporal?" the captain said.

"He told you. He wouldn't get up. He just laid there, arguing with them. He was telling one of them to go somewhere and bring back a copy of their articles of war——"

"King's Regulations; yes," the captain said.

"—and see if the book said whether he had the right of way, or the trucks. And then I got him up, and then the captain come along. And that's all. And with the captain's permission I'll now hand him over to His Majesty's wet nur——"

"That'll do, Corporal," the captain said. "You can go. I'll see to this." The policeman saluted and went on. The British policeman was now supporting the English boy. "Can't you take him home?" the captain said. "Where are their quarters?"

"I don't rightly know, sir, if they have quarters or not. We—I usually see them about the pubs until daylight. They don't seem to use quarters."

"You mean, they really aren't off of ships?"

"Well, sir, they might be ships, in a manner of speaking. But a man would have to be a bit sleepier than him to sleep in one of them."

"I see," the captain said. He looked at the policeman. "What kind of boats are they?"

This time the policeman's voice was immediate, final and completely inflectionless. It was like a closed door. "I don't rightly know, sir."

"Oh," the captain said. "Quite. Well, he's in no shape to stay about pubs until daylight this time."

"Perhaps I can find him a bit of a pub with a back table, where he can sleep," the policeman said. But the captain was not listening. He was looking across the street, where the lights of another café fell across the pavement. The English boy yawned terrifically, like a child does, his mouth pink and frankly gaped as a child's.

The captain turned to the policeman:

"Would you mind stepping across there and asking for Captain Bogard's driver? I'll take care of Mr. Hope."

The policeman departed. The captain now supported the English boy, his hand beneath the other's arm. Again the boy yawned like a weary child. "Steady," the captain said. "The car will be here in a minute."

"Right," the English boy said through the yawn.

Once in the car, he went to sleep immediately with the peaceful suddenness of babies, sitting between the two Americans. But though the aëro-drome was only thirty minutes away, he was awake when they arrived, apparently quite fresh, and asking for whisky. When they entered the mess he appeared quite sober, only blinking a little in the lighted room, in his raked cap and his awry-buttoned pea-jacket and a soiled silk muffler, embroidered with a club insignia which Bogard recognized to have come from a famous preparatory school, twisted about his throat.

"Ah," he said, his voice fresh, clear now, not blurred, quite cheerful, quite loud, so that the others in the room turned and looked at him. "Jolly. Whisky, what?" He went straight as a bird dog to the bar in the corner, the lieutenant following. Bogard had turned and gone on to the other end of the room, where five men sat about a card table.

"What's he admiral of?" one said.

"Of the whole Scotch navy, when I found him," Bogard said.

Another looked up. "Oh. I thought I'd seen him in town." He looked at the guest. "Maybe it's because he was on his feet that I didn't recognize him when he came in. You usually see them lying down in the gutter."

"Oh," the first said. He, too, looked around. "Is he one of those guys?"

"Sure. You've seen them. Sitting on the curb, you know, with a couple of limey M. P.'s hauling at their arms."

"Yes. I've seen them," the other said. They all looked at the English boy. He stood at the bar, talking, his voice loud, cheerful. "They all look like him too," the speaker said. "About seventeen or eighteen. They run those little boats that are always dashing in and out."

"Is that what they do?" a third said. "You mean, there's a male marine auxiliary to the Waacs? Good Lord, I sure made a mistake when I enlisted. But this war never was advertised right."

"I don't know," Bogard said. "I guess they do more than just ride around."

But they were not listening to him. They were looking at the guest. "They run by clock," the first said. "You can see the condition of one of them after sunset and almost tell what time it is. But what I don't see, is how a man that's in that shape at one o'clock every morning can even see a battleship the next day."

"Maybe when they have a message to send out to a ship," another said, "they just make duplicates and line the launches up and point them toward the ship and give each one a duplicate of the message and let them go. And the ones that miss the ship just cruise around the harbor until they hit a dock somewhere."

"It must be more than that," Bogard said.

He was about to say something else, but at that moment the guest turned from the bar and approached, carrying a glass. He walked steadily enough, but his color was high and his eyes were bright, and he was talking, loud, cheerful, as he came up.

"I say. Won't you chaps join——" He ceased. He seemed to remark something; he was looking at their breasts. "Oh, I say. You fly. All of you. Oh, good gad! Find it jolly, eh?"

"Yes," somebody said. "Jolly."

"But dangerous, what?"

"A little faster than tennis," another said. The guest looked at him, bright, affable, intent.

Another said quickly, "Bogard says you command a vessel."

"Hardly a vessel. Thanks, though. And not command. Ronnie does that. Ranks me a bit. Age."

"Ronnie?"

"Yes. Nice. Good egg. Old, though. Stickler."

"Stickler?"

"Frightful. You'd not believe it. Whenever we sight smoke and I have the glass, he sheers away. Keeps the ship hull down all the while. No beaver then. Had me two down a fortnight yesterday."

The Americans glanced at one another. "No beaver?"

"We play it. With basket masts, you see. See a basket mast. Beaver! One up. The Ergenstrasse doesn't count any more, though."

The men about the table looked at one another. Bogard spoke. "I see. When you or Ronnie see a ship with basket masts, you get a beaver on the other. I see. What is the Ergenstrasse?"

"She's German. Interned. Tramp steamer. Foremast rigged so it looks something like a basket mast. Booms, cables, I daresay. I didn't think it looked very much like a basket mast, myself. But Ronnie said yes. Called it one day. Then one day they shifted her across the basin and I called her on Ronnie. So we decided to not count her any more. See now, eh?"

"Oh," the one who had made the tennis remark said, "I see. You and Ronnie run about in the launch, playing beaver. H'm'm. That's nice. Did you ever pl——"

"Jerry," Bogard said. The guest had not moved. He looked down at the speaker, still smiling, his eyes quite wide.

The speaker still looked at the guest. "Has yours and Ronnie's boat got a yellow stern?"

"A yellow stern?" the English boy said. He had quit smiling, but his face was still pleasant.

"I thought that maybe when the boats had two captains, they might paint the sterns yellow or something."

"Oh," the guest said. "Burt and Reeves aren't officers."

"Burt and Reeves," the other said, in a musing tone. "So they go too. Do they play beaver too?"

"Jerry," Bogard said. The other looked at him. Bogard jerked his head a little. "Come over here." The other rose. They went aside. "Lay off of him," Bogard said. "I mean it, now. He's just a kid. When you were that age, how much sense did you have? Just about enough to get to chapel on time."

"My country hadn't been at war going on four years, though," Jerry said.

"Here we are, spending our money and getting shot at by the clock, and it's not even our fight, and these limeys that would have been goose-stepping twelve months now if it hadn't been——"

"Shut it," Bogard said. "You sound like a Liberty Loan."

"—taking it like it was a fair or something. 'Jolly.'" His voice was now falsetto, lilting. "'But dangerous, what?'"

"Sh-h-h-h," Bogard said.

"I'd like to catch him and his Ronnie out in the harbor, just once. Any harbor. London's. I wouldn't want anything but a Jenny, either. Jenny? Hell, I'd take a bicycle and a pair of water wings! I'll show him some war."

"Well, you lay off him now. He'll be gone soon."

"What are you going to do with him?"

"I'm going to take him along this morning. Let him have Harper's place out front. He says he can handle a Lewis. Says they have one on the boat. Something he was telling me—about how he once shot out a channel-marker light at seven hundred yards."

"Well, that's your business. Maybe he can beat you."

"Beat me?"

"Playing beaver. And then you can take on Ronnie."

"I'll show him some war, anyway," Bogard said. He looked at the guest. "His people have been in it three years now, and he seems to take it like a sophomore in town for the big game." He looked at Jerry again. "But you lay off him now."

As they approached the table, the guest's voice was loud and cheerful: ". . . if he got the glasses first, he would go in close and look, but when I got them first, he'd sheer off where I couldn't see anything but the smoke. Frightful stickler. Frightful. But Ergenstrasse not counting any more. And if you make a mistake and call her, you lose two beaver from your score. If Ronnie were only to forget and call her we'd be even."

At two o'clock the English boy was still talking, his voice bright, innocent, and cheerful. He was telling them how Switzerland had been spoiled by 1914, and instead of the vacation which his father had promised him for his sixteenth birthday, when that birthday came he and his tutor had had to do with Wales. But that he and the tutor had got pretty high and that he dared to say—with all due respect to any present who might have had the advantage of Switzerland, of course—that one could see probably as far from Wales as from Switzerland. "Perspire as much and breathe as hard, anyway," he added. And about him the Americans sat, a little hard-bitten, a little sober, somewhat older, listening to him with a kind of cold astonishment. They had been getting up for some time now and going out and returning in flying clothes, carrying helmets and goggles. An orderly entered with a tray of coffee cups, and the guest realized that for some time now he had been hearing engines in the darkness outside.

At last Bogard rose. "Come along," he said. "We'll get your togs." When they emerged from the mess, the sound of the engines was quite loud—an idling thunder. In alignment along the invisible tarmac was a vague rank of short banks of flickering blue-green fire suspended apparently in mid-air. They crossed the aërodrome to Bogard's quarters, where the lieutenant, McGinnis, sat on a cot fastening his flying boots. Bogard reached down a Sidcott suit and threw it across the cot. "Put this on," he said.

"Will I need all this?" the guest said. "Shall we be gone that long?"

"Probably," Bogard said. "Better use it. Cold upstairs."

The guest picked up the suit. "I say," he said. "I say. Ronnie and I have a do ourselves, tomor—today. Do you think Ronnie won't mind if I am a bit late? Might not wait for me."

"We'll be back before teatime," McGinnis said. He seemed quite busy with his boot. "Promise you." The English boy looked at him.

"What time should you be back?" Bogard said.

"Oh, well," the English boy said, "I daresay it will be all right. They let Ronnie say when to go, anyway. He'll wait for me if I should be a bit late."

"He'll wait," Bogard said. "Get your suit on."

"Right," the other said. They helped him into the suit. "Never been up before," he said, chattily, pleasantly. "Daresay you can see farther than from mountains, eh?"

"See more, anyway," McGinnis said. "You'll like it."

"Oh, rather. If Ronnie only waits for me. Lark. But dangerous, isn't it?"

"Go on," McGinnis said. "You're kidding me."

"Shut your trap, Mac," Bogard said. "Come along. Want some more coffee?" He looked at the guest, but McGinnis answered:

"No. Got something better than coffee. Coffee makes such a confounded stain on the wings."

"On the wings?" the English boy said. "Why coffee on the wings?"

"Stow it, I said, Mac," Bogard said. "Come along."

They recrossed the aërodrome, approaching the muttering banks of flame. When they drew near, the guest began to discern the shape, the outlines, of the Handley-Page. It looked like a Pullman coach run upslanted aground into the skeleton of the first floor of an incomplete skyscraper. The guest looked at it quietly.

"It's larger than a cruiser," he said in his bright, interested voice. "I say, you know. This doesn't fly in one lump. You can't pull my leg. Seen them before. It comes in two parts: Captain Bogard and me in one; Mac and 'nother chap in other. What?"

"No," McGinnis said. Bogard had vanished. "It all goes up in one lump. Big lark, eh? Buzzard, what?"

"Buzzard?" the guest murmured. "Oh, I say. A cruiser. Flying. I say, now."

"And listen," McGinnis said. His hand came forth; something cold fumbled against the hand of the English boy—a bottle. "When you feel yourself getting sick, see? Take a pull at it."

"Oh, shall I get sick?"

"Sure. We all do. Part of flying. This will stop it. But if it doesn't. See?"

"What? Quite. What?"

"Not overside. Don't spew it overside."

"Not overside?"

"It'll blow back in Bogy's and my face. Can't see. Bingo. Finished. See?"

"Oh, quite. What shall I do with it?" Their voices were quiet, brief, grave as conspirators.

"Just duck your head and let her go."

"Oh, quite."

Bogard returned. "Show him how to get into the front pit, will you?" he said. McGinnis led the way through the trap. Forward, rising to the slant of the fuselage, the passage narrowed; a man would need to crawl.

"Crawl in there and keep going," McGinnis said.

"It looks like a dog kennel," the guest said.

"Doesn't it, though?" McGinnis agreed cheerfully. "Cut along with you." Stooping, he could hear the other scuttling forward. "You'll find a Lewis gun up there, like as not," he said into the tunnel.

The voice of the guest came back: "Found it."

"The gunnery sergeant will be along in a minute and show you if it is loaded."

"It's loaded," the guest said; almost on the heels of his words the gun fired, a brief staccato burst. There were shouts, the loudest from the ground beneath the nose of the aeroplane. "It's quite all right," the English boy's voice said. "I pointed it west before I let it off. Nothing back there but Marine office and your brigade headquarters. Ronnie and I always do this before we go anywhere. Sorry if I was too soon. Oh, by the way," he added, "my name's Claude. Don't think I mentioned it."

On the ground, Bogard and two other officers stood. They had come up running. "Fired it west," one said. "How in hell does he know which way is west?"

"He's a sailor," the other said. "You forgot that."

"He seems to be a machine gunner too," Bogard said.

"Let's hope he doesn't forget that," the first said.

Nevertheless, Bogard kept an eye on the silhouetted head rising from the round gunpit in the nose ten feet ahead of him. "He did work that gun, though," he said to McGinnis beside him. "He even put the drum on himself, didn't he?"

"Yes," McGinnis said. "If he just doesn't forget and think that that gun is him and his tutor looking around from a Welsh alp."

"Maybe I should not have brought him," Bogard said. McGinnis didn't answer. Bogard jockeyed the wheel a little. Ahead, in the gunner's pit, the guest's head moved this way and that continuously, looking. "We'll get there and unload and haul air for home," Bogard said. "Maybe in the dark — Confound it, it would be a shame for his country to be in this mess for four years and him not even to see a gun pointed in his direction."

"He'll see one tonight if he don't keep his head in," McGinnis said.

But the boy did not do that. Not even when they had reached the objective and McGinnis had crawled down to the bomb toggles. And even when the searchlights found them and Bogard signaled to the other machines and dived, the two engines snarling full speed into and through the bursting shells, he could see the boy's face in the searchlight's glare, leaned far overside, coming sharply out as a spotlighted face on a stage, with an expression upon it of childlike interest and delight. "But he's firing that Lewis," Bogard thought. "Straight too"; nosing the machine farther down, watching the pinpoint swing into the sights, his right hand lifted, waiting to drop into McGinnis's sight. He dropped his hand; above the noise of the engines he seemed to hear the click and whistle of the released bombs as the machine, freed of the weight, shot zooming in a long upward bounce that carried it for an instant out of the light. Then he was pretty busy for a time, coming into and through the shells again, shooting athwart another beam that caught and held long enough for him to see the English boy leaning far over the side, looking back and down past the right wing, the undercarriage. "Maybe he's read about it somewhere," Bogard thought, turning, looking back to pick up the rest of the flight.

Then it was all over, the darkness cool and empty and peaceful and almost quiet, with only the steady sound of the engines. McGinnis climbed back into the office, and standing up in his seat, he fired the colored pistol this time and stood for a moment longer, looking backward toward where the searchlights still probed and sabered. He sat down again.

"O. K.," he said. "I counted all four of them. Let's haul air." Then he looked forward. "What's become of the King's Own? You didn't hang him onto a bomb release, did you?" Bogard looked. The forward pit was empty. It was in dim silhouette again now, against the stars, but there was nothing there now save the gun. "No," McGinnis said; "there he is. See? Leaning overside. Dammit, I told him not to spew it! There he comes back." The guest's head came into view again. But again it sank out of sight.

"He's coming back," Bogard said. "Stop him. Tell him we're going to have every squadron in the Hun Channel group on top of us in thirty minutes."

McGinnis swung himself down and stooped at the entrance to the passage. "Get back!" he shouted. The other was almost out; they squatted so, face to face like two dogs, shouting at one another above the noise of the still unthrottled engines on either side of the fabric walls. The English boy's voice was thin and high.

"Bomb!" he shrieked.

"Yes," McGinnis shouted, "they were bombs! We gave them hell! Get back, I tell you! Have every Hun in France on us in ten minutes! Get back to your gun!"

Again the boy's voice came, high, faint above the noise: "Bomb! All right?"

"Yes! Yes! All right. Back to your gun, damn you!"

McGinnis climbed back into the office. "He went back. Want me to take her awhile?"

"All right," Bogard said. He passed McGinnis the wheel. "Ease her back some. I'd just as soon it was daylight when they come down on us."

"Right," McGinnis said. He moved the wheel suddenly. "What's the matter with that right wing?" he said. "Watch it. . . . See? I'm flying on the right aileron and a little rudder. Feel it."

Bogard took the wheel a moment. "I didn't notice that. Wire somewhere, I guess. I didn't think any of those shells were that close. Watch her, though."

"Right," McGinnis said. "And so you are going with him on his boat tomorrow—today."

"Yes. I promised him. Confound it, you can't hurt a kid, you know."

"Why don't you take Collier along, with his mandolin? Then you could sail around and sing."

"I promised him," Bogard said. "Get that wing up a little."

"Right," McGinnis said.

Thirty minutes later it was beginning to be dawn; the sky was gray. Presently McGinnis said: "Well, here they come. Look at them! They look like mosquitoes in September. I hope he don't get worked up now and think he's playing beaver. If he does he'll just be one down to Ronnie, provided the devil has a beard. . . . Want the wheel?"

At eight o'clock the beach, the Channel, was beneath them. Throttled back, the machine drifted down as Bogard ruddered it gently into the Channel wind. His face was strained, a little tired.

McGinnis looked tired, too, and he needed a shave.

"What do you guess he is looking at now?" he said. For again the English boy was leaning over the right side of the cockpit, looking backward and downward past the right wing.

"I don't know," Bogard said. "Maybe bullet holes." He blasted the port engine. "Must have the riggers——"

"He could see some closer than that," McGinnis said. "I'll swear I saw tracer going into his back at one time. Or maybe it's the ocean he's looking at. But he must have seen that when he came over from England." Then Bogard leveled off; the nose rose sharply, the sand, the curling tide edge fled alongside. Yet still the English boy hung far overside, looking backward and downward at something beneath the right wing, his face rapt, with utter and childlike interest. Until the machine was completely stopped he continued to do so. Then he ducked down, and in the abrupt silence of the engines they could hear him crawling in the passage. He emerged just as the two pilots climbed stiffly down from the office, his face bright, eager; his voice high, excited.

"Oh, I say! Oh, good gad! What a chap! What a judge of distance! If Ronnie could only have seen! Oh, good gad! Or maybe they aren't like ours—don't load themselves as soon as the air strikes them."

The Americans looked at him. "What don't what?" McGinnis said.

"The bomb. It was magnificent; I say, I shan't forget it. Oh, I say, you know! It was splendid!"

After a while McGinnis said, "The bomb?" in a fainting voice. Then the two pilots glared at each other; they said in unison: "That right wing!" Then as one they clawed down through the trap and, with the guest at their heels, they ran around the machine and looked beneath the right wing. The bomb, suspended by its tail, hung straight down like a plumb bob beside the right wheel, its tip just touching the sand. And parallel with the wheel track was the long, delicate line in the sand where its ultimate tip had dragged. Behind them the English boy's voice was high, clear, child-like:

"Frightened, myself. Tried to tell you. But realized you knew your business better than I. Skill. Marvelous. Oh, I say, I shan't forget it."

A marine with a bayoneted rifle passed Bogard onto the wharf and directed him to the boat. The wharf was empty, and he didn't even see the boat until he approached the edge of the wharf and looked directly down into it and upon the backs of two stooping men in greasy dungarees, who rose and glanced briefly at him and stooped again.

It was about thirty feet long and about three feet wide. It was painted with gray-green camouflage. It was quarter-decked forward, with two blunt raked exhaust stacks. "Good Lord," Bogard thought, "if all that deck is engine—" Just aft the deck was the control seat; he saw a big wheel, an instrument panel. Rising to a height of about a foot above the freeboard, and running from the stern forward to where the deck began, and continuing on across the after edge of the deck and thence back down the other gunwale to the stern, was a solid screen, also camouflaged, which inclosed the boat save for the width of the stern, which was open. Facing the steersman's seat like an eye was a hole in the screen about eight inches in diameter. And looking down into the long, narrow, still, vicious shape, he saw a machine gun swiveled at the stern, and he looked at the low screen—including which the whole vessel did not sit much more than a yard above water level—with its single empty forward-staring eye, and he thought quietly: "It's steel. It's made of steel." And his face was quite sober, quite thoughtful, and he drew his trench coat about him and buttoned it, as though he were getting cold.

He heard steps behind him and turned. But it was only an orderly from the aërodrome, accompanied by the marine with the rifle. The orderly was carrying a largish bundle wrapped in paper.

"From Lieutenant McGinnis to the captain," the orderly said.

Bogard took the bundle. The orderly and the marine retreated. He opened the bundle. It contained some objects and a scrawled note. The objects were a new yellow silk sofa cushion and a Japanese parasol, obviously borrowed, and a comb and a few sheets of flimsy paper. The note said:

Couldn't find a camera anywhere and Collier wouldn't let me have his mandolin. But maybe Ronnie can play on the comb.

MAC

Bogard looked at the objects. But his face was still quite thoughtful, quite grave. He rewrapped the things and carried the bundle on up the wharf a way and dropped it quietly into the water.

As he returned toward the invisible boat he saw two men approaching. He recognized the boy at once—tall, slender, already talking, voluble, his head bent a little toward his shorter companion, who plodded along beside him, hands in pockets, smoking a pipe. The boy still wore the pea-coat beneath a flapping oilskin, but in place of the rakish and casual cap he now wore an infantryman's soiled Balaclava helmet, with, floating behind him as though upon the sound of his voice, a curtainlike piece of cloth almost as long as a burnous.

"Hullo, there!" he cried, still a hundred yards away.

But it was the second man that Bogard was watching, thinking to himself that he had never in his life seen a more curious figure. There was something stolid about the very shape of his hunched shoulders, his slightly down-looking face. He was a head shorter than the other. His face was ruddy, too, but its mold was of a profound gravity that was almost dour. It was the face of a man of twenty who has been for a year trying, even while asleep, to look twenty-one. He wore a high-necked sweater and dungaree slacks; above this a leather jacket; and above this a soiled naval officer's warmer that reached almost to his heels and which had one shoulder strap missing and not one remaining button at all. On his head was a plaid fore-and-aft deer stalker's cap, tied on by a narrow scarf brought across and down, hiding his ears, and then wrapped once about his throat and knotted with a hangman's noose beneath his left ear. It was unbelievably soiled, and with his hands elbow-deep in his pockets and his hunched shoulders and his bent head, he looked like someone's grandmother hanged, say, for a witch. Clamped upside down between his teeth was a short brier pipe.

"Here he is!" the boy cried. "This is Ronnie. Captain Bogard."

"How are you?" Bogard said. He extended his hand. The other said no word, but his hand came forth, limp. It was quite cold, but it was hard, calloused. He said no word; he just glanced briefly at Bogard and then away. But in that instant Bogard caught something in the look, something strange—a flicker; a kind of covert and curious respect, something like a boy of fifteen looking at a circus trapezist.

But he said no word. He ducked on; Bogard watched him drop from sight over the wharf edge as though he had jumped feet first into the sea. He remarked now that the engines in the invisible boat were running.

"We might get aboard too," the boy said. He started toward the boat, then he stopped. He touched Bogard's arm. "Yonder!" he hissed. "See?" His voice was thin with excitement.

"What?" Bogard also whispered; automatically he looked backward and upward, after old habit. The other was gripping his arm and pointing across the harbor.

"There! Over there. The Ergenstrasse. They have shifted her again." Across the harbor lay an ancient, rusting, sway-backed hulk. It was small and nondescript, and, remembering, Bogard saw that the foremast was a strange mess of cables and booms, resembling—allowing for a great deal of license or looseness of imagery—a basket mast. Beside him the boy was almost chortling. "Do you think that Ronnie noticed?" he hissed. "Do you?"

"I don't know," Bogard said.

"Oh, good gad! If he should glance up and call her before he notices, we'll be even. Oh, good gad! But come along." He went on; he was still chortling. "Careful," he said. "Frightful ladder."

He descended first, the two men in the boat rising and saluting. Ronnie had disappeared, save for his backside, which now filled a small hatch leading forward beneath the deck. Bogard descended gingerly.

"Good Lord," he said. "Do you have to climb up and down this every day?"

"Frightful, isn't it?" the other said, in his happy voice. "But you know yourself. Try to run a war with makeshifts, then wonder why it takes so long." The narrow hull slid and surged, even with Bogard's added weight. "Sits right on top, you see," the boy said. "Would float on a lawn, in a heavy dew. Goes right over them like a bit of paper."

"It does?" Bogard said.

"Oh, absolutely. That's why, you see." Bogard didn't see, but he was too busy letting himself gingerly down to a sitting posture. There were no thwarts; no seats save a long, thick, cylindrical ridge which ran along the bottom of the boat from the driver's seat to the stern. Ronnie had backed into sight. He now sat behind the wheel, bent over the instrument panel. But when he glanced back over his shoulder he did not speak. His face was merely interrogatory. Across his face there was now a long smudge of grease. The boy's face was empty, too, now.

"Right," he said. He looked forward, where one of the seamen had gone. "Ready forward?" he said.

"Aye, sir," the seaman said.

The other seaman was at the stern line. "Ready aft?"

"Aye, sir."

"Cast off." The boat sheered away, purring, a boiling of water under the stern. The boy looked down at Bogard, "Silly business. Do it shipshape, though. Can't tell when silly four-striper——" His face changed again, immediate, solicitous. "I say. Will you be warm? I never thought to fetch——"

"I'll be all right," Bogard said. But the other was already taking off his oilskin. "No, no," Bogard said. "I won't take it."

"You'll tell me if you get cold?"

"Yes. Sure." He was looking down at the cylinder on which he sat. It was a half cylinder—that is, like the hot-water tank to some Gargantuan stove, sliced down the middle and bolted, open side down, to the floor plates. It was twenty feet long and more than two feet thick. Its top rose as high as the gunwales and between it and the hull on either side was just room enough for a man to place his feet to walk.

"That's Muriel," the boy said.

"Muriel?"

"Yes. The one before that was Agatha. After my aunt. The first one Ronnie and I had was Alice in Wonderland. Ronnie and I were the White Rabbit. Jolly, eh?"

"Oh, you and Ronnie have had three, have you?"

"Oh yes," the boy said. He leaned down. "He didn't notice," he whispered. His face was again bright, gleeful. "When we come back," he said. "You watch."

"Oh," Bogard said. "The Ergenstrasse." He looked astern, and then he thought: "Good Lord! We must be going—traveling." He looked out now, broadside, and saw the harbor line fleeing past, and he thought to himself that the boat was well-nigh moving at the speed at which the Handley-Page flew, left the ground. They were beginning to bound now, even in the sheltered water, from one wave crest to the next with a distinct shock. His hand still rested on the cylinder on which he sat. He looked down at it again, following it from where it seemed to emerge, beneath Ronnie's seat, to where it beveled into the stern. "It's the air in here, I suppose," he said.

"The what?" the boy said.

"The air. Stored up in here. That makes the boat ride high."

"Oh, yes. I daresay. Very likely. I hadn't thought about it." He came forward, his burnous whipping in the wind, and sat down beside Bogard. Their heads were below the top of the screen.

Astern the harbor fled, diminishing, sinking into the sea. The boat had begun to lift now, swooping forward and down, shocking almost stationary for a moment, then lifting and swooping again; a gout of spray came aboard over the bows like a flung shovelful of shot. "I wish you'd take this coat," the boy said.

Bogard didn't answer. He looked around at the bright face. "We're outside, aren't we?" he said quietly.

"Yes. . . . Do take it, won't you?"

"Thanks, no. I'll be all right. We won't be long, anyway, I guess."

"No. We'll turn soon. It won't be so bad then."

"Yes. I'll be all right when we turn." Then they did turn. The motion became easier. That is, the boat didn't bang head-on, shuddering, into the swells. They came up beneath now, and the boat fled with increased speed, with a long, sickening, yawning motion, first to one side and then the other. But it fled on, and Bogard looked astern with that same soberness with which he had first looked down into the boat. "We're going east now," he said.

"With just a spot of north," the boy said. "Makes her ride a bit better, what?"

"Yes," Bogard said. Astern there was nothing now save empty sea and the delicate needlelike cant of the machine gun against the boiling and slewing wake, and the two seamen crouching quietly in the stern. "Yes. It's easier." Then he said: "How far do we go?"

The boy leaned closer. He moved closer. His voice was happy, confidential, proud, though lowered a little: "It's Ronnie's show. He thought of it. Not that I wouldn't have, in time. Gratitude and all that. But he's the older, you see. Thinks fast. Courtesy, noblesse oblige—all that. Thought of it soon as I told him this morning. I said, 'Oh, I say. I've been there. I've seen it'; and he said, 'Not flying'; and I said, 'Strewth'; and he said 'How far? No lying now'; and I said, 'Oh, far. Tremendous. Gone all night'; and he said, 'Flying all night. That must have been to Berlin'; and I said, 'I don't know. I daresay'; and he thought. I could see him thinking. Because he is the older, you see. More experience in courtesy, right thing. And he said, 'Berlin. No fun to that chap, dashing out and back with us.' And he thought and I waited, and I said, 'But we can't take him to Berlin. Too far. Don't know the way, either'; and he said—fast, like a shot—said, 'But there's Kiel'; and I knew—"

"What?" Bogard said. Without moving, his whole body sprang. "Kiel? In this?"

"Absolutely. Ronnie thought of it. Smart, even if he is a stickler. Said at once, 'Zeebrugge no show at all for that chap. Must do best we can for him. Berlin,' Ronnie said. 'My gad! Berlin.'"

"Listen," Bogard said. He had turned now, facing the other, his face quite grave. "What is this boat for?"

"For?"

"What does it do?" Then, knowing beforehand the answer to his own question, he said, putting his hand on the cylinder: "What is this in here? A torpedo, isn't it?"

"I thought you knew," the boy said.

"No," Bogard said. "I didn't know." His voice seemed to reach him from a distance, dry, cricketlike: "How do you fire it?"

"Fire it?"

"How do you get it out of the boat? When that hatch was open a while ago I could see the engines. They were right in front of the end of this tube."

"Oh," the boy said. "You pull a gadget there and the torpedo drops out astern. As soon as the screw touches the water it begins to turn, and then the torpedo is ready, loaded. Then all you have to do is turn the boat quickly and the torpedo goes on."

"You mean——" Bogard said. After a moment his voice obeyed him again. "You mean you aim the torpedo with the boat and release it and it starts moving, and you turn the boat out of the way and the torpedo passes through the same water that the boat just vacated?"

"Knew you'd catch on," the boy said. "Told Ronnie so. Airman. Tamer than yours, though. But can't be helped. Best we can do, just on water. But knew you'd catch on."

"Listen," Bogard said. His voice sounded to him quite calm. The boat fled on, yawing over the swells. He sat quite motionless. It seemed to him that he could hear himself talking to himself: "Go on. Ask him. Ask him what? Ask him how close to the ship do you have to be before you fire. . . . Listen," he said in that calm voice. "Now, you tell Ronnie, you see. You just tell him—just say——" He could feel his voice rattling off on him again, so he stopped it. He sat quite motionless, waiting for it to come back; the boy leaning now, looking at his face. Again the boy's voice was solicitous:

"I say. You're not feeling well. These confounded shallow boats."

"It's not that," Bogard said. "I just—— Do your orders say Kiel?"

"Oh, no. They let Ronnie say. Just so we bring the boat back. This is for you. Gratitude. Ronnie's idea. Tame, after flying. But if you'd rather, eh?"

"Yes, some place closer. You see, I——"

"Quite. I see. No vacations in wartime. I'll tell Ronnie." He went forward. Bogard did not move. The boat fled in long, slewing swoops. Bogard looked quietly astern, at the scudding sea, the sky.

"My God!" he thought. "Can you beat it? Can you beat it?"

The boy came back; Bogard turned to him a face the color of dirty paper. "All right now," the boy said. "Not Kiel. Nearer place, hunting probably just as good. Ronnie says he knows you will understand." He was tugging at his pocket. He brought out a bottle. "Here. Haven't forgot last night. Do the same for you. Good for the stomach, eh?"

Bogard drank, gulping—a big one. He extended the bottle, but the boy refused. "Never touch it on duty," he said. "Not like you chaps. Tame here."

The boat fled on. The sun was already down the west. But Bogard had lost all count of time, of distance. Ahead he could see white seas through the round eye opposite Ronnie's face, and Ronnie's hand on the wheel and the granitelike jut of his profiled jaw and the dead upside-down pipe. The boat fled on.

Then the boy leaned and touched his shoulder. He half rose. The boy was pointing. The sun was reddish; against it, outside them and about two miles away, a vessel—a trawler, it looked like—at anchor swung a tall mast.

"Lightship!" the boy shouted. "Theirs." Ahead Bogard could see a low, flat mole—the entrance to a harbor. "Channel!" the boy shouted. He swept his arm in both directions. "Mines!" His voice swept back on the wind. "Place filthy with them. All sides. Beneath us too. Lark, eh?"

Against the mole a fair surf was beating. Running before the seas now, the boat seemed to leap from one roller to the next; in the intervals while the screw was in the air the engine seemed to be trying to tear itself out by the roots. But it did not slow; when it passed the end of the mole the boat seemed to be standing almost erect on its rudder, like a sailfish. The mole was a mile away. From the end of it little faint lights began to flicker like fireflies. The boy leaned. "Down," he said. "Machine guns. Might stop a stray."

"What do I do?" Bogard shouted. "What can I do?"

"Stout fellow! Give them hell, what? Knew you'd like it!"

Crouching, Bogard looked up at the boy, his face wild. "I can handle the machine gun!"

"No need," the boy shouted back. "Give them first innings. Sporting. Visitors, eh?" He was looking forward. "There she is. See?" They were in the harbor now, the basin opening before them. Anchored in the channel was a big freighter. Painted midships of the hull was a huge Argentine flag. "Must get back to stations!" the boy shouted down to him. Then at that moment Ronnie spoke for the first time. The boat was hurtling along now in smoother water. Its speed did not slacken and Ronnie did not turn his head when he spoke. He just swung his jutting jaw and the clamped cold pipe a little, and said from the side of his mouth a single word:

"Beaver."

The boy, stooped over what he had called his gadget, jerked up, his expression astonished and outraged. Bogard also looked forward and saw Ronnie's arm pointing to starboard. It was a light cruiser at anchor a mile away. She had basket masts, and as he looked a gun flashed from her after turret. "Oh, damn!" the boy cried. "Oh, you putt! Oh, confound you, Ronnie! Now I'm three down!" But he had already stooped again over his gadget, his face bright and empty and alert again; not sober; just calm, waiting. Again Bogard looked forward and felt the boat pivot on its rudder and head directly for the freighter at terrific speed, Ronnie now with one hand on the wheel and the other lifted and extended at the height of his head.

But it seemed to Bogard that the hand would never drop. He crouched, not sitting, watching with a kind of quiet horror a painted flag increase like a moving picture of a locomotive taken from between the rails. Again the gun crashed from the cruiser behind them, and the freighter fired point-blank at them from its poop. Bogard heard neither shot:

"Man, man!" he shouted. "For God's sake!"

Ronnie's hand dropped. Again the boat spun on its rudder. Bogard saw the bow rise, pivoting; he expected the hull to slam broadside on into the ship. But it didn't. It shot off on a long tangent. He was waiting for it to make a wide sweep, heading seaward, putting the freighter astern, and he thought of the cruiser again. "Get a broadside, this time, once we clear the freighter," he thought. Then he remembered the freighter, the torpedo, and he looked back toward the freighter to watch the torpedo strike, and saw to his horror that the boat was now bearing down on the freighter again, in a skidding turn. Like a man in a dream, he watched himself rush down upon the ship and shoot past under her counter, still skidding, close enough to see the faces on her decks. "They missed and they are going to run down the torpedo and catch it and shoot it again," he thought idiotically.

So the boy had to touch his shoulder before he knew he was behind him. The boy's voice was quite calm: "Under Ronnie's seat there. A bit of a crank handle. If you'll just hand it to me——"

He found the crank. He passed it back; he was thinking dreamily: "Mac would say they had a telephone on board." But he didn't look at once to see what the boy was doing with it, for in that still and peaceful horror he was watching Ronnie, the cold pipe rigid in his jaw, hurling the boat at top speed round and round the freighter, so near that he could see the rivets in the plates. Then he looked aft, his face wild, importunate, and he saw what the boy was doing with the crank. He had fitted it into what was obviously a small windlass low on one flank of the tube near the head. He glanced up and saw Bogard's face. "Didn't go that time!" he shouted cheerfully.

"Go?" Bogard shouted. "It didn't—— The torpedo——"

The boy and one of the seamen were quite busy, stooping over the windlass and the tube. "No. Clumsy. Always happening. Should think clever chaps like engineers—— Happens, though. Draw her in and try her again."

"But the nose, the cap!" Bogard shouted. "It's still in the tube, isn't it? It's all right, isn't it?"

"Absolutely. But it's working now. Loaded. Screw's started turning. Get it back and drop it clear. If we should stop or slow up it would overtake us. Drive back into the tube. Bingo! What?"

Bogard was on his feet now, turned, braced to the terrific merry-go-round of the boat. High above them the freighter seemed to be spinning on her heel like a trick picture in the movies. "Let me have that winch!" he cried.

"Steady!" the boy said. "Mustn't draw her back too fast. Jam her into the head of the tube ourselves. Same bingo! Best let us. Every cobbler to his last, what?"

"Oh, quite," Bogard said. "Oh, absolutely." It was like someone else was using his mouth. He leaned, braced, his hands on the cold tube, beside the others. He was hot inside, but his outside was cold. He could feel all his flesh jerking with cold as he watched the blunt, grained hand of the seaman turning the windlass in short, easy, inch-long arcs, while at the head of the tube the boy bent, tapping the cylinder with a spanner, lightly, his head turned with listening, delicate and deliberate as a watchmaker. The boat rushed on in those furious, slewing turns. Bogard saw a long, drooping thread loop down from somebody's mouth, between his hands, and he found that the thread came from his own mouth.

He didn't hear the boy speak, nor notice when he stood up. He just felt the boat straighten out, flinging him to his knees beside the tube. The seaman had gone back to the stern and the boy stooped again over his gadget. Bogard knelt now, quite sick. He did not feel the boat when it swung again, nor hear the gun from the cruiser which had not dared to fire and the freighter which had not been able to fire, firing again. He did not feel anything at all when he saw the huge, painted flag directly ahead and increasing with locomotive speed, and Ronnie's lifted hand drop. But this time he knew that the torpedo was gone; in pivoting and spinning this time the whole boat seemed to leave the water; he saw the bow of the boat shoot skyward like the nose of a pursuit ship going into a wing-over. Then his outraged stomach denied him. He saw neither the geyser nor heard the detonation as he sprawled over the tube. He felt only a hand grasp him by the slack of his coat, and the voice of one of the seamen: "Steady all, sir. I've got you."

A voice roused him, a hand. He was half sitting in the narrow starboard runway, half lying across the tube. He had been there for quite a while; quite a while ago he had felt someone spread a garment over him. But he had not raised his head. "I'm all right," he had said. "You keep it."

"Don't need it," the boy said. "Going home now."

"I'm sorry I—" Bogard said.

"Quite. Confounded shallow boats. Turn any stomach until you get used to them. Ronnie and I both, at first. Each time. You wouldn't believe it. Believe human stomach hold so much. Here." It was the bottle. "Good drink. Take enormous one. Good for stomach."

Bogard drank. Soon he did feel better, warmer. When the hand touched him later, he found that he had been asleep.

It was the boy again. The pea-coat was too small for him; shrunken, perhaps. Below the cuffs his long, slender, girl's wrists were blue with cold. Then Bogard realized what the garment was that had been laid over him. But before Bogard could speak, the boy leaned down, whispering; his face was gleeful: "He didn't notice!"

"What?"

"Ergenstrasse! He didn't notice that they had shifted her. Gad, I'd be just one down, then." He watched Bogard's face with bright, eager eyes. "Beaver, you know. I say. Feeling better, eh?"

"Yes," Bogard said, "I am."

"He didn't notice at all. Oh, gad! Oh, Jove!"

Bogard rose and sat on the tube. The entrance to the harbor was just ahead; the boat had slowed a little. It was just dusk. He said quietly: "Does this often happen?" The boy looked at him. Bogard touched the tube. "This. Failing to go out."

"Oh, yes. Why they put the windlass on them. That was later. Made first boat; whole thing blew up one day. So put on windlass."

"But it happens sometimes, even now? I mean, sometimes they blow up, even with the windlass?"

"Well, can't say, of course. Boats go out. Not come back. Possible. Not ever know, of course. Not heard of one captured yet, though. Possible. Not to us, though. Not yet."

"Yes," Bogard said. "Yes." They entered the harbor, the boat moving still fast, but throttled now and smooth, across the dusk-filled basin. Again the boy leaned down, his voice gleeful.

"Not a word, now!" he hissed. "Steady all!" He stood up; he raised his voice: "I say, Ronnie." Ronnie did not turn his head, but Bogard could tell that he was listening. "That Argentine ship was amusing, eh? In there. How do you suppose it got past us here? Might have stopped here as well. French would buy the wheat." He paused, diabolical—Machiavelli with the face of a strayed angel. "I say. How long has it been since we had a strange ship in here? Been months, eh?" Again he leaned, hissing. "Watch, now!" But Bogard could not see Ronnie's head move at all. "He's looking, though!" the boy whispered, breathed. And Ronnie was looking, though his head had not moved at all. Then there came into view, in silhouette against the dusk-filled sky, the vague, basketlike shape of the interned vessel's foremast. At once Ronnie's arm rose, pointing; again he spoke without turning his head, out of the side of his mouth, past the cold, clamped pipe, a single word:

"Beaver."

The boy moved like a released spring, like a heeled dog freed. "Oh, damn you!" he cried. "Oh, you putt! It's the Ergenstrasse! Oh, confound you! I'm just one down now!" He had stepped in one stride completely over Bogard, and he now leaned down over Ronnie. "What?" The boat was slowing in toward the wharf, the engine idle. "Aren't I, Ronnie? Just one down now?"

The boat drifted in; the seaman had again crawled forward onto the deck. Ronnie spoke for the third and last time. "Right," he said.

"I want," Bogard said, "a case of Scotch. The best we've got. And fix it up good. It's to go to town. And I want a responsible man to deliver it."

The responsible man came. "This is for a child," Bogard said, indicating the package. "You'll find him in the Street of the Twelve Hours, somewhere near the Café Twelve Hours. He'll be in the gutter. You'll know him. A child about six feet long. Any English M. P. will show him to you. If he is asleep, don't wake him. Just sit there and wait until he wakes up. Then give him this. Tell him it is from Captain Bogard."

About a month later a copy of the English Gazette which had strayed onto an American aërodrome carried the following item in the casualty lists:

MISSING: Torpedo Boat XOOI. Lieutenants R. Boyce Smith and L. C. W. Hope, R. N. R., Able Seamen, Machinist's Mate Burt and Torpedoman Reeves, Channel Fleet, Light Torpedo Division. Failed to return from coast patrol duty.

Shortly after that the American Air Service headquarters also issued a bulletin:

For extraordinary valor over and beyond the routine of duty, Captain H. S. Bogard, with his crew, composed of Second Lieutenant Darrel McGinnis and Aviation Gunners Watts and Harper, on a daylight raid and without scout protection, destroyed with bombs an ammunition depot several miles behind the enemy's lines. From here, beset by enemy aircraft in superior numbers, these men proceeded with what bombs remained to the enemy's corps headquarters at — and partially demolished this château, and then returned safely without loss of a man.

And regarding which exploit, it might have added, had it failed and had Captain Bogard come out of it alive, he would have been immediately and thoroughly court-martialed.

Carrying his remaining two bombs, he had dived the Handley-Page at the château where the generals sat at lunch, until McGinnis, at the toggles below him, began to shout at him, before he ever signaled. He didn't signal until he could discern separately the slate tiles of the roof. Then his hand dropped and he zoomed, and he held the aëroplane so, in its wild snarl, his lips parted, his breath hissing, thinking: "God! God! If they were all there—all the generals, the admirals, the presidents and the kings—theirs, ours—all of them."

THE DOLL

TRANSLATED BY VYVYAN HOLLAND

LENOSHKA, who was reading the adventures of Tom Sawyer in an odd volume of Mark Twain, suddenly broke into a clear laugh. But she immediately turned round timidly, as though she had done something wrong. The austerity of the old house, the large empty study, the tall uncurtained windows through which the sun poured pitilessly down, reminded the little girl that laughter was forbidden. She could almost hear the gloomy voice of Ivan Michailovitch, her father, saying: "Don't make so much noise, Lena. These are no days for laughter."

The child's lips pursed up in a sad little pout. She shrugged her shoulders in a way that outlined their slight form beneath her linen dress and resumed her reading.

It was a sultry summer afternoon in Russian Turkestan. The town of Tashkent was dozing beneath the torrid sky. A scorching haze rose from the street in which the dust accumulated in thick muggy waves. Melancholy-eyed camels, dragged along by Sarts from the Steppes, passed slowly before the Orthodox churches, whose domes were furnaces of incandescent light, and before mosques whose minarets, like the fingers of God, seemed to be pointing out the way to Heaven to the faithful.

A large fly filled the room with its senseless buzzing in such a way that it appeared to be everywhere at the same time. Lenoshka followed its flight with her eyes. A tiny brown, glittering creature, the fly soared up to the ceiling, sped like a bullet past the child's ears, collided with the walls and rebounded in noisy spirals. It was like some strange jewel, a piece of mingled sun and earth, a mad atom of happiness in the gloomy room.

The metallic humming of the insect produced a slight feeling of numbness in the little girl's body. She shut her eyes and, limp with the heat, her short hair covering her forehead, she sat there without moving and vaguely envied the fly's existence.

"You're happy enough," she thought. "You can do what you like. You haven't got to carry buckets of water from the well to the house every morning and evening. You can find plenty to eat and you don't go to school."

And gradually Lenoshka imagined that she too was a free aerial creature, that the daily work of the house did not exist and that she had nothing to do but to fly about, to go in and out of houses and to sing in the sunlight.

The sound of dragging footsteps approaching the door and a low cough interrupted her reveries, and she rose as a tall, lean, slightly bowed figure appeared in the doorway. It was her father. A deep line on each side of his mouth imparted a look of gloomy sensuality to his lips. His expression was austere and his eyes, which were of too light a shade of blue, looked as if they were blind beneath the thick blackness of his eyebrows. A short beard covered his chin. His general appearance suggested breeding, coupled at the same time with a note of instability, of lack of balance and inadaptability which could not be defined but was at the same time very strongly marked. He kissed the little girl on the forehead and she shrank away from the clamminess of her father's face.

"Are you tired, Father?" she asked.

Ivan Michailovitch showed by a gesture how unnecessary this question was and let himself drop into an arm-chair. He stretched out his long legs, placed his thin, trembling, ink-stained hands on his knees and sat there motionless, with his lips apart. He looked so weary that the little girl said to him:

"Would you like some water?"

"Yes, get me some."

She fetched a glass from the kitchen and held it out to him. Ivan Michailovitch put it eagerly to his lips but, after the first mouthful, he said, peevishly:

"It's quite hot."

"You know quite well, Father," observed the little girl seriously, "that it can't be anything else. We've sold the refrigerator and ice costs a fortune."

He smiled brokenly and murmured:

"You're twelve, aren't you, child?"

"Why, yes, Father."

"Twelve, and you already know so much!"

He was moved to sudden pity, he who usually, after his tedious work at a Government office, forgot his daughter and lost himself in vague memories in which he recalled his life as a rich aristocrat, a lazy, ridiculous life, but agreeable enough on the whole, which had been annihilated by Bolshevism.

"Come and sit on my knee, darling, and kiss me," he said.

Surprised by this unexpected show of affection, Lena timidly obeyed. But Ivan Michailovitch was already feeling embarrassed. He was always stopped from any form of demonstration by a strange fear of ridicule, a sort of diffidence with regard both to himself and to other people which surrounded him with an atmosphere of discomfort and boredom. This fear had developed along morbid lines since his wife had deserted him, leaving him with Lena, who was two years old at the time; and he suffered from it even in his daughter's presence. He never knew what to say to her, his hands were too clumsy to caress the child and it always seemed to him that everything he said to her rang false.

Lena instinctively felt this embarrassment and got off her father's knee.

Ivan Michailovitch was once more obsessed with the feeling of distress to which his daily dealings with his daughter inevitably gave rise. He would have liked to gain the child's confidence, to guide her and warm her, and yet all this longing, all his love, which was really deep and sincere, resolved itself into empty commonplace phrases.

Once again he thought: "It's no use. How unfortunate it all is!"

Yet he tried to react:

"Have you been to school to-day?"

Lenoshka replied without a moment's hesitation:

"Yes, all day."

From the way in which she dropped her eyes he knew that she was lying, but did not follow the matter up. An immense weariness overcame him.

What was the use of questioning her? What was the good of getting angry, since he had never been able to make friends with her, and now he could not even do anything for her in a material way? He gazed at his daughter, that little girl who came from himself and who was yet so far away from him. Ivan Michailovitch felt a desire to cry from sheer misery and perplexity in the presence of that little fine active body, of that full-lipped mouth which seemed modelled on his own, and beneath the gaze of those alert, eager, golden-brown eyes. He guessed that dangerous thoughts were seething behind that smooth brow and that precocious appetites plagued that mind which was such a mystery to him.

He tried to sigh but found himself unable to do so. All that issued from his lips was a queer, harsh sort of rattling sound.

In the meantime the child dragged a deal table into the centre of the room and placed on it a few cucumbers in a cracked dish. Ivan Michailovitch drew from his pocket a piece of hard brown bread bristling with bits of straw. Lenoshka raised her eyes to her father and he seemed to read a reproach in their large pupils.

"That's all I could get after waiting for an hour in the queue," he said, by way of excuse. "It's yesterday's ration."

She made no reply and they sat down to their meal. They ate rapidly and in silence. The heat was so oppressive that the effort of breaking the rough bread made them sweat. Even when the last crumb of bread and the last shred of cucumber-skin were gone, they felt the pangs of hunger just as keenly as before in their unsatisfied stomachs.

"I'll wash the plates," said Lena. "They haven't been done for three days."

She went into the kitchen and set to work. Nothing revolted her so much as this task. She had an innate love of clean, pretty, bright objects and her heart ached with misery as she recalled the days of plenty when she had been spoiled by governesses whom no one controlled, with a father whom she seldom saw and who made up for his absence by lavishing presents on her. But she was certain that her life could not always be restricted to dirty plates and unappetising meals. She knew that some miracle would occur to set her free and she awaited it with all the fibres of her being and all the ardour of her youthful enthusiasm.

She was still occupied with her task when her father, in the neighbouring room, uttered an exclamation:

"Philip Adrianovitch! What chance brings you here?"

Lenoshka carefully washed her hands and ran back into the living room. She adored Philip, her father's friend, a lean, dapper, bald-headed old man who was always jolly and well-dressed and whose pockets were always full of sweets. He was the only man she knew who had not changed during the last hateful years.

Philip Adrianovitch, even though he was of noble birth and had possessed a large fortune, had a certain Asiatic suppleness of character which enabled him to adapt himself to any circumstances without losing his air of careless dignity. As he had always been careful to make friends among the most advanced political parties, the advent of the Revolution had not succeeded in ruining him. Thanks to these friends he was able to save a small portion of his property, and he set himself to turn this to account in some mysterious way.

Ivan Michailovitch often said of him, with secret envy, mixed, however, with a certain admiration:

"He will end in the cellars of the Cheka, as a speculator, but in the meantime he lives like a fighting-cock."

When the little girl came in, Philip Adrianovitch smiled in a way which gave an odd twist to his thin lips.

"Good evening, my pretty Lena. Have you got a kiss for me?"

He always treated the child with a sort of gallantry which embarrassed her. She put her forehead up to the old man who kissed it, playing lightly with her fine hair as he did so. Then, turning gaily to Ivan Michailovitch, he asked:

"Well, Vania, how's business?"

"I'd like to know what you call business. I go on covering paper with ink and starving to death. That's all. But one gets used to it."

"Come! Don't be so despondent. Everything will come right in the end. Do you want some money?"

"Yes, I do," replied Ivan Michailovitch, in a voice that betrayed neither eagerness nor embarrassment. "Are you in funds?"

"I've just brought off a small deal. A cigarette?"

"Give me one!" said Ivan Michailovitch, greedily stretching out his hand. "I haven't smoked for two days."

His fingers trembled as his friend handed him his cigarette case and the first puffs gave him such pleasure that it almost amounted to pain.

"And you, Lena? Would you like a cigarette too?" asked Philip Adrianovitch.

"Oh, how good of you, Uncle Philip!" cried the little girl. "You don't mind, Father?"

Ivan Michailovitch shrugged his shoulders.

"Since that's what they teach you at school now, I suppose you can. Only," he added, in his listless voice, "you're wrong to lead her astray, Philip. You are morally wrong, I mean, because your cigarette won't really do her any harm."

Exhausted by this long speech, he crossed over to the window. Darkness was beginning to descend upon the town. He shut his eyes in order to taste the smoke better.

Meanwhile, Philip Adrianovitch was talking to Lenoshka. He knew what to say to the little girl; indeed he spoke too well, his voice was too soft, his eyes too veiled, his movements too studied and restrained. This jarred on Ivan Michailovitch like a false note in music, and a baffled look came into his face. But what could he do?

And when his friend asked him: "Will you let me take Lena out for a drive?" What else could he reply but: "Of course. It will amuse her."

Then, as an after thought, he added:

"By the way, Philip Adrianovitch, can you leave me a few cigarettes?"

The little girl and the old man left the house together. Night had fallen rapidly; the sky was already full of stars. At first they walked along in silence, deeply inhaling the cool night air. Then Philip Adrianovitch hailed a passing cab and said to the driver:

"Take us where you like and don't worry about the fare."

They drove through the town. The minarets were now pale grey ghosts beneath the bright light of the stars. The moonlight coated the leaves in the orchards and in the gardens with a layer of silver and made the thin streams of water in the middle of the streets glitter faintly. The child's body was filled with the dry warmth of the oriental night. Through her flimsy dress she felt its boisterous spell which insensibly affected her so much that she could not abandon herself to the unexpected pleasure of the drive.

Philip Adrianovitch placed his hand on her shoulder in a lingering caress. Now and then his fingers would stray on to the bare flesh of her neck. Then Lena would shut her eyes and feel a strange desire to laugh and cry at the same time. Suddenly he asked her:

"Would you like to go away, dear?"

He said this with a detached, almost timid air. But the question did not startle Lena, because it followed quite naturally on her constant day-dreams.

"Oh, yes, Uncle Philip!" she replied.

She said this with such eagerness and enthusiasm that the blood rushed to the old man's head and his hand trembled on the child's shoulder, as he muttered to her:

"Listen, Lenoshka darling, I love you dearly, much more than you think. It hurts me to see you working like a scullery maid. You ought to have pretty frocks, sweets, flowers. You like that sort of thing, don't you?"

"Toys, Uncle Philip, that's what I really like. Especially dolls."

"Dolls, of course!" he cried, as though the child's wish filled him with delight. "Well, you shall have them. I'll give you plenty."

"How kind you are, Uncle darling. When will you give me them? Soon?"

"Oh, here, you know, it's impossible. There aren't any dolls here. Now, listen carefully, Lena. I'm leaving for Moscow at the end of the week. Moscow is a big town with wide streets, motor cars passing up and down the whole time and huge high houses. There I can get you everything you want. Will you come with me?"

"Yes, of course, but will Father let me go?"

"Why should you need his permission? Aren't you a big girl, free to do as you like? You need not even mention it to him."

Lenoshka made no reply. She remembered what they taught her at school where Comrade Zotof, the Communist teacher, told them that middle-class parents ought not to have any more authority over their children and that after the age of ten everyone had the right to independence and that it was absurd for a free human being to pay attention to the opinions of grown-up people. She had not been convinced by this, because she did not like Comrade Zotof, a rough working-man who was covered with red hair and had a nasty smell. But now Uncle Philip, whom she admired, was confirming the truth of this teaching. How could she hesitate?

And yet one final objection of a practical nature occurred to her, for in her pretty head an early experience mingled strangely with her childish eagerness.

"But what shall I do about a passport?" she asked.

Her solemn, matter-of-fact air pleased Philip Adrianovitch so much that he pressed her to him and kissed her. She was accustomed to the old man's kisses, but this time he put a new ardour into his lips which made her shudder secretly.

"Don't be afraid, dear child," he replied, his voice hoarse with emotion. "I'll arrange all that. It's all settled then? You'll come to Moscow with me?"

There was something in his keen, feverish voice that frightened the little girl. But, as she did not yet know how to detect passion in a man's voice, she answered:

"Whenever you like, Uncle Philip."

He kissed her and again she felt his body yield to hers and glow.

When the cab dropped her at her house she saw a scarcely distinguishable shadow and a luminous point at the window of the big study. Ivan Michailovitch was still smoking. A hard little lump came into Lena's throat, but she thought of the doll, the large doll dressed in velvet and silk which Uncle Philip had promised her and she firmly resolved not to say a word to her father.

II

When Philip Adrianovitch deserted Lenoshka in Moscow, after making her his little mistress, all that he left her was a bundle of ruble notes and a vague idea that a little girl can earn money with her body.

On the day on which he did not return she did not at first realise that she was alone. When her landlady made her understand, the room which they had occupied together suddenly seemed enormous to her and she left the house to get away from it. The delicate warmth of the late summer twilight permeated the city. Lenoshka made her way through the avenues and streets until, tired out, she leaned for support against a rickety hoarding. Her eyes were attracted by the antics of three sparrows playing in the street and it was only then that she began to weep silently. There was none of the abandonment of childhood about her crying. She wept noiselessly with the slow, heavy tears of an old woman.

Her face was hidden in her hands, so she did not notice that a stranger was studying her. The stranger was a little girl scarcely taller than herself, perched upon immensely high crooked heels and dressed in a scarlet frock, which revealed a large expanse of bony chest. Her head was topped by a mass of outrageously false red hair which seemed to cast a garish glow over her painted lips, her rouge-daubed cheeks and her solemn, wistful eyes. This strange apparition said slowly:

"Why are you crying, you little idiot?"

Lenoshka raised her head and examined the stranger through her tears. The stranger went on gravely:

"You mustn't cry. It spoils one's eyes, and you've got nice eyes. Come and walk with me. One always has better luck in pairs. My name's Aniuta. What's yours?"

"Lena."

As though this interchange of names had been enough to give them mutual confidence, Lena followed the red-haired girl.

"Why, you don't even know how to walk!" cried Aniuta, contemptuously. "You must sway from side to side like the pendulum of a clock."

"Why?" asked Lena.

"To attract men, silly. You're not an infant, you ought to know that."

Lena began to understand. Besides, her friend began to explain, with the protective air of an elder sister:

"I'll teach you everything. You must come and live with me in the Khitrof Rynok.<sup>1</sup> We've got a house there where there are about a hundred of us, without any grown-up people to worry us. We're fairly cramped for space but we'll find room for you. You'll see, there are some important people there. Mitri is the eldest. He's seventeen and sells cocaine: he's very sharp and makes a lot of money. Then there's his wife, Tania, who is only about my age but knows how to look after herself: she sells doped cigarettes. Vassia is pretty clever too, but he'll end badly; he steals too much and they say that he's even killed people. There are about thirty of my profession, but they don't know how to please men. They are too small, smaller even than you. I won't take any of them out with me. Providence sent you along so that we should work together. You've got a nice new frock, and I'll do your hair for you, because we must look like big girls and then everything will be all right."

Lena listened and a smile passed over her full lips at the prospect of the new life upon which she was about to enter.

III

Autumn had come and the rain kept the streets in a perpetual state of dampness. The wind beating furiously against the rickety house-tops already held the icy breath of winter.

It was nearly five o'clock in the afternoon and the day was dying. Aniuta and Lena had just got up and were alone in the vast dormitory. The little girls and the youths who lived there had already all left to go about their shady and mysterious occupations. The bareness of the shabby room was very depressing. A few piles of straw littering the floor and a broken bottle in one corner comprised the entire furniture of the place.

Aniuta took a piece of red paper from her blouse, unfolded it carefully and, having damped it with spittle, made up her lips and cheeks. She then handed it to Lena, who did the same. Thus adorned they looked at each other. They had to go out and the evening looked so wretched and cold through the broken panes of the windows. They could not bring themselves to make a move, even though they were ready: this disinclination had started with the first rainy days and increased in intensity as the nights drew in more and more. Suddenly Lena began to laugh.

"You've put on one brown boot and one black one!" she said.

"I know," replied her friend, solemnly, "they're all I've got left."

<sup>1</sup>A wretched quarter in which tramps, thieves and prostitutes have always found shelter and which the Bolsheviks have not been able to clean up any more than the Tsarist police were able to do.

"It's a bit of luck that they're different feet," decided Lena. And she laughed again.

Aniuta was angry at first, but was eventually conquered by Lena's gaiety and they went out together.

Their two little figures were immediately swallowed up in the turmoil of the great city. A vague feeling of terror came over them and forced them to quicken their pace. There was a cold mist in the air and they kept on passing their hands over their heads to keep it out of their false hair. They did not speak to each other, being too depressed by the darkness, the lowering sky, hunger and especially by that tragic air of mystery which prowls through the deserted quarters of great cities

Shadows passed them which seemed either too frightened or too unfriendly: sometimes a wild-eyed dog whose hanging jaws they could picture to themselves followed them for a short way; then they huddled close to each other, for they had heard that starving animals often attacked children.

At last they reached a dimly-lit avenue. At long intervals street lamps shone through the rain which covered them with a glistening closely-woven web. The two little girls breathed more freely now that they were away from the agony of darkness. Lena was the first to recover herself, straightened her back, held up her head and adopted a swaying gait, modelled on the contortions of professional prostitutes and which she thought constituted their most powerful attraction.

Thus they continued on their way, provocative and alert, sometimes in the middle of the pavement and sometimes hugging the wall if they thought that someone was taking too much interest in them. For the secret police were making a drive against prostitution. This walking about in the penetrating mist, this anxious hunt for a crust of bread, did not perturb their souls which disgust and weariness had not yet had time to blight. This strange game even amused them, especially Lena who was the braver of the two and had not been at it for so long. From beneath her long lashes her glance sped, with a bold smile, towards the rare passers-by who hurried along, their emaciated or unhealthily puffy faces, which hunger had ground in its terrible mill, bent low towards the ground.

These had no interest for these huntresses armed with their precocious but very definite experience. They knew that they were as surly as sick animals and gloomier than a winter's evening. They wanted to find some rich "speculator" or some Commissar in festive mood, men who were not haunted by the question of their daily bread, and who were greedy and open-handed.

They wandered about thus for about an hour. Aniuta's odd boots, soaked with water, had assumed the same neutral colour; Lena kept her arms as far apart as possible, because whenever she touched her body with them the cold of her soaking garments seemed to be accentuated. The coquetry which made them maintain their swinging gait had become mechanical and the brilliance of their eyes was gone. They were thinking of moving to some other quarter of the city when luck suddenly came their way.

A man, whose approach they had not heard because of the patter of the rain, passed by them and, turning sharply, said to them:

"Well, little girls, it's not much of an evening for a walk."

The two children started with pleased surprise, but Aniuta replied, with an affectation of innocence:

"We're looking for company, sir."

The man looked carefully round and then suggested:

"All right, come along with me. But don't make it look too obvious."

He walked quietly away and they followed him with apparent unconcern. Lena nudged her companion and whispered:

"Did you see his fur-lined coat?"

"Yes," said the other. "It's marvellous. We're in luck to-night, Lena, great luck."

She gazed gratefully at the round shoulders which preceded them, covered with thick cloth, a symbol of luxury and plenty. Every now and then the man turned round and, seeing them pattering along behind him, waved to them.

When they had left the central quarter of the city and the indiscreet light of the street lamps was no more than a silvery mist in the distance, he let the two little girls catch up with him and, placing himself between them, he put his arms round them. They shivered.

"You're cold, children," he said. "Wait, we'll soon warm you. I'll take you somewhere so nice that you'll hardly believe it."

He stumbled over a rut. Lena laughed, but Aniuta, who was less high-spirited and more cunning, said kindly:

"Forgive her, sir, she is too young, she isn't used to things."

"It doesn't matter, it doesn't matter at all," replied the man. "They're like that at her age. I love youth and gaiety. Laugh as much as you like, my pet, but be careful not to break your leg."

They were walking down a rutted alley full of holes which were so many mud traps. Pieces of broken fencing littered the ground and the air was full of the stench of household refuse and rotting wood.

The man quickened his pace and the weary children could scarcely keep up with him. At last he came to a halt before a wooden house the outline of whose two stories could be vaguely distinguished in the darkness.

"An old private house," said the man, proudly. "I live there with a noblewoman who knows which side her bread's buttered."

He took a key from his pocket, opened the door and led the children through a narrow passage to his room. Even before looking round it they were conscious of an atmosphere of comfort. An oil lamp with a violet shade shed a soft light through the room. It was warm and heavy, russet curtains hung over the windows and the door. Solid, comfortable, old-fashioned furniture seemed to invite one to rest and to a kind of dreamy intimacy. And yet, in contrast with the discreet cleanliness of the place, a dirty shaving-brush and a razor still covered with soap lay upon the table.

"Well, do you like it here?" the man asked Lena, taking her by the chin.

"Yes, sir!"

"What do you mean, 'sir'? I'm not a gentleman, I'm just a merchant. My name is Nikita Vassilitch. Just call me Uncle Nikita. Is that all right?"

He rubbed his hands together good-humouredly and, removing his fur-lined coat, appeared in a pair of check trousers, a brown jacket and a high-necked Russian blouse. He was short and plump and had broad shoulders and a high bald forehead. In spite of his rather common face, there was a certain shrewdness in his small, red-circled eyes. Without quite knowing why, their expression reminded Lena of that of Philip Adrianovitch, her first lover.

The girls' clothes were so wet that they were afraid of sitting down for fear of soiling the furniture. Nikita Vassilitch noticed this and rang the bell.

In answer to it a grey-haired woman came in who still retained a natural dignity behind a servile smile.

"Good evening, Countess," said Nikita. "Allow me to introduce two little friends of mine who are cold and hungry. We must first give them a dressing-gown each. Then bring us some sandwiches, some cakes and my vodka."

As he spoke the sound of rattling plates came from the next room.

"Ah! I see you've got customers this evening!" said the man.

"A few, thank Heavens, Nikita Vassilitch."

"All the better for you, Countess, but don't forget to keep the best tidbits for us. After all, I'm your oldest and richest guest."

When the old lady had gone, Nikita Vassilitch raised a curtain which covered a freshly-made hole in the wall and called to the little girls:

"Come and look. It will amuse you."

They came over and looked, curiously, standing on tip-toe. Their host had not lied, it was a strange sight.

In the middle of a large room whose walls were covered with old tapestry which gave them an air of quiet wealth, and in which a divan, piled up with delicate silk cushions, stood sentinel beneath the gilded dream of a magnificent ikon, stood a table. From its dimensions, from the care which had been put into its installation, one knew that it was the most important object in the room. It was imposing, it ruled the room. One felt that at that table one could really eat.

Around it the guests waited in silence. In the commonness and in the shrewd vigour of their features they nearly all resembled Nikita Vassilitch. Thick-set, short-necked, rough-bearded, dressed in stout, unstylish clothes, they formed a strange company in that room which still bore traces of tasteful opulence. Their thick fingers, whose nails were either bitten or not over-clean, manipulated the finely-wrought cutlery and the exquisite glasses with a certain hesitating respect. One guessed that those hands were more accustomed to other activities: to dragging sacks of produce about in country districts, to be sold eventually in towns at fabulous prices; to opening the heavy gates of carriage drives; to sweeping courtyards; to taking horses to water at frozen troughs in which the ice had to be broken by hatchets; and, perhaps, who knows, to strangling travellers on moonless, starless nights.

"They're all lads after my own heart," observed Nikita Vassilitch, waving towards the guests with a satisfied smile. "They're none of them mother's darlings. They're go-getters, pals. It's all very fine for the Commissars to squeal, those who aren't idiots know quite well that we're the masters now."

The children gazed at them, fascinated. They had heard of the secret restaurants where, for fabulous sums of money, white bread, cakes, cream, meat and wine were provided. They dared not say anything, overawed as they would have been in church, and indeed they scarcely dared to breathe. And when a shudder passed through their soaked bodies, they did not even realise that it was because of the cold.

Nikita Vassilitch's hostess interrupted their examination. She placed two dressing-gowns on an arm-chair and left the room.

"Come along," said the merchant, "put these on quickly."

Aniuta began to unlace her boots; Lena had already begun to unbutton her blouse when Nikita interrupted her hoarsely:

"Come along, dear, let me undress you!"

The child went submissively over to him. The man's hands did not tremble but his whole face suddenly grew pale and became suffused with little nervous wrinkles.

"It's like boiling milk," thought Lena.

He slowly removed the little girl's blouse and slipped down her skirt. She was naked. Her half-starved little body still retained some remnant of its former gracefulness. When she looked at its pure amber-coloured form, Lena was sometimes seized with a foolish desire to cry. But this evening she felt no shame at being naked and laughed at Aniuta lost in her huge dressing-gown.

Nikita slowly stroked the smooth skin with his rough hand. His eyes looked dead behind the mist which veiled them; large drops of moisture stood on his forehead: the red circles round his eyes seemed to spread and to be about to burst at any moment. Suddenly he pushed the child roughly away from him and shouted:

"Hide your body, you spawn of the Devil! Don't tempt me any more!"

He breathed heavily to relieve his congested lungs and yelled:

"Food and drink, you miserable Countess!"

Then he stretched himself upon his bed and shut his eyes, his mouth twisted with suffering.

The old woman brought in a tray on which stood a bowl of caviare, some slices of white bread, some ham and a decanter full of vodka. Nikita Vassilitch sighed.

"I'm seeing it again, Countess."

She silently filled a large glass with vodka, which he drank at a gulp. Then his face relaxed and, standing up, he cried:

"Come, children, don't let's be sad. We must laugh this evening. I want to be gay; my ghost has gone!"

He lowered his voice.

"I've got a ghost, you know; but it's nothing. When I drink it goes away."

The two children were not listening to him. Their whole souls were concentrated in their eyes, hypnotised by the food. Aniuta asked, diffidently:

"Is that for us too?"

"But whom do you think it's for?" cried Nikita Vassilitch, suddenly excited to pity. "Of course it's for you, you poor little waifs! And if there's not enough, we'll send for more. When Nikita entertains no one ever has any cause for complaint. And what the hell does one care for the law when one has plenty of money to pay with?"

He slapped his bulging coat-pocket boastfully, drank another glass of vodka and coughed. The little girls were seated at the table but had not touched anything yet, waiting for their host to give the word.

"Go on! Help yourselves! I'm not hungry myself," he added, laying stress on the last words which expressed the height of wealth.

Lena made the first move, taking a slice of ham, at which she gazed in bewilderment, as though unable to believe that it could be eaten all at once. Then suddenly she began to devour it, Aniuta following her example. Minutes went by, punctuated only by the greedy crunching of the children's jaws. The little girls' movements were stiff and their whole bodies shivered. Even though Nikita Vassilitch was not a man to be easily moved to pity and although the misery of which he had himself been a witness had made him indifferent to the sufferings of others, a queer kind of emotion brought a lump into his throat, and he drank another glass of vodka in little sips.

The children were at last satisfied and stopped eating. A little colour had come into their cheeks and their eyes were brighter. Aniuta got up and, putting her arms round Nikita Vassilitch's neck, kissed him full on his wet mouth. Lena clapped her hands.

"I want to kiss you too, Uncle Nikita!" she cried.

He took one of them on each knee and, after caressing them for a while, he said, in a very serious voice:

"Now, children, you must have some vodka."

They consented gravely, already imbued with that Russian truth that drinking is a sacred rite. He filled his glass and handed it to Aniuta:

"You drink first. You're the elder."

The little girl took a few sips, but a violent fit of coughing seized her. Nikita Vassilitch observed contemptuously:

"It isn't as strong as all that, my pet!"

Lena took the glass from her friend's hand and emptied it at a gulp. Big tears came into her eyes and the room swam round her, but she held firm. This feat threw Nikita Vassilitch into a frenzy of enthusiasm.

"Well done! There's a brave girl for you!" he cried. "What a wench! Without drawing a breath! Here, take this for your trouble."

Fumbling in his pockets he pulled out a bundle of filthy notes and pressed it into the child's hand. She passed the money over to Aniuta.

"Oh, so she's the banker, is she?" observed Nikita Vassilitch, with another laugh. "You're not steady enough to be trusted with it, I suppose. That's why I prefer you: I don't like serious people. They're difficult to get the better of in business and in the evenings they don't know how to laugh. Wait till I've had a little more to drink and you'll see how amusing I can be."

He seized the decanter, still half full of vodka, put it to his lips and threw back his head, and the little girls saw the silvery liquid vanish. When he put the decanter down it was quite empty. His face had gone purple and for a moment or two he seemed quite stunned; then he broke into a harsh, jerky, agonised laugh.

"Why did I bring you here?" he groaned. "Do I need you here? Do you bring me any gaiety? You just sit there and gape at me instead of laughing and amusing me. You see quite well that I'm miserable, so miserable that I could howl like a dog; even though I'm rolling in money I can't forget. They killed my son, my big son who was an army officer. Yes, I, Nikita, the simple merchant, had a fine officer son, who was the light of my eyes! They turned him into a ghost for me."

Exhausted by this long speech he paused for a moment, then he resumed violently:

"Stop me, for God's sake! I mustn't talk like that! We must be gay this evening. Come along! Shout! Dance! Oh, hell, one can't even amuse oneself nowadays! In the old days when I felt depressed I used to go and see the gipsies. I made them drunk and then what songs they sang! Songs more beautiful than Paradise, songs that made one almost die of sadness."

With a sweeping gesture he conjured up his past orgies, the dazzling bubble of champagne, the shouts, the shrieks, the laughter of the violins, the wild dances of the women, and over his contracted features there passed for a moment the frenzy of these frantic feasts with their mixture of hysterical joy and mortal misery.

The empty decanter caught his eye. He banged his fist on the table and screamed:

"Countess! Where's that bloody Countess?"

She came in, her face ashen-pale.

"Vodka, more vodka. Do you think I'm a schoolboy to be served like this, you old bitch?"

"Nikita Vassilitch," the old woman pleaded in a broken voice, "I must implore you not to use such language and not to talk so loudly. I've got people here."

"People? What people? Oh! Your guests! Well, they prevent me from enjoying myself, your guests do. They've put the evil eye on me and made me miserable, so you've got to chuck them out at once."

"But I can't do that, Nikita Vassilitch. Just think . . ."

"I'll pay for all of them. Here's some money. There isn't to be a sign of them in this house in one minute's time. When Nikita's making merry he wants the place empty."

In spite of the fortune which the presence of the speculator in her house represented for her, she would gladly have been rid of him, but as she looked at him she grew afraid. He was capable of anything in his wild state of intoxication and of unbridled lust. He might make an appalling scene and attract the attention of the militia and that would mean the dungeons of the Cheka and torture for the Countess. So she muttered submissively:

"Very well, Nikita Vassilitch, I'll say I'm expecting a raid."

"That's better, Countess! And don't be depressed about it. Nikita will pay."

Hours passed and more decanters of vodka were drunk. Nikita never stopped talking; sometimes full of wild gaiety, sometimes shaken with sobs. A sort of delirium took possession of him. With frightful tenacity he groped for the happiness which eluded him like a bird that was too magnificent for him. Sometimes he showered brutal caresses on the children and bit them, and they, stiff with weariness and scorched by the vodka, understanding nothing of this desperate savage drunkenness, began to loathe him.

Exhausted at last, he sprawled on the divan, unbuttoned his coat and, after trying unsuccessfully to open his blouse, the collar of which was choking him, mumbled:

"Can't you help me, you little bitches?"

When Lena reached the sofa to obey him he was already snoring, his cheeks swollen, his eyelids limp and his lips black. Lena began in disgust:

"A scarecrow has . . ."

She did not finish but stood there, holding her breath and calling her friend's attention to the man's pocket. A huge pocket-book, bulging with bank-notes, was protruding from it. The covetousness in Lena's face was so intense that Aniuta understood. She nodded her head in approval and then cautiously whispered:

"Let's get dressed first."

Quietly, with swift silent movements, the children resumed their wet rags. Their hearts beat so loudly in the echoing room that it seemed as if the noise must wake Nikita. But he went on sleeping undisturbed. Only his hands kept moving like giant captive insects and one of them, obeying an unconscious instinct of caution, fumbled for the pocket-book and grasped it. The children waited a moment, but the hand did not move. Time was pressing and they had to act. Lena, looking round the room, caught sight of the open razor. She seized it and, without hesitation, slit Nikita Vassilitch's throat from ear to ear in a single sweeping stroke.

Then the rainy night swallowed up the two little shadows.

Comrade Sokolnikoff, Investigator of Criminal Affairs to the Revolutionary Tribunal, entered his office in high good humour. There was little work for him to do that day and he hoped to be able to spend the whole afternoon with his children, of whom he was very fond. He passed his hands contentedly over his fat cheeks and thought how nice it was to be able to keep clean at a time when soap was so scarce. Then he told the soldier acting as orderly to have the accused in the Miassine murder brought in.

He waited, whistling between his teeth, without troubling to look at the file before him. He knew nothing about the case, preferring to rely on his instinct and to judge by appearances. He was a man who was not concerned with legal quibbles. But when the door opened and the "accused" came in, he could not restrain an exclamation.

It was Lena. Her head had been shaved and in her long grey prison dress she looked like an under-nourished boy.

Comrade Sokolnikoff drew a deep breath.

"Are you the person accused of having killed Citizen Miassine?" he asked.

"It was I who cut Nikita's throat," the child replied.

"Well! Well!" muttered the Investigator. "And why did you do it?"

"His pocket was full of rubles and I wanted them."

Her voice did not falter. There was no sign of remorse, no sign of fear in her childish eyes. Sokolnikoff, even though he was Investigator to the Revolutionary Tribunal, felt uncomfortable. He tried to blot out the picture of his daughter Masha, whom he had stupidly got into his mind and who now refused to leave it. He stroked his cheeks mechanically; their smoothness embarrassed him now. At last, with deep tenderness of which even he himself was unaware, he said to her, as though speaking to his own child:

"But my poor little girl, what you've done is horrible. Just think of it!"

The kindness in his voice had a profound effect on Lena, who for months and months had forgotten what kindness was.

She lowered her eyes, which until then had gazed boldly into those of Sokolnikoff. A few moments passed in silence and then suddenly the office was filled with the sound of sobbing, of that childish sobbing which seems to stifle children's throats and burst their lungs.

"Well," said Sokolnikoff, "you see, little girl, you see how your crime . . ."

But she interrupted him:

"Oh, Mister Judge, Mister Judge, you have a kind voice! Tell them to give me back the doll which I bought afterwards, the lovely doll which they took away from me in prison!"

And in the presence of that little girl standing there like a weakly boy, Comrade Sokolnikoff, hardened Communist, Investigator to the Revolutionary Tribunal, felt, for the first time in his life, as though he himself were on trial.

THE CARBURYS' TWO LITTLE GIRLS, Penny and Claudia, went upstairs again with their governess, Miss Rice, as soon as lunch was over: their steps could be heard retreating along the pitch-pine gallery round the hall. The visitors were disappointed—Mrs. Laurie liked children, and Frank Peele had been hoping to see more of the governess. Rain drummed on the hall skylight; still smoking their host Godwin Carbury's rather musty cigarettes, the grown-ups allowed themselves to be driven into the library. Here no chair invited you, the uninviting books must have been bought in lots and looked gummed in the shelves. It could have been a pretty September day; the plum-tree leaves in the tilting orchards round were bright yellow, but for days the Forest of Dene had been clouded and sodden.

Mrs. Laurie, who was vivacious and had married at nineteen, and Mrs. Carbury, who was muddled and dim, had been friends years ago in India when they were both young girls. They had kept in touch, Mrs. Carbury having no other vivacious friend, life having taught Mrs. Laurie that there was no knowing when anybody devoted might not come in useful—besides, she had always been sorry for Mima.

Mima's life had been unrewarding. She returned flatly from India after her friend's wedding, and it had not been till she was twenty-seven or eight that she met Godwin Carbury, who at forty was looking round for a wife. He had the reputation of being the most unpopular man in his part of the country, and that reputation followed him up to London. He was careful, savagely careful, about money, and not careful enough about seeing this was not known. Added to this, he had a dour self-importance. It was understood that economy kept him single as long as his mother had lived to keep house at Pendlethwaite. Possibly Mima saw something in him that no one else saw; she was anxious to 'settle' suitably and not herself accustomed to being liked. At all events, they married, and had had after some years these two thin, remote little girls. They had few neighbours at Pendlethwaite, and Godwin's peculiarities cut them off more and more from anybody there was. Whatever misgivings she had, Mima pandered to him blindly. On her own account she had just a little money, so once or twice a year she came up to London, gazed into shop windows, met Mrs. Laurie (now widowed) and bought reduced coats and shoes for the little girls. She had begun lately to talk of giving up London; the girls' education would be a heavy expense, she said.

It surprised Mrs. Laurie to find herself at Pendlethwaite, but she had been at a loose end, with nowhere to go for a week. So she thought, 'Try the Carburys,' and had written to Mima. She was a shiftless woman, maintaining herself by the exercise of a good deal of charm: she could say daring things without sounding impertinent, and determined to get a little fun out of Godwin—apart from this, she did not expect very much.

Pendlethwaite was not a lovable house. Built about 1880 of unpleasing maroon brick, it creaked inside with pitch-pine: its churchlike windows peered narrowly at the smiling landscape round; its grounds darkened a valley with belts of laurel and stiff, damp-looking clumps of unindigenous firs. The house looked dedicated to a perpetual January: sunnier seasons beat back from its walls. The bloomy red plums and mellow apples bending the boughs this month were pagan company for it. Indoors, there was no electricity, panels absorbed the lamp-light; before October, no fires were lit till night. It had not even the insidious charm of decay, for Godwin had great ideas of 'keeping things up'; the laurels were kept clipped, the thrifty meals served formally. . . . Mrs. Laurie had been diverted to find that she had a fellow-guest, but this did not see her far. Frank Peele, just back on leave from Siam, was Mima's second cousin. He must have asked himself here because he had to be somewhere; she thought he was not a man you would scramble to entertain. At about thirty, he was a haggard schoolboy—shambling, facetious, huffy, forlorn, melancholic, with perhaps (she feared most of all) a romantic soul. She supposed Mima must enjoy being even sorrier for him than she need be for herself. . . . Entertaining on this scale must be a plunge for the Carburys. Mrs. Laurie could almost hear Godwin saying to Mima: 'Well then, in for a penny, in for a pound.' He went through with his duties as host with glum correctness. 'But if one stayed a day too long he'd cut off supplies.' As it was, his rigid economies hit you everywhere.

The one startling un-economy was the governess. Mrs. Laurie, though unhappily childless, knew an expensive governess when she saw one. Miss Rice's technique was perfect. Her first appearance, at lunch, took Nella's breath away with its serene unobtrusiveness. Penny and Claudia—their dark eyes set close in, tucking their long fair hair back behind their shoulders primly—clearly revolved round her. 'Those two little mice adore her,' thought Mrs. Laurie, recalling the composed retreat after lunch: three people going back to a world of their own. But the adoration was kept within nice bounds. 'How does Mima keep the woman in this mausoleum? She might be anywhere. Mima can't be such a fool as I thought. . . . I must find out.'

In the library, she lost no time doing this. In the bow window, Frank Peele with his hands in his pockets stood looking out unexpectedly at the rain; Mima poured out thin coffee; Godwin glumly handed the cups round. Mrs. Laurie said affably: 'So you got a governess? Last time we met, you were busy looking for one.'

'Yes, oh yes. We did,' Mima said in her flustered way.

'Miss Rice came in May,' said Godwin firmly.

'She seems a great success. . . .'

Frank Peele grunted.

'When she first came in,' went on Mrs. Laurie, 'I felt certain I'd seen her somewhere. I wonder where she was before? She's startlingly good-looking, but in such a tactful way. Hag-ridden—but that's the life, I suppose.'

'She appears content with us,' said Godwin, handing the sugar to Mrs. Laurie bitterly. 'Mima, what are your plans for this afternoon?' His wife looked blank.

'Our guests should be entertained.'

'It struck me,' said Frank, wheeling round, 'as one of the few faces I had not seen before.'

'Really?' said Godwin.

Mima touched the coffee-tray clumsily; everything on it skidded. Did she not want cousin Frank to fall for the governess? The nicest women like having unattached men around. 'She must be full of brains,' said Mrs. Laurie vaguely.

'She teaches wonderfully; she's got the children on so. They seem to be learning everything.'

'Can we have them all down after tea to play. Up Jenkin or something?'

'They do preparation then,' said Godwin repressively. ('Set,' thought his guest, 'on getting his money's worth.') Mima's eyes, oddly overwrought in her pink creased face, stole to meet her husband's. 'Frank,' Godwin continued, 'I could show you those maps now.' Clearly, any discussion of Miss Rice was closed.

'Not to-day, thanks,' said Frank, 'I've got a crick in my neck.' Godwin, after one more forbidding look at Mima, left them, shutting the door reprovingly. Frank loafed along the bookshelves, pulled out Monasteries of the Levant, and folded himself in a chair with an air of resigned discomfort. A man with a book is practically not present. Mrs. Laurie whipped out her petit point, and the two women, pulling their chairs together zestfully, settled down for a talk. Rain streamed down the windows, paper rustled inside the cold grate.

Mima saw so few friends that talk went to her head like wine. Evenly sing-song, the women's voices began rising and falling. After half an hour, Frank's book slipped on to his knee; his head rolled back, jaw dropping; he let out a sharp snore. 'Really . . .' exclaimed Mima, stopping the talk to titter. 'A tropical habit,' said Mrs. Laurie. This was better than Frank with a book, they were quite alone. She hopped back to her topic.

'Mima, what's Godwin got up his sleeve about Miss Rice?'

'Miss Rice?—nothing,' Mima said, overacting.

'His one wicked extravagance?'

'No,' faltered Mima. 'That's just the point—she's not.'

'A bargain? You amaze me. Can she be at all fishy?'

'My dear Nella—she's good with the children, isn't she?' Mima fixed her friend with such oddly imploring eyes that Mrs. Laurie, startled, put down her work: 'She's made princesses of them,' she said extravagantly. 'How wise you have been, Mima!'

'You do really think so? Godwin and I wanted the best we could get, you see: he has such ideas for Penny and Claudia.'

'It does him credit,' said Mrs. Laurie warmly.

'I suppose so,' blurted out Mima, then, looking wretched, put her hand to her cheek. 'I've never quite liked—I mean if she—I can't help wondering—'

'Why did Godwin snap me up when I said I thought I knew her face?'

'We'd hoped no one would think that,' said Mima surprisingly. 'As a rule, you see, almost nobody comes here, and in every other way she seemed quite ideal: she is. In the ordinary way, we never could have afforded her. It did seem such an opportunity. You see, we could not offer a high salary.'

'That would narrow things down. . . .'

'It did. All the ones I had interviewed were so vulgar and pushing, besides seeming to know nothing at all. The agency woman said, "For that, what can you expect?" I was in despair.'

'Oh? So then—?'

'I came round more and more to Godwin's idea. As he said, it was practically a charity. It did seem unfair that the thing should count against her. When she had paid for her defence she hadn't a penny, and no other future, of course. And she was acquitted.'

'What on earth do you mean?'

Looking thoroughly frightened, Mima caught herself up. 'Oh dear,' she said, 'and I swore never to speak of it. Nella, will you swear to let this go no further? It's such a relief to tell you: it's on my mind the whole time. You see, Godwin had followed all the evidence carefully. The witnesses gave her such magnificent testimonials, almost all her former employers were called. Even the Prosecution didn't make out she wasn't a good governess. And after all, she was cleared. (If only they'd found who'd done it. . . .)'

'Begin at the beginning.'

'Well. . . . Do you ever read murder trials?'

'Hardly ever miss one.'

'Do you remember that Sir Max Rant dying suddenly?'

'Mima—she's not Henrietta Post?'

'Sssh—sssh,' whispered Mima, glancing Frank's way cautiously. Then she nodded at Nella with frightened important eyes.

Mrs. Laurie stared, galvanized, at her hostess. Then: 'She's lucky to be alive,' she said, 'it was touch and go.'

'He was a dreadful old man, apparently. At the very worst, they said nothing against her morals.'

'No wonder she's haunted-looking. That was an appalling ordeal. . . . But, after that, how on earth . . . ?'

'Godwin got me to write to her three weeks after the trial, offering her a new life and twenty-five pounds a year. . . .'

'Godwin is on the spot! Well, they're your children, not mine—Henrietta Post!'

Immovably, without batting a closed eyelid, Frank said, 'Who is Henrietta Post?'

II

'Miss Rice's hands are cold again,' said Penny.

Claudia went on painting a moment longer, then, balancing her brush on the glass jar of paint-water, which gave out a prussic smell and had a red sediment, looked intently across the table at Penny, who stood by Miss Rice's chair, chafing her right hand. Their governess, with her book propped on the table, her pale cheek on her left hand, read on, smiling unnoticingly. Once she withdrew her hand from Penny's to turn over a page.

'Whatever will she do in winter?' said Claudia.

'There'll be fires then.'

'This fire never burns much.' They shared the same desperate thought: 'Suppose our darling should leave us?'

This afternoon, the black chill of the grate focused your fancy as firelight might have done. The schoolroom had a faded sea-blue wallpaper cut into by pitch-pine presses and two doors: not a colour warmed it; the high windows looked into a rain-blurred hill. Miss Rice had put nothing of her own on the mantelpiece, along which marched a file of plasticine animals modelled by the little girls. About the room were products of other hobbies good governesses encourage children to have: on the window-sill a nursery-garden in pots. Pink-cheeked 'Bubbles' and 'Cherry Ripe' looked queerly down at the bleak room where these three people were living as best they could.

Miss Rice put away the book, and with it her happy, forgetful smile—the book had been Emma. 'Have you stopped painting?' she said.

She had given them for the subject a Greek temple. Claudia's temple had a sunset behind it, Penny had filled in the columns with Mediterranean blue. Miss Rice came round and looked. 'A sunset like that would make reflections on white stone, Claudia. Penny, on such a fine day there would be shadows.' They saw. She always thought of something they had not thought of: they wrinkled up their foreheads in ecstatic despair. 'Penny, if you are stopping, wash that blue off your paint-brush.'

'Are paints poison?'

'Sometimes. Well, are you cold, too?'

They would admit nothing that could distress her.

'Then push the table back and get the skipping-ropes out.'

The little girls were alike, though there were two years between them, as though they could not decide to part in any particular. There was not much difference in size, as though Penny had waited for Claudia. Their voices were pitched on the same persuasive note; when their vehement dark eyes met they seemed to consult. What they thought of being alive their parents would never know: their characters were like batteries storing something up. Before Miss Rice was here, the doctor's sister had come in every morning to give them lessons. They had known before how to read and write, so all they had learnt from the doctor's sister was what every one else knew: just why their house was avoided, how bitterly father was laughed at and mother pitied because of him. They learnt that it was wretched to be themselves. They marked the contempt with which every morning she bicycled up their avenue, and how insolently she ate what there was at lunch. Her raspy fingertips, the pearls screwed tight in her fleshy ears, her horsesense, all seemed part of her power to mortify them. She was the world and they prayed she might die, but she married. After that they waited, in armour. Then came Miss Rice.

'If you want to keep warm you must hurry,' said Miss Rice.

Claudia unwound the skipping-ropes and they took one each: they stood with their arms out, gripping the handles eagerly. 'One, two, three—go!' The ropes zip-zipped on the oilcloth. Penny stumbled at fifty-six, but Claudia kept in and skipped seventy-eight: her toes bounced and bounced, her hair flopped, her eyes started out of her head. At last the rope caught her toe. 'That's the record,' said Miss Rice, 'but Penny may beat it next time.' Both breathless, they knelt on the hearthrug, life tingling up through them from their toes to their cheeks.

'If you skipped,' said Claudia, 'you might skip a hundred.'

'The rope is too short,' said Miss Rice.

'What else used you to do—dance?'

'Yes, once.'

They had never seen anyone dancing except in pictures of ballrooms: they preferred to imagine Miss Rice not on the crook of an arm, but floating alone round a floor, with her ageless, shining white face, unfrivolous as an angel. At this happy moment, near her and warm from skipping, they felt on the edge of the story she did not tell. . . . But she looked down at the skipping-ropes on the floor. 'Better put those away,' she said. Except when she was reading she never stayed quiet long: something they could feel creep up behind her chair would make her speaking eyes go suddenly cold and dark as the grate. Against this their love was powerless. This dreadful expectation seemed wrong in their darling—mother without her worries would not be anyone, father was there to stare and bite his moustache, but she seemed to them born to inherit light. . . . Feeling their enemy here now the children, helpless, got up to put the skipping-ropes back in the press.

'Someone's coming!' said Penny. They heard the baize door at the far end of their passage swing to behind somebody, then a man's step. A knuckle rapped the door once, unconfidently. Miss Rice and the children waited. 'Come in!' she said.

Frank Peele peered round the door. 'Oh?' he said. 'May I come in? Sorry. I was exploring. Looking for secret passages. Exercise before tea.' Miss Rice smiled composedly. 'So here you all are,' he went on. He looked at the table. 'Painting?'

'Yes.'

'What a day!' he said to Miss Rice humbly. 'Very cheery up here, though. You believe in fresh air?' Then he saw that both windows were bolted: what he felt were the draughts. Miss Rice had moved to the table where she had been reading; Frank dropped into the wicker chair with a creak. The children shut their paint-boxes up. 'Must be getting on tea-time,' remarked Frank.

'Are you hungry, Cousin Frank?' said Claudia gently.

Frank looked relieved at hearing someone say something. 'I don't deserve tea; I slept like a log in the library. Your mother and Mrs. Laurie complain I snored.' He looked round the schoolroom wistfully, like a dog. 'They were talking nineteen to the dozen. When I dropped off they were well away about India, when I came to it was one Henrietta Post.'

Penny laughed. 'Who's Henrietta Post?' she said.

'Don't ask me,' said Frank, '—Miss Rice, who's Henrietta Post?'

Miss Rice pondered while the clock ticked several seconds and a cart rattled off into silence behind the wet orchards. The children turned to see how she took Frank's joke. She looked twice at him with steady, considering, dark eyes. 'Surely you know?' she said at last.

'I don't know a soul,' said Frank, 'I've been in Siam.'

'But you get the papers there, don't you?'

'She's a celebrity, is she?'

'She was accused of murder,' said Miss Rice, as though giving a history lesson, 'tried last spring, acquitted but never properly cleared. So she disappeared, hoping to be forgotten.'

'Good God,' exclaimed Frank. 'Where would a woman go to, after a show like that?'

'She is fortunate to be anywhere.'

'—Stop: it's coming back!' Frank said, delighted to have a topic. 'Wasn't she that governess? The old swine whose house she was in had been making up to her, so when someone did him in they tried to fix it on her. I remember I thought at the time—'

Miss Rice's marked unresponse reminded Frank where he was. Chidden, he stopped awkwardly, with a glance at the children. They sat stone-still, clasped hands thrust down between their knees; you could not possibly tell what was going on in their heads, which were both turned intently away from their governess. Frank kicked himself. But for the life of him he couldn't stop blurting out: 'She was very good-looking, wasn't she?'

'You never saw any photographs?'

'Out where I am I only get The Times, you see. No pretty pictures in it.'

'I see.'

Frank went on violently: 'I know I thought at the time, what a shocking unfair thing to happen to any woman!' . . . Miss Rice with her cold smile looked thoughtfully into the grate as though there were a fire burning there: she said nothing more. Her charges' agonized tension became startling. Frank hummed and beat a nonplussed tattoo on his knee. They were waiting to see the last of him. Whatever brick one had dropped, they were all very odd up here. . . .

III

This wet autumn evening closed in so early that the children had to stop work and wait for the lamp to come; when Mrs. Carbury looked in they were all in the dark. 'Why, whatever are you doing?' she said nervously. 'Where's Miss Rice? Why doesn't she ring for the lamp?'

'It never comes any sooner.'

'Father wouldn't like you wasting your time like this. Where is Miss Rice?'

'In her room,' Penny said, so indifferently that there seemed to be something foolish about the fuss. At this point a band of light appeared in the passage; the housemaid brought in the lamp and Mima saw her daughters facing each other like images across the table of lesson books, their unchildish eyes dark in the sudden lamplight. She sat down, acting calm while the housemaid was in the room; all the same, her manner made the girl so jumpy that she went away again without drawing down the blinds. Mrs. Carbury sat eyeing the other door: the children's bedroom opened off the schoolroom and Miss Rice's room was beyond, connecting with theirs. Her relief at not finding the governess was tremendous: all the same, she felt she was being defied.

'Does she always leave you to do preparation alone?'

'She's tired,' said Claudia. 'Cousin Frank was up here.'

'Oh? . . . Well, tell her I want to speak to her. Then you can leave your lessons, just for this evening, and go downstairs; Mrs. Laurie says she will play games with you.'

The children looked at their books without stirring, and Mima for the first time felt mutiny in the air. . . . Mima had had to brace herself to come in; twice already since tea she had started up to the schoolroom, then turned back before the baize door to that wing. Ever since her revelation to Mrs. Laurie she had been in a fearful state: the way Mrs. Laurie took it brought her own most persistent throttling fears to the top. 'Henrietta Post. . . . Well, they're your children, not mine.' What Nella said was what anybody who knew would say. Mima had shrunk back from the schoolroom door, feeling: 'No, I really cannot face her.' Then she had been forced to think: 'But that is the woman my children are with the whole time. . . .' Once she had got as far as Godwin's study to tell him he must agree to send Miss Rice away to-morrow, but the way he had looked up at her settled that. 'Nothing has changed since I agreed to engage her.' Mima knew too well that her husband found her a fool. 'I will give her notice first, then tell Godwin. It won't be so bad with Nella here in the house. Nella will back me up. But when Godwin hears I've told Nella? . . . He said before she came to stay: "Suppose your friend is inquisitive?" . . . What are they doing up there? What does she say to them? What goes on the whole time? My own children are strangers; they don't like being downstairs now. What was it the prosecution said about influence?' That thought had brought Mima past the schoolroom door.

Mima raised her voice. 'Run along now at once, children: Mrs. Laurie is waiting.'

'We would much rather not, mother.'

'Then you're very ungrateful. Besides, I have got something to say to Miss Rice—Penny and Claudia, don't look at each other like that! It's rude to look at each other when mother speaks!'

'Miss Rice is tired,' repeated Claudia gently.

'If you give us the message,' said Penny, 'we'll tell her.'

'No, I want to talk to Miss Rice,' said Mima, her voice unnatural.

'Do you, mother?' said Penny. 'You don't generally.'

The wicker chair Mima sat in creaked convulsively. 'When we're alone again you may learn to make mother happy. You may understand mother then and not be unkind to her. To-morrow, Miss Rice will be going away, children.'

Penny and Claudia looked at the chair their mother now sat in, then up at Emma left on the edge of the mantelpiece. Claudia looked at their row of young plants in the window-sill, sharp in the lamplight against the rain-lashed dark outside, Penny at the wrinkled rug where that afternoon they had knelt at their darling's feet. Then their gentle, vehement, dark eyes, meeting, paused to consult again. They said in their quiet voices: 'Then we will go too.'

MARÍA CONCEPCIÓN

Katherine Anne Porter

(1894- )

---

MARÍA CONCEPCIÓN WALKED CAREFULLY, keeping to the middle of the white dusty road, where the maguey thorns and the treacherous curved spines of organ cactus had not gathered so profusely. She would have enjoyed resting for a moment in the dark shade by the roadside, but she had no time to waste drawing cactus needles from her feet. Juan and his chief would be waiting for their food in the damp trenches of the buried city.

She carried about a dozen living fowls slung over her right shoulder, their feet fastened together. Half of them fell upon the flat of her back, the balance dangled uneasily over her breast. They wriggled their benumbed and swollen legs against her neck, they twisted their stupefied eyes and peered into her face inquiringly. She did not see them or think of them. Her left arm was tired with the weight of the food basket, and she was hungry after her long morning's work.

Her straight back outlined itself strongly under her clean bright blue cotton rebozo. Instinctive serenity softened her black eyes, shaped like almonds, set far apart, and tilted a bit endwise. She walked with the free, natural, guarded ease of the primitive woman carrying an unborn child. The shape of her body was easy, the swelling life was not a distortion, but the right inevitable proportions of a woman. She was entirely contented. Her husband was at work and she was on her way to market to sell her fowls.

Her small house sat half-way up a shallow hill, under a clump of pepper-trees, a wall of organ cactus enclosing it on the side nearest to the road. Now she came down into the valley, divided by the narrow spring, and crossed a bridge of loose stones near the hut where María Rosa the bee-keeper lived with her old godmother, Lupe the medicine woman. María Concepción had no faith in the charred owl bones, the singed rabbit fur, the cat entrails, the messes and ointments sold by Lupe to the ailing of the village. She was a good Christian, and drank simple herb teas for headache and stomachache, or bought her remedies bottled, with printed directions that she could not read, at the drugstore near the city market, where she went almost daily. But she often bought a jar of honey from young María Rosa, a pretty, shy child only fifteen years old.

María Concepción and her husband, Juan Villegas, were each a little past their eighteenth year. She had a good reputation with the neighbors as an energetic religious woman who could drive a bargain to the end. It was commonly known that if she wished to buy a new rebozo for herself or a shirt for Juan, she could bring out a sack of hard silver coins for the purpose.

She had paid for the license, nearly a year ago, the potent bit of stamped paper which permits people to be married in the church. She had given money to the priest before she and Juan walked together up to the altar the Monday after Holy Week. It had been the adventure of the villagers to go, three Sundays one after another, to hear the banns called by the priest for Juan de Dois Villegas and María Concepción Manríquez, who were actually getting married in the church, instead of behind it, which was the usual custom, less expensive, and as binding as any other ceremony. But María Concepción was always as proud as if she owned a hacienda.

She paused on the bridge and dabbled her feet in the water, her eyes resting themselves from the sun-rays in a fixed gaze to the far-off mountains, deeply blue under their hanging drift of clouds. It came to her that she would like a fresh crust of honey. The delicious aroma of bees, their slow thrilling hum, awakened a pleasant desire for a flake of sweetness in her mouth.

"If I do not eat it now, I shall mark my child," she thought, peering through the crevices in the thick hedge of cactus that sheered up nakedly, like bared knife blades set protectingly around the small clearing. The place was so silent she doubted if María Rosa and Lupe were at home.

The leaning jacal of dried rush-withes and corn sheaves, bound to tall saplings thrust into the earth, roofed with yellowed maguey leaves flattened and overlapping like shingles, hunched drowsy and fragrant in the warmth of noonday. The hives, similarly made, were scattered towards the back of the clearing, like small mounds of clean vegetable refuse. Over each mound there hung a dusty golden shimmer of bees.

A light gay scream of laughter rose from behind the hut; a man's short laugh joined in. "Ah, hahahaha!" went the voices together high and low, like a song.

"So María Rosa has a man!" María Concepción stopped short, smiling, shifted her burden slightly, and bent forward shading her eyes to see more clearly through the spaces of the hedge.

María Rosa ran, dodging between beehives, parting two stunted jasmine bushes as she came, lifting her knees in swift leaps, looking over her shoulder and laughing in a quivering, excited way. A heavy jar, swung to her wrist by the handle, knocked against her thighs as she ran. Her toes pushed up sudden spurts of dust, her half-raveled braids showered around her shoulders in long crinkled wisps.

Juan Villegas ran after her, also laughing strangely, his teeth set, both rows gleaming behind the small soft black beard growing sparsely on his lips, his chin, leaving his brown cheeks girl-smooth. When he seized her, he clenched so hard her chemise gave way and ripped from her shoulder. She stopped laughing at this, pushed him away and stood silent, trying to pull up the torn sleeve with one hand. Her pointed chin and dark red mouth moved in an uncertain way, as if she wished to laugh again; her long black lashes flickered with the quick-moving lights in her hidden eyes.

María Concepción did not stir nor breathe for some seconds. Her forehead was cold, and yet boiling water seemed to be pouring slowly along her spine. An unaccountable pain was in her knees, as if they were broken. She was afraid Juan and María Rosa would feel her eyes fixed upon them and would find her there, unable to move, spying upon them. But they did not pass beyond the enclosure, nor even glance towards the gap in the wall opening upon the road.

Juan lifted one of María Rosa's loosened braids and slapped her neck with it playfully. She smiled softly, consentingly. Together they moved back through the hives of honey-comb. María Rosa balanced her jar on one hip and swung her long full petticoats with every step. Juan flourished his wide hat back and forth, walking proudly as a game-cock.

María Concepción came out of the heavy cloud which enwrapped her head and bound her throat, and found herself walking onward, keeping the road without knowing it, feeling her way delicately, her ears strumming as if all María Rosa's bees had hived in them. Her careful sense of duty kept her moving toward the buried city where Juan's chief, the American archeologist, was taking his midday rest, waiting for his food.

Juan and María Rosa! She burned all over now, as if a layer of tiny fig-cactus bristles, as cruel as spun glass, had crawled under her skin. She wished to sit down quietly and wait for her death, but not until she had cut the throats of her man and that girl who were laughing and kissing under the cornstalks. Once when she was a young girl she had come back from market to find her jacal burned to a pile of ash and her few silver coins gone. A dark empty feeling had filled her; she kept moving about the place, not believing her eyes, expecting it all to take shape again before her. But it was gone, and though she knew an enemy had done it, she could not find out who it was, and could only curse and threaten the air. Now here was a worse thing, but she knew her enemy. María Rosa, that sinful girl, shameless! She heard herself saying a harsh, true word about María Rosa, saying it aloud as if she expected someone to agree with her: "Yes, she is a whore! She has no right to live."

At this moment the gray untidy head of Givens appeared over the edges of the newest trench he had caused to be dug in his field of excavations. The long deep crevasses, in which a man might stand without being seen, lay crisscrossed like orderly gashes of a giant scalpel. Nearly all of the men of the community worked for Givens, helping him to uncover the lost city of their ancestors. They worked all the year through and prospered, digging every day for those small clay heads and bits of pottery and fragments of painted walls for which there was no good use on earth, being all broken and encrusted with clay. They themselves could make better ones, perfectly stout and new, which they took to town and peddled to foreigners for real money. But the unearthly delight of the chief in finding these worn-out things was an endless puzzle. He would fairly roar for joy at times, waving a shattered pot or a human skull above his head, shouting for his photographer to come and make a picture of this!

Now he emerged, and his young enthusiast's eyes welcomed María Concepción from his old-man face, covered with hard wrinkles and burned to the color of red earth. "I hope you've brought me a nice fat one." He selected a fowl from the bunch dangling nearest him as María Concepción, wordless, leaned over the trench. "Dress it for me, there's a good girl. I'll broil it."

María Concepción took the fowl by the head, and silently, swiftly drew her knife across its throat, twisting the head off with the casual firmness she might use with the top of a beet.

"Good God, woman, you do have nerve," said Givens, watching her. "I can't do that. It gives me the creeps."

"My home country is Guadalajara," explained María Concepción, without bravado, as she picked and gutted the fowl.

She stood and regarded Givens condescendingly, that diverting white man who had no woman of his own to cook for him, and moreover appeared not to feel any loss of dignity in preparing his own food. He squatted now, eyes squinted, nose wrinkled to avoid the smoke, turning the roasting fowl busily on a stick. A mysterious man, undoubtedly rich, and Juan's chief, therefore to be respected, to be placated.

"The tortillas are fresh and hot, señor," she murmured gently. "With your permission I will now go to market."

"Yes, yes, run along; bring me another of these tomorrow." Givens turned his head to look at her again. Her grand manner sometimes reminded him of royalty in exile. He noticed her unnatural paleness. "The sun is too hot, eh?" he asked.

"Yes, sir. Pardon me, but Juan will be here soon?"

"He ought to be here now. Leave his food. The others will eat it."

She moved away; the blue of her rebozo became a dancing spot in the heat waves that rose from the gray-red soil. Givens liked his Indians best when he could feel a fatherly indulgence for their primitive childish ways. He told comic stories of Juan's escapades, of how often he had saved him, in the past five years, from going to jail, and even from being shot, for his varied and always unexpected misdeeds.

"I am never a minute too soon to get him out of one pickle or another," he would say. "Well, he's a good worker, and I know how to manage him."

After Juan was married, he used to twit him, with exactly the right shade of condescension, on his many infidelities to María Concepción. "She'll catch you yet, and God help you!" he was fond of saying, and Juan would laugh with immense pleasure.

It did not occur to María Concepción to tell Juan she had found him out. During the day her anger against him died, and her anger against María Rosa grew. She kept saying to herself, "When I was a young girl like María Rosa, if a man had caught hold of me so, I would have broken my jar over his head." She forgot completely that she had not resisted even so much as María Rosa, on the day that Juan had first taken hold of her. Besides she had married him afterwards in the church, and that was a very different thing.

Juan did not come home that night, but went away to war and María Rosa went with him. Juan had a rifle at his shoulder and two pistols at his belt. María Rosa wore a rifle also, slung on her back along with the blankets and the cooking pots. They joined the nearest detachment of troops in the field, and María Rosa marched ahead with the battalion of experienced women of war, which went over the crops like locusts, gathering provisions for the army. She cooked with them, and ate with them what was left after the men had eaten. After battles she went out on the field with the others to salvage clothing and ammunition and guns from the slain before they should begin to swell in the heat. Sometimes they would encounter the women from the other army, and a second battle as grim as the first would take place.

There was no particular scandal in the village. People shrugged, grinned. It was far better that they were gone. The neighbors went around saying that María Rosa was safer in the army than she would be in the same village with María Concepción.

María Concepción did not weep when Juan left her; and when the baby was born, and died within four days, she did not weep. "She is mere stone," said old Lupe, who went over and offered charms to preserve the baby.

"May you rot in hell with your charms," said María Concepción.

If she had not gone so regularly to church, lighting candles before the saints, kneeling with her arms spread in the form of a cross for hours at a time, and receiving holy communion every month, there might have been talk of her being devil-possessed, her face was so changed and blind-looking. But this was impossible when, after all, she had been married by the priest. It must be, they reasoned, that she was being punished for her pride. They decided that this was the true cause for everything: she was altogether too proud. So they pitied her.

During the year that Juan and María Rosa were gone María Concepción sold her fowls and looked after her garden and her sack of hard coins grew. Lupe had no talent for bees, and the hives did not prosper. She began to blame María Rosa for running away, and to praise María Concepción for her behavior. She used to see María Concepción at the market or at church, and she always said that no one could tell by looking at her now that she was a woman who had such a heavy grief.

"I pray God everything goes well with María Concepción from this out," she would say, "for she has had her share of trouble."

When some idle person repeated this to the deserted woman, she went down to Lupe's house and stood within the clearing and called to the medicine woman, who sat in her doorway stirring a mess of her infallible cure for sores: "Keep your prayers to yourself, Lupe, or offer them for others who need them. I will ask God for what I want in this world."

"And will you get it, you think, María Concepción?" asked Lupe, tittering cruelly and smelling the wooden mixing spoon. "Did you pray for what you have now?"

Afterward everyone noticed that María Concepción went oftener to church, and even seldomer to the village to talk with the other women as they sat along the curb, nursing their babies and eating fruit, at the end of the market-day.

"She is wrong to take us for enemies," said old Soledad, who was a thinker and a peace-maker. "All women have these troubles. Well, we should suffer together."

But María Concepción lived alone. She was gaunt, as if something were gnawing her away inside, her eyes were sunken, and she would not speak a word if she could help it. She worked harder than ever, and her butchering knife was scarcely ever out of her hand.

Juan and María Rosa, disgusted with military life, came home one day without asking permission of anyone. The field of war had unrolled itself, a long scroll of vexations, until the end had frayed out within twenty miles of Juan's village. So he and María Rosa, now lean as a wolf, burdened with a child daily expected, set out with no farewells to the regiment and walked home.

They arrived one morning about daybreak. Juan was picked up on sight by a group of military police from the small barracks on the edge of town, and taken to prison, where the officer in charge told him with impersonal cheerfulness that he would add one to a catch of ten waiting to be shot as deserters the next morning.

María Rosa, screaming and falling on her face in the road, was taken under the armpits by two guards and helped briskly to her jacal, now sadly run down. She was received with professional importance by Lupe, who helped the baby to be born at once.

Limping with foot soreness, a layer of dust concealing his fine new clothes got mysteriously from somewhere, Juan appeared before the captain at the barracks. The captain recognized him as head digger for his good friend Givens, and dispatched a note to Givens saying: "I am holding the person of Juan Villegas awaiting your further disposition."

When Givens showed up Juan was delivered to him with the urgent request that nothing be made public about so humane and sensible an operation on the part of military authority.

Juan walked out of the rather stifling atmosphere of the drumhead court, a definite air of swagger about him. His hat, of unreasonable dimensions and embroidered with silver thread, hung over one eyebrow, secured at the back by a cord of silver dripping with bright blue tassels. His shirt was of a checkerboard pattern in green and black, his white cotton trousers were bound by a belt of yellow leather tooled in red. His feet were bare, full of stone bruises, and sadly ragged as to toenails. He removed his cigarette from the corner of his full-lipped wide mouth. He removed the splendid hat. His black dusty hair, pressed moistly to his forehead, sprang up suddenly in a cloudy thatch on his crown. He bowed to the officer, who appeared to be gazing at a vacuum. He swung his arm wide in a free circle upsoaring towards the prison window, where forlorn heads poked over the window sill, hot eyes following after the lucky departing one. Two or three of the heads nodded, and a half dozen hands were flipped at him in an effort to imitate his own casual and heady manner.

Juan kept up this insufferable pantomime until they rounded the first clump of fig-cactus. Then he seized Givens' hand and burst into oratory. "Blessed be the day your servant Juan Villegas first came under your eyes. From this day my life is yours without condition, ten thousand thanks with all my heart!"

"For God's sake stop playing the fool," said Givens irritably. "Some day I'm going to be five minutes too late."

"Well, it is nothing much to be shot, my chief—certainly you know I was not afraid—but to be shot in a drove of deserters, against a cold wall, just in the moment of my home-coming, by order of that . . ."

Glittering epithets tumbled over one another like explosions of a rocket. All the scandalous analogies from the animal and vegetable worlds were applied in a vivid, unique and personal way to the life, loves, and family history of the officer who had just set him free. When he had quite cursed himself dry, and his nerves were soothed, he added: "With your permission, my chief!"

"What will María Concepción say to all this?" asked Givens. "You are very informal, Juan, for a man who was married in the church."

Juan put on his hat.

"Oh, María Concepción! That's nothing. Look, my chief, to be married in the church is a great misfortune for a man. After that he is not himself any more. How can that woman complain when I do not drink even at fiestas enough to be really drunk? I do not beat her; never, never. We were always at peace. I say to her, Come here, and she comes straight. I say, Go there, and she goes quickly. Yet sometimes I looked at her and thought, Now I am married to that woman in the church, and I felt a sinking inside, as if something were lying heavy on my stomach. With María Rosa it is all different. She is not silent; she talks. When she talks too much, I slap her and say, Silence, thou simpleton! and she weeps. She is just a girl with whom I do as I please. You know how she used to keep those clean little bees in their hives? She is like their honey to me. I swear it. I would not harm María Concepción because I am married to her in the church; but also, my chief, I will not leave María Rosa, because she pleases me more than any other woman."

"Let me tell you, Juan, things haven't been going as well as you think. You be careful. Some day María Concepción will just take your head off with that carving knife of hers. You keep that in mind."

Juan's expression was the proper blend of masculine triumph and sentimental melancholy. It was pleasant to see himself in the rôle of hero to two such desirable women. He had just escaped from the threat of a disagreeable end. His clothes were new and handsome, and they had cost him just nothing. María Rosa had collected them for him here and there after battles. He was walking in the early sunshine, smelling the good smells of ripening cactus-figs, peaches, and melons, of pungent berries dangling from the pepper-trees, and the smoke of his cigarette under his nose. He was on his way to civilian life with his patient chief. His situation was ineffably perfect, and he swallowed it whole.

"My chief," he addressed Givens handsomely, as one man of the world to another, "women are good things, but not at this moment. With your permission, I will now go to the village and eat. My God, how I shall eat! Tomorrow morning very early I will come to the buried city and work like seven men. Let us forget María Concepción and María Rosa. Each one in her place. I will manage them when the time comes."

News of Juan's adventure soon got abroad, and Juan found many friends about him during the morning. They frankly commended his way of leaving the army. It was in itself the act of a hero. The new hero ate a great deal and drank somewhat, the occasion being better than a feast-day. It was almost noon before he returned to visit María Rosa.

He found her sitting on a clean straw mat, rubbing fat on her three-hour-old-son. Before this felicitous vision Juan's emotions so twisted him that he returned to the village and invited every man in the "Death and Resurrection" pulque shop to drink with him.

Having thus taken leave of his balance, he started back to María Rosa, and found himself unaccountably in his own house, attempting to beat María Concepción by way of reestablishing himself in his legal household.

María Concepción, knowing all the events of that unhappy day, was not in a yielding mood, and refused to be beaten. She did not scream nor implore; she stood her ground and resisted; she even struck at him. Juan, amazed, hardly knowing what he did, stepped back and gazed at her inquiringly through a leisurely whirling film which seemed to have lodged behind his eyes. Certainly he had not even thought of touching her. Oh, well, no harm done. He gave up, turned away, half-asleep on his feet. He dropped amiably in a shadowed corner and began to snore.

María Concepción, seeing that he was quiet, began to bind the legs of her fowls. It was market-day and she was late. She fumbled and tangled the bits of cord in her haste, and set off across the plowed fields instead of taking the accustomed road. She ran with a crazy panic in her head, her stumbling legs. Now and then she would stop and look about her, trying to place herself, then go on a few steps, until she realized that she was not going towards the market.

At once she came to her senses completely, recognized the thing that troubled her so terribly, was certain of what she wanted. She sat down quietly under a sheltering thorny bush and gave herself over to her long devouring sorrow. The thing which had for so long squeezed her whole body into a tight dumb knot of suffering suddenly broke with shocking violence. She jerked with the involuntary recoil of one who receives a blow, and the sweat poured from her skin as if the wounds of her whole life were shedding their salt ichor. Drawing her rebozo over her head, she bowed her forehead on her updrawn knees, and sat there in deadly silence and immobility. From time to time she lifted her head where the sweat formed steadily and poured down her face, drenching the front of her chemise, and her mouth had the shape of crying, but there were no tears and no sound. All her being was a dark confused memory of grief burning in her at night, of deadly baffled anger eating at her by day, until her very tongue tasted bitter, and her feet were as heavy as if she were mired in the muddy roads during the time of rains.

After a great while she stood up and threw the rebozo off her face, and set out walking again.

Juan awakened slowly, with long yawns and grumblings, alternated with short relapses into sleep full of visions and clamors. A blur of orange light seared his eyeballs when he tried to unseal his lids. There came from somewhere a low voice weeping without tears, saying meaningless phrases over and over. He began to listen. He tugged at the leash of his stupor, he strained to grasp those words which terrified him even though he could not quite hear them. Then he came awake with frightening suddenness, sitting up and staring at the long sharpened streak of light piercing the corn-husk walls from the level disappearing sun.

María Concepción stood in the doorway, looming colossally tall to his betrayed eyes. She was talking quickly, and calling his name. Then he saw her clearly.

"God's name!" said Juan, frozen to the marrow, "here I am facing my death!" for the long knife she wore habitually at her belt was in her hand. But instead, she threw it away, clear from her, and got down on her knees, crawling toward him as he had seen her crawl many times toward the shrine at Guadalupe Villa. He watched her approach with such horror that the hair of his head seemed to be lifting itself away from him. Falling forward upon her face, she huddled over him, lips moving in a ghostly whisper. Her words became clear, and Juan understood them all.

For a second he could not move nor speak. Then he took her head between both his hands, and supported her in this way, saying swiftly, anxiously reassuring, almost in a babble:

"Oh, thou poor creature! Oh, madwoman! Oh, my María Concepción, unfortunate! Listen. . . . Don't be afraid. Listen to me! I will hide thee away, I thy own man will protect thee! Quiet! Not a sound!"

Trying to collect himself, he held her and cursed under his breath for a few moments in the gathering darkness. María Concepción bent over, face almost on the ground, her feet folded under her, as if she would hide behind him. For the first time in his life Juan was aware of danger. This was danger. María Concepción would be dragged away between two gendarmes, with him following helpless and unarmed, to spend the rest of her days in Belén Prison, maybe. Danger! The night swarmed with threats. He stood up and dragged her up with him. She was silent and perfectly rigid, holding to him with resistless strength, her hands stiffened on his arms.

"Get me the knife," he told her in a whisper. She obeyed, her feet slipping along the hard earth floor, her shoulders straight, her arms close to her side. He lighted a candle. María Concepción held the knife out to him. It was stained and dark even to the handle with drying blood.

He frowned at her harshly, noting the same stains on her chemise and hands.

"Take off thy clothes and wash thy hands," he ordered. He washed the knife carefully, and threw the water wide of the doorway. She watched him and did likewise with the bowl in which she had bathed.

"Light the brasero and cook food for me," he told her in the same peremptory tone. He took her garments and went out. When he returned, she was wearing an old soiled dress, and was fanning the fire in the charcoal burner. Seating himself cross-legged near her, he stared at her as at a creature unknown to him, who bewildered him utterly, for whom there was no possible explanation. She did not turn her head, but kept silent and still, except for the movements of her strong hands fanning the blaze which cast sparks and small jets of white smoke, flaring and dying rhythmically with the motion of the fan, lighting her face and darkening it by turns.

Juan's voice barely disturbed the silence: "Listen to me carefully, and tell me the truth, and when the gendarmes come here for us, thou shalt have nothing to fear. But there will be something for us to settle between us afterward."

The light from the charcoal burner shone in her eyes; a yellow phosphorescence glimmered behind the dark iris.

"For me everything is settled now," she answered, in a tone so tender, so grave, so heavy with suffering, that Juan felt his vitals contract. He wished to repent openly, not as a man, but as a very small child. He could not fathom her, nor himself, nor the mysterious fortunes of life grown so instantly confused where all had seemed so gay and simple. He felt too that she had become invaluable, a woman without equal among a million women, and he could not tell why. He drew an enormous sigh that rattled in his chest.

"Yes, yes, it is all settled. I shall not go away again. We must stay here together."

Whispering, he questioned her and she answered whispering, and he instructed her over and over until she had her lesson by heart. The hostile darkness of the night encroached upon them, flowing over the narrow threshold, invading their hearts. It brought with it sighs and murmurs, the pad of secretive feet in the near-by road, the sharp staccato whimper of wind through the cactus leaves. All these familiar, once friendly cadences were now invested with sinister terrors; a dread, formless and uncontrollable, took hold of them both.

"Light another candle," said Juan, loudly, in too resolute, too sharp a tone. "Let us eat now."

They sat facing each other and ate from the same dish, after their old habit. Neither tasted what they ate. With food half-way to his mouth, Juan listened. The sound of voices rose, spread, widened at the turn of the road along the cactus wall. A spray of lantern light shot through the hedge, a single voice slashed the blackness, ripped the fragile layer of silence suspended above the hut.

"Juan Villegas!"

"Pass, friends!" Juan roared back cheerfully.

They stood in the doorway, simple cautious gendarmes from the village, mixed-bloods themselves with Indian sympathies, well known to all the community. They flashed their lanterns almost apologetically upon the pleasant, harmless scene of a man eating supper with his wife.

"Pardon, brother," said the leader. "Someone has killed the woman María Rosa, and we must question her neighbors and friends." He paused, and added with an attempt at severity, "Naturally!"

"Naturally," agreed Juan. "You know that I was a good friend of María Rosa. This is bad news."

They all went away together, the men walking in a group, María Concepción following a few steps in the rear, near Juan. No one spoke.

The two points of candlelight at María Rosa's head fluttered uneasily; the shadows shifted and dodged on the stained darkened walls. To María Concepción everything in the smothering enclosing room shared an evil restlessness. The watchful faces of those called as witnesses, the faces of old friends, were made alien by the look of speculation in their eyes. The ridges of the rose-colored rebozo thrown over the body varied continually, as though the thing it covered was not perfectly in repose. Her eyes swerved over the body in the open painted coffin, from the candle tips at the head to the feet, jutting up thinly, the small scarred soles protruding, freshly washed, a mass of crooked, half-healed wounds, thorn-pricks and cuts of sharp stones. Her gaze went back to the candle flame, to Juan's eyes warning her, to the gendarmes talking among themselves. Her eyes would not be controlled.

With a leap that shook her her gaze settled upon the face of María Rosa. Instantly her blood ran smoothly again: there was nothing to fear. Even the restless light could not give a look of life to that fixed countenance. She was dead. María Concepción felt her muscles give way softly; her heart began beating steadily without effort. She knew no more rancor against that pitiable thing, lying indifferently in its blue coffin under the fine silk rebozo. The mouth drooped sharply at the corners in a grimace of weeping arrested half-way. The brows were distressed; the dead flesh could not cast off the shape of its last terror. It was all finished. María Rosa had eaten too much honey and had had too much love. Now she must sit in hell, crying over her sins and her hard death forever and ever.

Old Lupe's cackling voice arose. She had spent the morning helping María Rosa, and it had been hard work. The child had spat blood the moment it was born, a bad sign. She thought then that bad luck would come to the house. Well, about sunset she was in the yard at the back of the house grinding tomatoes and peppers. She had left mother and babe asleep. She heard a strange noise in the house, a choking and smothered calling, like someone wailing in sleep. Well, such a thing is only natural. But there followed a light, quick, thudding sound—

"Like the blows of a fist?" interrupted an officer.

"No, not at all like such a thing."

"How do you know?"

"I am well acquainted with that sound, friends," retorted Lupe. "This was something else."

She was at a loss to describe it exactly. A moment later, there came the sound of pebbles rolling and slipping under feet; then she knew someone had been there and was running away.

"Why did you wait so long before going to see?"

"I am old and hard in the joints," said Lupe. "I cannot run after people. I walked as fast as I could to the cactus hedge, for it is only by this way that anyone can enter. There was no one in the road, sir, no one. Three cows, with a dog driving them; nothing else. When I got to María Rosa, she was lying all tangled up, and from her neck to her middle she was full of knife-holes. It was a sight to move the Blessed Image Himself! Her eyes were—"

"Never mind. Who came oftenest to her house before she went away? Did you know her enemies?"

Lupe's face congealed, closed. Her spongy skin drew into a network of secretive wrinkles. She turned withdrawn and expressionless eyes upon the gendarmes.

"I am an old woman. I do not see well. I cannot hurry on my feet. I know no enemy of María Rosa. I did not see anyone leave the clearing."

"You did not hear splashing in the spring near the bridge?"

"No, sir."

"Why, then, do our dogs follow a scent there and lose it?"

"God only knows, my friend. I am an old wo—"

"Yes. How did the footfalls sound?"

"Like the tread of an evil spirit!" Lupe broke forth into a swelling oracular tone that startled them. The Indians stirred uneasily, glanced at the dead, then at Lupe. They half expected her to produce the evil spirit among them at once.

The gendarme began to lose his temper.

"No, poor unfortunate; I mean, were they heavy or light? The footsteps of a man or of a woman? Was the person shod or barefoot?"

A glance at the listening circle assured Lupe of their thrilled attention. She enjoyed the dangerous importance of her situation. She could have ruined that María Concepción with a word, but it was even sweeter to make fools of these gendarmes who went about spying on honest people. She raised her voice again. What she had not seen she could not describe, thank God! No one could harm her because her knees were stiff and she could not run even to seize a murderer. As for knowing the difference between footfalls, shod or bare, man or woman, nay, between devil and human, who ever heard of such madness?

"My eyes are not ears, gentlemen," she ended grandly, "but upon my heart I swear those footsteps fell as the tread of the spirit of evil!"

"Imbecile!" yapped the leader in a shrill voice. "Take her away, one of you! Now, Juan Villegas, tell me—"

Juan told his story patiently, several times over. He had returned to his wife that day. She had gone to market as usual. He had helped her prepare her fowls. She had returned about mid-afternoon, they had talked, she had cooked, they had eaten, nothing was amiss. Then the gendarmes came with the news about María Rosa. That was all. Yes, María Rosa had run away with him, but there had been no bad blood between him and his wife on this account, nor between his wife and María Rosa. Everybody knew that his wife was a quiet woman.

María Concepción heard her own voice answering without a break. It was true at first she was troubled when her husband went away, but after that she had not worried about him. It was the way of men, she believed. She was a church-married woman and knew her place. Well, he had come home at last. She had gone to market, but had come back early, because now she had her man to cook for. That was all.

Other voices broke in. A toothless old man said: "She is a woman of good reputation among us, and María Rosa was not." A smiling young mother, Anita, baby at breast, said: "If no one thinks so, how can you accuse her? It was the loss of her child and not of her husband that changed her so." Another: "María Rosa had a strange life, apart from us. How do we know who might have come from another place to do her evil?" And old Soledad spoke up boldly: "When I saw María Concepción in the market today, I said, 'Good luck to you, María Concepción, this is a happy day for you!'" and she gave María Concepción a long easy stare, and the smile of a born wise-woman.

María Concepción suddenly felt herself guarded, surrounded, upborne by her faithful friends. They were around her, speaking for her, defending her, the forces of life were ranged invincibly with her against the beaten dead. María Rosa had thrown away her share of strength in them, she lay forfeited among them. María Concepción looked from one to the other of the circling, intent faces. Their eyes gave back reassurance, understanding, a secret and mighty sympathy.

The gendarmes were at a loss. They, too, felt that sheltering wall cast impenetrably around her. They were certain she had done it, and yet they could not accuse her. Nobody could be accused; there was not a shred of true evidence. They shrugged their shoulders and snapped their fingers and shuffled their feet. Well, then, good night to everybody. Many pardons for having intruded. Good health!

A small bundle lying against the wall at the head of the coffin squirmed like an eel. A wail, a mere sliver of sound, issued. María Concepción took the son of María Rosa in her arms.

"He is mine," she said clearly, "I will take him with me."

No one assented in words, but an approving nod, a bare breath of complete agreement, stirred among them as they made way for her.

María Concepción, carrying the child, followed Juan from the clearing. The hut was left with its lighted candles and a crowd of old women who would sit up all night, drinking coffee and smoking and telling ghost stories.

Juan's exaltation had burned out. There was not an ember of excitement left in him. He was tired. The perilous adventure was over. María Rosa had vanished, to come no more forever. Their days of marching, of eating, of quarreling and making love between battles, were all over. Tomorrow he would go back to dull and endless labor, he must descend into the trenches of the buried city as María Rosa must go into her grave. He felt his veins fill up with bitterness, with black unendurable melancholy. Oh, Jesus! what bad luck overtakes a man!

Well, there was no way out of it now. For a moment he craved only to sleep. He was so drowsy he could scarcely guide his feet. The occasional light touch of the woman at his elbow was as unreal, as ghostly as the brushing of a leaf against his face. He did not know why he had fought to save her, and now he forgot her. There was nothing in him except a vast blind hurt like a covered wound.

He entered the jacal, and without waiting to light a candle, threw off his clothing, sitting just within the door. He moved with lagging, half-awake hands, to strip his body of its heavy finery. With a long groaning sigh of relief he fell straight back on the floor, almost instantly asleep, his arms flung up and outward.

María Concepción, a small clay jar in her hand, approached the gentle little mother goat tethered to a sapling, which gave and yielded as she pulled at the rope's end after the farthest reaches of grass about her. The kid, tied up a few feet away, rose bleating, its feathery fleece shivering in the fresh wind. Sitting on her heels, holding his tether, she allowed him to suckle a few moments. Afterward—all her movements very deliberate and even—she drew a supply of milk for the child.

She sat against the wall of her house, near the doorway. The child, fed and asleep, was cradled in the hollow of her crossed legs. The silence overflowed the world, the skies flowed down evenly to the rim of the valley, the stealthy moon crept slantwise to the shelter of the mountains. She felt soft and warm all over; she dreamed that the newly born child was her own, and she was resting deliciously.

María Concepción could hear Juan's breathing. The sound vaped from the low doorway, calmly; the house seemed to be resting after a burdensome day. She breathed, too, very slowly and quietly, each inspiration saturating her with repose. The child's light, faint breath was a mere shadowy moth of sound in the silver air. The night, the earth under her, seemed to swell and recede together with a limitless, unhurried benign breathing. She drooped and closed her eyes, feeling the slow rise and fall within her own body. She did not know what it was, but it eased her all through. Even as she was falling asleep, head bowed over the child, she was still aware of a strange, wakeful happiness.

I HAD FOUND WORK in Rheinhesse, but after eight days the job was done. With three marks in my pocket and a litre bottle of wine in my rucksack I set off for Mainz.

In a wine-shop on the quay I met up with a pipe-layer from Gladbach, who was out of a job too and on the tramp through Germany as I was. First we drank a quarter litre together and before we could look round we'd drunk four and by the time we had told each other our life-stories we'd drunk eight and my money was gone. Thereupon my pal ransacked his trouser pockets and, lo and behold, the innkeeper brought two more quarters and then we embraced and drank to our eternal friendship. Then he began telling me about all the jobs he had ever had and I, not to be outdone, started up and told him all about my travels as a fitter in Germany, Rumania and Sweden, until he chipped in with: "Man, those were the days . . ."

But all the same a lump came into my throat and I flourished my last glass of wine and sang: "What's the good of a pretty garden for others to walk in and pick my roses . . ."

Then the innkeeper came and sat down at our table and suddenly we were all talking about the War. "That time at Cambrai . . ." my pal shouted, and then the innkeeper got up and fetched a jug and we drank that empty too and our souls took flight for the open country, on the Aisne, round Bapaume and in the forest of Argonne. But I'll never forget how my pal's eyes suddenly went quite dark and he muttered as though to himself: "My lads, if we had known then what sort of a peace it was going to be . . ." At that we fell silent; only the clock ticked and the wine swayed in the glasses.

Suddenly I found myself in the street. My pal was sprawling with his arms across the table and weeping. He would not hear of parting. "Cover!" he was shouting. "Take cover where you can!" So I left him as he was drunk. The innkeeper came to the door with me. There in the forgotten light of day he said to me: "Things'll mend soon." I shook him by the hand and answered, as I did time and time again: "Pray God they may, my friend."

At first the houses looked a bit askew and the motor-cars drove as if there was no one on the road but themselves. That didn't worry me, though, and I set off along the quay-side. Then a motor-car had to pull up sharp and my poor little self was hauled over the coals by a man inside it. That amused me and I shouted back at him as he cursed: "You're nothing but a stuffed shirt," and went happily on my way. Soon, however, my eyes cleared and I saw life in its wonted clarity. My pal, the pipe-layer, our host and war comrade, the divine consolation of the wine and the cheerful belly of the jug died away behind me in the haze of the old town. I walked straight ahead and, after a few minutes, there I stood on the bridge over the Rhine. My heart laughed aloud as I saw the river. I leant over the green-painted rails, the March breeze refreshed me and, as I took a close look at the river, I saw that far and wide there was not a vessel of any kind to be seen on it; they all lay at the quays, moored and tarred—unemployed as I was.

But there was still the town before my eyes; the fronts of the houses stood up in a thin haze and above them rose the Cathedral, and over them all, over the roofs and the water and the whole width of the Rhine, lay the light. It was all one single radiance of light, and the seagulls waddled about on the piers of the bridge, and in the sky were little white clouds, sailing to Holland. At that I held my tongue and only used my eyes, and I felt that a man could never go under as long as there was so much light and so much good water and such a cosy town in his own native land. I set off light-heartedly through drab outskirts and past silent factories—but soon all that came to an end and I was on a country road lined by walnut trees.

The wind, blowing over stretches of asparagus, bowled yellow dust in front of me. Far away on the horizon I saw a range of blue hills. It was the Odenwald, and that was my destination.

It was evening by the time I reached Darmstadt. I was refused a lodging, for I still reeked of wine, but I didn't care; for on the edge of the town I found a loft and slept in the hay. It was warm and I slept soundly. I burrowed in and let the darkness enfold me.

I was wakened by the singing of birds and, as I was shivering, I called the litre bottle to my aid and the never-failing miracle of wine soon ran through my chilled limbs. I washed in a pond where a boat called "Elfriede" was moored. Then I climbed the road up into the forest. There the birds were already busy and the dew shone on the anemones.

I had been walking for two hours when hunger assailed me, but there was no village to be seen. The air was bright and clear. The sun fell in a thousand flecks of light through the thin foliage. The wind sighed through the tree tops. Poor wretch, I thought, what good to you is the peace of nature if there is no peace in your belly?

After another half hour I began to feel weak. I sat myself down and breathed deeply. That stilled the beating of my heart. At last I lay down at full length and fell asleep. That's the best thing, I thought. If you have no bread, then sleep; for sleep is the bread of the poor.

Nevertheless I dreamt that my conscience arose and sat on my chest.

"Henry," it said so severely that I quailed before it, "you have drunk your three marks and now, Henry, you go hungry."

But my counter-conscience jumped up and said: "You silly old woman, how is the poor fellow to endure life without a few quarter litres?" At that my conscience sprang from my chest and rushed upon my counter-conscience to beat it, but my counter-conscience transformed itself into a singing tone. It leapt up into the windy tree-tops. It passed into the light of the sun. It descended again in dew. It was to be seen everywhere and nowhere and at last it hid as a chuckling echo in a distant stony brook.

But I lay stretched out at ease in the lap of nature and slept the divine sleep of a boy for whose favour the Muses are rivals . . .

I was awakened by a blow. A horse towered above me. I heard curses. "Drunken sot!" And then I observed that I was lying in the middle of the road. I must have rolled there in my sleep. The farmer jumped down from his cart and I got up. There he stood, purple in the face; he was a young man, and he gripped me by the shoulder. "Seven o'clock in the morning and sozzled already," he shouted and tried to throw me into the ditch. But I gave him such a push that he fell over. Whereupon, as was only natural, we went for each other for some time in silence. But as I knew how to box, I soon laid him out and he said no more. Whereupon I took a deep breath of the fragrant forest air and all at once my strength was renewed. I drew myself up proudly and was just going to take a drink from my litre bottle when a woman jumped down from the cart.

"Schickedanz," she screamed and running to the man she took his head in her hands and began stroking his forehead.

"It's all right, madam," I said, and going to the pair, I held the bottle under the farmer's nose—and what happened? He woke up. When he was on his feet with his wife beside him, he said: "What's up?"

"I laid you out," I answered. His wife laughed at this, for the man looked at me so stupidly. "But in case you think I'm a thief or one of those scoundrels who drive about the country in motor-cars," I went on, "I'll tell you what I am. I'm an out-of-work fitter, driven by hunger to tramp his native land, and that's why I fell asleep."

At this the woman laughed again. She had black hair under a red handkerchief and such lovely teeth as you never saw.

"Schickedanz," she said, dusting the earth from his forehead, "you could have asked the man first. You're always so hasty and that's what you get for it."

Schickedanz looked at me for a full minute nearly. "Where are you going?" he said.

And I replied that I didn't know, but to some village anyway to cadge a bite of food, a slice of bread and butter or a few potatoes.

"Jump in!" Schickedanz said, and I jumped in.

The horse went at a walk; Schickedanz sat in front and drove; I sat next the woman. The forest sighed around us. And so we went along.

I don't know to this day how it happened that I stayed on with Schickedanz. We never spoke a word on the way and when we got to the village in its green hollow, we stopped at a rambling farmhouse and we went into a sitting-room and then I came over bad. When I woke up I was in a high bed and on the window-ledge sat a cat. I looked round the room and my eyes rested with joy on a guardian angel who was leading a child over a rickety bridge in a dark wood. A picture like that hung over my bed when I was a little boy. Then a cow suddenly mooed and I thought I was at Aunt Amelia's in Mecklenburg. She was the sister of my poor father and when the cow mooed a second time I thought: "You're out on rest in Flanders and Conrad will be in in a moment and the tailor and then we'll sit down to a game of skat." However, when the cow mooed for the third time, Schickedanz came in and told me I had slept for two days and two nights. He sat down on my bed, took a look at me and then said he could give me work, for his man had died four days since.

"In this bed," he added, pointing to where I lay.

I jumped up. "Free board and lodging and I'll do all the work you want."

"Right," said Schickedanz. Then we went downstairs and drank some gin and ate some bread and cheese.

It was not very hard work on the farm. Schickedanz let me do what I liked. First I put all his implements in good repair, the reaper and binder and the chaff-cutter; then the electric lighting had its turn and the engine. I tended the animals and helped with the book-keeping, and then one evening Schickedanz confessed to me over a glass of Hollands that he wanted to have a motor bicycle, so we went to Neustadt and bought a second-hand one. I rode it home and every evening for the next fortnight Schickedanz buzzed up the hairpin bends that climbed the range of hills behind the house. So, what with working and resting, the time went on. How happy

I was when I had seen to the animals. There they stood in the stalls, their coats groomed, and as I walked down the row, I rejoiced in their contentment. Schickedanz went out of his way to praise me. Sometimes he took me pillion on his motor bicycle to an inn in the forest.

His wife was called Joan. She was young and beautiful. She spoke to me very seldom and I avoided looking at her, for I could not help thinking of Fanny whenever she was there—that was the name of the first girl I ever loved—and never won. So the days went by between working, sleeping and eating—and life was good. I had been six weeks on the farm and my cheeks had filled out and the girls in the village turned their heads to look at me. I often went for a stroll in the soft evening air and sometimes I slipped out of my room late at night and down to the meadows because I was thinking of Joan and how beautiful she was. But when my heart beat too hard, I lit a pipe or went to the inn and drank to the Fatherland with the fellows there.

Spring came with a bang. I worked like a horse and Schickedanz said he had never had a man on the farm to touch me. Soon the whole valley was in blossom and there was such a smell from the meadows at night that you couldn't sleep. Schickedanz boozed. He spoke little. Joan sat in the sitting-room and sewed.

My heart was heavy those days, but I worked on as well as I could and one day Schickedanz called me into the room and there sat Joan, and Schickedanz said: "Henry, the cherry trees are in blossom." He pointed out of the window. "That hill there covered with cherry trees in blossom belongs to me. It's worth more to me than anything else on the farm. When the cherries are ripe you must take them to Zwingenberg market with Joan and sell them. Will you stay on till then?"

At this Joan looked at me and I said: "Yes."

The cherry trees were in blossom and the fruit set well. The sun was strong. The cherries ripened.

One morning, when I had seen to the animals and Schickedanz was off on his motor-bike on some political business, Joan came out to me in the yard and said: "Henry, we'll go to the cherry orchard."

We went, taking two baskets with us. First there was a clayey sunken road, then a narrow path across a meadow, then a little brook to cross and then came the cherry orchard. There stood the trees and the fruit shone like lacquer in the spring sunshine. Joan opened a shed and I got out a ladder and then I climbed up the trees and picked the cherries. Joan collected them in the large baskets. She called to me after two hours and I sat down beside her in the moist grass. The village lay below us. The church clock was striking six and a light breeze combed the grass.

"Henry," Joan said after a while, "the cherry orchard really belongs to me. I brought it with me as a dowry. And I can gather the crop as I please."

"Indeed," said I, "but that's fine to have the crop to gather."

"Yes," Joan said, "Schickedanz only has the money, but the trees belong to me."

We drank cold coffee out of a metal can and cut slices from the loaf in the basket.

Then I set the ladder against the trees again and picked cherries. Joan gathered them into her baskets. By eight o'clock we had four large baskets full. Then Joan whistled across to the farm and it was not long before a farm girl came with a cart. We hoisted the baskets up, Joan took the reins and we drove to Zwingenberg.

It was a little town on the mountain road with a white church, and when the sun blazed down the dust in the streets glowed. We had driven through dense forest and sometimes I took the reins and the little horse trotted along—what happiness, I thought, and I looked at Joan. She had her eyes half closed and let the sun blaze on her face. Then my heart was far away and I began to whistle. The pony trotted and Joan slept.

We sold our cherries very well that day. Joan had a pocketful of money. We drank coffee at a pastrycook's. At five o'clock we set off home. The horse knew his way. I left the reins slack. Joan sat beside me. The forest towered above us and the road went uphill.

Then the devil leapt onto my shoulders and I clasped Joan round the hips. She did not mind. So I stopped the horse and wanted to kiss Joan. Then she smiled and said: "I am not your wife, Henry," and at that my cheeks burned. The horse went on again at a walk, the air was cool in the forest, and the empty baskets bumped about at the back of the cart. Joan began to talk.

"Henry," she said, "I'm Schickedanz's wife. I married him because the man I loved didn't come back from the war. But a woman's got to marry and Schickedanz at that time was a fine young fellow and he pleased me because he was so strong. So we made a match of it, Henry. But it wasn't love. It was common sense, Henry. But it's not right to behave like that. When I look at you I know that quite well. I've been looking at you for six weeks now. And now I know it. Before I didn't."

"Joan," I said—nothing else but "Joan."

"I'm only a stupid farmer's wife," she went on, "but my heart is like yours—always far away. I've looked at you for six weeks. You are sad too like I am."

"Joan," I said. Nothing else.

"But it's all up with me," Joan said. "I'm going to have a baby and Schickedanz can hardly wait to know it's a boy."

It was chill in the forest. The horse trotted along and my heart stood still.

"I do really love you, Henry," Joan said, "I do really. It came quite simply and I tell it to you the same way, but the child is Schickedanz's and you, after all, are only something that the wind has brought."

At that I held my tongue and thought: Yes, I am only something the wind has brought.

We drew slowly nearer the village. "Schickedanz is a good farmer and he wants to have a son and wants me to be the sort of wife who does as he expects. And I do. But, Henry, I often want to run away, away from the village, away from the valley; but all that is so remote and you too—you're a man who'll never settle down. But that is not for me, because after all I'm fond of Schickedanz and the child is his."

We got home and Schickedanz was standing at the door. And Joan gave him the bag of money. Schickedanz laughed at the sight of it and took us into the sitting-room and got out the gin and we drank, Schickedanz and I, for two hours and when Joan had gone to bed, Schickedanz laughed and got out currant wine and we drank that as well and Schickedanz said that in three months' time he would have a son and then there would be a feast and I mustn't go before that.

I went every morning for a fortnight with Joan to the cherry orchard. We picked the cherries and drove to Zwingenberg market. For fourteen days long I knew that Joan loved me because I was one whom the wind brought and not one of those she saw every day. For fourteen days long Joan was true to Schickedanz.

Then one day Schickedanz said to me: "It's the cherry feast the day after tomorrow."

I asked Joan what that was and she said it was a festival to give thanks for the cherry crop, and all their relations came from the farms round about, and musicians and the lads and girls from the village. That morning Joan and I drove off again with the cherries, and on the way home I kissed her and she said that the child would arrive in two months and she would call it Henry. We drove through the forest and Joan cried because we could not sin together.

"Oh, Joan," I said, "I don't know where the wind will blow me, but your love I can never forget, because it is so near and yet so far."

At this Joan stopped the horse and said: "Henry . . ." and kissed me on the eyes. That was right up on the hill where the road is swept bare by the wind and the grass flaps like a flag. The village lay below and the meadows were soft and green.

"My life," Joan said, "is not there," and she pointed to the village; "but the child belongs there, and you, Henry, will understand what a woman who was born there needs."

"Yes," I said. "Joan, I have only love for you and you shall live as you must."

At this Joan cried, but I whipped up the horse and the cart rumbled down into the valley.

What happened next dances before my eyes to this day. We had hardly reached the village when women came running to meet us; men followed and then a rabble of children and they all stared at us. Joan looked up and asked: "What is the matter?" But they said nothing, so I whipped up the horse. We reached the farm and there stood the musicians, the trees in the garden were decorated with garlands of paper, and the flag of Germany blew from the gable of the house. I jumped down and Joan got down and stood beside me. "What is the matter?" she cried out and the men who were standing in the yard made way a little and Schickedanz was lying on a bench. Blood flowed from a gash in his forehead, his coat was bloody and so was the ground beneath him. "What is the matter?" Joan cried out. Then the man who was standing beside Schickedanz, he was the doctor from Neustadt, came up and said: "He has had an accident on his motor-bicycle and there is no hope."

At this Joan uttered a cry such as I have never heard; she cried out again and again, she wept, then she laughed; the men shrank back, the women ran up, and there stood Joan with her hands to her body and then with another cry she sank to the ground. The women picked her up and carried her, still crying aloud, into the house.

But we, three men and the doctor, stood beside Schickedanz and we could hear the animals moving restlessly. Then the women cried out again from the house and the church bell began to toll for curfew, and then Schickedanz started up, with blood and white spittle at his mouth, and he asked: "Is the boy there?"

My God, at that a shudder went through me, and we lifted him up and carried him into the best sitting-room, and there he lay, and as soon as ever he got his breath he asked: "Is the boy there?" Then he fell back and muttered something.

There was silence in the yard outside. I sat beside Schickedanz. His breast bone was smashed in and the blood pulsed out over his cheeks. His wife was crying out upstairs. Sometimes he tried to say something; his lips moved, and I felt a great love for him when he could not get out what he wanted.

The doctor came back and gave him an injection. Then he grew quieter. I held his hand. "Schickedanz," I asked him, "do you know me?"

"The boy?" he muttered.

"Yes," I said. "The boy——"

Then he held out his hand and said: "Henry, the boy, that's all. I'll go gladly if only the boy is there . . ."

I laid a vinegar bandage on his forehead, but he pushed it away and sat up. His eyes were set, I have never seen such determination in any eye, he sat right up and his breast bones crunched. "Listen!" he whispered. "Listen!"

Three abrupt cries came from above and then a whimper, and while the soft June air came over the meadows and in at the window and while the cherry feast garlands rustled on the trees in the garden, the young farmer got to his feet, staggered to the door and fell down sobbing: "The boy first, then I, God the Father . . ."

I tried to lift him up, but he struggled. Then I heard steps. The doctor came in, he was laughing and rubbing his hands. "A fine boy," he shouted, "a little too early, but a strapping young Schickedanz."

At that the farmer stood up and went straight to bed and lay down and spat blood.

"Ah, yes," the doctor said, "I'd almost forgotten him . . ." But then Schickedanz sat up, his chest swelled, the white of eternity was in his eyes; he took three deep breaths and then collapsed.

"Amen," the doctor said and closed his eyelids. The child whimpered on the first floor. I went to the stable and packed my rucksack. The musicians were standing in the yard and eighteen women with them. The doctor came to the door and said: "A young Schickedanz!" At that the musicians struck up and the women rubbed their hands on their skirts for joy. And as the chorale burst forth, I walked out onto the road, into the dust from which we come and to which we return.

NO MORE TROUBLE FOR JEDWICK

Louis Paul

(1901- )

---

JEDWICK SMILED at the woman drawing water from the well. "Kin I have me a drink, ma'am?" he drawled, his broad shoulders drooped shyly in a half bow.

She was tall and dark. The sun blazed down on the white-hot Virginia highway. Jedwick's clothes were saturated with sweat. Scintillant beads shone like translucent jewels against his shiny skin. The black man shook his head like a hound dog coming up out of a creek.

"I reckon," she nodded. The Negro woman, lighter than Jedwick, was not wholly at ease. Her husband was in the village getting groceries. Roamin' niggers . . .

"Yas ma'am," Jedwick said, and dipped into the barrel.

The woman dried her hands on her apron. "Y'all f'om round hyeah?"

Jedwick stared at her a moment. "I ain't f'om hyeah," he murmured between immense gulps, "ner neither I ain't gonna stay hyeah. Whereat I git to Alexandria?"

"Right smart piece yonder."

"How fur?"

She speculated. "Eight-twelve mile."

Jedwick finished his water and looked at the blue and gold cauldron over his head. "Hot, ain't it?"

"Do git hot."

"Yo' man wuk in town?"

"No. He after groceries."

Jedwick glanced down the hill toward the little village. The view was empty.

She understood his movement.

He smiled. He had fine healthy teeth. She was aware of a frightened sensation in the pit of her stomach. Jedwick bent and rubbed his ankle as though that were an habitual gesture. The flaming orb in the sky shone down remorselessly. Something about the Negro's beautiful black arms hypnotized her. She stood poised, enchanted, like a statue: made to flee, but forever motionless. The midday silence was oppressive, like the sun. She waited.

"I ain't seed no woman fo' a long time," Jedwick said, almost in apology.

"He after groceries."

Closer to hers, his face was more strikingly handsome than ever. His lips were very cool, strangely. Perspiration came off on her mouth and cheeks . . .

Later he said, "Thank you sho' nuff fo' that there water, ma'am. Ain't they some law gin doin' much wawkin' thisyere state highways?"

"Is," she looked up at the stranger, embarrassed, "if them troopers ketches you."

Jedwick nodded and suddenly disappeared down the embankment. Couldn't trust the road from here in. Stick to the tracks.

He wrapped a long red handkerchief around his shoulders to keep his neck from frying, and stepped gingerly along the single-tracked roadbed, trying to pace the ties to his long swinging gait. Oughta lay these hyeah ties out even, so's a man could wawk. Wa'n't no cinder path like usual. Say ten mile. 'Bout fo' hours in thisyere sun. Should be makin' up a string o' boxes fo' Manhattan Junction in Alex some'rs round six.

He wanted after an hour to crawl under the shade of some green leafy trees. Lay out yo' legs an' sleep. Thoughts that came like hunger or dreams, unwanted; but they were only a whip-flick to sting the flesh of his determination. Gits me out o' the sun in one o' them boxes in Alex, yassuh! There I rests. He visualized a phrase: Jedwick escapes.

Waves of hypnotic steel-gray heat shimmered up off the two metal radiators that converged in the distance. His eyes began to burn. He thought it would be nice to be rich. He would buy a boat with a motor in it, all covered with a striped canvas canopy, and sail out of sight of land. There would be a breeze off in the ocean. Nice gal, that there brown lady by the highway crossin'. Like a scared cottontail. She liked him. They all liked Jedwick. Lovin' ain't harmin' no gal, he thought.

Bugs. Chrissakes! Little gnats and fuzzy things and leg-squirming beetles popped up in front of him; some kind of a locust whanged with a flat noise on his chest, and he slapped it down. Flies and ticks smelled your sweat. A breath of wind floated lazing over the treetops, but died itself of the heat. Jedwick sighed.

Sighing wasn't natural to him. He thought he'd sing. He bugled a tentative air.

A slick-tawkin' man f'om Bumminham . . .

The plaintive lyric echoed magnificently between the banks of woods. Jedwick's cello-like bass rose through the dazzling, brain-sizzling heat to heaven, and he laughed about some dimly felt deliciousness in solitude's freedom. His voice took up the lilt.

A slick-tawkin' man f'om Bumminham
Come up my way, an' his name was Sam;
I pay no attention, ner I din give a damn,
Till he stoled my gal away.

He hummed the rest of the melody: it was too hot to think of the words.

A little garter snake, sunning itself under the vast ceiling of broiling light, was startled and jiggled off noisily into the brush. Maybe, he confided to the vanished reptile, maybe tomor' I gonna be in New York. Yassuh. Wonder how fur they is after me? Think they can ketch thisyere Jedwick? Yo' completely crazy. How fur I is to Alex, I wonder? Damn me! but it do git hot!

Three mile an hour, 'bout. 'Thout stoppin' I git me in them yards fo sun-down. Yassuh. Sundown. Don't seem like ole sun ever gone go down.

I hates t' see
Thet evenin' sun go down . . .

Nossuh. Man said that jes crazy's that snake.

There was a shack directly around a bend, and the white man saw him first. "Where you going to, boy?"

He had a wrinkled skin and sandy gray hair and wore gray uniform pants.

"I goin' t' ask you fo' some water, has you got any?" Jedwick smiled brightly with his thick lips.

"Where you goin'?" the man repeated.

"Well, y'see, cap'n, well, suh, I'm goin' in t' the Districk. Yassuh. Dassit."

"Washin'ton? What you traipsin' up here for?"

"Don't like to wawk on the highway, cap'n, boss. 'S y'all got a little water?"

"Alexandria's along up hyeah. You makin' for one of them boxes?"

"Nossuh, nossuh! Ain't layin' over no place, cap'n, suh. Ole friend in town gonna ride me into the Districk."

"You must be runnin' away, boy," the man in the shack said, squinting lowered eyes at the big sweating Negro.

"Me? I ain't runnin' no place, suh, cap'n," he protested. "Why fo' I gonna run any place?"

The white man fetched up an iron pail and handed him a different dipper. "Too hot," he said, shaking his head, "to hit them ties 'less yo-all runnin' away. Why ain't you takin' a sleep in some cool place?"

"Me, suh? I gotta git in D. C. Yassuh. I got me friends in the Districk, suh."

The wrinkled man glanced down at Jedwick's right ankle.

"Goin' git me a job," Jedwick stammered uncertainly, "in—like, suh, now, a 'partment house. Dassit," he said. "Yassuh."

"Take all you want," the other said about the water; "they's a crick below here. Ain't my business where-at you're runnin' to."

"Nossuh, cap'n. I ain't runnin'."

"Matter o' fact, they's some empties makin' up in Alexandria about seven to-night. You going t' New York," he stated.

Jedwick was amazed. "How you figger that there, boss?"

"If'n I don't know a chain-gang nigger," he told Jedwick calmly, "I'll go and jump in that there crick."

The big Negro's face curled into a magnificent smile. "Come f'om thataway?"

"Been around," the man said expressionlessly.

"Yassuh," murmured Jedwick. He added, "Thank y'all fo' that water."

"Not 'tall."

"Thank y'all," he repeated.

The man drew himself in out of the heat. Jedwick started off toward Alexandria, but caught a phrase which he thought was the man calling him back—until he analyzed it.

"I want Colonel Saunders, yessum," he was saying, "the police chief in——"

Jedwick sauntered back, and the man in the shack stepped away from the phone when he saw him. His hand slipped into a drawer and the Negro saw a pearl butt come out. Jedwick muttered softly as he crashed over the flimsy table, rolling the white man backward out of his chair. He twisted, and leapt again. They bowled heavily through the door, rocking the flimsy shack. The leather-faced, wiry man struggled up almost successfully, but Jedwick got his feet on him. The black kicked scientifically, as a boxer uses his hands.

In a moment the white man lay still, his head battered. His shirt was torn where his stomach had been gashed. Jedwick felt very sorry for him. How foolish the man had been. Jedwick hated to hurt anybody.

He stopped long enough to bundle the body inside the shack, take another drink and dip his face in the bucket of cold water. It seemed hotter in the sun than ever.

Now he dumped the pail empty and resumed his trek in the oily tropical sun's glare. In a few moments the water he had drunk sank through the pores of his skin and oozed out in dribblets. If it's hotter down in Africa, he joked to himself, I'm glad my folks done been slaves. Yassuh.

Slaves.

At least it wasn't too hot to whistle. Instead of his bit of excoriation of a slick-tawkin' man from Bumminham the great black figure chanted a whistle refrain as he trudged on tirelessly toward his destination. He loped along, picking the ties carefully. The song was a monotonous, fugitive melody about a man named Joe, who —Done his Susie wrong, yassuh,

But he love her all the same.

He seemed almost to skip along the ties to that repetitious lilt.

Jedwick was, as he saw the shacks of Alexandria's outskirts loom glaringly in the terrific blaze of afternoon, neither blithe nor desperate, neither coward nor cruel. He was escaping. A criminal—or any man—would. He felt very sorry for the gray-haired man, did he not? Of course. Glimpsing the freight-yards of Alexandria, Virginia, he lapsed into the weakness of a sigh again. Like when the cap'n blowed his whistle at sundown and yo' pick dropped outn yo' fingers . . . like when the las' sack o' cotton was drug down t' the baler, an'—, yassuh. He shook these memories off. Jedwick wasn't really a sighing man.

He hadn't eaten for forty hours. You travels light and fast and lives offn yo' flesh. But yo' gits hongry. Whereat you kin promote a vittle or that in Alex? Better crawl in one of them cars. They gonna trace that phone cawl. Find that wrinkled man an' they gonna be hell poppin' round Alex.

Down in behind the fence. That was the place. He saw a bum duck between two cars and hop over the coupling, coming toward him.

"Hi," he greeted this specimen.

"Know what time d'Junction empties goin' out t'night?" The bum screwed up a weather-scarred face.

"Yassuh. Seven."

"You eat?"

"No suh!"

"Where ya come in?"

Jedwick thumbed his hand back.

"Leggin'—you out in that there sun?"

"Sho nuff, likely, brother," Jedwick answered.

"Got a coupla hours," said the bum. "They's a jungle overn 'em weeds. Some liver here, an' haffa loaf o' breard."

Jedwick thanked the man from the North.

They toasted the liver. The bum, whose name was Sully, dug some whole coffee beans out of a bag, battered them on a rock, and had a can going. They split the "breard" and the big Negro was very grateful. After the meal Sully pulled a razor from a leather bag around his neck and began to shave a light beard. Jedwick, in payment for the bum's life-giving coffee, related the incidents of his story. The man shaving exhibited a great curiosity concerning the details of Jedwick's encounter with the brown up on the hill yonder. He chuckled, vicariously amused.

Jedwick added that he had killed the trackman.

Sully squinted. "You must be one o' dese tough black boys."

"Nossuh," said Jedwick, particular not to be misunderstood. "Whut else I gonna do?"

"Coulda flattened him, or tied him up." Sully put away his razor.

"Sho'. You figger out jes' whut to do. That man had a big gun. He gonna blow off my haid ifn I don't get him."

"Every man fer himself, sonny," the bum shrugged his shoulders. "You set?"

"Les go git stowed away fo some no-count railroad bull git rampagin' round."

They idled through the yard, trained soldiers expertly taking cover back of every bump in the topography. Jedwick pried a loose door. Sully was boosted half way up. A metallic voice startled them.

"What you guys doin'?"

Sully's wits left him and he stared up at the man blankly. Jedwick grinned with silly surprise. "We's jes' gonna ride in, suh."

"Oh, yer jist gonna ride in?"

"Yassuh," he said innocently.

"Just gonna ride in." The voice was pregnant with unpleasant suggestions.

Jedwick wrinkled his brow into a puzzled expression. "Yassuh, cap'n, boss. Ain't it aw right?"

"Ain't it aw right!" he mimicked, and spat. "Where you two bums from?"

"We, suh?"

"Who the hell y' think I'm talkin' to?"

"Yassuh. I got a fren in New York, boss," he explained. "He gits me a job in a big apartment house. Sully hyeah goin' to try to get a job too, cap'n."

"Well, maybe I don't know stiffs no more," the man said. "Don't you know you can't ride on no freight train?"

"Can't ride on no freight train?" Jedwick almost believed in this innocence himself. "Nossuh, boss, nossuh. Is thisyere a freight train? Look like they is all epty. I never know they is hahm in ridin' in epty car. Never would come in hyeah did we knows that, suh. Dassit." He was talking fast—for his life. "Yassuh, boss, gentman, suh."

The train-bull shook himself impatiently. "Better take yourselves outa here big and pronto," he said with positiveness, "or you'll be gettin' about sixty days apiece for vags."

"'Scuse us, mister cap'n, boss, suh, yassuh," Jedwick murmured with elegant unctuousness, "we is goin'."

The Law swung himself up the side ladder and disappeared momentarily along the line of cars.

"You gettin' in?" the black man whispered to Sully coolly.

Sully backed away. "Not me!" he exclaimed hoarsely.

Jedwick shook a finger, said "Hi!" got his belly up on the platform, clipped the door to, and disappeared into the black interior.

He heard the bull coming back, tapping on each door. "Hey, you, come outa there!" He got to Jedwick's door and cried, "Hey, you, come outa there!" There was only silence inside. Footsteps crunched away along the gravel.

Jedwick lay motionless for an unconscionable time. At last the train gave three bone-rattling jerks that knocked him into another corner. The couplings shrieked, another gentle bump, and the train moved slowly out of the yards. The engineer's hoot-hoot sounded to Jedwick's ears like a wild pæan to freedom. The car was like a furnace, but of course he didn't care.

He crawled over to the door and lay with his head to the floor crack, afraid to push the thing ajar.

Wonder and excitement to freedom! The train rattled on, carriages hitting track-cracks with ever-increasing crescendo. Fool, anyone who risked life unnecessarily. That trackman. Why hadn't he let well enough alone? Dead now, and nothing gained. Never would he risk the quickness of life except in the defense of his own.

On into the night the bumping freight train sped. North. Where he could achieve that departure from the old and sink into the blissful anonymity of its millions, renaissance, born again, with only dead memories to remind him of the past. Yassuh, he speculated. Dassit. Goin' git free in New York. But gotta watch out fo' that bull. Whereat I wonder is fust division stop on thisyere line? Some'rs 'long hyeah. He pried the door open a crack. The sun had set and blue darkness had fallen over the countryside that bobbed swiftly by his limited vision. A hot wind blew in his face.

Yassuh. Like sho' nuff git me a leetle shet-eye, can't takin' no chances. Bull goin' look in these hyeah cars fust crack outn the box do we make a division stop. We git in the Junction mornin' sometime . . . then, nigger, you is free. Yassuh. Dassit—free! The thought made his brain spin airily. No more trouble for Jedwick!

Well, no more later; but just now the cars pulled up under brakes and came to a jerking halt. He shoved open the door and glanced out. Blackness. Tall brush alongside the cinder roadbed. Lucky. Jedwick was always lucky. He jumped down and squatted behind the weeds. Sure enough. The bull had a flash, and he peered into the recesses of every car. Another train, a passenger, thundered on past in the opposite direction. Jedwick waited until the freight train began to move, then he hopped out like a big rabbit scooting across an open space, and swung himself up into the car. That was all right. He was good for another hour.

That hour found him asleep. Fatigue fells all men. Jedwick fell asleep, woke when the train stopped again—which was too late. He was on his knees when the light flashed in.

"What the hell you doin' in there?" the bull shouted.

Jedwick, a thinking animal in danger, murmured in a much broader accent than his own, "Cain't po' man rahd in disyere train, yo' honoah?"

"Comin' outa there?"

"Sho gwine come out, passuh."

He jumped down, but squatted his great frame into a much smaller figure. The railroad bull clicked his light into Jedwick's face. "Say, ain't you the same nigger I chased in Alexandria?"

"Whut Alesandria?"

"Din I tell yer to stay outa them cars?"

"Me, yo' honah? Nossuh." Jedwick exhibited surprise.

"Hell I ain't!"

"Nossuh," Jedwick said gently but firmly.

"Where'd y' git on?"

"Bout a nour back yander, yo' honah, suh. Ah bo'd de train when de cyahs stoppin' sahd them there weeds. 'Scuse me, suh."

"Well," said the man, not exactly satisfied, "git on outa here. You can't ride in these here trains. An' I ketch y' ridin' agin," he showed Jedwick an army Colt strapped to his trousers, "I'm gonna plug ya." He meant it. "I see you agin," the white man added, "you git it."

Jedwick hunched his shoulders. "I'se so'y, yo' honah. Ah gone git away f'om hyeah jes lahk y'all say. Gone right now." He started off toward the rear of the train. "Ain't meant nary hahm, suh," he murmured.

"See you stay 'way," the bull called after him.

When the freight train pulled out again Jedwick was on it. After the next stop the bull knew he was on it. It was a game of hide and seek. At each stop the Negro ran for cover in the weeds, and thanked the night for being darker than the ace of spades. He saw the blue steel of a gun behind the flash as the detective prowled through the cars.

Jedwick wondered why the man wouldn't let well enough alone. Damn me! but people sho' huntin' trouble wid big guns. Why fo' ever body come messin' 'round me? What I wanna harm nobody fo'? They keeps messin' 'round stid leavin' me be, an' mo' trouble happen fo' you know it.

That man goin' kill me ifn he ketches me, he thought, or I goin' try to kill him. Why anybody want kill someone else?

The bull wouldn't, of course, let well enough alone. He knew there was only one way to nab the black bastard—that was on the moving train. There was some danger in that, but the bull didn't consider danger. His job was to get that pernicky nigger the hell and gone off his train.

Crawling along the tops of the cars, he swung himself down over the one he suspected. He gently wedged it open and slipped in. Jedwick sat square in front of the door, his legs spread and tensed, waiting. The bull plopped between the black man's outstretched legs, and Jedwick caught him full in the face with a large but cunning heel. The man's pistol cracked against the side of the car, and the white bull's body dropped out like a sack of potatoes and hit the cinders with a thud. Jedwick sighed as at the completion of an unpleasant duty. Trouble, he thought philosophically; why people allus huntin' 'round fo' trouble?

The sunrise got pink in the east. He sized up the land about him. Wasn't but a few minutes out of the Junction. Better slip off before that cop was missed. Shortly the freight slowed. He hopped it from the ladder.

It was a mile or so to the highway. The sun was just blazing up properly. Another boiling day. A truck was the thing.

Free. Escape was almost certain now. They couldn't pin the railroad bull's accident on him. And Alabama would never get him if he reached New York. Of course he'd reach New York. One of those wonderful red vans came chugging up the highway. By God, this was luck! A colored chauffeur was at the wheel. Going right into the city. Jedwick's luck was an enchanted affair. When the truck approached he flicked his hand and smiled teethily. The driver jammed his brakes. Didn't he say his luck was magic?

"Sho' nice of you," he said as he skipped up on the seat. He sank into the leather cushion blissfully. "Yassuh."

"Goin' into New York?"

"Yassuh."

"Where you from?"

"Been bummin' my way up from the Districk," said Jedwick. "Ole feller goin' far as the las' town in a little Fo'd brang me thus far."

"I got a samwich I ain't et," said the driver. "You're perfectly welcome to it."

"Sho' nice of you," he repeated. He took the sandwich and swallowed it whole. "My name Jedwick," he grunted past the last mouthful.

At Canal and Sixth Avenue the driver said, "Like you to drop off here, buddy. I get caught ridin' anybody in, it's jes' too bad fo' me."

"Yassuh," said Jedwick gratefully. "Sho' nice of you." He dropped down and the truck turned up Sixth Avenue.

IF YOU CAN'T BE GOOD, BE CAUTIOUS

---

AN OLD LYCETT LORRY came lumberingly into a garage near the Great West Road. This was a ramshackle place with a draughty concrete yard, corrugated iron roofs, and doors hanging by a hinge. It was much used by lorry drivers as a port of call for a chat.

'Hullo, Tom,' said the garage hand to the driver of the lorry. 'You haven't been this way lately.'

'Hullo,' said Tom. 'Cheerio, everyone. I'll have six gallons of the usual, please, and perhaps Bessie will give me a cup of tea if I promise her a kiss.'

Presently Tom, sitting in the cab of his lorry and stirring his tea with a pencil, shouted: 'Did you hear about that young fellow who works for our crowd—Bob Curtain? Curt, we all call him. He's been up before the magistrates to-day.'

'No, go on,' said the garage hand. 'What for—speeding?'

'I don't know,' said Tom. 'It wasn't anything to do with driving. He's a bit of a lad.'

At that moment a second Lycett lorry swung into the filling station, rather too fast, scattering a heap of gravel and a couple of buckets. It pulled up with a jerk, almost striking the tailboard of Tom's lorry. It was Curt.

'Hullo, young fellow,' said Tom. 'How did you get on to-day? So they didn't put you in quod?'

Curt got out of his lorry and glared at him without answering. He began to lounge round the yard with his hands in his pockets.

'No,' he said at length. 'Nor are they likely to.'

'Well,' said Tom. 'What was it all about? What was the trouble?'

'Nothing. All a lot of rot. Just those blasted bobbies trying to put me wrong.'

'But what was the charge?' said Tom. 'If it isn't a rude answer. If you don't mind my asking.'

'No, I don't mind,' said Curt. 'Why should I? It was carrying a gun without a licence, if you want to know.'

Tom pushed his cap off his forehead, and shook his head. 'Well, you're a funny one,' said the garage hand. 'What on earth do you want with a gun?'

'No harm in it,' said Curt. 'I'm just interested in fire-arms, that's all.'

'What did the magistrate say?'

'Oh, a lot of stuff. He tried to make the most of it. Anybody'd have thought I'd committed a crime. A lot of talk about getting into bad company. I didn't listen to half of it.'

'Well, it's all right, isn't it?' said Tom. 'He let you off scot free?'

'No, he didn't. I was bound over. I've got to go and report every bloody month.'

'Well, there's no great harm in that.'

'Yes, there is,' said Curt. 'That's just the swine of it. Didn't I tell you I'd got a better job?'

'I do remember something. What was it?'

'It was up in Manchester, that's what it was, driving a taxi for a chap I know. It was a good opening. Now this has mucked everything up. I can't take it.'

Curt went on mouching round the yard with his hands in his pockets. 'Damn fools,' he said. 'Damned swines. I tell you what it is, Tom. Those swines of police: once they've got their hands on you, they mean to get you. They mean to put you wrong. I'd like to get hold of that fool of a magistrate.'

'Well,' said Tom. 'I'm sorry. Still, if you can't be good, be cautious. That's what I always tell my kids. "Be good if you can, and if you can't, be cautious!"'

A silence followed this.

'Sorry,' said Tom self-consciously. 'It ain't often I go chucking these pearls of wisdom round. Where are you for to-night, Curt? Bristol?'

'Taunton,' said Curt. 'I've got a load of petrol—hundreds of gallons. Some muck the boss has got hold of cheap.'

'I'm on that game, too. I've got to go and pick my load up, then I'll be getting along.'

'Right,' said Curt. 'We're meeting at the usual place later on. That fellow Sid's coming.'

'I'll be there,' said Tom. 'Cheer up, you'll be all right.'

Curt nodded. He cranked up his lorry and moved off but, after driving for a few minutes, decided to wait on the Great West Road for Tom to catch him up. He wanted to unburden himself.

It was now the brown dusk of an October twilight. Lights began to gleam in the evening. A brooding silence fell, and was shattered, and fell again as an occasional lorry crashed by on the first stage of a long night journey.

The river's vaporous breath swirled up from Kew, from Gunnersbury, from Brentford. It coiled round the lamps and across the tattered half-made roads and dying fields. Curt shuddered. He felt the raw edge of the mist against his skin. Its looming shapes hung before him, filling his mind with vague fears of the police, of the bosses, and the power they held over his whole life.

Presently he found a man in a mackintosh was looking up into the cab of the lorry, and asking for a lift.

'Get up if you like,' said Curt, rousing himself. 'She's not exactly one of those super luxury coaches, still, she gets along somehow. Where do you want to go to?'

'Oh, west,' said the other.

Curt laughed. 'West?' he said. 'That seems a bit uncertain. I mean, do you want to go to Bath or Cardiff or Salisbury? They're all west from here. Where are you aiming for?'

'Where are you going?' said the stranger.

'Oh, me; I'm going down past Bristol; but I'm meeting one or two pals half-way, and we might find something to do.'

He found the stranger staring at him.

'What's the matter?' he said. 'We have to do something to amuse ourselves. A lot of chaps, who drive lorries, don't get home for a week or more together, so we arrange meeting-places on the road.'

'What for?'

'Oh, just for a bit of talk; you get to feel a bit cut off when you live and sleep on one of these barrows for days together. The married men feel it most, and this night driving, too, it works on you. Of course, the bosses try to stop our meeting, but then they do so many things against the Act all the time, what the hell can they expect?'

'Do they?' said the stranger. 'What sort of things? You mean they keep you on too long hours?'

'Yes, of course I do,' said Curt angrily. 'You aren't on their side, are you? Because if you are you can get a lift off somebody else, see? I'll pull up right away.'

He began to slow down.

'All right, mate. That's all right,' the stranger said hastily. 'It isn't my trade, you see. I was only asking.'

'Well, I'm telling you. How would you like to drive fifty-seven hours, on a stretch, with only three hours off the whole time? That's what happened to a London man last week. I knew him slightly; the chap lived round Dalston way. Then he crashed, and got killed. At the inquest it came out that he'd been driving for fifty-seven hours without sleep. He leaves a wife and kiddies. He was quite a young chap, not much older than me. How would you like that?'

The stranger made no answer.

'Bit thick isn't it?' said Curt. 'Bit bloody thick, isn't it? By God, it makes me see red. They're all the same, all these bosses. To hell with them! An extra quid's worth more to them than a man's happiness, or a man's life. And the police are simply there to back them up. That's what I say. Throat-cutting would be a damn sight too good for them.'

The stranger still made no answer.

It was now quite dark. They rushed along in that narrow and lonely world that closes round night drivers. They sped through an endless silent tunnel—a cave of darkness. The yellow light of the headlamps flashed on the ribbed walls and roofs to this side and that as deep banks and hedges streamed past. Trees, remote and still, stood for an instant before them, their leaves showing faint and dusty in the light. Then they vanished. The headlamps bored and bored through the darkness of the tunnel. Occasionally a fast-moving car slipped quietly by them.

The stranger watched Curt as his talk ran on and on. He was a young man, twenty-three, or twenty-four at the most. He was good looking, unshaved, unwashed, with black, oily smears on his forehead and face. His hair flew in the wind, and he lounged at ease behind the wheel, driving the lorry with reckless speed and skill. He talked ceaselessly, seeming to keep only half his attention on the yellow rings of light, and the wall of darkness ahead.

They scraped a corner, two wheels mounting a bank and tilting the lorry up at a sharp angle.

'All right, all right,' said Curt. 'Don't get windy. It's this blasted steering. You just ought to feel the back lash. I tighten up the ball joints after every journey. The worm-and-segment's not too good. Takes a bit of getting used to. Of course the boss got her cheap, and he's never spent a penny on repairs yet.'

'How are the brakes?' said the stranger.

'Brakes?' said Curt. 'They're comic. I oughtn't to take her out on the road like this at all, really. The hand brake acts on the back wheel, only it doesn't act. And I don't like using the foot-brake much; it puts too much strain on the rear gearbox bearing.'

'Why don't you drive slower?' said the stranger. 'Be more careful.'

'Hells bells,' said Curt. 'You couldn't drive much slower. Still, I expect you're wise. A pal of mine was telling me to be cautious only to-day. What he said to me was: "If you can't be good, be cautious." Don't you think that's a pretty good way of putting it?'

The stranger said nothing.

'Well,' said Curt, 'I think it is, especially when the police are such swine. They love to get it in for you.'

'What makes you say that?'

'Because they are,' said Curt angrily.

'I'll tell you what's been happening to me.' And he drew the lorry up at the side of the road and looked intently down the long moonlit stretch in front of him.

'Or perhaps I won't tell you,' he said. 'I'm afraid I'll have to put you off here—I've got to meet some friends of mine.'

As the stranger was getting down, another lorry lumbered by, and Tom leaned out of the cab and waved to Curt.

'Look here,' said Curt. 'We're getting near Savernake. This is all Lord Harleigh's Estate round here; if you care to wait a bit, you'll get another lift. Sorry I can't take you any further.'

'That's all right,' said the other man. 'I shall do fine.'

'So long,' said Curt. 'Good luck, old man.'

He let in his clutch, and with many jolts the transmission took up the load and the lorry started forward. In a mile or two he swung off into a side lane and nosed cautiously along. It was little more than a soft, grassy track. The trees of a thick wood bordered it on each side—their branches scraping and slapping the lorry as it passed. Then his headlights picked out a dark, bulky shape under the boughs, and he pulled up. As his eyes became accustomed to the clouded moonlight, he saw there were two other lorries waiting for him.

'Hullo,' said Curt. 'Cheerio, Tom. Hullo, Sid, how's things?'

Sid was on the road from Bristol up to London. He had brought a friend with him, a butcher's assistant from Bristol, who wanted a night out. Curt promised to take the butcher back to Bristol by the morning.

'Who was it that you were talking to when I passed?' said Tom.

'Oh, just a chap I'd given a lift to,' said Curt.

'You're a fool to go picking up with people,' said Sid. 'As long as you didn't start blabbing to him—'

'Of course not,' said Curt. 'What do you take me for? I think I shall turn round right away,' he went on. 'Might as well get it done.'

Sid nodded.

'How's she starting up nowadays?' he asked.

'Not too bad. It takes two of us most mornings. When I swing her alone, it leaves me feeling as if I hadn't the guts left to pull the skin off a rice pudding.'

Tom laughed.

'Blow the top off a glass of beer, you mean,' he said.

'When I'm too weak for that, I'll give you the beer,' said Curt. After a lot of manœuvring he backed his lorry round.

'Aren't you chaps going to turn?' he said, getting down.

'Why?' said Sid. 'Plenty of time later. Are you getting windy?'

Sid was a country chap by birth—yet he looked more of a townee than either of the others. His hair was black, and smoothed back, and he wore a bright-coloured jumper, and a ring on his signet finger.

They spoke all the time in low voices, saying as little as they could. Presently they fell silent.

'Well,' said Curt. 'Shall we start?'

'Might as well,' said Sid. 'Rouse up, Tom.'

'Not me, Sid,' said Tom, who was sitting with his feet up in the cab of his lorry. 'I'm not in this. I've got a wife and two kids at home.'

'Come on,' said Sid. 'It's only a bit of sport.'

'Not me,' said Tom. 'You'd better buck up. It'll be daylight soon.'

Curt left Tom in his lorry, and walked off with the others in the darkness. His heart was beating.

'What's the idea?' he whispered to Sid. 'Same as last time?'

'Yes,' said Sid. 'That, and a bit more. Don't talk. There's the torch; keep by me, I know this place like a book.'

Sid moved so quickly and quietly in the dense darkness under the trees it was hard to keep track of him. Curt could feel the other fellow, the butcher, somewhere close by, though he couldn't see him.

Suddenly Sid crouched down.

'Wait,' he said. He touched Curt's arm. 'Quick, you fool.'

Curt knew what to do. He shone the electric torch full on the branches of the tree about him. In the sudden glare, it seemed that the whole tree was full of roosting pheasants as a hen house. They showed up black and flustered in the sudden light.

Sid at once fired into the tree point blank with a sawn-off sporting gun. There was an immense crash of noise, which filled the whole night with repeated echoings: wings beat and branches rustled.

Curt felt a touch on his arm.

'I've got two,' said Sid. 'Quick, we'd better move away from here.'

After a little while they stopped and Sid gave Curt the dead birds.

'This is a good place,' said Sid. 'Let's try again.'

'That shooting will bring along every keeper in the place,' said Curt.

'That's enough for one night. I always said it was a damn fool way.'

'Don't get milky,' said Sid. 'Put the light on.'

Another tree was silhouetted: the gun crashed again. They got another bird.

'Christ!' said Sid. 'There's someone coming.' They lay stock still. Curt could feel his heart in the roots of his tongue. The footsteps were coming nearer.

A voice called. Sid whispered: 'They're coming this way.'

Suddenly there was a light in the trees, and the voices were right on top of them.

'Run!' said Sid.

Curt found himself at once alone, running over the broken ground in pitch darkness. There were loud shouts and lights just behind, and he hurled the two birds away as he ran. He plunged into brambles, which slashed his face and his clothes.

He fought with the clinging brambles frenziedly, as if they had been hands in the darkness holding him. He felt they nearly had him now. He'd put himself in their hands this time. What was going to happen?

Then he was clear of the brambles and running on open grass skirting the side of the wood. He saw sheep starting up in the darkness across a field. Then he found he was no longer being followed. He lay for a while in the deepest shadow, till the distant voices died right away.

After wandering in the woods for another half-hour, he found his way to the lorries. The others were still missing.

'You're a damn fool,' Tom said, when he told him what had happened. 'Why can't you keep out of this sort of thing for a bit?'

They waited, Curt only anxious now to get away as quickly as possible. Presently they heard voices.

The clouds were clearing and the moonlight grew brighter every moment. They saw Sid and the other man coming towards them dragging a heavy burden.

'What the hell——' said Tom.

It was the carcase of a newly killed last season's lamb. Tom took a look at it and went to the handle of his lorry.

'When it comes to sheep-stealing,' he said, 'I'm going.'

'Don't be in such a hurry,' said Sid. 'What d'you think I brought a butcher with me for? You stay and have a joint off it, Tom.'

'Not me,' said Tom.

'Look here,' said Sid to Curt. 'You're going to take this bloke back to Bristol, aren't you? He knows just where to sell this bit of mutton.'

'I'll get you retail prices for it,' said the butcher.

'Right,' said Sid. 'We'll just sling it on Curt's lorry.'

'All right,' said Curt, watching them, but his heart sank.

'Don't you take it,' said Tom.

'Shut your mouth,' said Sid. 'He'll take it.'

'All right,' said Curt. 'Let's move off. I've had enough for one night.'

'It's easy,' said Sid. 'We'll do it again.' He spoke with perfect assurance.

Curt started up his lorry. But as the engine fired and banged into life in the night silence, they heard the sound of another car. All listened, looking at each other without speaking. 'It's only a car passing in the distance,' Curt thought. But what if it were something else—someone who'd got wind of them? The sound was coming nearer, then he saw headlights flash. In another moment a car bumped slowly into view along the rough lane.

'Christ!' said Sid. 'That's a police car—a Morris.'

Curt leaped into the driving seat of his lorry, raced the engine, and let in the clutch. His was the only one of the three lorries which faced the way of escape: and he had the stolen sheep.

As the car approached his lorry jerked forward. In the glare of his headlights Curt saw the man who had travelled with him, and he could see now that he had plain-clothes-man written all over him.

'The swine,' he said to himself.

In another moment he was clanging up the broken lane. The lorry lurched from one side to the other as he struck deep ruts and pits. He held on to the steering-wheel with all his strength, letting the engine gather power. He could feel the dangerous give of the steering-gear as the front wheels took shock after shock.

After a few minutes of this rough work, he turned out into the main road. He was on a long, straight stretch, dipping and rising in the moon-light. With the accelerator jammed against the footboards he was soon doing fifty down the slopes. Then he saw the headlights of another car rising and dipping behind him. He was being chased. Soon he knew the car behind was coming up quickly. The headlights began to lighten the road all round him. His lorry was making noise enough for a traction engine. He crashed and thundered down the hills. Every bolt in the old Lycett banged and rattled. The wheel kicked violently in his hands, he could hardly hold it. He was only waiting for something to go.

The deep shadows of the trees and banks tumbled by him, writhing as they went; streaming, interlacing, barring his way. The black silhouette of his own lorry hovered beside him. He felt the car drawing nearer: he felt hands closing in on him. Dark fears of punishment, imprisonment, bubbled up from his lowest level. What would they do with him?

He clutched the wheel more firmly. The other car was right on him. A side turning rushed towards him, and he wrenched his lorry round. It struck a bank, swayed at a sickening angle, and then was on the road again. The turning was a narrow lane, climbing steeply.

He heard shouts behind him and knew that the other car had overshot the turning. He raced his engine in low gear, climbing slowly. By the time he had reached the top of the hill he saw the lights coming after him again.

Then he was rushing, thirty, forty, fifty miles an hour again, holding desperately to a narrow dropping road that overhung a deep valley. The road on his near side vanished into sheer emptiness.

The engine began to pop back in the carburetor. Curt knew there was plenty of petrol and he had cleaned the pipes and filters recently. An inlet valve must have burnt out or stuck. He muttered curses to himself.

Then he could see a flame through the floorboards, where the clutch pedal came through. As he glanced down, it was spreading. He opened the offside door in readiness. He tried the brakes, but they made no difference.

'I shall be dead before they get me,' he thought. 'I shall be dead in five minutes.'

He heard a loud metallic crash against the bottom of the crankcase. At the same instant he found the steering-wheel twisting loosely in his hands. 'The track rod's gone,' he thought. 'That's the end.'

His lorry leapt up the offside bank at fifty miles an hour; it lurched off and rushed at the other edge. Curt tried to jump clear, and saw the clouds and stars beneath his feet. Then the lorry came over on top of him—a huge black hurtling mass . . .

At the same instant the Morris car with a dry skid and a scream of brakes drew up in his tracks. Two men flung the door open and began to climb out. For a second or so they watched in silence.

With crash after crash the lorry plunged down into the valley, turning over and over. It came to rest, and instantly a column of red flame rose straight in the darkness as the petrol exploded into fire. Then it turned to smoke and fitful bursts of flame thirty and forty feet high.

‘Good God,’ said one of the policemen. ‘That’s the end of him.’

‘Young fool, young fool.’

They began to stumble quickly down the hill in the darkness.

Curt watched them vanish. He was lying beside the hedge where he had been thrown as the lorry overturned. He found he was quite unhurt.

As the police officers vanished in the darkness, he began to walk quickly away.

‘It was bad luck on Curt,’ he began thinking to himself. ‘But perhaps he’s better dead. I’ll be in Manchester to-night. I’ll be in Manchester to-night, and start on that new job.’

After a few minutes walking and running the flames were hidden by a shoulder of the hill and he slackened his pace.

‘I’ll get away with it all right,’ he whispered. ‘I shall always get away with it. Watch me!’

THE BALL

MADAME KAMPF entered the school-room and shut the door so sharply behind her that the draught made by it caused all the glass crystals of the chandelier to knock together with a clear, bell-like tinkle. But Antoinette did not interrupt her reading, her head bowed so low over the desk that her hair swept the pages of her book. Her mother looked at her for a moment in silence; then she crossed the room and stood before her with her arms folded over her chest.

‘You might at least get up when your mother comes into the room!’ she shouted at her. ‘Or can’t you? Perhaps you’re glued to your chair? What manners! Where’s Miss Betty?’

From the next room came the sound of a sewing-machine keeping time with a song whose words: "What shall I do, what shall I do, when you are gone away . . . ?" were being sung in an undertone by a clear but untrained voice.

"Miss Betty!" called Madame Kampf.

"Yes, Madame Kampf!"

The English girl slid in through the half-open door. She had pink cheeks, soft, rather timid eyes and long, honey-coloured hair swathed round her neat head.

"I engaged you to look after my daughter and to educate her, didn't I?" began Madame Kampf severely, "and not to spend your time making yourself frocks. Doesn't Antoinette know that she must get up when her mother comes into a room?"

"Oh, Antoinette, how could you?" cried the governess in a sort of wounded, bird-like twitter.

Antoinette was standing up now, balancing herself awkwardly on one foot. She was a tall, thin child of fourteen with the pale face natural to her age, which was so fleshless that to the eyes of grown-up people it looked like a round light-coloured blur, without features save a pair of heavy, dark-ringed eyes and a small, tightly shut mouth. Fourteen, with budding breasts that strained her tight school dress and seemed to hamper the weak childish body. Large feet and those long sticks, ending in red hands, which one day, who knows, might become the most lovely arms in the world. A fragile-looking neck and fine, straight, pale, short hair.

"You know, Antoinette, your manners are quite deplorable, my poor child. Sit down. I'll come in again and you will be good enough to get up at once, do you understand?"

Madame Kampf went back to the door and opened it again. Antoinette rose slowly and with such obvious reluctance that her mother pursed her lips threateningly and asked her sharply:

"You're not sulky by any chance are you, Miss?"

"No, Mother," replied Antoinette in a low voice.

"Then why do you put on that face?"

Antoinette smiled in a sort of laborious, craven effort that distorted her features painfully. Sometimes she hated grown-up people so much that she would have liked to kill them, to disfigure them or at least to stamp on the floor and scream: "Oh, how you bore me!" But she had been afraid of her parents from her very earliest childhood. Years before, when Antoinette was quite little, her mother had often taken her on her lap and hugged and kissed and caressed her. Antoinette had forgotten all that, but she retained firmly fixed in her mind the memory of outbursts in an exasperated voice, above her head: "The child's always getting under my feet! You've ruined my dress again with your dirty shoes! Go and stand in the corner, do you hear? That'll teach you! Little fool!" And one day—for the first time in her life she had wanted to die on that day—at the corner of a street, during a scene her mother had suddenly cried out in a rage, so loud that passers-by had turned round to see what was happening: “You want your face slapped, do you?” and then a stinging smack, in the open street. She was eleven at the time and tall for her age. The grown-up people in the street had not mattered so much; but at that very moment some boys were coming out of school and they had looked at her and laughed and shouted: “How’s that, old girl?” And their sniggers had pursued her as she walked with her head bowed in the autumn twilight, while the street lamps danced through her tears. And her mother had gone on: “Can’t you stop snivelling? What a foul temper you’ve got. When I punish you, it’s for your own good, do you hear? That will teach you not to annoy me again!”

Horrible people. And nowadays, just in order to torture her and torment her and humiliate her, it was nothing from morning till night but: “Look how you’re holding your fork!” (And in front of the footman too.) “Sit up straight! Do try not to look like a hunchback!” She was fourteen now, she was a young woman and, in her day-dreams, a beautiful and admired one. Men spoiled her and petted her, just as André Sperelli did to Hélène and Marie and Julien de Suberceaux to Maud de Rouvre in the books she had been reading. Love! She started. Madame Kampf was still talking.

“And if you think I get you an English governess for you to have manners like that, you’re wrong, my beauty.”

And then in a quieter voice, while she pushed back a strand of hair that had fallen across her daughter’s forehead, she said:

“You always forget that we are rich now, Antoinette.”

She turned to the governess:

“Miss Betty, there are a lot of things I want you to do this week. I’m giving a ball on the fifteenth.”

“A ball?” echoed Antoinette, opening her eyes wide.

“Yes,” said Madame Kampf with a smile, “a ball.”

She looked at Antoinette with a self-satisfied look in her eyes, then she nodded stealthily in the direction of the English girl.

“You haven’t told her anything?”

“No, Mother,” declared Antoinette emphatically.

She was aware of this constant anxiety on her mother’s part. At the start—that is, two years before—when they had left the old Rue Favart after lucky stock-exchange speculations by Alfred Kampf, first on the fall of the franc and afterwards on that of the pound sterling in 1926, speculations which had made them rich, Antoinette had been called into her parents’ room every morning. Her mother would be sitting up in bed polishing her fingernails. In the dressing-room next door her father, a spare little Jew with very bright eyes, would be shaving, washing and dressing with that mad haste which characterised all his actions and which had formerly earned him the nickname of “Fire” from his German-Jewish friends on the exchange.

He had kicked his heels on the broad steps of the exchange for a great many years. Antoinette knew that before then he had been employed at the Bank of Paris, and that at an even more remote period he had been a page boy in a blue livery at the door of the Bank. Shortly before Antoinette's birth he had married his mistress, Mademoiselle Rosine, the manager's typist, and for eleven years they had lived in a gloomy little flat behind the Opéra Comique. Antoinette remembered how she used to do her home-work in the evenings on the dining-room table while the servant washed up noisily in the kitchen, and Madame Kampf read novels, her elbows on the table beneath the light, which consisted of a large ground-glass globe in which a bright gas-flame spluttered. Sometimes Madame Kampf would heave a deep sigh of irritation, so loud and so sudden that it made Antoinette jump. Kampf would then ask: "What's the matter now?" And Rosine would answer: "It makes me sick to think of all the people living happily and in comfort while I spend the best years of my life in this filthy hole, darning your socks."

Kampf would shrug his shoulders without a word. Then Rosine would usually turn towards Antoinette and say very angrily: "What are you listening for? You've no right to listen to what grown-ups say." And she would go on: "Yes, my girl, if you're going to wait until your father makes his fortune, as he's kept on promising to do ever since we were married, you've a long time to wait. A lot of water will pass under the bridge. You'll grow up and you'll have to go on waiting, as your poor mother has done." And when she uttered the word "waiting", a vaguely pathetic expression would pass over her hard, drawn, sullen features, which affected Antoinette despite herself and often made her instinctively put her lips up to her mother's face.

"My poor child," Rosine would say, stroking her forehead. But once she had cried: "Oh, leave me alone! You infuriate me. You're just as exasperating yourself!" And never again had Antoinette tried to kiss her except in the morning and in the evening, kisses which mean as little between parents and children as the hand-shakes of two strangers.

And then one day they had suddenly become rich, how she had never quite understood. They had gone to live in a large white apartment and her mother had her hair dyed a beautiful bright gold colour. Antoinette stole a timid glance at that flamboyant head which she did not recognise.

"Antoinette," ordered Madame Kampf, "tell me again. What do you say when people ask you where we lived last year?"

"Don't be silly," Kampf would say from the next room. "Who do you think is going to talk to the child? She doesn't know anyone."

"I know what I'm doing," retorted Madame Kampf, raising her voice. "What about the servants?"

"If I hear her saying one word to the servants, I'll deal with her. Do you understand, Antoinette? She knows that she's to keep her mouth shut and learn her lessons and that's all she's got to do." And turning to his wife: "She's not an idiot, you know."

But as soon as he had gone, Madame Kampf would start again:

"If anyone questions you, Antoinette, you must tell them that we lived all the year round in the South. There's no need to specify whether it was at Cannes or at Nice, just say the South . . . unless they press you, then it's better to say Cannes, it sounds better. But of course your father is right; talk as little as possible to grown-up people."

And she would dismiss her with a wave of her fine bare arm, a trifle too plump, on which shone the diamond bracelet which her husband had just given her and which she never took off except in her bath.

All this passed vaguely through Antoinette's mind while her mother was asking the governess:

"Is Antoinette's handwriting good?"

"Yes, Madame Kampf."

"Why?" asked Antoinette timidly.

"Because," explained Madame Kampf, "you can help me to address envelopes this evening. You see, I'm sending out nearly two hundred invitations. I shall never get through them all alone. Miss Betty, Antoinette may go to bed an hour later than usual this evening. Aren't you glad?" she added, turning to her daughter.

But Antoinette, once more buried in her reflections, said nothing. Madame Kampf shrugged her shoulders.

"The child's always wool-gathering," she muttered. "Doesn't it make you feel proud to think that your parents are giving a ball? You're not very affectionate I'm afraid, my poor child," she ended, with a sigh, leaving the room.

II

That evening Antoinette, who was usually taken off to bed by her governess sharp at nine o'clock, remained behind in the drawing-room with her parents. She so seldom entered that room that she gazed curiously at the white panelling and the gilt furniture, as though she were in a strange house. Her mother pointed to a little table on which were a bottle of ink, a pen, a packet of cards and some envelopes.

"Sit down there. I'll dictate the addresses to you. Are you coming, my dear?" she asked her husband in a louder voice, because the man-servant was clearing the table in the next room and for some months the Kampfs had always been very formal in their conversation before him.

When Monsieur Kampf came in Rosine whispered to him: "Send the menial away, will you, he gets on my nerves."

Then, catching Antoinette's eye, she coloured and said sharply:

"Come, George, haven't you finished yet? Clear away the rest of the things and leave us, please."

Then they three sat silently in their chairs until the man had gone. Madame Kampf sighed.

"I hate that George. I don't know why I should. When he's waiting at table and I feel that he's behind me, it takes away my appetite. What are you grinning like that for, Antoinette? Come, let's get to work. Have you got the list of guests, Alfred?"

"Yes," replied Kampf, "but wait till I get my coat off; it's hot in here."

"Yes, and above all don't forget not to leave it lying about the room as you did last time. I could see from George's and Lucie's faces what they thought of people sitting in the drawing-room in their shirt-sleeves."

"I don't care a damn what the servants think," growled Kampf.

"You're wrong then. It's they who make people's reputation by going about gossiping. I should never have known that the Baroness on the third floor . . ."

She lowered her voice and whispered something which Antoinette did not succeed in catching in spite of all her efforts.

". . . had it not been for Lucie, who was with her for three years."

Kampf took out of his pocket a piece of paper covered with names and erasures.

"Let's begin with the people I know, shall we, Rosine? Write, Antoinette: Monsieur and Madame Banyuls. I don't know their address. You've got the telephone book there. You can look the addresses out as we go along."

"They're very rich, aren't they?" muttered Rosine in an awed voice.

"Very."

"Do you think they'll come? I don't know Madame Banyuls."

"Nor do I. But I do business with the husband, and that's quite enough. They say the wife is charming; besides, she hasn't been invited out much by her own set since that business. . . . You know, the notorious orgies in the Bois de Boulogne two years ago. . . ."

"Alfred! Be careful in front of the child!"

"She doesn't understand. Write it down, Antoinette. She makes a very good start, anyway."

"Don't forget the Ostiers," said Rosine eagerly. "They're said to give lovely parties."

"Monsieur and Madame Ostier d'Arrachon, with two r's, Antoinette. But I won't guarantee their coming. They're very stuck up. The wife was once . . ."

He made a gesture.

"Not really?"

"Yes, really. I know someone who often saw her in a bawdy-house in Marseilles. Yes, really, I assure you. But that was long ago, nearly twenty years. She's been completely white-washed by her marriage and knows some of the best people; she's very difficult to get hold of. As a general rule all women who've had a gay youth get like that . . ."

"Heavens, how difficult it all is!" sighed Madame Kampf.

"One has to do things by easy stages, my dear. For your first party you want people and more people, as many as you can get hold of. For your second or third you can start weeding out. This time you must invite people wholesale."

"But if only one were sure of everyone coming. If some of them refuse to come I think I shall die of shame."

Kampf contorted his face in a silent laugh.

"If some of them refuse to come you must ask them again next time and again the following time. Shall I tell you something? The fact is, to get on in Society, one has only to follow literally the precept of the Gospels."

"Which one?"

"Whoever smiteth thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also. Society is the best school in which to learn Christian humility."

"I often ask myself," observed Madame Kampf, vaguely shocked, "where you get all your nonsense from."

Kampf smiled.

"Come, come! Let's get on. Here are some addresses already written out. You can just copy them out, Antoinette."

Madame Kampf leaned over her daughter's shoulder as she wrote, bowed over the table:

"Yes, she's got a very nice handwriting, very well formed. Here, Alfred, isn't Monsieur Julien Nassan the man who went to prison over that swindle . . . ?"

"Nassan? Yes, that's right."

"Oh!" murmured Rosine, rather taken aback.

Kampf said:

"What's the matter with you? He's been cleared, he's received everywhere, he's a charming fellow and above all a very shrewd business man."

"Monsieur Julien Nassan, 23b Avenue Hoche," read Antoinette. "Next, please, Father."

"That only makes twenty-five," groaned Madame Kampf. "We'll never get two hundred people, Alfred."

"Of course we shall. Don't start fussing. Where's your own list? All the people you met at Nice, at Deauville, at Chamonix last year."

Madame Kampf took a note-book from the table.

"Count Moïssi, Monsieur, Madame and Mademoiselle Lévy de Brunelleschi and the Marquis d'Itcharra: he's Madame Lévy's gigolo and they're always asked everywhere together."

"There really is a husband I suppose?" asked Kampf, doubtfully.

"Naturally. They're very respectable people. Here are some more Marquises. Five altogether. The Marquis de Liguès y Hermosa, the Marquis . . . By the way, Alfred, does one call them by their titles in addressing them? I think it's better, don't you? Not Monsieur le Marquis, naturally, like servants, but 'dear Marquis,' 'dear Countess,' otherwise the others won't even know that we've got titled guests."

"I suppose you'd like to stick a label on their backs, eh?"

"Oh, you and your stupid jokes! Come, Antoinette, hurry up and copy them out, dear."

Antoinette wrote for a moment, then she read out loud:

"Baron and Baroness Levinstein-Lévy, the Count and Countess du Poirier. . . ."

"That's Abraham and Rebecca Birnbaum," mused her mother. "They bought the title. Silly to call themselves du Poirier. Now I myself . . ."

She fell into a deep reverie.

"Just Count and Countess Kampf," she muttered. "It doesn't sound bad at all."

"We must wait a little," advised Kampf. "In ten years time perhaps."

In the meantime Rosine was sorting out the visiting cards thrown in confusion into a malachite bowl ornamented by two gilt-bronze Chinese dragons.

"I wish I knew who all these people were, all the same," she said. "They're all cards I received at the New Year. Lots of little gigolos whom I met at Deauville. . . ."

"You want as many of those as possible. They're decorative and if they dress well . . ."

"My dear, you're joking. They're all Counts, Marquises or Viscounts at the very least. But I can't put faces to their names, they're all so exactly alike. Though it makes no difference really. You saw what they did at the Rothwan de Fiesques? One greets everyone in exactly the same words: 'I'm so delighted . . .' and if one is forced to introduce two people to each other one smothers the names. No one ever hears them anyway. Look, Antoinette, these are quite easy; all the addresses are on the cards themselves."

"But, Mother, this is the furniture man's card."

"What's that? Show me. Yes, she's right. Heavens! I'm losing my head, I really am, Alfred. How many have you got now, Antoinette?"

"A hundred and seventy-two, Mother."

"Oh, well!"

The Kampfs sighed together in relief and smiled at one another, like two actors on the stage after a third recall, with an expression composed of happy weariness and triumph.

"Not bad, eh?"

"Is . . . is Mademoiselle Isabelle Cossette my Mademoiselle Isabelle?"

"Why yes."

"Oh!" exclaimed Antoinette. "Why are you asking her?"

She immediately blushed violently, expecting a sharp: "Mind your own business" from her mother; but Madame Kampf explained awkwardly:

"She's a kind-hearted woman, and one must be pleasant to people."

"She's as sour as a lemon," protested Antoinette.

Mademoiselle Isabelle, a cousin of the Kampfs and music-teacher to several families of rich Jewish outside brokers, was a flat-chested old maid, as straight and stiff as a ramrod; she gave Antoinette piano and singing lessons. She was extremely short-sighted, but she never wore glasses, because she was vain of her fairly handsome eyes and her thick eyebrows. So she glued her long, fleshy, pointed nose, purple with powder, to the score, and whenever Antoinette made a mistake she rapped her knuckles with an ebony ruler, as flat and hard as herself. She was as malicious and inquisitive as an old magpie. The day before her lesson Antoinette would mutter furiously, in the course of her evening prayers (her father was converted at the time of his marriage, so Antoinette had been brought up in the Catholic faith): "Please God, make Mademoiselle Isabelle die tonight!"

"The child's right," observed Kampf in surprise; "why do you want to invite that old fool? You know you can't bear the sight of her."

Madame Kampf shrugged her shoulders impatiently.

"Oh, you don't understand a thing. How do you suppose the family will hear about it unless I do? Can't you see Aunt Loridon's face (you remember she quarrelled with me because I married a Jew) and Julie Lacombe's and Uncle Martial's and those of all the rest of the family who used to put on such condescending airs with us because they were richer than we were, you remember? Well, to be perfectly frank with you, if Isabelle isn't asked and if I didn't know that next day they'll all die of jealousy, I'd just as soon not give the ball at all! Send her a card, Antoinette."

"Shall we dance in both drawing-rooms?"

"Naturally, and in the corridor as well. You know our corridor is rather impressive. I'll hire masses of flowers; you'll see how well it will look, in the big corridor, all the women with ball-dresses and lovely jewelry and all the men in dress-clothes. At the Lévy de Brunelleschis' it was a marvellous sight. They turned the lights out during the tangos, leaving only two large alabaster lamps in the corner with red lights in them."

"I don't like that, it's too much like a night-club."

"Apparently everyone is doing it now; women adore being mauled to music. And of course we'll have supper at small tables."

"And why not a buffet to start with?"

"That's an idea. They'll want thawing out a bit when they arrive. We can put the buffet in Antoinette's room. She can sleep in the linen-room or in the little box-room at the end of the passage for one night."

Antoinette started violently. She went quite white and asked in a low, stifled voice:

"Mayn't I stay just for a few minutes?"

A ball! Good heavens, could it be possible that within a few yards of her there could take place that splendid thing which she pictured to herself vaguely as a confused mixture of wild music, intoxicating perfumes and brilliant clothes, of words of love whispered in dark, cool, secluded corners, and that she herself should be put to bed like a baby, at nine o'clock that evening, as on any other evening? Perhaps some of the men who knew that Kampf had a daughter would ask where she was; and her mother would reply, with her hateful little laugh: "Oh, she's been in bed a long time." And yet what harm could it do her for Antoinette, too, to have her share of happiness in this world? Oh, to dance once, only once, in a pretty frock, like a real grown-up girl, clasped in a man's arms! She closed her eyes and pleaded once more with a sort of desperate courage, as though she were pressing a loaded revolver to her bosom:

"Only a few minutes, Mother, please!"

"What?" cried Madame Kampf in amazement. "What's that? The child must be mad."

Suddenly Antoinette cried, her features convulsed:

"I implore you, Mother, I beg of you! I'm fourteen now. I'm no longer a child. I know one comes out at fifteen; I look fifteen and next year . . ."

Madame Kampf broke in:

"That's a good one, to be sure!" she cried in a voice hoarse with rage. "A brat, a chit like you, at the ball! Can you see it? You wait, I'll rid you of all your big ideas, my girl! So you think you'll be coming out next year, do you? Who has been putting ideas like that into your head? I'll have you know that I'm only just beginning to live myself, do you hear? myself, and I've no intention of saddling myself with a marriageable daughter yet. I wonder I don't box your ears to put some sense into your head," she went on in the same voice, taking a step towards Antoinette.

Antoinette shrank back and grew still paler; the wild, despairing look in her face moved Kampf to a sort of pity:

"Leave the child alone," he said, catching hold of Rosine's outstretched hand; "she's tired and nervy, poor child, and doesn't know what she's saying. Go to bed, Antoinette."

Antoinette did not move; her mother pushed her gently by the shoulders.

"Come, get along with you, and don't answer back. Be off or it will be the worse for you!"

Antoinette was trembling in every limb, but she got up and went slowly and dry-eyed out of the room.

"Charming," observed Madame Kampf when she had gone. "She promises well. However, I was just the same at her age; but I'm not like my own poor mother, who could never refuse me anything. I'll tame her, I promise you that."

"She'll be all right when she's had a sleep; she's tired; it's already eleven and she's not used to such late hours; that's what's put her on edge. Let's get on with the list, it's much more interesting," said Kampf.

III

Miss Betty was awakened in the middle of the night by the sound of sobs coming from the next room. She switched on the light and listened for a moment through the partition. It was the first time she had heard the child cry; as a rule, when Madame Kampf scolded her, Antoinette succeeded in swallowing her tears in silence.

"What's the matter with you, dear? Are you ill?" the governess asked. The sobbing stopped immediately.

"I suppose your mother has been scolding you. It's all for your own good, Antoinette. Tomorrow you'll beg her pardon and kiss her and that'll be the end of it; but you must go to sleep now; would you like a hot drink? No? You might at least answer me," she added, as Antoinette still kept silence. "Oh, dear! What an awful thing a sulky little girl can be. You're making your guardian angel very unhappy."

Antoinette made a face and whispered: "Beastly Englishwoman," beneath her breath and shook her feeble clenched fists at the wall. Selfish beasts, hypocrites! All of them. What did they care if she suffocated all by herself in the dark through crying so much, or whether she felt as miserable and lonely as a lost dog? No one loved her, not a single soul in all the world. Couldn't they see, blind fools, that she was a thousand times more intelligent, more deserving, more profound than the whole lot of them, these people who presumed to bring her up and to educate her? Vulgar, uncultured upstarts! Oh, how she had been laughing at them all the evening and they, naturally, had noticed nothing. She could laugh or cry in front of them without their ever noticing anything. . . . A child of fourteen, a brat, something as contemptible and as negligible as a dog in their eyes. What right had they to pack her off to bed, to punish her, to insult her? "Oh, how I wish they'd die!" On the other side of the partition she could hear the governess breathing softly in her sleep. Antoinette began to cry again, but more gently, tasting the tears which flowed into the corners of her mouth and between her lips; suddenly an odd feeling of pleasure came over her; for the first time in her life she was crying like this, without making a face or hiccoughing, silently, like a woman. Later she would cry other tears like these, for love. For a long time she listened to the sobs throbbing in her bosom like the deep low rumble of the sea. Her tear-wet mouth tasted of salt and water. She lit the lamp and examined herself curiously in the glass. Her eyelids were swollen and her cheeks were red and mottled. Like those of a little girl who has been whipped. She was ugly, terribly ugly. She began to cry again.

"I want to die! O God! Let me die. O God, O Blessed Virgin Mary, why was I made to be born among them? Punish them, I implore you! Punish them just once and then I shall die happily!"

She stopped and suddenly said, in a loud voice:

"And perhaps after all they're just nonsense, God and the Virgin Mary, just like kind parents and the age of happiness."

"Yes! The age of happiness, what a joke, eh? What a joke!" she kept furiously repeating over and over again, biting her hands so hard that she felt them bleed between her teeth.

"Happy . . . Happy . . . I'd rather be dead and buried."

Slavery, prison, having to go through the same routine day after day. To get up, to dress. Ugly dresses, thick boots, ribbed stockings, all done on purpose, like a livery, so that no one in the street should think for a moment of looking at that insignificant brat passing by. Idiots! You will never again see that flower-like body and those eyes, so bright, so pure, so clear and deeply ringed, those beautiful, proud, frightened eyes with their appeal, their innocence, their patience. Never, perhaps never again. To have to wait, and with all those evil desires of hers. Why did such shameful, desperate envy gnaw at her heart at the sight of a couple of lovers kissing one another as they strolled along in the twilight, swaying gently from side to side as though intoxicated? An old maid's bitterness at the age of fourteen? And yet she knew quite well that her turn would come; but it was so far ahead that it seemed as though it never would come and, in the meantime, there was her narrow, degrading life, her lessons, harsh discipline and a screaming mother.

"To think that woman threatened me!"

And she added, in a deliberately loud voice:

"She would never have dared . . ."

But she remembered the raised hand.

"If she had touched me I would have clawed her and bitten her and then . . . one can always escape for ever . . . the window," she thought feverishly. And she saw herself on the pavement, lying in a pool of blood. No ball on the fifteenth. People would say: "She might have chosen another time to kill herself." As her mother had said: "I myself want to live." Perhaps, after all, it was that which hurt her more than anything else. Never before had Antoinette seen that cold, feminine, jealous look in her mother's eyes.

"Selfish beasts! I'm the one that wants to live, I, I! I'm young. They're robbing me, stealing my birthright of happiness in this world. Oh, to be able to get into the ball by a miracle and to be the most beautiful, the most dazzling girl there, with all the men at my feet!"

She went on in a whisper:

"Don't you know her? She's Mademoiselle Kampf. She's not exactly beautiful, perhaps, but she has extraordinary charm. She is so dazzling that she puts all the others in the shade, doesn't she? As for her mother, she looks like a charwoman beside her."

She laid her head on the tear-soaked pillow and closed her eyes; her tired limbs gradually relaxed with a gentle sensual feeling. She touched her body lightly through her night-dress, with tenderness and wonder. Beautiful body meant for love! She murmured:

"Fifteen. Oh, Romeo! Just Juliet's age!"

When she was fifteen the world would be a different place.

IV

The next day Madame Kampf made no reference to the scene of the night before; but all through breakfast she made a point of letting her daughter feel her irritation by a series of those sharp rebukes in which she excelled when she was in a bad temper:

"Don't sit there dreaming with your mouth open. Keep your mouth shut and breathe through your nose. I suppose you think it amuses your parents to have a child who is always up in the clouds. Try to eat more tidily. I'm sure you've made a mess on the table-cloth. You ought to have better table-manners at your age. And don't scowl at me. You'll have to learn to listen when you're spoken to without making faces. Can't you say anything? Are you dumb? Good, now we're going to have tears!" She concluded, flinging her napkin down on the table. "I'd rather go away than watch you sitting there like the picture of misery. Silly little fool!"

She left the room, slamming the door behind her: Antoinette and the English governess were left facing each other across the remains of breakfast.

"Finish your fruit, Antoinette," whispered the governess. "You'll be late for your German lesson."

With a shaking hand Antoinette put the piece of orange she had been peeling into her mouth. She set herself to eat it slowly and calmly, so that the footman who stood motionless behind her chair might think that she was indifferent to all this scolding, and despised "that woman"; but in spite of all her efforts tears began to start from her eyes and flowed in round shining drops onto her dress.

A little later Madame Kampf came into the schoolroom, holding in her hand the packet of invitations they had written the night before.

"You're going to your piano lesson after luncheon, aren't you, Antoinette? Well, you can give Isabelle her invitation yourself and you, Miss Betty, can post the others."

"Yes, Mrs. Kampf."

The post-office was crowded; Miss Betty looked at the clock.

"Oh, we haven't got time, it's too late. I'll post them during your lesson, dear," she said, lowering her eyes and suddenly blushing scarlet. "That'll be all right, won't it?"

"Yes," muttered Antoinette.

Nothing further was said, but when the governess, telling her to hurry, left her at Mademoiselle Isabelle's door, Antoinette waited a moment, hidden in the embrasure, and watched the English girl hurry towards a taxi waiting at the corner of the street. The taxi passed quite close to Antoinette, who raised herself on tip-toe and looked eagerly and timidly into it. But she could see nothing. She stood there for another moment or two, following the retreating taxi with her eyes.

"I thought she had a lover. No doubt they're kissing one another now, as people do in books. I wonder if he's telling her he loves her. And she? Is she his . . . mistress?" she mused with a sudden feeling of shame and disgust, not unmixed with a certain vague distress. "Free, alone with a man! How lucky she is! They'll probably go to the Bois de Boulogne. I wish Mother could see them, oh, how I wish she could!" she muttered, clenching her fists. "But no. Lovers are so fortunate. They're happy; they're together; they can kiss each other . . . The world is full of men and women who love each other. Why not me?"

Her school satchel swung at arms' length before her and she looked at it with loathing. Then she sighed, turned on her heel and crossed the courtyard. She was late. Mademoiselle Isabelle would say: "Haven't you been taught that punctuality is the first duty of a well-brought-up child towards its teachers, Antoinette?"

"How old and stupid and ugly she is!" she thought in a wave of exasperation, and out loud she said: "Good-afternoon, Mademoiselle. Mother kept me; it's not my fault I'm late; and she asked me to give you this."

As she handed her the envelope she added, with sudden inspiration:

"And she wants you to let me go five minutes earlier than usual."

In that way she might see her governess returning with her young man. But Mademoiselle Isabelle was not listening. She was reading Madame Kampf's invitation. Antoinette saw her long, gaunt, tanned cheeks suddenly redden.

"What's this? A ball? Your mother's giving a ball?"

She turned the card over and over between her fingers, then she passed it furtively over the back of her hand to find out whether it was engraved or merely printed. It made at least forty francs difference. From the feel of it she immediately recognised that it was engraved. She shrugged her shoulders angrily. These Kampfs had always been insanely vain and extravagant. In the old days, when Rosine worked at the Banque de Paris (and it wasn't so long ago, either, Heaven knew!) she had spent her whole salary on clothes. She used to wear silk underclothing and have clean gloves every week. But no doubt she got money from men. Only women like that were really happy. The others . . . And she said bitterly:

"Your mother has always been lucky."

"She's furious," thought Antoinette, and with a sly upward glance she asked:

"You'll be sure to come, won't you?"

"Well, I'll do my best, because I really do want to see your mother very much," said Mademoiselle Isabelle; "on the other hand I don't yet know if I can. Some friends of mine, the parents of one of my pupils, named Gros, Aristide Gros, an ex-Permanent-Under-Secretary—your father must have heard me speak of them, I've known them for years—well, they've asked me to go to the theatre with them on that day, and I've definitely accepted, you see. Anyway I'll try to get out of it," she concluded, non-committally. "But in any case you can tell your mother that I shall be delighted to drop in for a short time.

"And now to work. Come and sit down."

Antoinette slowly adjusted the screw of the plush music stool before the piano. She could have drawn from memory all the stains and holes in its seat. She began her scales, staring with dreary fixedness at a yellow vase on the mantelpiece, the interior of which was black with dust. Not a single flower in the room, and those hideous little shell-covered boxes on the shelves of the overmantel. How ugly, shabby and dismal was that little dark flat to which she had been dragged for years.

While Mademoiselle Isabelle was arranging the music, she turned her head furtively toward the window and thought how lovely it must be in the Bois at dusk with its delicate leafless winter trees and the pearly whiteness of the sky overhead. Three times a week, every week for six years. Would it go on until she died?

"Really, Antoinette, look how you're holding your hands! Now start again, please. Will there be many people at your mother's party?"

"I believe Mother has asked about two hundred."

"Oh! Does she think there's enough room for them all? Doesn't she think it will be too hot or too crowded? Play harder, Antoinette; put some life into it; your left hand is too loose, dear. And learn that scale for next time and the eighteenth exercise in Czerny's third book."

Scales, exercises, month after month: The Death of Asa, Mendelssohn's Songs without Words. The Barcarolle from the Contes d'Hoffmann. And under the awkward childish fingers they all merged into a sort of formless noisy clamour.

Mademoiselle beat time strenuously with a rolled-up exercise book.

"Why do you press so heavily on the keys? Staccato, staccato. Do you think I can't see how you are holding your third and fourth fingers? Did you say two hundred people? Do you know them all?"

"No."

"Is your mother going to wear her new pink Premet dress?"

"I don't know."

"And you? I suppose you'll be at the ball? You're big enough now."

"I don't know," muttered Antoinette, quivering with misery.

"Faster, faster! This is the time it should be played in. One two, one two, one two! You're half asleep. Now the suite."

The suite, that passage bristling with sharps over which one's fingers fumbled the whole time! A baby started crying in the next flat. Mademoiselle Isabelle lit the lamp. Outside, the sky had grown dark and the daylight had almost disappeared. The clock struck four. Another hour wasted, ruined, trickled through her fingers like water, never to return. She thought: "I would like to go far, far away, or else die."

"Are you tired, Antoinette? Already? At your age I played six hours a day. Wait a moment; don't run away so quickly. Why are you in such a hurry? What time should I come on the fifteenth?"

"It's on the card. Ten o'clock."

"Good. But I'll see you before then."

"Yes, Mademoiselle."

When Antoinette got outside the street was empty. She leaned up against the wall and waited. A moment or two later Miss Betty came hurrying along, clinging to a young man's arm. Antoinette sprang forward and stumbled against them. Miss Betty uttered a faint scream.

"Oh, Miss Betty, I've been waiting for you for over a quarter of an hour."

Her governess's face suddenly seemed so changed that for a moment she scarcely recognised her. But the pitiful little half-pathetic lips, bruised like a battered flower, escaped her notice; her eyes were on "the man."

He was a very young man. A student. Perhaps even a school-boy with his tender chin inflamed from its first contact with the razor. Nice bold eyes. He was smoking. He broke into Miss Betty's halting excuses and said quickly, in a clear voice:

"Won't you introduce me?"

"This is my cousin, Antoinette," breathed the governess.

Antoinette held out her hand. The boy gave a short laugh but made no comment; then he thought a moment and finally suggested:

"Shall I see you home?"

They walked down the dark, empty street together in silence. The wind blew the clean rain-soaked air, which felt as though it were saturated with tears, into Antoinette's face. She slackened her pace and gazed at the lovers walking in front of her without speaking, pressed against each other. How quickly they walked! She stopped, but they did not even turn their heads. "If I were run over by a car I don't think they'd even notice it," she thought, with an odd feeling of bitterness. Someone bumped into her; she shrank back in an instinctive movement of fear. But it was only a lamp-lighter; she watched him touching the lamps one by one with his long pole and saw them suddenly flare up in the dark. They all seemed to twinkle and flicker like candles in the wind. Panic suddenly seized her and she started running as hard as she could.

She caught the lovers up by the Alexandre III bridge. They were talking rapidly with their heads close together. When he saw Antoinette, the boy made a movement of impatience. For a moment Miss Betty seemed non-plussed, then, in a sudden inspiration, she opened her bag and took out the packet of letters.

"Look, darling, here are your mother's invitations. I haven't had time to post them yet. Run along to the letter-box there in the street on the left, where the light is. Just put them in the box. We'll wait for you here."

She put the packet into Antoinette's hand and walked rapidly away. Antoinette saw her stop on the middle of the bridge and wait there for the boy. They leaned over the parapet together.

Antoinette did not move at once. It was so dark that she could only distinguish two shadowy figures and, all around, the dark river full of reflected light. Even when they kissed she guessed at, rather than saw, their faces come together in a sort of soft confusion. She twisted her fingers violently together like a jealous woman, and as she did so one of the envelopes slipped out and fell in the street. She was afraid and picked it up quickly and, at the same instant, she was ashamed of her fear. Was she always going to tremble like a small child at the slightest thing? She did not deserve to be a woman. And what about those two who were still kissing? They had not unglued their lips yet. A sort of giddiness came over her, and a savage need for bravado and wickedness. She clenched her teeth, crumpled the envelopes in her hands, tore them up and threw them all together into the Seine. For some moments, with a beating heart, she watched them fluttering against the arch of the bridge. Then the wind carried them down into the water below.

v

Antoinette returned from her walk with Miss Betty at about six o'clock. As no one seemed to answer the bell, the governess knocked. They could hear the sound of furniture being moved inside the house.

"They must be getting the cloak-room ready," said the English girl. "The ball's tonight; I keep on forgetting about it, don't you, darling?"

She gave Antoinette an affectionate smile of timid complicity. And yet she had not seen her young lover again in the child's presence. But since that last meeting Antoinette had become so taciturn that she alarmed her governess by her silence and her glances.

The footman opened the door.

Madame Kampf, who was watching the electrician in the dining-room, swept out on them.

"Can't you come in by the back way?" she screamed in a fury. "You know quite well that the cloak-room is being put in the hall. Now we've got to start all over again and nothing will ever be finished," she concluded, seizing hold of a table to help the concierge and George who were getting the place ready.

In the dining-room and in the long corridor which led out of it, six waiters in white coats were arranging the supper tables. In the centre of the room stood the buffet, profusely adorned with bright flowers.

Antoinette wanted to go in and look, but Madame Kampf began shouting again.

"Not there! Don't go in there! The bar is in your room, and we're using yours too, Miss Betty. You can sleep in the linen-room for to-night and you, Antoinette, in the box room; it's right at the end of the apartment and you'll be able to sleep all right; you won't even hear the music. What are you doing?" she went on, turning to the electrician who was humming as he went unhurriedly about his job. "You can see that bulb isn't working."

"Oh, it all takes time, lady . . ."

Rosine shrugged her shoulders angrily.

"Time, time! And he's been here nearly an hour already!" she said, half to herself.

She twisted her fingers hard together as she spoke, in a gesture which was so exactly like Antoinette's when she was angry that the child, who was still standing in the doorway, started suddenly as one does when one finds oneself unexpectedly confronted by a mirror.

Madame Kampf was wearing a dressing-gown, with her bare feet thrust into slippers; her hair was loose and writhed in serpentine coils round her scarlet face. She noticed that the florist, his arms full of roses, was trying to get past Antoinette as she stood with her back to the wall.

"Come, get out of the way!" shouted Madame Kampf, so sharply that Antoinette, in trying to obey as quickly as possible, bumped into the man and broke off one of the roses.

"You're intolerable!" said her mother in a voice so loud that the glasses on the table rang. "What do you mean by getting into people's way and annoying everyone? Go to your room, not your own room, but to the linen-room or wherever you like so long as you're neither seen nor heard!"

When Antoinette was gone, Madame Kampf strode swiftly through the dining-room and the pantry crammed with champagne-coolers full of ice and reached her husband's study. Kampf was telephoning. As soon as he replaced the receiver she exploded:

"But what's the matter with you? You're not even shaved!"

"At six o'clock? You're crazy."

"In the first place it's half-past six, and then there may be things to be fetched at the last moment; it's better to be prepared for everything."

"You're crazy," he repeated, impatiently; "if there's anything to be fetched the servants can do it."

"I like that—coming the aristocrat and the gentleman now! 'The servants can do it!'" she mimicked, shrugging her shoulders. "You can keep that sort of thing for the guests."

"Oh, don't, for God's sake, get all upset!" ground out Kampf.

"But how can you expect me not to be upset?" cried Rosine, with tears in her voice. "Nothing's going right! The filthy servants will never be ready! I have to be everywhere and supervise everything, and I haven't slept for three nights; I'm coming to the end of my strength and I feel I'm going mad."

She picked up a little silver ash-tray and threw it on the floor. This act of violence seemed to calm her down. She smiled rather shamefacedly.

"It's not my fault, Alfred."

Kampf shook his head without replying; Rosine started to move away, but he called her back.

"Tell me, I meant to ask you. Have you still had no reply from any of the people you asked to-night?"

"No, why?"

"I don't know. It seems funny to me. It's as though it was done deliberately. I meant to ask Barthélemy if he had received his invitation, but I haven't seen him at the exchange for a week. Suppose I telephone him?"

"At this time of day? It would be silly."

"All the same, it's funny," observed Kampf.

"Well," put in his wife, "it means that it's not fashionable to reply, that's all. People either come or they don't. And I'll tell you something else. I'm really rather pleased. It means that no one thought of refusing from the start, or they would have written to excuse themselves. Don't you agree?"

As her husband did not reply she asked him impatiently:

"Don't you think I'm right, Alfred, eh? What do you think?"

Kampf spread out his hands.

"I don't know. What do you want me to say? I don't know any more than you do."

They looked at each other in silence for a moment. Then Rosine dropped her eyes and sighed.

"Oh, I feel quite lost, don't you?"

"You'll get over it," said Kampf.

"I know, but in the meantime . . . If you only knew how frightened I am! I wish it was all over!"

"Don't get all upset," prompted Kampf again, weakly.

He himself was absent-mindedly turning a paper-knife over in his hands.

"Above all," he advised her, "talk as little as possible. Use only conventional phrases such as: 'I'm delighted you've been able to come . . . Won't you take something? . . . How warm it is! . . . How cold it is! . . .'"

"What will be awful will be the introductions," said Rosine anxiously. "Just think, all those people whom I have only seen once in my life and whose faces I can hardly remember, and who won't know one another and have nothing in common."

"Heavens! You'll muddle through somehow. After all, everyone is in the same position as we are. They all had to start once."

"Do you remember our little flat in the Rue Favart?" asked Rosine suddenly. "And how we hesitated before getting a new divan for the dining-room in place of the one that was all broken? That's only four years ago and look now!" And she pointed to the heavy, ornate furniture around them.

"You mean," added Kampf, "that in four years from now we'll be entertaining Ambassadors, and then we shall remember how we trembled with fear this evening because a few dozen pimps and old tarts were coming to the house. Eh?"

She laughed and put her hand over his mouth.

"Shut up, do!"

As she left the room she ran into the butler who was coming to tell her that the mossers had not been sent with the champagne and that the barman thought there would not be enough gin for the cocktails.

Rosine seized her head in both hands.

"Good, that's the last straw!" she began to shout. "I suppose you couldn't have told me that before. Where do you think I'm going to get gin at this time of night? Everything's shut . . . and the mossers too!"

"Send the chauffeur, dear," suggested Kampf.

"The chauffeur has gone to dinner," said George.

"Naturally!" cried Rosine, beside herself. "Naturally! He doesn't care a . . ." She hesitated ". . . a blow whether we want him or not, his lordship goes away, his lordship goes to dinner. There's another who'll get the sack first thing tomorrow," she added, addressing George in such a tone of fury that he tightened his long, shaven lips.

"If Madame is referring to me . . ." he began.

"No, no, you must be mad. I hardly know what I'm saying; you see what a state of nerves I'm in," said Rosine, shrugging her shoulders; "take a taxi and go to the wine-merchants at once. Give him some money, Alfred."

And she retired to her room, putting finishing touches to the arrangement of the flowers as she went along and scolding the servants:

"That plate of cakes is in a bad place. Pull the pheasant's tail up a bit more. Where are the caviare sandwiches? Don't put them too near the front, or they'll all throw themselves on them. And the foie gras has been forgotten! Unless I do everything myself! . . ."

"We're unpacking it now, Madame," said the butler, looking at her with ill-concealed scorn.

"I must look ridiculous," suddenly thought Rosine, catching a glimpse in the glass of her scarlet face, the wild look in her eyes, and her trembling lips. But, like an overwrought child, in spite of all she could do she could not calm herself; she was exhausted and on the verge of tears.

She retired to her own room.

The maid was laying out her ball-dress on the bed: it was made of silver tissue ornamented with thick fringes of pearls. Shoes that shone like jewels and a pair of gossamer stockings completed the outfit.

"Will Madame dine now? Dinner's being served here, so as not to disturb the tables, I suppose."

"I'm not hungry," cried Rosine in a frenzy.

"As Madame wishes; but may I go and dine?" asked Lucie tartly, for Madame Kampf had kept her for four hours sewing on the pearls that were coming off the fringes. "I would like to point out to Madame that it is nearly eight o'clock and that human beings are not animals."

"Run along, my dear girl, nobody's keeping you!" exclaimed Madame Kampf.

When she was alone, she threw herself on the sofa and closed her eyes. But the room was as cold as an ice-house; all the radiators in the flat had been turned off since the morning. She got up and went over to the dressing-table.

"I look frightful . . ."

She began carefully to make up her face; first a thick layer of cream which she worked between her two hands, then liquid rouge on her cheeks, mascara on her eyelashes, a little line to lengthen the eyelids towards the temples, and powder. She made herself up with extreme deliberation, stopping every now and then to gaze at her reflection in the mirror with passionate, anxious care and an expression which was a mixture of severity, diffidence and shrewdness. Suddenly she seized a white hair on her temple and pulled it out furiously. How badly arranged life was! She thought of her face at the age of twenty, with its lovely complexion, and of her darned stockings and patched underclothing. And now she had jewelry and all the clothes she wanted, but the first wrinkles were appearing. All these things seemed to go together. How she would have to hurry up and live, to attract men and to love! What was the good of money and pretty clothes and fine motor-cars if one had not a man in one's life, a young lover? How she had waited for that lover! She had listened and given in to men who spoke to her of love when she was still a poor girl, because they were well dressed and because their hands were clean and well-kept. They were all fools. But she had never ceased waiting. And now was her last chance, the last years before old age, real, irreparable old age. She closed her eyes and imagined young lips and eager tender eyes, charged with desire.

Then hurriedly, as though she were preparing for a lover's tryst, she flung off her dressing-gown and began to array herself; she put on her stockings, her shoes and her dress with the peculiar agility of women who have had to do without maids all their lives. Jewelry; she had boxes full of it. Kampf used to say that it was the safest form of investment. She put on a big necklace consisting of a double row of pearls, all her rings and huge diamond bracelets which imprisoned her arms from wrist to elbow; then she pinned a large sapphire, ruby and emerald brooch on her bosom. She shone and glittered like a shrine. She stepped back a few paces and looked at herself with a happy smile. Life was beginning at last! That evening, perhaps, who could tell? . . . .

VI

Antoinette and her governess had finished eating their dinner from an ironing-board supported by two chairs in the linen-room. From the other side of the door came the sound of servants running about and of rattling dishes. Antoinette sat motionless, her hands clasped together between her knees. At nine o'clock Miss Betty looked at her watch.

"You must go to bed now, darling," she said. "You won't hear the music in the box-room and you'll sleep well there."

As Antoinette made no answer, the governess clapped her hands together playfully.

"Come, Antoinette, wake up; what's the matter with you?"

And she led her to the little badly-lit box-room, which had been hastily furnished with an iron bedstead and two chairs. Opposite, across the courtyard, she could see the brilliantly lit windows of the dining-room and the drawing-room.

"There are no shutters, so you can see the people dance from here," said Miss Betty lightly.

When she was gone Antoinette pressed her forehead timidly and longingly against the window; a large section of the wall opposite was lit up by the warm golden brilliance of the windows. Shadows, those of the servants, kept passing rapidly to and fro behind the muslin curtains. Someone opened one of the windows, and Antoinette distinctly caught the sound of instruments being tuned at the far end of the drawing-room. The band was there already. Heavens! It was past nine o'clock. For a whole week she had been vaguely expecting some sort of catastrophe to occur which should swallow up the world before anything should be discovered; but the evening was passing just like any other evening. In a neighbouring flat a clock struck the half-hour. Another thirty minutes or three quarters of an hour and then. . . . Nothing would happen, of course, since, when they had come in that day, Madame Kampf had accosted Miss Betty with her usual impetuosity which made nervous people lose their heads at once, and had asked her: "Well? Did you post the invitations? You didn't lose any? You're sure?" And Miss Betty had replied: "Quite sure, Madame Kampf." Of course she alone was responsible. If she got the sack so much the worse for her; and so much the better too; it would teach her a lesson.

"I don't care, I don't care!" she stammered and she bit her knuckles with her sharp young teeth until they bled.

"And the other woman can do what she likes to me, I'm not afraid. I don't care!"

She gazed down into the deep, dark well of the courtyard below.

"I shall kill myself and, before dying, I shall say that it is her fault, so there!" she muttered. "I'm not afraid of anything and I've already got my revenge!"

She renewed her vigil; the window became clouded by her breath; she wiped it impatiently and glued her face to it again and finally lost patience and opened the casement wide. The night air was fresh and sharp. Now, with the sharp eyes of fifteen, she could clearly distinguish the chairs ranged along the wall and the band grouped round the piano. She stood there without moving for so long that her cheeks and her bare arms grew numb with cold. For a moment she deceived herself into believing that nothing had happened and that she had dreamed of the bridge, the dark waters of the Seine and the torn invitations floating in the wind, that the guests would arrive miraculously and that the party would soon begin. She heard the three-quarters strike and then ten strokes—the ten strokes—at which she shuddered and slipped out through the door.

She made her way to the drawing-room like a murderer being drawn back to the scene of his first crime. She crossed the passage where two waiters with their heads tilted back were drinking champagne out of bottles. She reached the dining-room. It was empty and all ready with the large table in the centre loaded with game, fish in aspic, linen edged with Venetian lace, flowers spread between the dishes and fruit piled into two equal pyramids. All around, tables laid for four or six glittered with glass, fine china, silver and silver-gilt. Afterwards, Antoinette could never understand how she had dared to walk right through that huge room, twinkling with lights. She hesitated a moment on the threshold of the drawing-room and then she caught sight of the big silk-covered sofa in the neighbouring boudoir. She went down on her hands and knees and slid between the back of the sofa and the hanging curtains; there was just enough room for her there if she kept her arms and knees close to her body, and by craning her head forward she could see the drawing-room as though she were looking at the stage of a theatre. She was shivering a little, still frozen from her long wait before the open window. At present the room was calm and silent and half asleep. The musicians were talking together in low voices. There was a negro with dazzling teeth, a lady in a silk dress, cymbals as big as the big drum at a country fair and something like an enormous 'cello standing in one corner. The negro sighed and swept his finger-nails over the strings of a kind of guitar which gave out a dull moaning sound.

"People start and finish later and later nowadays."

The pianist said something which Antoinette could not catch and which made the others laugh. Then Monsieur and Madame Kampf came in briskly.

When Antoinette saw them she cowered back instinctively, as though trying to dig herself into the ground; she huddled against the wall with her mouth hidden in the crook of her bent arm; but she could hear their footsteps approaching. They were quite close to her now. Kampf sat down in an armchair facing Antoinette. Rosine walked about the room for a moment or two; she lit the bracket-lamps on each side of the mantelpiece and turned them out again. She was glittering with diamonds.

"Sit down," said Kampf in a low voice. "It's silly to get agitated like this."

She placed herself in such a position that Antoinette, who had opened her eyes and thrust forward her head until it touched the back of the sofa, could see her mother standing before her and she was struck by the expression on that usually arrogant face, an expression which she had never seen before: a mixture of humility, of fervour and of fear.

"Do you think it will be all right, Alfred?" she asked in the clear, uncertain accents of a little child.

Alfred had no time to reply, for the bell echoed shrilly through the flat. Rosine clasped her hands.

"Oh, heavens, it's starting!" she whispered, as though talking of an earthquake.

They hurried towards the open doors of the drawing-room.

A moment later Antoinette saw them return, one on each side of Mademoiselle Isabelle, who was talking very loudly, in a voice entirely different from her usual one, rather high and staccato, with little bursts of laughter.

"I'd forgotten all about her," thought Antoinette horrified.

Madame Kampf, now radiant, chattered unceasingly; she had recovered her arrogance; she winked maliciously at her husband, furtively calling his attention to Mademoiselle Isabelle's dress, which was made of yellow muslin, while round her long lean neck she wore a feather boa which she kept twisting coquettishly with her hands: a silver lorgnette hung from the end of an orange velvet ribbon round her wrist.

"I don't think you know this room, Isabelle?"

"No, but it's very pretty. Who furnished it for you? Oh, what lovely little vases! I see you still like the Japanese style, Rosine. I myself always defend it; I was only saying the other day to the Bloch-Lévys, you know, the Solomon Bloch-Lévys, who declared that it was in bad taste and had a suggestion of nouveau-riche (according to their own expression): 'You may say what you like, but it's gay and lively and the fact that it is cheaper than Louis-Quinze is not a fault but quite the opposite.'"

"But you're very much mistaken, Isabelle," protested Rosine eagerly. "Early Chinese and Japanese objects fetch fantastic prices. For instance, for that vase with the birds on it . . ."

"Not a very good period . . ."

"... my husband paid ten thousand francs at auction. What did I say? Ten thousand? Twelve thousand, wasn't it, Alfred? I scolded him at the time, but not for long; I love rummaging about in antique shops. It's a real passion of mine."

Kampf rang the bell.

"I'm sure you'd like a glass of port, wouldn't you, ladies? Oh, George," he said as the footman came in, "bring in three glasses of Sandeman's port and some sandwiches—some caviare sandwiches."

As Mademoiselle Isabelle moved away to examine a Buddha seated on a velvet cushion through her lorgnette, Madame Kampf hissed in her husband's ear:

"Sandwiches? You must be mad. You're not going to have the whole arrangement of the table spoiled for her! George, bring the cakes in the Dresden dish; you know which the Dresden dish is?"

"Yes, Madame."

He returned in a moment with the cake-dish and a cut-glass decanter. The three of them drank in silence. Then Madame Kampf and Mademoiselle Isabelle sat down on the sofa behind which Antoinette was hidden. By stretching out her hand she could have touched her mother's silver shoes and her music teacher's yellow satin slippers. Kampf walked up and down, casting furtive glances at the clock.

"Tell me who is coming to-night," asked Mademoiselle Isabelle.

"Oh," replied Rosine, "some charming people, and some old bores too, like the Marquise de San Palacio, to whom I owe an invitation; but she does love coming here so much. I saw her yesterday and she told me that she had really meant to be away. She said to me: 'My dear, I've put off my departure for the South for a week because of your party: it's always so amusing at your house!'"

"Oh, so you've given balls before?" asked Mademoiselle Isabelle, pursing her lips.

"Oh, no!" Madame Kampf hastened to explain. "Only tea-parties; I did not ask you because I know how terribly busy you are in the day-time."

"Yes, indeed; besides, I am thinking of giving some concerts next year . . ."

"Really? That's an excellent idea."

They stopped talking. Mademoiselle Isabelle resumed her inspection of the walls.

"It's charming, quite charming, and such taste!"

Silence fell again. Both ladies cleared their throats and Isabelle carefully arranged the folds of her dress.

"What lovely weather we have been having lately, haven't we?"

Kampf suddenly interrupted:

"Come, we can't sit like this, like dummies. How late everyone is. You did say ten o'clock on the invitations, didn't you, Rosine?"

"I'm afraid I came much too early."

"Not at all, my dear; what do you mean? It's a very bad habit to arrive late; quite deplorable."

"Let's have a dance," said Kampf, playfully clapping his hands.

"That's a very good idea!" cried Madame Kampf and, turning to the orchestra: "You may begin to play: play a charleston. Do you dance the charleston, Isabelle?"

"Yes, a little, like everyone else."

"Well, you won't lack partners. The Marquis de Itcharra, for instance, who's a nephew of the Spanish Ambassador, takes all the prizes at Deauville, doesn't he, Rosine? In the meantime let's open the ball."

They went off together and the band blared out through the deserted room. Antoinette saw Madame Kampf get up, run over to the window and in her turn glue her face to the pane. The clock struck half-past ten.

"Heavens! What on earth has happened to them all?" whispered Madame Kampf distractedly. "I wish that silly old frump would go to blazes," she added, almost aloud and then she clapped her hands and cried laughingly:

"Charming, charming! I didn't know you danced so well, Isabelle!"

"Why, she dances like Josephine Baker herself," put in Kampf from the other end of the room.

At the end of the dance Kampf called out:

"Rosine, I'm taking Isabelle to the bar. Don't be jealous!"

"But won't you come too, dear?"

"Excuse me for half a moment. I've a few orders to give the servants and then I'll join you."

"I warn you, Rosine, I'm going to flirt with Isabelle the whole evening."

Madame Kampf forced herself to laugh and to wag a threatening finger at them; but she said nothing and, as soon as she was alone, she hurried back to the window. She could hear the motor-cars going up and down the Avenue; some of them slowed down before the house; then Madame Kampf craned forward and scanned the cold dark street with her eyes, but the cars passed on, the sound of their engines growing fainter in the distance and finally dying down into the shadows. Besides, as time went on even the motor-cars became scarcer and scarcer and for minutes together there was not a sound in the street, which might have been a street in a provincial town. Nothing but the rumble of the tramcars in a near-by street and the far-off sound of motor horns, softened by distance.

Rosine's teeth chattered as though she had a chill. A quarter to eleven. Ten to eleven. In the empty drawing-room a clock struck with a busy, silvery little sound, brisk and clear. The dining-room clock echoed it and from the other side of the street a large church clock boomed out slowly and solemnly, growing louder and louder with each succeeding stroke.

"Nine, ten, eleven," cried Madame Kampf, raising her diamond-studded arms up to heaven. "What on earth's the matter? But what in the name of God has happened?"

Alfred returned with Isabelle; all three looked at one another in silence.

Madame Kampf laughed nervously:

"It's a little odd, isn't it? I hope nothing has happened."

"But my dear, nothing but an earthquake . . ." began Mademoiselle Isabelle, in a triumphant voice.

But Madame Kampf was not going to give in yet. Fingering her pearls she said, in a voice hoarse with anxiety:

"It doesn't mean anything. The other day, when I was with my friend the Countess de Brunelleschi, the first guests only began to come at a quarter to twelve. So that . . ."

"It's very annoying for the hostess, very exasperating," muttered Isabelle softly.

"Oh, one gets used to it, doesn't one?"

At that moment the bell rang. Alfred and Rosine hurled themselves towards the door.

"Play!" cried Rosine to the band.

They started vigorously attacking a blues. No one came. Rosine could not contain herself any longer. She called out:

"George, George! The bell! Didn't you hear it?"

"It's only the ices from Rey's."

Madame Kampf burst out:

"But I tell you something must have happened, an accident, a misunderstanding, a mistake in the date or the time, or something, I don't know what. Ten past eleven. It's ten past eleven!" she repeated despairingly.

"Ten past eleven already?" exclaimed Mademoiselle Isabelle. "Really time does fly in your house. I congratulate you. Actually it's a quarter past; I think I heard it strike."

"Well, they won't be long now!" said Kampf in a loud voice.

They all sat down again, but they no longer talked. They could hear the servants laughing uproariously in the pantry.

"Go and make them be quiet, Alfred," said Rosine at length, in a voice trembling with rage. "Go along at once."

At half past eleven the pianist came up.

"Shall we wait any longer, Madame?"

"No! Go away, all of you!" cried Rosine roughly, on the verge of hysterics. "We'll give you your money and then you can go! There won't be any ball, or anything. It's an outrage, an insult, a trick played on us by our enemies to make us a laughing-stock. If anyone comes now they're not to be let in, do you hear?" she continued with increasing violence. "Tell them that there's illness in the house, death, anything you like!"

Mademoiselle Isabelle tried to calm her.

"Come, dear, it isn't quite hopeless yet. Don't torment yourself like this. You'll make yourself ill. Naturally, I understand your feelings, my poor dear friend; but the world is so cruel, alas! You ought to say something to her, Alfred, to soothe her and console her. . . ."

"What a farcel!" hissed Kampf between his clenched teeth, his face white with rage. "Are you going to be quiet?"

"Come, Alfred, don't scream at her; try to calm her."

"Why, if she wants to make a fool of herself?"

He turned sharply on his heel and addressed the band:

"Why are you still here? How much do I owe you? And clear out at once, for God's sake."

Mademoiselle Isabelle slowly picked up her feather boa, her lorgnette and her bag.

"I think I had better go, Alfred, unless I can be of any use to you, my poor friend."

As he did not answer she bent down and kissed Rosine on the forehead. Rosine did not move, she did not even cry, but sat there with dry, staring eyes.

"Good-bye, darling, and believe me when I tell you that I am deeply distressed and that I offer you my most sincere sympathy," said Mademoiselle Isabelle mechanically, as though she were at a funeral. "No, no! There's no need to see me home, Alfred. I'm going at once. Have a good cry, Rosine, it helps a lot," she called out at the top of her voice from the centre of the deserted room.

Alfred and Rosine heard her tell the servants as she passed through the dining-room:

"Take care not to make a noise. Madame is very much upset and very overwrought."

Then came the drone of the lift and the distant sound of the street door being opened and shut.

"Old bitch!" muttered Kampf. "If only . . ."

He did not finish his sentence. Rosine sprang up from the sofa, her face streaming with tears, and shook her fist at him, shouting:

"It's your fault, you old fool! It's your filthy vanity, your stupid pride! It's all your fault. His lordship wants to give balls, to hold receptions! It's too ridiculous for words! Do you think that nobody knows who you are, and where you came from? Nouveau riche! They've made a nice fool of you, your fine friends! Thieves! Crooks!"

"And what about yours? Your Counts and Marquises and pimps?"

They went on shouting both at once, in a torrent of violent, passionate abuse. Then Kampf lowered his voice and said, between his teeth:

"When I picked you up you had already racketed about God knows where. Did you flatter yourself that I didn't know all about it and that I never noticed anything? I thought you were pretty and intelligent and that if I became rich you would be a credit to me. And look at you now! The manners of a fish-wife, a stupid old woman with the manners of a cook."

"Other people have been perfectly satisfied with me."

"I doubt it. But don't enter into details. You'll be sorry tomorrow if you do."

"Tomorrow? Do you think I'll stop another hour with you, after what you've said to me? Beast!"

"Get out, then! Go to hell!"

He left the room, slamming the door after him.

Rosine shouted:

"Come back, Alfred!"

And she waited, her head turned towards the drawing-room, breathing hard. But he had already gone down the stairs. In the street she could hear him angrily calling for a taxi; and then his voice died away round a corner.

The servants had gone to bed, leaving all the lights on and all the doors open. Rosine collapsed into an armchair in her bright dress and her pearls.

She suddenly made a violent movement, so abrupt and so sudden that it made Antoinette start, and in doing so she struck her forehead against the wall. She cowered further back, but her mother had heard nothing and was tearing off her bracelets and throwing them one by one onto the floor. One of them, a beautiful, heavy bracelet set with enormous diamonds, rolled under the sofa to Antoinette's feet. Antoinette stared at it, unable to move hand or foot.

She looked at her mother's face, down which the tears coursed, mixing with the paint; a wrinkled, distorted, purple, childish, comic, pathetic face. But Antoinette was not touched; she felt nothing but a sort of disdain, of scornful indifference. Later she would say to some man: "Oh, you know I was a dreadful little girl. On one occasion . . ."

She suddenly felt the richness of her future and of her untried strength and of being able to think: "How can one cry like that for such a cause? And love? And death? She will die one day. Has she forgotten that?"

So grown-up people suffered so deeply for futile, passing things. And she, Antoinette, had been afraid of them, had trembled before them and their shouting and anger and their vain, absurd threats. Slowly she crept out from her hiding-place. For a moment longer, hidden in the shadow, she contemplated her mother, who was not sobbing, but was completely absorbed in herself, her tears flowing down to her mouth without her making any attempt to dry them. Then she got up and went over to her.

"Mother!"

Madame Kampf started up in her chair.

"What do you want? What are you doing here?" she cried in confusion. "Go away, go away at once and leave me alone. I can't get a moment's peace in my own house these days!"

Antoinette, rather pale, stood her ground with her head bowed. The sound of her mother's voice rang in her ears, but it sounded weak now and had lost its power over her, and reminded her of stage thunder. One day, soon, she would say to some man: "Mother will make a fuss, but never mind. . . ."

She put out her hand gently and placed it on her mother's hair, which she stroked with light, trembling fingers.

"Poor Mother! . . ." she began.

For a moment longer Rosine struggled automatically, thrust her away and shook her head convulsively:

"Leave me alone! Go away! Leave me alone, I tell you!"

And then a weak, broken, pitiful expression passed over her features.

"Oh, my poor child, my poor little Antoinette! You're very lucky; you don't yet know how unfair and wicked and cynical the world is. All those people who smiled at me and invited me to their parties, were all laughing at me behind my back and despised me because I was not of their world. A lot of brutes, of . . . But you can't understand, my poor child! And your father! I've no one but you now!" she wound up suddenly. "No one but you, my poor little child!"

She took her into her arms and, as she pressed the mute little face to her pearls, she saw that it was not smiling.

"You're a good girl, Antoinette."

It was the moment, the imperceptible moment when "on the path of life" they crossed and one was going to go on upward and the other to sink into the gloom. But they were unaware of this. And yet Antoinette repeated softly:

"Poor Mother!"

KNEEL TO THE RISING SUN

Erskine Caldwell

(1902- )

---

A SHIVER went through Lonnie. He drew his hand away from his sharp chin, remembering what Clem had said. It made him feel now as if he were committing a crime by standing in Arch Gunnard's presence and allowing his face to be seen.

He and Clem had been walking up the road together that afternoon on their way to the filling station when he told Clem how much he needed rations. Clem stopped a moment to kick a rock out of the road, and said that if you worked for Arch Gunnard long enough, your face would be sharp enough to split the boards for your own coffin.

As Lonnie turned away to sit down on an empty box beside the gasoline pump, he could not help wishing that he could be as unafraid of Arch Gunnard as Clem was. Even if Clem was a Negro, he never hesitated to ask for rations when he needed something to eat; and when he and his family did not get enough, Clem came right out and told Arch so. Arch stood for that, but he swore that he was going to run Clem out of the country the first chance he got.

Lonnie knew without turning around that Clem was standing at the corner of the filling station with two or three other Negroes and looking at him, but for some reason he was unable to meet Clem's eyes.

Arch Gunnard was sitting in the sun, honing his jack-knife blade on his boot top. He glanced once or twice at Lonnie's hound, Nancy, who was lying in the middle of the road waiting for Lonnie to go home.

"That your dog, Lonnie?"

Jumping with fear, Lonnie's hand went to his chin to hide the lean face that would accuse Arch of short-rationing.

Arch snapped his fingers and the hound stood up, wagging her tail. She waited to be called.

"Mr. Arch, I——"

Arch called the dog. She began crawling towards them on her belly, wagging her tail a little faster each time Arch's fingers snapped. When she was several feet away, she turned over on her back and lay on the ground with her four paws in the air.

Dudley Smith and Jim Weaver, who were lounging around the filling station, laughed. They had been leaning against the side of the building, but they straightened up to see what Arch was up to.

Arch spat some more tobacco juice on his boot top and whetted the jack-knife blade some more.

"What kind of a hound dog is that, anyway, Lonnie?" Arch said. "Looks like to me it might be a ketch hound."

Lonnie could feel Clem Henry's eyes boring into the back of his head. He wondered what Clem would do if it had been his dog Arch Gunnard was snapping his fingers at and calling like that.

"His tail's way too long for a coon hound or a bird dog, ain't it, Arch?" somebody behind Lonnie said, laughing out loud.

Everybody laughed then, including Arch. They looked at Lonnie, waiting to hear what he was going to say to Arch.

"Is he a ketch hound, Lonnie?" Arch said, snapping his finger again.

"Mr. Arch, I——"

"Don't be ashamed of him, Lonnie, if he don't show signs of turning out to be a bird dog or a fox hound. Everybody needs a hound around the house that can go out and catch pigs and rabbits when you are in a hurry for them. A ketch hound is a mighty respectable animal. I've known the time when I was mighty proud to own one."

Everybody laughed.

Arch Gunnard was getting ready to grab Nancy by the tail. Lonnie sat up, twisting his neck until he caught a glimpse of Clem Henry at the other corner of the filling station. Clem was staring at him with unmistakable meaning, with the same look in his eyes he had had that afternoon when he said that nobody who worked for Arch Gunnard ought to stand for short-rationing. Lonnie lowered his eyes. He could not figure out how a Negro could be braver than he was. There were a lot of times like that when he would have given anything he had to be able to jump into Clem's shoes and change places with him.

"The trouble with this hound of yours, Lonnie, is that he's too heavy on his feet. Don't you reckon it would be a pretty slick little trick to lighten the load some, being as how he's a ketch hound to begin with?"

Lonnie remembered then what Clem Henry had said he would do if Arch Gunnard ever tried to cut off his dog's tail. Lonnie knew, and Clem knew, and everybody else knew, that that would give Arch the chance he was waiting for. All Arch asked, he had said, was for Clem Henry to overstep his place just one little half-inch, or to talk back to him with just one little short word, and he would do the rest. Everybody knew what Arch meant by that, especially if Clem did not turn and run. And Clem had not been known to run from anybody, after fifteen years in the country.

Arch reached down and grabbed Nancy's tail while Lonnie was wondering about Clem. Nancy acted as if she thought Arch were playing some kind of a game with her. She turned her head around until she could reach Arch's hand to lick it. He cracked her on the bridge of the nose with the end of the jackknife.

"He's a mighty playful dog, Lonnie," Arch said, catching up a shorter grip on the tail, "but his wagpole is way too long for a dog his size, especially when he wants to be a ketch hound."

Lonnie swallowed hard.

"Mr. Arch, she's a mighty fine rabbit tracker. I——"

"Shucks, Lonnie," Arch said, whetting the knife blade on the dog's tail, "I aint never seen a hound in all my life that needed a tail that long to hunt rabbits with. It's way too long for just a common, ordinary, everyday ketch hound."

Lonnie looked up hopefully at Dudley Smith and the others. None of them offered any help. It was useless for him to try to stop Arch, because Arch Gunnard would let nothing stand in his way when once he had set his head on what he wished to do. Lonnie knew that if he should let himself show any anger or resentment, Arch would drive him off the farm before sundown that night. Clem Henry was the only person there who would help him, but Clem . . .

The white men and the Negroes at both corners of the filling station waited to see what Lonnie was going to do about it. All of them hoped he would put up a fight for his hound. If anyone ever had the nerve to stop

Arch Gunnard from cutting off a dog's tail, it might put an end to it. It was plain, though, that Lonnie, who was one of Arch's share-croppers, was afraid to speak up. Clem Henry might; Clem was the only one who might try to stop Arch, even if it meant trouble. All of them knew that Arch would insist on running Clem out of the country, or filling him full of lead.

"I reckon it's all right with you, aint it, Lonnie?" Arch said. "I don't seem to hear no objections."

Clem Henry stepped forward several paces, and stopped.

Arch laughed, watching Lonnie's face, and jerked Nancy to her feet. The hound cried out in pain and surprise, but Arch made her be quiet by kicking her in the belly.

Lonnie winced. He could hardly bear to see anybody kick his dog like that.

"Mr. Arch, I . . ."

A contraction in his throat almost choked him for several moments, and he had to open his mouth wide and fight for breath. The other white men around him were silent. Nobody liked to see a dog kicked in the belly like that.

Lonnie could see the other end of the filling station from the corner of his eye. He saw a couple of Negroes go up behind Clem and grasp his overalls. Clem spat on the ground, between outspread feet, but he did not try to break away from them.

"Being as how I don't hear no objections, I reckon it's all right to go ahead and cut it off," Arch said, spitting.

Lonnie's head went forward and all he could see of Nancy was her hind feet. He had come to ask for a slab of sowbelly and some molasses, or something. Now he did not know if he could ever bring himself to ask for rations, no matter how much hungrier they became at home.

"I always make it a habit of asking a man first," Arch said. "I wouldn't want to go ahead and cut off a tail if a man had any objections. That wouldn't be right. No, sir, it just wouldn't be fair and square."

Arch caught a shorter grip on the hound's tail and placed the knife blade on it two or three inches from the rump. It looked to those who were watching as if his mouth were watering, because tobacco juice began to trickle down the corners of his lips. He brought up the back of his hand and wiped his mouth.

A noisy automobile came plowing down the road through the deep red dust. Everyone looked up as it passed in order to see who was in it.

Lonnie glanced at it, but he could not keep his eyes raised. His head fell downward once more until he could feel his sharp chin cutting into his chest. He wondered then if Arch had noticed how lean his face was.

"I keep two or three ketch hounds around my place," Arch said, honing the blade on the tail of the dog as if it were a razor strop until his actions brought smiles to the faces of the men grouped around him, "but I never could see the sense of a ketch hound having a long tail. It only gets in their way when I send them out to catch a pig or a rabbit for my supper."

Pulling with his left hand and pushing with his right, Arch Gunnard docked the hound's tail as quickly and as easily as if he were cutting a willow switch in the pasture to drive the cows home with. The dog sprang forward with the release of her tail until she was far beyond Arch's reach, and began howling so loud she could be heard half a mile away. Nancy stopped once and looked back at Arch, and then she sprang to the middle of the road and began leaping and twisting in circles. All that time she was yelping and biting at the bleeding stub of her tail.

Arch leaned backward and twirled the severed tail in one hand while he wiped the jack-knife blade on his boot sole. He watched Lonnie's dog chasing herself around in circles in the red dust.

Nobody had anything to say then. Lonnie tried not to watch his dog's agony, and he forced himself to keep from looking at Clem Henry. Then, with his eyes shut, he wondered why he had remained on Arch Gunnard's plantation all those past years, share-cropping for a mere living on short-rations, and becoming leaner and leaner all the time. He knew then how true it was what Clem had said about Arch's share-croppers' faces becoming sharp enough to hew their own coffins. His hands went to his chin before he knew what he was doing. His hand dropped when he had felt the bones of jaw and the exposed tendons of his cheeks.

As hungry as he was, he knew that even if Arch did give him some rations then, there would not be nearly enough for them to eat for the following week. Hatty, his wife, was already broken down from hunger and work in the fields, and his father, Mark Newsome, stone-deaf for the past twenty years, was always asking him why there was never enough food in the house for them to have a solid meal. Lonnie's head fell forward a little more, and he could feel his eyes becoming damp.

The pressure of his sharp chin against his chest made him so uncomfortable that he had to raise his head at last in order to ease the pain of it.

The first thing he saw when he looked up was Arch Gunnard twirling Nancy's tail in his left hand. Arch Gunnard had a trunk full of dogs' tails at home. He had been cutting off tails ever since anyone could remember, and during all those years he had accumulated a collection of which he was so proud that he kept the trunk locked and the key tied around his neck on a string. On Sunday afternoons when the preacher came to visit, or when a crowd was there to loll on the front porch and swap stories, Arch showed them off, naming each tail from memory just as well as if he had had a tag on it.

Clem Henry had left the filling station and was walking alone down the road towards the plantation. Clem Henry's house was in a cluster of Negro cabins below Arch's big house, and he had to pass Lonnie's house to get there. Lonnie was on the verge of getting up and leaving when he saw Arch looking at him. He did not know whether Arch was looking at his lean face, or whether he was watching to see if he were going to get up and go down the road with Clem.

The thought of leaving reminded him of his reason for being there. He had to have some rations before suppertime that night, no matter how short they were.

"Mr. Arch, I . . ."

Arch stared at him for a moment, appearing as if he had turned to listen to some strange sound unheard of before that moment.

Lonnie bit his lips, wondering if Arch was going to say anything about how lean and hungry he looked. But Arch was thinking about something else. He slapped his hand on his leg and laughed out loud.

"I sometimes wish niggers had tails," Arch said, coiling Nancy's tail into a ball and putting it into his pocket. "I'd a heap rather cut off nigger tails than dog tails. There'd be more to cut, for one thing."

Dudley Smith and somebody else behind them laughed for a brief moment. The laughter died out almost as suddenly as it had risen.

The Negroes who had heard Arch shuffled their feet in the dust and moved backwards. It was only a few minutes until not one was left at the filling station. They went up the road behind the red wooden building until they were out of sight.

Arch got up and stretched. The sun was getting low, and it was no longer comfortable in the October air. "Well, I reckon I'll be getting on home to get me some supper," he said.

He walked slowly to the middle of the road and stopped to look at Nancy retreating along the ditch.

"Nobody going my way?" he asked. "What's wrong with you, Lonnie? Going home to supper, aint you?"

"Mr. Arch, I . . ."

Lonnie found himself jumping to his feet. His first thought was to ask for the sowbelly and molasses, and maybe some corn meal; but when he opened his mouth, the words refused to come out. He took several steps forward and shook his head. He did not know what Arch might say or do if he said "no."

"Hatty'll be looking for you," Arch said, turning his back and walking off.

He reached into his hip pocket and took out Nancy's tail. He began twirling it as he walked down the road towards the big house in the distance.

Dudley Smith went inside the filling station, and the others walked away.

After Arch had gone several hundred yards, Lonnie sat down heavily on the box beside the gas pump from which he had got up when Arch spoke to him. He sat down heavily, his shoulders drooping, his arms falling between his outspread legs.

Lonnie did not know how long his eyes had been closed, but when he opened them, he saw Nancy lying between his feet, licking the docked tail. While he watched her, he felt the sharp point of his chin cutting into his chest again. Presently the door behind him was slammed shut, and a minute later he could hear Dudley Smith walking away from the filling station on his way home.

II

Lonnie had been sleeping fitfully for several hours when he suddenly found himself wide awake. Hatty shook him again. He raised himself on his elbow and tried to see into the darkness of the room. Without knowing what time it was, he was able to determine that it was still nearly two hours until sunrise.

"Lonnie," Hatty said again, trembling in the cold night air, "Lonnie, your pa aint in the house."

Lonnie sat upright in bed.

"How do you know he aint?" he said.

"I've been lying here wide awake ever since I got in bed, and I heard him when he went out. He's been gone all that time."

"Maybe he just stepped out for a while," Lonnie said, turning and trying to see through the bedroom window.

"I know what I'm saying, Lonnie," Hatty insisted. "Your pa's been gone a heap too long."

Both of them sat without a sound for several minutes while they listened for Mark Newsome.

Lonnie got up and lit a lamp. He shivered while he was putting on his shirt, overalls, and shoes. He tied his shoelaces in hard knots because he couldn't see in the faint light. Outside the window it was almost pitch-dark, and Lonnie could feel the damp October air blowing against his face.

"I'll go help look," Hatty said, throwing the covers off and starting to get up.

Lonnie went to the bed and drew the covers back over her and pushed her back into place.

"You try to get some sleep, Hatty," he said; "you can't stay awake the whole night. I'll go bring Pa back."

He left Hatty, blowing out the lamp, and stumbled through the dark hall, feeling his way to the front porch by touching the wall with his hands. When he got to the porch, he could still barely see any distance ahead, but his eyes were becoming more accustomed to the darkness. He waited a minute, listening.

Feeling his way down the steps into the yard, he walked around the corner of the house and stopped to listen again before calling his father.

"Oh, Pa!" he said loudly. "Oh, Pa!"

He stopped under the bedroom window when he realized what he had been doing.

"Now that's a fool thing for me to be out here doing," he said, scolding himself. "Pa couldn't hear it thunder."

He heard a rustling of the bed.

"He's been gone long enough to get clear to the crossroads, or more," Hatty said, calling through the window.

"Now you lay down and try to get a little sleep, Hatty," Lonnie told her. "I'll bring him back in no time."

He could hear Nancy scratching fleas under the house, but he knew she was in no condition to help look for Mark. It would be several days before she recovered from the shock of losing her tail.

"He's been gone a long time," Hatty said, unable to keep still.

"That don't make no difference," Lonnie said. "I'll find him sooner or later. Now you go on to sleep like I told you, Hatty."

Lonnie walked towards the barn, listening for some sound. Over at the big house he could hear the hogs grunting and squealing, and he wished they would be quiet so he could hear other sounds. Arch Gunnard's dogs were howling occasionally, but they were not making any more noise than they usually did at night, and he was accustomed to their howling.

Lonnie went to the barn, looking inside and out. After walking around the barn, he went into the field as far as the cotton shed. He knew it was useless, but he could not keep from calling his father time after time.

"Oh, Pa!" he said, trying to penetrate the darkness.

He went further into the field.

"Now, what in the world could have become of Pa?" he said, stopping and wondering where to look next.

After he had gone back to the front yard, he began to feel uneasy for the first time. Mark had not acted any more strangely during the past week than he ordinarily did, but Lonnie knew he was upset over the way Arch Gunnard was giving out short-rations. Mark had even said that, at the rate they were being fed, all of them would starve to death inside another three months.

Lonnie left the yard and went down the road towards the Negro cabins. When he got to Clem's house, he turned in and walked up the path to the door. He knocked several times and waited. There was no answer, and he rapped louder.

"Who's that?" he heard Clem say from bed.

"It's me," Lonnie said. "I've got to see you a minute, Clem. I'm out in the front yard."

He sat down and waited for Clem to dress and come outside. While he waited, he strained his ears to catch any sound that might be in the air.

Over the fields towards the big house he could hear the fattening hogs grunt and squeal.

Clem came out and shut the door. He stood on the doorsill a moment speaking to his wife in bed, telling her he would be back and not to worry.

"Who's that?" Clem said, coming down into the yard.

Lonnie got up and met Clem half-way.

"What's the trouble?" Clem asked then, buttoning up his overall jumper.

"Pa's not in his bed," Lonnie said, "and Hatty says he's been gone from the house most all night. I went out in the field, and all around the barn, but I couldn't find a trace of him anywhere."

Clem then finished buttoning his jumper and began rolling a cigarette. He walked slowly down the path to the road. It was still dark, and it would be at least an hour before dawn made it any lighter.

"Maybe he was too hungry to stay in bed any longer," Clem said. "When I saw him yesterday, he said he was so shrunk up and weak he didn't know if he could last much longer. He looked like his skin and bones couldn't shrivel much more."

"I asked Arch last night after supertime for some rations—just a little piece of sowbelly and some molasses. He said he'd get around to letting me have some the first thing this morning."

"Why don't you tell him to give you full rations or none?" Clem said. "If you knew you wasn't going to get none at all, you could move away and find a better man to share-crop for, couldn't you?"

"I've been loyal to Arch Gunnard for a long time now," Lonnie said. "I'd hate to haul off and leave him like that."

Clem looked at Lonnie, but he did not say anything more just then. They turned up the road towards the driveway that led up to the big house. The fattening hogs were still grunting and squealing in the pen, and one of Arch's hounds came down a cotton row beside the driveway to smell their shoes.

"Them fattening hogs always get enough to eat," Clem said. "There's not a one of them that don't weigh seven hundred pounds right now, and they're getting bigger every day. Besides taking all that's thrown to them, they make a lot of meals off the chickens that get in there to peck around."

Lonnie listened to the grunting of the hogs as they walked up the driveway towards the big house.

"Reckon we'd better get Arch up to help look for Pa?" Lonnie said. "I'd hate to wake him up, but I'm scared Pa might stray off into the swamp and get lost for good. He couldn't hear it thunder, even. I never could find him back there in all that tangle if he got into it."

Clem said something under his breath and went on towards the barn and hog pen. He reached the pen before Lonnie got there.

"You'd better come here quick," Clem said, turning around to see where Lonnie was.

Lonnie ran to the hog pen. He stopped and climbed half-way up the wooden-and-wire sides of the fence. At first he could see nothing, but gradually he was able to see the moving mass of black fattening hogs on the other side of the pen. They were biting and snarling at each other like a pack of hungry hounds turned loose on a dead rabbit.

Lonnie scrambled to the top of the fence, but Clem caught him and pulled him back.

"Don't go in that hog pen that way," he said. "Them hogs will tear you to pieces, they're that wild. They're fighting over something."

Both of them ran around the corner of the pen and got to the side where the hogs were. Down under their feet on the ground Lonnie caught a glimpse of a dark mass splotched with white. He was able to see it for a moment only, because one of the hogs trampled over it.

Clem opened and closed his mouth several times before he was able to say anything at all. He clutched at Lonnie's arm, shaking him.

"That looks like it might be your pa," he said. "I swear before goodness, Lonnie, it does look like it."

Lonnie still could not believe it. He climbed to the top of the fence and began kicking his feet at the hogs, trying to drive them away. They paid no attention to him.

While Lonnie was perched there, Clem had gone to the wagon shed, and he ran back with two singletrees he had somehow managed to find there in the dark. He handed one to Lonnie, poking it at him until Lonnie's attention was drawn from the hogs long enough to take it.

Clem leaped over the fence and began swinging the singletree at the hogs. Lonnie slid down beside him, yelling at them. One hog turned on Lonnie and snapped at him, and Clem struck it over the back of the neck with enough force to drive it off momentarily.

By then Lonnie was able to realize what had happened. He ran to the mass of hogs, kicking them with his heavy stiff shoes and striking them on their heads with the iron-tipped singletree. Once he felt a stinging sensation, and looked down to see one of the hogs biting the calf of his leg. He had just enough time to hit the hog and drive it away before his leg was torn. He knew most of his overall leg had been ripped away, because he could feel the night air on his bare wet calf.

Clem had gone ahead and had driven the hogs back. There was no other way to do anything. They were in a snarling circle around them, and both of them had to keep the singletrees swinging back and forth all the time to keep the hogs off. Finally Lonnie reached down and got a grip on Mark's leg. With Clem helping, Lonnie carried his father to the fence and lifted him over to the other side.

They were too much out of breath for a while to say anything, or to do anything else. The snarling fattening hogs were at the fence, biting the wood and wire, and making more noise than ever.

While Lonnie was searching in his pockets for a match, Clem struck one. He held the flame close to Mark Newsome's head.

They both stared unbelievably, and then Clem blew out the match. There was nothing said as they stared at each other in the darkness.

Clem walked several steps away, and turned and came back beside Lonnie.

"It's him, though," Clem said, sitting down on the ground. "It's him, all right."

"I reckon so," Lonnie said. He could think of nothing else to say then.

They sat on the ground, one on each side of Mark, looking at the body. There had been no sign of life in the body beside them since they had first touched it. The face, throat, and stomach had been completely devoured.

"You'd better go wake up Arch Gunnard," Clem said after a while.

"What for?" Lonnie said. "He can't help none now. It's too late for help."

"Makes no difference," Clem insisted. "You'd better go wake him up and let him see what there is to see. If you wait till morning, he might take it into his head to say the hogs didn't do it. Right now is the time to get him up so he can see what his hogs did."

Clem turned around and looked at the big house. The dark outline against the dark sky made him hesitate.

"A man who short-rations tenants ought to have to sit and look at that till it's buried."

Lonnie looked at Clem fearfully. He knew Clem was right, but he was scared to hear a Negro say anything like that about a white man.

"You oughtn't talk like that about Arch," Lonnie said. "He's in bed asleep. He didn't have a thing to do with it. He didn't have no more to do with it than I did."

Clem laughed a little, and threw the singletree on the ground between his feet. After letting it lie there a little while, he picked it up and began beating the ground with it.

Lonnie got to his feet slowly. He had never seen Clem act like that before, and he did not know what to think about it. He left without saying anything and walked stiffly to the house in the darkness to wake up Arch Gunnard.

III

Arch was hard to wake up. And even after he was awake, he was in no hurry to get up. Lonnie was standing outside the bedroom window, and Arch was lying in bed six or eight feet away. Lonnie could hear him toss and grumble.

"Who told you to come and wake me up in the middle of the night?" Arch said.

"Well, Clem Henry's out here, and he said maybe you'd like to know about it."

Arch tossed around on the bed, flailing the pillow with his fists.

"You tell Clem Henry I said that one of these days he's going to find himself turned inside out, like a coat-sleeve."

Lonnie waited doggedly. He knew Clem was right in insisting that Arch ought to wake up and come out there to see what had happened. Lonnie was afraid to go back to the barnyard and tell Clem that Arch was not coming. He did not know, but he had a feeling that Clem might go into the bedroom and drag Arch out of bed. He did not like to think of anything like that taking place.

"Are you still out there, Lonnie?" Arch shouted.

"I'm right here, Mr. Arch. I——"

"If I wasn't so sleepy, I'd come out there and take a stick and—I don't know what I wouldn't do!"

Lonnie met Arch at the back step. On the way out to the hog pen Arch did not speak to him. Arch walked heavily ahead, not even waiting to see if Lonnie was coming. The lantern that Arch was carrying cast long flat beams of yellow light over the ground; and when they got to where Clem was waiting beside Mark's body, the Negro's face shone in the night like a highly polished plowshare.

"What was Mark doing in my hog pen at night, anyway?" Arch said, shouting at them both.

Neither Clem nor Lonnie replied. Arch glared at them for not answering. But no matter how many times he looked at them, his eyes returned each time to stare at the torn body of Mark Newsome on the ground at his feet.

"There's nothing to be done now," Arch said finally. "We'll just have to wait till daylight and send for the undertaker." He walked a few steps away. "Looks like you could have waited till morning in the first place. There wasn't no sense in getting me up."

He turned his back and looked sideways at Clem. Clem stood up and looked him straight in the eyes.

"What do you want, Clem Henry?" he said. "Who told you to be coming around my house in the middle of the night? I don't want niggers coming here except when I send for them."

"I couldn't stand to see anybody eaten up by the hogs, and not do anything about it," Clem said.

"You mind your own business," Arch told him. "And when you talk to me, take off your hat, or you'll be sorry for it. It wouldn't take much to make me do you up the way you belong."

Lonnie backed away. There was a feeling of uneasiness around them.

That was how trouble between Clem and Arch always began. He had seen it start that way dozens of times before. As long as Clem turned and went away, nothing happened, but sometimes he stayed right where he was and talked up to Arch just as if he had been a white man, too.

Lonnie hoped it would not happen this time. Arch was already mad enough about being waked up in the middle of the night, and Lonnie knew there was no limit to what Arch would do when he got good and mad at a Negro. Nobody had ever seen him kill a Negro, but he had said he had, and he told people that he was not scared to do it again.

"I reckon you know how he came to get eaten up by the hogs like that," Clem said, looking straight at Arch.

Arch whirled around.

"Are you talking to me . . . ?"

"I asked you that," Clem stated.

"God damn you, yellow-blooded . . ." Arch yelled.

He swung the lantern at Clem's head. Clem dodged, but the bottom of it hit his shoulder, and it was smashed to pieces. The oil splattered on the ground, igniting in the air from the flaming wick. Clem was lucky not to have it splash on his face and overalls.

"Now, look here . . ." Clem said.

"You yellow-blooded nigger," Arch said, rushing at him. "I'll teach you to talk back to me. You've got too big for your place for the last time. I've been taking too much from you, but I aint doing it no more."

"Mr. Arch, I . . ." Lonnie said, stepping forward partly between them. No one heard him.

Arch stood back and watched the kerosene flicker out on the ground.

"You know good and well why he got eaten up by the fattening hogs," Clem said, standing his ground. "He was so hungry he had to get up out of bed in the middle of the night and come up here in the dark trying to find something to eat. Maybe he was trying to find the smokehouse. It makes no difference, either way. He's been on short-rations like everybody else working on your place, and he was so old he didn't know where to look for food except in your smokehouse. You know good and well that's how he got lost up here in the dark and fell in the hog pen."

The kerosene had died out completely. In the last faint flare, Arch had reached down and grabbed up the singletree that had been lying on the ground where Lonnie had dropped it.

Arch raised the singletree over his head and struck with all his might at Clem. Clem dodged, but Arch drew back again quickly and landed a blow on his arm just above the elbow before Clem could dodge it. Clem's arm dropped to his side, dangling lifelessly.

"You Goddamn yellow-blooded nigger!" Arch shouted. "Now's your time, you black bastard. I've been waiting for the chance to teach you your lesson. And this's going to be one you won't never forget."

Clem felt the ground with his feet until he had located the other singletree. He stooped down and got it. Raising it, he did not try to hit Arch, but held it in front of him so he could ward off Arch's blows at his head. He continued to stand his ground, not giving Arch an inch.

"Drop that singletree," Arch said.

"I won't stand here and let you beat me like that," Clem protested.

"By God, that's all I want to hear," Arch said, his mouth curling. "Nigger, your time has come, by God!"

He swung once more at Clem, but Clem turned and ran towards the barn. Arch went after him a few steps and stopped. He threw aside the singletree and turned and ran back to the house.

Lonnie went to the fence and tried to think what was best for him to do. He knew he could not take sides with a Negro, in the open, even if Clem had helped him, and especially after Clem had talked to Arch in the way he wished he could himself. He was a white man, and to save his life he could not stand to think of turning against Arch, no matter what happened.

Presently a light burst through one of the windows of the house, and he heard Arch shouting at his wife to wake her up.

When he saw Arch's wife go to the telephone, Lonnie realized what was going to happen. She was calling up the neighbors and Arch's friends. They would not mind getting up in the night when they found out what was going to take place.

Out behind the barn he could hear Clem calling him. Leaving the yard, Lonnie felt his way out there in the dark.

"What's the trouble, Clem?" he said.

"I reckon my time has come," Clem said. "Arch Gunnard talks that way when he's good and mad. He talked just like he did that time he carried Jim Moffin off to the swamp—and Jim never came back."

"Arch wouldn't do anything like that to you, Clem," Lonnie said excitedly, but he knew better.

Clem said nothing.

"Maybe you'd better strike out for the swamps till he changes his mind and cools off some," Lonnie said. "You might be right, Clem."

Lonnie could feel Clem's eyes burning into him.

"Wouldn't be no sense in that, if you'd help me," Clem said. "Wouldn't you stand by me?"

Lonnie trembled as the meaning of Clem's suggestion became clear to him. His back was to the side of the barn, and he leaned against it while sheets of black and white passed before his eyes.

"Wouldn't you stand by me?" Clem asked again.

"I don't know what Arch would say to that," Lonnie told him haltingly.

Clem walked away several paces. He stood with his back to Lonnie while he looked across the field towards the quarter where his home was.

"I could go in that little patch of woods out there and stay till they get tired of looking for me," Clem said, turning around to see Lonnie.

"You'd better go somewhere," Lonnie said uneasily. "I know Arch Gunnard. He's hard to handle when he makes up his mind to do something he wants to do. I couldn't stop him an inch. Maybe you'd better get clear out of the country, Clem."

"I couldn't do that, and leave my family down there across the field," Clem said.

"He's going to get you if you don't."

"If you'd only sort of help me out a little, he wouldn't. I would only have to go and hide out in that little patch of woods over there a while. Looks like you could do that for me, being as how I helped you find your pa when he was in the hog pen."

Lonnie nodded, listening for sounds from the big house. He continued to nod at Clem while Clem was waiting to be assured.

"If you're going to stand up for me," Clem said, "I can just go over there in the woods and wait till they get it off their minds. You won't be telling them where I'm at, and you could say I struck out for the swamp. They wouldn't ever find me without bloodhounds."

"That's right," Lonnie said, listening for sounds of Arch's coming out of the house. He did not wish to be found back there behind the barn where Arch could accuse him of talking to Clem.

The moment Lonnie replied, Clem turned and ran off into the night. Lonnie went after him a few steps, as if he had suddenly changed his mind about helping him, but Clem was lost in the darkness by then.

Lonnie waited for a few minutes, listening to Clem crashing through the underbrush in the patch of woods a quarter of a mile away. When he could hear Clem no longer, he went around the barn to meet Arch.

Arch came out of the house carrying his double-barreled shotgun and the lantern he had picked up in the house. His pockets were bulging with shells.

"Where is that damn nigger, Lonnie?" Arch asked him. "Where'd he go to?"

Lonnie opened his mouth, but no words came out.

"You know which way he went, don't you?"

Lonnie again tried to say something, but there were no sounds. He jumped when he found himself nodding his head to Arch.

"Mr. Arch, I——"

"That's all right, then," Arch said. "That's all I need to know now. Dudley Smith and Tom Hawkins and Frank and Dave Howard and the rest will be here in a minute, and you can stay right here so you can show us where he's hiding out."

Frantically Lonnie tried to say something. Then he reached for Arch's sleeve to stop him, but Arch had gone.

Arch ran around the house to the front yard. Soon a car came racing down the road, its headlights lighting up the whole place, hog pen and all. Lonnie knew it was probably Dudley Smith, because his was the first house in that direction, only half a mile away. While he was turning into the driveway, several other automobiles came into sight, both up the road and down it.

Lonnie trembled. He was afraid Arch was going to tell him to point out where Clem had gone to hide. Then he knew Arch would tell him. He had promised Clem he would not do that. But try as he might, he could not make himself believe that Arch Gunnard would do anything more than whip Clem.

Clem had not done anything that called for lynching. He had not raped a white woman, he had not shot at a white man; he had only talked back to Arch, with his hat on. But Arch was mad enough to do anything; he was mad enough at Clem not to stop at anything short of lynching.

The whole crowd of men was swarming around him before he realized it. And there was Arch clutching his arm and shouting into his face.

"Mr. Arch, I . . ."

Lonnie recognized every man in the feeble dawn. They were excited, and they looked like men on the last lap of an all-night foxhunting party. Their shotguns and pistols were held at their waist, ready for the kill.

"What's the matter with you, Lonnie?" Arch said, shouting into his ear. "Wake up and say where Clem Henry went to hide out. We're ready to go get him."

Lonnie remembered looking up and seeing Frank Howard dropping yellow twelve-gauge shells into the breech of his gun. Frank bent forward so he could hear Lonnie tell Arch where Clem was hiding.

"You aint going to kill Clem this time, are you, Mr. Arch?" Lonnie asked.

"Kill him?" Dudley Smith repeated. "What do you reckon I've been waiting all this time for if it wasn't for a chance to get Clem. That nigger has had it coming to him ever since he came to this county. He's a bad nigger, and it's coming to him."

"It wasn't exactly Clem's fault," Lonnie said. "If Pa hadn't come up here and fell in the hog pen, Clem wouldn't have had a thing to do with it. He was helping me, that's all."

"Shut up, Lonnie," somebody shouted at him. "You're so excited you don't know what you're saying. You're taking up for a nigger when you talk like that."

People were crowding around him so tightly he felt as if he were being squeezed to death. He had to get some air, get his breath, get out of the crowd.

"That's right," Lonnie said.

He heard himself speak, but he did not know what he was saying.

"But Clem helped me find Pa when he got lost looking around for something to eat."

"Shut up, Lonnie," somebody said again. "You damn fool, shut up!"

Arch grabbed his shoulder and shook him until his teeth rattled. Then Lonnie realized what he had been saying.

"Now, look here, Lonnie," Arch shouted. "You must be out of your head, because you know good and well you wouldn't talk like a nigger-lover in your right mind."

"That's right," Lonnie said, trembling all over. "I sure wouldn't want to talk like that."

He could still feel the grip on his shoulder where Arch's strong fingers had hurt him.

"Did Clem go to the swamp, Lonnie?" Dudley Smith said. "Is that right, Lonnie?"

Lonnie tried to shake his head; he tried to nod his head. Then Arch's fingers squeezed his thin neck. Lonnie looked at the men wild-eyed.

"Where's Clem hiding, Lonnie?" Arch demanded, squeezing.

Lonnie went three or four steps towards the barn. When he stopped, the men behind him pushed forward again. He found himself being rushed behind the barn and beyond it.

"All right, Lonnie," Arch said. "Now which way?"

Lonnie pointed towards the patch of woods where the creek was. The swamp was in the other direction.

"He said he was going to hide out in that little patch of woods along the creek over there, Mr. Arch," Lonnie said. "I reckon he's over there now."

Lonnie felt himself being swept forward, and he stumbled over the rough ground trying to keep from being knocked down and trampled upon. Nobody was talking, and everyone seemed to be walking on tip-toes. The gray light of early dawn was increasing enough both to hide them and to show the way ahead.

Just before they reached the fringe of the woods the men separated, and Lonnie found himself a part of the circle that was closing in on Clem.

Lonnie was alone, and there was nobody to stop him, but he was unable to move forward or backward. It began to be clear to him what he had done.

Clem was probably up a tree somewhere in the woods ahead, but by that time he had been surrounded on all sides. If he should attempt to break and run, he would be shot down like a rabbit.

Lonnie sat down on a log and tried to think what to do. The sun would be up in a few more minutes, and as soon as it came up, the men would close in on the creek and Clem. He would have no chance at all among all those shotguns and pistols.

Once or twice he saw the flare of a match through the underbrush where some of the men were lying in wait. A whiff of cigarette smoke struck his nostrils, and he found himself wondering if Clem could smell it wherever he was in the woods.

There was still no sound anywhere around him, and he knew that Arch Gunnard and the rest of the men were waiting for the sun, which would in a few minutes come up behind him in the east.

It was light enough by that time to see plainly the rough ground and the tangled underbrush and the curling bark on the pine trees.

The men had already begun to creep forward, guns raised as if stalking a deer. The woods were not large, and the circle of men would be able to cover it in a few minutes at the rate they were going forward. There was still a chance that Clem had slipped through the circle before dawn broke, but Lonnie felt that he was still there. He began to feel then that Clem was there because he himself had placed him there for the men to find more easily.

Lonnie found himself moving forward, drawn into the narrowing circle. Presently he could see the men all around him in dim outline. Their eyes were searching the heavy green pine tops as they went forward from tree to tree.

"Oh, Pa!" he said in a hoarse whisper. "Oh, Pa!"

He went forward a few steps, looking into the bushes and up into the tree tops. When he saw the other men again, he realized that it was not Mark Newsome being sought. He did not know what had made him forget like that.

The creeping forward began to work into the movement of Lonnie's body. He found himself springing forward on his toes, and his body was leaning in that direction. It was like creeping up on a rabbit when you did not have a gun to hunt with.

He forgot again what he was doing there. The springing motion in his legs seemed to be growing stronger with each step. He bent forward so far he could almost touch the ground with his fingertips. He could not stop now. He was keeping up with the circle of men.

The fifteen men were drawing closer and closer together. The dawn had broken enough to show the time on the face of a watch. The sun was beginning to color the sky above.

Lonnie was far in advance of anyone else by then. He could not hold himself back. The strength in his legs was more than he could hold in check.

He had for so long been unable to buy shells for his gun that he had forgotten how much he liked to hunt.

The sound of the men's steady creeping had become a rhythm in his ears.

"Here's the bastard!" somebody shouted, and there was a concerted crashing through the dry underbrush. Lonnie dashed forward, reaching the tree almost as quickly as anyone else.

He could see everybody with guns raised, and far into the sky above the sharply outlined face of Clem Henry gleamed in the rising sun. His body was hugging the slender top of the pine.

Lonnie did not know who was the first to fire, but the rest of the men did not hesitate. There was a deafening roar as the shotguns and revolvers flared and smoked around the trunk of the tree.

He closed his eyes; he was afraid to look again at the face above. The firing continued without break. Clem hugged the tree with all his might, and then, with the far-away sound of splintering wood, the top of the tree and Clem came crashing through the lower limbs to the ground. The body, sprawling and torn, landed on the ground with a thud that stopped Lonnie's heart for a moment.

He turned, clutching for the support of a tree, as the firing began once more. The crumpled body was tossed time after time, like a sackful of kittens being killed with an automatic shotgun, as charges of lead were fired into it from all sides. A cloud of dust rose from the ground and drifted overhead with the choking odor of burned powder.

Lonnie did not remember how long the shooting lasted. He found himself running from tree to tree, clutching at the rough pine bark, stumbling wildly towards the cleared ground. The sky had turned from gray to red when he emerged in the open, and as he ran, falling over the hard clods in the plowed field, he tried to keep his eyes on the house ahead.

Once he fell and found it almost impossible to rise again to his feet. He struggled to his knees, facing the round red sun. The warmth gave him the strength to rise to his feet, and he muttered unintelligibly to himself. He tried to say things he had never thought to say before.

When he got home, Hatty was waiting for him in the yard. She had heard the shots in the woods, and she had seen him stumbling over the hard clods in the field, and she had seen him kneeling there looking straight into the face of the sun. Hatty was trembling as she ran to Lonnie to find out what the matter was.

Once in his own yard, Lonnie turned and looked for a second over his shoulder. He saw the men climbing over the fence at Arch Gunnard's. Arch's wife was standing on the back porch, and she was speaking to them.

"Where's your pa, Lonnie?" Hatty said. "And what in the world was all that shooting in the woods for?" Lonnie stumbled forward until he had reached the front porch. He fell upon the steps.

"Lonnie, Lonnie!" Hatty was saying. "Wake up and tell me what in the world is the matter. I've never seen the like of all that's going on."

"Nothing," Lonnie said. "Nothing."

"Well, if there's nothing the matter, can't you go up to the big house and ask for a little piece of streak-of-lean? We ain't got a thing to cook for breakfast. Your pa's going to be hungrier than ever after being up walking around all night."

"What?" Lonnie said, his voice rising to a shout as he jumped to his feet.

"Why, I only said go up to the big house and get a little piece of streak-of-lean, Lonnie. That's all I said."

He grabbed his wife about the shoulders.

"Meat?" he yelled, shaking her roughly.

"Yes," she said, pulling away from him in surprise. "Couldn't you go ask Arch Gunnard for a little bit of streak-of-lean?"

Lonnie slumped down again on the steps, his hands falling between his outspread legs and his chin falling on his chest.

"No," he said almost inaudibly. "No. I aint hungry."

THE NOWAKS

---

I FOUND the Wassertorstrasse without much difficulty. The entrance to it was a big stone archway, a bit of old Berlin, daubed with hammers and sickles and Nazi crosses and plastered with tattered bills which advertised auctions or crimes. It was a deep shabby cobbled street, littered with sprawling children in tears. Youths in woollen sweaters circled waveringly across it on racing bikes and whooped at girls passing with milk-jugs. The pavement was chalk-marked for the hopping game called Heaven and Earth. At the end of it, like a tall, dangerously sharp, red instrument, stood a church.

Frau Nowak herself opened the door to me. She looked far iller than when I had seen her last, with big blue rings under her eyes. She was wearing the same hat and mangy old black coat. At first, she didn't recognize me.

'Good afternoon, Frau Nowak.'

Her face changed slowly from poking suspicion to a brilliant, timid, almost girlish smile of welcome:

'Why, if it isn't Herr Christoph! Come in, Herr Christoph! Come in and sit down.'

'I'm afraid you were just going out, weren't you?'

'No, no, Herr Christoph—I've just come in; just this minute.' She was wiping her hands hastily on her coat before shaking mine: 'This is one of my charring days. I don't get finished till half-past two and it makes the dinner so late.'

She stood aside for me to enter. I pushed open the door and, in doing so, jarred the handle of the frying-pan on the stove which stood just behind it. In the tiny kitchen there was barely room for the two of us together. A stifling smell of potatoes fried in cheap margarine filled the flat.

'Come and sit down, Herr Christoph,' she repeated, hastily doing the honours. 'I'm afraid it's terribly untidy. You must excuse that. I have to go out so early and my Grete's such a lazy great lump, though she's turned twelve. There's no getting her to do anything, if you don't stand over her all the time.'

The living-room had a sloping ceiling stained with old patches of damp. It contained a big table, six chairs, a sideboard and two large double-beds. The place was so full of furniture that you had to squeeze your way into it sideways.

'Grete!' cried Frau Nowak. 'Where are you? Come here this minute!'

'She's gone out,' came Otto's voice from the inner room.

'Otto! Come out and see who's here!'

'Can't be bothered. I'm busy mending the gramophone.'

'Busy, indeed! You! You good-for-nothing! That's a nice way to speak to your mother! Come out of that room, do you hear me?'

She had flown into a rage instantly, automatically, with astonishing violence. Her face became all nose; thin, bitter and inflamed. Her whole body trembled.

'It doesn't really matter, Frau Nowak,' I said. 'Let him come out when he wants to. He'll get all the bigger surprise.'

'A nice son I've got! Speaking to me like that . . .'

She had pulled off her hat and was unpacking greasy parcels from a string bag: 'Dear me,' she fussed, 'I wonder where that child's got to? Always down in the street, she is. If I've told her once, I've told her a hundred times. Children have no consideration.'

'How has your lung been keeping, Frau Nowak?'

She sighed: 'Sometimes it seems to me it's worse than ever. I get such a burning, just here. And when I finish work it's as if I was too tired to eat. I come over so bilious . . . I don't think the doctor's satisfied, either. He talks about sending me to a sanatorium later in the winter. I was there before, you know. But there's always so many waiting to go . . . Then, the flat's so damp at this time of year. You see those marks on the ceiling? There's days we have to put a foot-bath under them to catch the drips. Of course, they've no right to let these attics as dwellings at all, really. The Inspector's condemned them time and time again. But what are you to do?'

One must live somewhere. We applied for a transfer over a year ago and they keep promising they'll see about it. But there's a lot of others are worse off still, I daresay . . . My husband was reading out of the newspaper the other day about the English and their Pound. It keeps on falling, they say. I don't understand such things, myself. I hope you haven't lost any money, Herr Christoph?

'As a matter of fact, Frau Nowak, that's partly why I came down to see you to-day. I've decided to go into a cheaper room and I was wondering if there was anywhere round here you could recommend me?'

'Oh dear, Herr Christoph, I am sorry!'

She was quite genuinely shocked: 'But you can't live in this part of the town—a gentleman like you! Oh no. I'm afraid it wouldn't suit you at all.'

'I'm not so particular as you think, perhaps. I just want a quiet clean room for about twenty marks a month. It doesn't matter how small it is. I'm out most of the day.'

She shook her head doubtfully: 'Well, Herr Christoph, I shall have to see if I can't think of something . . .'

'Isn't dinner ready yet, mother?' asked Otto, appearing in shirtsleeves at the doorway of the inner room: 'I'm nearly starving!'

'How do you expect it to be ready when I have to spend the whole morning slaving for you, you great lump of laziness!' cried Frau Nowak, shrilly, at the top of her voice. Then, transposing without the least pause into her ingratiating social tone, she added: 'Don't you see who's here?'

'Why . . . it's Christoph!' Otto, as usual, had begun acting at once. His face was slowly illuminated by a sunrise of extreme joy. His cheeks dimpled with smiles. He sprang forward, throwing one arm around my neck, wringing my hand: 'Christoph, you old soul, where have you been hiding all this time?' His voice became languishing, reproachful: 'We've missed you so much! Why have you never come to see us?'

'Herr Christoph is a very busy gentleman,' put in Frau Nowak, reprovingly: 'He's got no time to waste running after a do-nothing like you.'

Otto grinned, winked at me: then he turned reproachfully upon Frau Nowak:

'Mother, what are you thinking of? Are you going to let Christoph sit there without so much as a cup of coffee? He must be thirsty, after climbing all these stairs!'

'What you mean is, Otto, that you're thirsty, don't you? No, thank you, Frau Nowak, I won't have anything—really. And I won't keep you from your cooking any longer . . . Look here, Otto, will you come out with me now and help me find a room? I've just been telling your mother that I'm coming to live in this neighbourhood . . . You shall have your cup of coffee with me, outside.'

'What, Christoph—you're going to live here, in Hallesches Tor!' Otto began dancing with excitement: 'Oh, mother, won't that be grand! Oh, I am so pleased!'

'You may just as well go out and have a look round with Herr Christoph, now,' said Frau Nowak. 'Dinner won't be ready for at least an hour, yet. You're only in my way here. Not you, Herr Christoph, of course. You'll come back and have something to eat with us, won't you?'

'Well, Frau Nowak, it's very kind of you indeed, but I'm afraid I can't, to-day. I shall have to be getting back home.'

'Just give me a crust of bread before I go, mother,' begged Otto piteously. 'I'm so empty that my head's spinning round like a top.'

'All right,' said Frau Nowak, cutting a slice of bread and half throwing it at him in her vexation, 'but don't blame me if there's nothing in the house this evening when you want to make one of your sandwiches . . . Good-bye, Herr Christoph. It was very kind of you to come and see us. If you really decide to live near here, I hope you'll look in often . . . though I doubt if you'll find anything to your liking. It won't be what you've been accustomed to. . . .'

As Otto was about to follow me out of the flat she called him back. I heard them arguing; then the door shut. I descended slowly the five flights of stairs to the courtyard. The bottom of the court was clammy and dark, although the sun was shining on a cloud in the sky overhead. Broken buckets, wheels off prams and bits of bicycle tyre lay scattered about, like things which have fallen down a well.

It was a minute or two before Otto came clattering down the stairs to join me:

'Mother didn't like to ask you,' he told me, breathless. 'She was afraid you'd be annoyed . . . But I said that I was sure you'd far rather be with us, where you can do just what you like and you know everything's clean, than in a strange house full of bugs . . . Do say yes, Christoph, please! It'll be such fun! You and I can sleep in the back room. You can have Lothar's bed—he won't mind. He can share the double-bed with Grete . . . And in the mornings you can stay in bed as long as ever you like. If you want, I'll bring you your breakfast . . . You will come, won't you!?''

And so it was settled.

My first evening as a lodger at the Nowaks was something of a ceremony. I arrived with my two suit-cases soon after five o'clock, to find Frau Nowak already cooking the evening meal. Otto whispered to me that we were to have lung hash, as a special treat.

'I'm afraid you won't think very much of our food,' said Frau Nowak, 'after what you've been used to. But we'll do our best.' She was all smiles, bubbling over with excitement. I smiled and smiled, feeling awkward and in the way. At length, I clambered over the living-room furniture and sat down on my bed. There was no space to unpack in, and nowhere, apparently, to put my clothes. At the living-room table, Grete was playing with her cigarette-cards and transfers. She was a lumpish child of twelve years old, pretty in a sugary way, but round-shouldered and too fat. My presence made her very self-conscious. She wriggled, smirked and kept calling out, in an affected, sing-song, 'grown-up' voice:

'Mummy! Come and look at the pretty flowers!'

'I've got no time for your pretty flowers,' exclaimed Frau Nowak at length, in great exasperation: 'Here am I, with a daughter the size of an elephant, having to slave all by myself, cooking the supper!'

'Quite right, mother!' cried Otto, gleefully joining in. He turned upon Grete, righteously indignant: 'Why don't you help her, I should like to know? You're fat enough. You sit around all day doing nothing. Get off that chair this instant, do you hear! And put those filthy cards away, or I'll burn them!'

He grabbed at the cards with one hand and gave Grete a slap across the face with the other. Grete, who obviously wasn't hurt, at once set up a loud, theatrical wail: 'Oh, Otto, you've hurt me!' She covered her face with her hands and peeped at me between the fingers.

'Will you leave that child alone!' cried Frau Nowak shrilly from the kitchen. 'I should like to know who you are, to talk about laziness! And you, Grete, just you stop that howling—or I'll tell Otto to hit you properly, so that you'll have something to cry for. You two between you, you drive me nearly distracted.'

'But, mother!' Otto ran into the kitchen, took her round the waist and began kissing her: 'Poor little Mummy, little Mutti, little Muttchen,' he crooned, in tones of the most mawkish solicitude. 'You have to work so hard and Otto's so horrid to you. But he doesn't mean to be, you know—he's just stupid . . . Shall I fetch the coal up for you to-morrow, Mummy? Would you like that?'

'Let go of me, you great humbug!' cried Frau Nowak, laughing and struggling. 'I don't want any of your soft soap! Much you care for your poor old mother! Leave me to get on with my work in peace.'

'Otto's not a bad boy,' she continued to me, when he had let go of her at last, 'but he's such a scatterbrain. Quite the opposite of my Lothar—there's a model son for you! He's not too proud to do any job, whatever it is, and when he's scraped a few groschen together, instead of spending it on himself he comes straight to me and says: "Here you are, mother. Just buy yourself a pair of warm house-shoes for the winter."' Frau Nowak held out her hand to me with the gesture of giving money. Like Otto, she had the trick of acting every scene she described.

'Oh, Lothar this, Lothar that,' Otto interrupted crossly: 'It's always Lothar. But tell me this, mother, which of us was it that gave you a twenty mark note the other day? Lothar couldn't earn twenty marks in a month of Sundays. Well, if that's how you talk, you needn't expect to get any more; not if you come to me on your knees.'

'You wicked boy,' she was up in arms again in an instant, 'have you no more shame than to speak of such things in front of Herr Christoph! Why, if he knew where that twenty marks came from—and plenty more besides—he'd disdain to stay in the same house with you another minute; and quite right too! And the cheek of you—saying you gave me that money! You know very well that if your father hadn't seen the envelope . . .'

'That's right!' shouted Otto, screwing up his face at her like a monkey and beginning to dance with excitement: 'That's just what I wanted! Admit to Christoph that you stole it! You're a thief! You're a thief!'

'Otto, how dare you!' Quick as fury, Frau Nowak's hand grabbed up the lid of a saucepan. I jumped back a pace, to be out of range, tripped over a chair and sat down hard. Grete uttered an affected little shriek of joy and alarm. The door opened. It was Herr Nowak, come back from his work.

He was a powerful, dumpy little man, with pointed moustaches, cropped hair and bushy eyebrows. He took in the scene with a long grunt which was half a belch. He did not appear to understand what had been happening; or perhaps he merely did not care. Frau Nowak said nothing to enlighten him. She hung the saucepan-lid quietly on a hook. Grete jumped up from her chair and ran to him with outstretched arms: 'Pappi! Pappi!'

Herr Nowak smiled down at her, showing two or three nicotine-stained stumps of teeth. Bending, he picked her up, carefully and expertly, with a certain admiring curiosity, like a large valuable vase. By profession he was a furniture-remover. Then he held out his hand—taking his time about it, gracious, not fussily eager to please:

'Servus, Herr.'

'Aren't you glad that Herr Christoph's come to live with us, Pappi?' chanted Grete, perched on her father's shoulder, in her sugary sing-song tones. At this Herr Nowak, as if suddenly acquiring new energy, began shaking my hand again, much more warmly, and thumping me on the back:

'Glad? Yes, of course I'm glad!' He nodded his head in vigorous approval. 'Englisch Man? Anglais, eh? Ha, ha. That's right! Oh yes, I talk French, you see. Forgotten most of it now. Learnt in the war. I was feldwebel—on the West Front. Talked to lots of prisoners. Good lads. All the same as us . . .'

'You're drunk again, father!' exclaimed Frau Nowak, in disgust. 'Whatever will Herr Christoph think of you!'

'Christoph doesn't mind; do you, Christoph?' Herr Nowak patted my shoulder.

'Christoph, indeed! He's Herr Christoph to you! Can't you tell a gentleman when you see one?'

'I'd much rather you called me Christoph,' I said.

'That's right! Christoph's right! We're all the same flesh and blood. . . . Argent, money—all the same! Ha, ha!'

Otto took my other arm: 'Christoph's quite one of the family, already!'

Presently we sat down to an immense meal of lung hash, black bread, malt coffee and boiled potatoes. In the first recklessness of having so much money to spend (I had given her ten marks in advance for the week's board) Frau Nowak had prepared enough potatoes for a dozen people. She kept shovelling them on to my plate from a big saucepan, until I thought I should suffocate:

'Have some more, Herr Christoph. You're eating nothing.'

'I've never eaten so much in my whole life, Frau Nowak.'

'Christoph doesn't like our food,' said Herr Nowak. 'Never mind, Christoph, you'll get used to it. Otto was just the same when he came back from that week-end in the country. He'd got used to all sorts of fine ways, with his Herr Baron . . .'

'Hold your tongue, father!' said Frau Nowak warningly. 'Can't you leave the boy alone? He's old enough to be able to decide for himself what's right and wrong—more shame to him.'

We were still eating when Lothar came in. He threw his cap on to the bed, shook hands with me politely but silently, with a little bow, and took his place at the table. My presence did not appear to surprise or interest him in the least: his glance barely met mine. He was, I knew, only twenty; but he might well have been years older. He was a man already. Otto seemed almost childish beside him. He had a lean, bony, peasant's face, soured by racial memory of barren fields.

'Lothar's going to night-school,' Frau Nowak told me, with pride. 'He had a job in a garage, you know; and now he wants to study engineering. They won't take you in anywhere nowadays, unless you've got a diploma of some sort. He must show you his drawings, Herr Christoph, when you've got time to look at them. The teacher said they were very good indeed.'

'I should like to see them.'

Lothar didn't respond. I sympathized with him and felt rather foolish. But Frau Nowak was determined to show him off:

'Which nights are your classes, Lothar?'

'Mondays and Thursdays.' He went on eating, deliberately, obstinately, without looking at his mother. Then, perhaps to show that he bore me no ill-will, he added: 'From eight to ten thirty.' As soon as he had finished, he got up without a word, shook hands with me, making the same small bow, took his cap and went out.

Frau Nowak looked after him and sighed: 'He's going round to his Nazis, I suppose. I often wish he'd never taken up with them at all. They put all kinds of silly ideas into his head. It makes him so restless. Since he joined them he's been a different boy altogether. . . . Not that I understand these politics myself. What I always say is—why can't we have the Kaiser back? Those were the good times, say what you like.'

'Ach, to hell with your old Kaiser,' said Otto. 'What we want is a communist revolution.'

'A communist revolution!' Frau Nowak snorted. 'The idea! The communists are all good-for-nothing lazybones, like you, who've never done an honest day's work in their lives.'

'Christoph's a communist,' said Otto. 'Aren't you, Christoph?'

'Not a proper one, I'm afraid.'

Frau Nowak smiled: 'What nonsense will you be telling us next! How could Herr Christoph be a communist? He's a gentleman.'

'What I say is——' Herr Nowak put down his knife and fork and wiped his moustaches carefully on the back of his hand: 'we're all equal as God made us. You're as good as me. I'm as good as you. A Frenchman's as good as an Englishman. An Englishman's as good as a German. You understand what I mean?'

I nodded.

'Take the war, now——' Herr Nowak pushed back his chair from the table: 'One day I was in a wood. All alone, you understand. Just walking through the wood by myself, as I might be walking down the street . . . And suddenly—there before me, stood a Frenchman. Just as if he'd sprung out of the earth. He was no further away from me than you are now.' Herr Nowak sprang to his feet as he spoke. Snatching up the bread-knife from the table he held it before him, in a posture of defence, like a bayonet. He glared at me from beneath his bushy eyebrows, re-living the scene: 'There we stand. We look at each other. That Frenchman was as pale as death. Suddenly he cries: "Don't shoot me!" Just like that.' Herr Nowak clasped his hands in a piteous gesture of entreaty. The bread-knife was in the way now: he put it down on the table. "'Don't shoot me! I have five children.'" (He spoke French, of course: but I could understand him. I could speak French perfectly in those days; but I've forgotten some of it now.) Well, I look at him and he looks at me. Then I say: "Ami." (That means Friend.) And then we shake hands.' Herr Nowak took my hand in both of his and pressed it with great emotion. 'And then we begin to walk away from each other—backwards; I didn't want him to shoot me in the back.' Still glaring in front of him, Herr Nowak began cautiously retreating backwards, step by step, until he collided violently with the sideboard. A framed photograph fell off it. The glass smashed.

'Pappi! Pappi!' cried Grete in delight. 'Just look what you've done!'

'Perhaps that'll teach you to stop your fooling, you old clown!' exclaimed Frau Nowak angrily. Grete began loudly and affectedly laughing, until Otto slapped her face and she set up her stagey whine. Meanwhile, Herr Nowak had restored his wife's good temper by kissing her and pinching her cheek.

'Get away from me, you great lout!' she protested laughing; coyly pleased that I was present: 'Let me alone, you stink of beer.'

At that time I had a great many lessons to give. I was out most of the day. My pupils were scattered about the fashionable suburbs of the west—rich, well-preserved women of Frau Nowak's age, but looking ten years younger; they liked to make a hobby of a little English conversation on dull afternoons when their husbands were away at the office. Sitting on silk cushions in front of open fireplaces, we discussed 'Point Counter-Point' and 'Lady Chatterley's Lover.' A manservant brought in tea with buttered toast. Sometimes, when they got tired of literature, I amused them by descriptions of the Nowak household. I was careful, however, not to say that I lived there: it would have been bad for my business to admit that I was really poor. The ladies paid me three marks an hour, a little reluctantly, having done their best to beat me down to two marks fifty. Most of them also tried, deliberately or subconsciously, to cheat me into staying longer than my time. I always had to keep my eye on the clock.

Fewer people wanted lessons in the morning; and so it happened that I usually got up much later than the rest of the Nowak family. Frau Nowak had her charring, Herr Nowak went off to his job at the furniture-removers', Lothar, who was out of work, was helping a friend with a paper-round, Grete went to school. Only Otto kept me company; except on the mornings when, with endless nagging, he was driven out to the labour bureau by his mother, to get his card stamped.

After fetching our breakfast, a cup of coffee and a slice of bread and dripping, Otto would strip off his pyjama jacket and do exercises, shadow-box or try to stand on his head. He flexed his muscles for my admiration. He was very proud of his figure. Squatting on my bed, he told me stories:

'Did I ever tell you, Christoph, how I saw the Hand?'

'No, I don't think so.'

'Well, listen . . . Once, when I was very small, I was lying in bed at night. It was very dark and very late. And suddenly I woke up and saw a great big black hand stretching over the bed. I was so frightened I couldn't even scream. I just drew my legs up under my chin and stared at it. Then, after a minute or two, it disappeared and I yelled out. Mother came running in and I said: "Mother, I've seen the Hand." But she only laughed. She wouldn't believe it.'

Otto's innocent face, with its two dimples, like a bun, had become very solemn. He held me with his absurdly small bright eyes, concentrating all his narrative powers:

'And then, Christoph, several years later, I had a job as apprentice to an upholsterer. Well, one day—it was in the middle of the morning, in broad daylight—I was sitting working on my stool. And suddenly it seemed to go all dark in the room and I looked up and there was the Hand, as near to me as you are now, just closing over me. I felt my arms and legs turn cold and I couldn't breathe and I couldn't cry out. The master saw how pale I was and he said: "Why, Otto, what's the matter with you? Aren't you well?" And as he spoke to me it seemed as if the Hand drew right away from me again, getting smaller and smaller, until it was just a little black speck. And when I looked up again the room was quite light, just as it always was, and where I'd seen the black speck there was a big fly crawling across the ceiling. But I was so ill the whole day that the master had to send me home.'

Otto's face had gone quite pale during this recital and, for a moment, a really frightening expression of fear had passed over his features. He was tragic now; his little eyes bright with tears:

'One day I shall see the Hand again. And then I shall die.'

'Nonsense,' I said laughing. 'We'll protect you.'

Otto shook his head very sadly:

'Let's hope so, Christoph. But I'm afraid not. The Hand will get me in the end.'

'How long did you stay with the upholsterer?' I asked.

'Oh, not long. Only a few weeks. The master was so unkind to me. He always gave me the hardest jobs to do—and I was such a little chap then. One day I got there five minutes late. He made a terrible row; called me a verfluchter Hund. And do you think I put up with that?' Otto leant forward, thrust his face, contracted into a dry monkey-like leer of malice, towards me. 'Nee, nee. Bei mir nicht.' His little eyes focussed upon me for a moment with an extraordinary intensity of simian hatred; his puckered-up features became startlingly ugly. Then they relaxed. I was no longer the upholsterer. He laughed gaily and innocently, throwing back his hair, showing his teeth: 'I pretended I was going to hit him. I frightened him, all right.' He imitated the gesture of a scared middle-aged man avoiding a blow. He laughed.

'And then you had to leave?' I asked.

Otto nodded. His face slowly changed. He was turning melancholy again.

'What did your father and mother say to that?'

'Oh, they've always been against me. Ever since I was small. If there were two crusts of bread mother would always give the bigger one to Lothar. Whenever I complained they used to say: "Go and work. You're old enough. Get your own food. Why should we support you?"' Otto's eyes moistened with the most sincere self-pity: 'Nobody understands me here. Nobody's good to me. They all hate me, really. They wish I was dead.'

'How can you talk such rubbish, Otto! Your mother certainly doesn't hate you.'

'Poor mother!' agreed Otto. He had changed his tone at once, seemingly utterly unaware of what he had just said: 'It's terrible. I can't bear to think of her working like that, every day. You know, Christoph, she's very, very ill. Often, at night, she coughs for hours and hours. And sometimes she spits out blood. I lie awake wondering if she's going to die.'

I nodded. In spite of myself I began to smile. Not that I disbelieved what he had said about Frau Nowak. But Otto himself, squatting there on the bed, was so animally alive, his naked brown body so sleek with health, that his talk of death seemed ludicrous, like the description of a funeral by a painted clown. He must have understood this, for he grinned back, not in the least shocked at my apparent callousness. Straightening his legs he bent forward without effort and grasped his feet with his hands: 'Can you do that, Christoph?'

A sudden notion pleased him: 'Christoph, if I show you something, will you swear not to tell a single soul?'

'All right.'

He got up and rummaged under his bed. One of the floor-boards was loose in the corner by the window: lifting it, he fished out a tin box which had once contained biscuits. The tin was full of letters and photographs. Otto spread them out on the bed:

'Mother would burn these if she found them . . . Look, Christoph, how do you like her? Her name's Hilde. I met her at the place where I go dancing . . . And this is Marie. Hasn't she got beautiful eyes? She's wild about me—all the other boys are jealous. But she's not really my type,' Otto shook his head seriously: 'You know, it's a funny thing, but as soon as I know that a girl's keen on me, I lose interest in her. I wanted to break with her altogether; but she came round here and made such a to-do in front of mother. So I have to see her sometimes to keep her quiet . . . And here's Trude—honestly, Christoph, would you believe she was twenty-seven? It's a fact! Hasn't she a marvellous figure? She lives in the west end, in a flat of her own! She's been divorced twice. I can go there whenever I like. Here's a photo her brother took of her. He wanted to take some of us two together, but I wouldn't let him. I was afraid he'd sell them, afterwards—you can be arrested for it, you know . . .' Otto smirked, handed me a packet of letters: 'Here, read these; they'll make you laugh. This one's from an Englishman. He's got the biggest car I ever saw in my life—here's a photo of it. He writes to me sometimes. Father got wind of it, and now he watches out to see if there's any money in the envelopes—the dirty dog! But I know a trick worth two of that! I've told all my friends to address their letters to the bakery on the corner. The baker's son is a pal of mine . . . Oh, that reminds me: I must write to the Baron and warn him at once . . .'

Down in the murky pit of the courtyard where the fog, in this clammy autumn weather, never lifted, the street singers and musicians succeeded each other in a performance which was nearly continuous. There were parties of boys with mandolins, an old man who played the concertina and a father who sang with his little girls. Easily the favourite tune was: Aus der Jugendzeit. I often heard it a dozen times in one morning. The father of the girls was paralysed and could only make desperate throttled noises like a donkey; but the daughters sang with the energy of fiends: 'Sie kommt, sie kommt nicht mehr!' they screamed in unison, like demons of the air, rejoicing in the frustration of mankind. Occasionally a groschen, screwed in a corner of newspaper, was tossed down from a window high above. It hit the pavement and ricocheted like a bullet, but the little girls never flinched.

Now and then the visiting nurse called to see Frau Nowak, shook her head over the sleeping arrangements and went away again. The inspector of housing, a pale young man with an open collar (which he obviously wore on principle), came also and took copious notes. The attic, he told Frau Nowak, was absolutely insanitary and uninhabitable. He had a slightly reproachful air as he said this, as though we ourselves were partly to blame. Frau Nowak bitterly resented these visits. They were, she thought, simply attempts to spy on her. She was haunted by the fear that the nurse or the inspector would look in at a moment when the flat was untidy. So deep were her suspicions that she even told lies—pretending that the leak in the roof wasn't serious—to get them out the house as quickly as possible.

Another regular visitor was the Jewish tailor and outfitter, who sold clothes of all kinds on the instalment plan. He was small and gentle and very persuasive. All day long he made his rounds of the tenements in the districts, collecting fifty pfennigs here, a mark there, scratching up his precarious livelihood, like a hen, from this apparently barren soil. He never pressed hard for money; preferring to urge his debtors to take more of his goods and embark upon a fresh series of payments. Two years ago Frau Nowak had bought a suit and an overcoat for Otto for three hundred marks. The suit and the overcoat had been worn out long ago but the money was not nearly repaid. Shortly after my arrival Frau Nowak invested in clothes for Grete to the value of seventy-five marks. The tailor made no objection at all.

The whole neighbourhood owed him money. Yet he was not unpopular: he enjoyed the status of a public character, whom people curse without real malice. 'Perhaps Lothar's right,' Frau Nowak would sometimes say: 'when Hitler comes, he'll show these Jews a thing or two. They won't be so cheeky then.' But when I suggested that Hitler, if he got his own way, would remove the tailor altogether, then Frau Nowak would immediately change her tone: 'Oh, I shouldn't like that to happen. After all, he makes very good clothes. Besides, a Jew will always let you have time if you're in difficulties. You wouldn't catch a Christian giving credit like he does . . . You ask the people round here, Herr Christoph: they'd never turn out the Jews.'

Towards evening Otto, who had spent the day in gloomy lounging—either lolling about the flat or chatting with his friends downstairs at the courtyard entrance—would begin to brighten up. When I got back from work I generally found him changing already from his sweater and knickerbockers into his best suit, with its shoulders padded out to points, small tight double-breasted waistcoat and bell-bottomed trousers. He had quite a large selection of ties and it took him half an hour at least to choose one of them and to knot it to his satisfaction. He stood smirking in front of the cracked triangle of looking-glass in the kitchen, his pink bun-face dimpled with conceit, getting in Frau Nowak's way and disregarding all her protests. As soon as supper was over he was going out dancing.

I generally went out in the evenings too. However tired I was, I couldn't go to sleep immediately after my evening meal: Grete and her parents were often in bed by nine o'clock. So I went to the cinema or sat in a café and read the newspapers and yawned. There was nothing else to do.

At the end of our street there was a cellar lokal called the Alexander Casino. Otto showed it to me one evening, when we happened to leave the house together. You went down four steps from the street level, opened the door, pushed aside the heavy leather curtain which kept out the draught and found yourself in a long, low, dingy room. It was lit by red chinese lanterns and festooned with dusty paper streamers. Round the walls stood wicker tables and big shabby settees which looked like the seats of English third-class railway-carriages. At the far end were trellis-work alcoves, arbour'd over with imitation cherry-blossom twined on wires. The whole place smelt damply of beer.

I had been here before: a year ago, in the days when Fritz Wendel used to take me on Saturday evening excursions round the 'queer dives' of the city. It was all just as we had left it; only less sinister, less picturesque, symbolic no longer of a tremendous truth about the meaning of existence—because, this time, I wasn't in the least drunk. The same proprietor, an ex-boxer, rested his immense stomach on the bar, the same hangdog waiter shuffled forward in his soiled white coat: two girls, the very same perhaps, were dancing together to the wailing of the loud-speaker. A group of youths in sweaters and leather jackets were playing Sheep's Head; the spectators leaning over to see the cards. A boy with tattooed arms sat by the stove, deep in a crime shocker. His shirt was open at the neck, with the sleeves rolled up to his armpits: he wore shorts and socks, as if about to take part in a race. Over in the far alcove, a man and a boy were sitting together. The boy had a round childish face and heavy reddened eyelids which looked swollen as if from lack of sleep. He was relating something to the elderly, shaven-headed, respectable-looking man, who sat rather unwillingly listening and smoking a short cigar. The boy told his story carefully and with great patience. At intervals, to emphasize a point, he laid his hand on the elderly man's knee and looked up into his face, watching its every movement shrewdly and intently, like a doctor with a nervous patient.

Later on, I got to know this boy quite well. He was called Pieps. He was a great traveller. He ran away from home at the age of fourteen because his father, a woodcutter in the Thuringian Forest, used to beat him. Pieps set out to walk to Hamburg. At Hamburg he stowed away on a ship bound for Antwerp and from Antwerp he walked back into Germany and along the Rhine. He had been in Austria, too, and Czechoslovakia. He was full of songs and stories and jokes: he had an extraordinarily cheerful and happy nature, sharing what he had with his friends and never worrying where his next meal was coming from. He was a clever pickpocket and worked chiefly in an amusement-hall in the Friedrichstrasse, not far from the Passage, which was full of detectives and getting too dangerous nowadays. In this amusement-hall there were punch-balls and peepshows and try-your-grip machines. Most of the boys from the Alexander Casino spent their afternoons there, while their girls were out working the Friedrichstrasse and the Linden for possible pick-ups.

Pieps lived together with his two friends, Gerhardt and Kurt, in a cellar on the canal-bank, near the station of the overhead railway. The cellar belonged to Gerhardt's aunt, an elderly Friedrichstrasse whore, whose legs and arms were tattooed with snakes, birds and flowers. Gerhardt was a tall boy with a vague, silly, unhappy smile. He did not pick pockets, but stole from the big department-stores. He had never yet been caught, perhaps because of the lunatic brazenness of his thefts. Stupidly grinning, he would stuff things into his pockets right under the noses of the shop-assistants. He gave everything he stole to his aunt, who cursed him for his laziness and kept him very short of money. One day, when we were together, he took from his pocket a brightly-coloured lady's leather belt: 'Look, Christoph, isn't it pretty?'

'Where did you get it from?'

'From Landauers', Gerhardt told me. 'Why . . . what are you smiling at?'

'You see, the Landauers are friends of mine. It seems funny—that's all.'

At once, Gerhardt's face was the picture of dismay: 'You won't tell them, Christoph, will you?'

'No,' I promised. 'I won't.'

Kurt came to the Alexander Casino less often than the others. I could understand him better than I could understand Pieps or Gerhardt, because he was consciously unhappy. He had a reckless, fatal streak in his character, a capacity for pure sudden flashes of rage against the hopelessness of his life. The Germans call it Wut. He would sit silent in his corner, drinking rapidly, drumming with his fists on the table, imperious and sullen. Then, suddenly, he would jump to his feet, exclaim: 'Ach, Scheiss!' and go striding out. In this mood, he picked quarrels deliberately with the other boys, fighting them three or four at a time, until he was flung out into the street, half stunned and covered with blood. On these occasions even Pieps and Gerhardt joined against him as against a public danger: they hit him as hard as anyone else and dragged him home between them afterwards without the least malice for the black eyes he often managed to give them. His behaviour did not appear to surprise them in the least. They were all good friends again next day.

By the time I arrived back Herr and Frau Nowak had probably been asleep for two or three hours. Otto generally arrived later still. Yet Herr Nowak, who resented so much else in his son's behaviour, never seemed to mind getting up and opening the door to him, whatever the time of night. For some strange reason, nothing would induce the Nowaks to let either of us have a latchkey. They couldn't sleep unless the door was bolted as well as locked.

In these tenements each lavatory served for four flats. Ours was on the floor below. If, before retiring, I wished to relieve nature, there was a second journey to be made through the living-room in the dark to the kitchen, skirting the table, avoiding the chairs, trying not to collide with the head of the Nowaks' bed or jolt the bed in which Lothar and Grete were sleeping. However cautiously I moved, Frau Nowak would wake up: she seemed to be able to see me in the dark and embarrassed me with polite directions: 'No, Herr Christoph—not there, if you please. In the bucket on the left, by the stove.'

Lying in bed, in the darkness, in my tiny corner of the enormous human warren of the tenements, I could hear, with uncanny precision, every sound which came up from the courtyard below. The shape of the court must have acted as a gramophone-horn. There was someone going downstairs: our neighbour, Herr Müller, probably: he had a night-shift on the railway. I listened to his steps getting fainter, flight by flight; then they crossed the court, clear and sticky on the wet stone. Straining my ears, I heard, or fancied I heard, the grating of the key in the lock of the big street door. A moment later, the door closed with a deep, hollow boom. And now, from the next room, Frau Nowak had an outburst of coughing. In the silence which followed it, Lothar's bed creaked as he turned over, muttering something indistinct and threatening in his sleep. Somewhere on the other side of the court a baby began to scream, a window was slammed to, something very heavy, deep in the innermost recesses of the building, thudded dully against a wall. It was alien and mysterious and uncanny, like sleeping out in the jungle, alone.

Sunday was a long day at the Nowaks. There was nowhere to go in this wretched weather. We were all of us at home. Grete and Herr Nowak were watching a trap for sparrows which Herr Nowak had made and fixed up in the window. They sat there, hour by hour, intent upon it. The string which worked the trap was in Grete's hand. Occasionally, they giggled at each other and looked at me. I was sitting on the opposite side of the table, frowning at a piece of paper on which I had written: 'But, Edward, can't you see?' I was trying to get on with a novel. It was about a family who lived in a large country house on unearned incomes and were very unhappy. They spent their time explaining to each other why they couldn't enjoy their lives; and some of the reasons—though I say it myself—were most ingenious. Unfortunately I found myself taking less and less interest in my unhappy family: the atmosphere of the Nowak household was not very inspiring. Otto, in the inner room with the door open, was amusing himself by balancing ornaments on the turntable of an old gramophone, which was now minus sound-box and tone-arm, to see how long it would be before they flew off and smashed. Lothar was filing keys and mending locks for the neighbours, his pale sullen face bent over his work in obstinate concentration. Frau Nowak, who was cooking, began a sermon about the Good and the Worthless Brother: 'Look at Lothar. Even when he's out of a job he keeps himself occupied. But all you're good for is to smash things. You're no son of mine.'

Otto lolled sneering on his bed, occasionally spitting out an obscene word or making a farting noise with his lips. Certain tones of his voice were maddening: they made one want to hurt him—and he knew it. Frau Nowak's shrill scolding rose to a scream:

'I've a good mind to turn you out of the house! What have you ever done for us? When there's any work going you're too tired to do it; but you're not too tired to go gallivanting about half the night—you wicked unnatural good-for-nothing . . . !'

Otto sprang to his feet and began dancing about the room with cries of animal triumph. Frau Nowak picked up a piece of soap and flung it at him. He dodged, and it smashed the window. After this Frau Nowak sat down and began to cry. Otto ran to her at once and began to soothe her with noisy kisses. Neither Lothar nor Herr Nowak took much notice of the row. Herr Nowak seemed even rather to have enjoyed it: he winked at me slyly. Later, the hole in the window was stopped with a piece of cardboard. It remained unmended; adding one more to the many draughts in the attic.

During supper, we were all jolly. Herr Nowak got up from the table to give imitations of the different ways in which Jews and Catholics pray. He fell down on his knees and bumped his head several times vigorously on the ground, gabbling nonsense which was supposed to represent Hebrew and Latin prayers: 'Koolyvotchka, koolyvotchka, koolyvotchka. Amen.' Then he told stories of executions, to the horror and delight of Grete and Frau Nowak: 'William the First—the old William—never signed a death-warrant; and do you know why? Because once, quite soon after he'd come to the throne, there was a celebrated murder-case and for a long time the judges couldn't agree whether the prisoner was guilty or innocent, but at last they condemned him to be executed. They put him on the scaffold and the executioner took his axe—so; and swung it—like this; and brought it down: Kernack! (They're all trained men, of course: You or I couldn't cut a man's head off with one stroke, if they gave us a thousand marks.) And the head fell into the basket—flop! Herr Nowak rolled up his eyes, let his tongue hang out from the corner of his mouth and gave a really most vivid and disgusting imitation of the decapitated head: 'And then the head spoke, all by itself, and said: "I am innocent!" (Of course it was only the nerves; but it spoke, just as plainly as I'm speaking now.) "I am innocent!" it said. . . . And a few months later, another man confessed on his death-bed that he'd been the real murderer. So, after that, William never signed a death-warrant again.'

In the Wassertorstrasse one week was much like another. Our leaky stuffy little attic smelt of cooking and bad drains. When the living-room stove was alight, we could hardly breathe; when it wasn't, we froze. The weather had turned very cold. Frau Nowak tramped the streets, when she wasn't at work, from the clinic to the board of health offices and back again: for hours she waited on benches in draughty corridors or puzzled over complicated application-forms. The doctors couldn't agree about her case. One was in favour of sending her to a sanatorium at once. Another thought she was too far gone to be worth sending at all—and told her so. Another assured her that there was nothing serious the matter: she merely needed a fortnight in the Alps. Frau Nowak listened to all three of them with the greatest respect and never failed to impress upon me, in describing these interviews, that each was the kindest and cleverest professor to be found in the whole of Europe.

She returned home coughing and shivering, with sodden shoes, exhausted and semi-hysterical. No sooner was she inside the flat than she began scolding at Grete or at Otto, quite automatically, like a clockwork doll unwinding its spring:

'You mark my words—you'll end in prison! I wish I'd packed you off to a reformatory when you were fourteen. It might have done you some good . . . And to think that, in my whole family, we've never had anybody before who wasn't respectable and decent!'

'You respectable!' Otto sneered: 'When you were a girl you went around with every pair of trousers you could find.'

'I forbid you to speak to me like that! Do you hear? I forbid you! Oh, I wish I'd died before I bore you, you wicked unnatural child!'

Otto skipped around her, dodging her blows, wild with glee at the row he had started. In his excitement he pulled hideous grimaces.

'He's mad!' exclaimed Frau Nowak: 'Just look at him now, Herr Christoph. I ask you, isn't he just a raving madman? I must take him to the hospital to be examined.'

This idea appealed to Otto's romantic imagination. Often, when we were alone together, he would tell me with tears in his eyes:

'I shan't be here much longer, Christoph. My nerves are breaking down. Very soon they'll come and take me away. They'll put me in a strait-waistcoat and feed me through a rubber tube. And when you come to visit me, I shan't know who you are.'

Frau Nowak and Otto were not the only ones with 'nerves.' Slowly but surely the Nowaks were breaking down my powers of resistance. Every day I found the smell from the kitchen sink a little nastier: every day Otto's voice when quarrelling seemed harsher and his mother's a little shriller. Grete's whine made me set my teeth. When Otto slammed a door I winced irritably. At nights I couldn't get to sleep unless I was half drunk. Also, I was secretly worrying about an unpleasant and mysterious rash: it might be due to Frau Nowak's cooking, or worse.

I now spent most of my evenings at the Alexander Casino. At a table in the corner by the stove I wrote letters, talked to Pieps and Gerhardt or simply amused myself by watching the other guests. The place was usually very quiet. We all sat round or lounged at the bar, waiting for something to happen. No sooner came the sound of the outer door than a dozen pairs of eyes were turned to see what new visitor would emerge from behind the leather curtain. Generally, it was only a biscuit-seller with his basket or a Salvation Army girl with her collecting-box and tracts. If the biscuit-seller had been doing good business or was drunk he would throw dice with us for packets of sugar-wafers. As for the Salvation Army girl, she rattled her way drably round the room, got nothing and departed, without making us feel in the least uncomfortable. Indeed, she had become so much a part of the evening's routine that Gerhardt and Pieps did not even make jokes about her when she was gone. Then an old man would shuffle in, whisper something to the barman and retire with him into the room behind the bar. He was a cocaine-addict. A moment later he reappeared, raised his hat to all of us with a vague courteous gesture, and shuffled out. The old man had a nervous tic and kept shaking his head all the time, as if saying to Life: No. No. No.

Sometimes the police came, looking for wanted criminals or escaped reformatory boys. Their visits were usually expected and prepared for. At any rate you could always, as Pieps explained to me, make a last-minute exit through the lavatory window into the courtyard at the back of the house: 'But you must be careful, Christoph,' he added: 'Take a good big jump. Or you'll fall down the coal-shoot and into the cellar. I did, once. And Hamburg Werner, who was coming after me, laughed so much that the bulls caught him.'

On Saturday and Sunday evenings the Alexander Casino was full. Visitors from the West End arrived, like ambassadors from another country. There were a good number of foreigners—Dutchmen mostly, and Englishmen. The Englishmen talked in loud, high, excited voices. They discussed communism and van Gogh and the best restaurants. Some of them seemed a little scared: perhaps they expected to be knifed in this den of thieves. Pieps and Gerhardt sat at their tables and mimicked their accents, cadging drinks and cigarettes. A stout man in horn spectacles asked: 'Were you at that delicious party Bill gave for the negro singers?' And a young man with a monocle murmured: 'All the poetry in the world is in that face.' I knew what he was feeling at that moment: I could sympathize with, even envy him. But it was saddening to know that, two weeks hence, he would boast about his exploits here to a select party of clubmen or dons—warmed discreet smilers around a table furnished with historic silver and legendary port. It made me feel older.

At last the doctors made up their minds: Frau Nowak was to be sent to the sanatorium after all: and quite soon—shortly before Christmas. As soon as she heard this she ordered a new dress from the tailor. She was as excited and pleased as if she had been invited to a party: 'The matrons are always very particular, you know, Herr Christoph. They see to it that we keep ourselves neat and tidy. If we don't we get punished—and quite right too . . . I'm sure I shall enjoy being there,' Frau Nowak sighed, 'if only I can stop myself worrying about the family. What they'll do when I'm gone, goodness only knows. They're as helpless as a lot of sheep . . .' In the evenings she spent hours stitching warm flannel underclothes, smiling to herself, like a woman who is expecting a child.

On the afternoon of my departure Otto was very depressed.

'Now you're going, Christoph, I don't know what'll happen to me. Perhaps, six months from now, I shan't be alive at all.'

'You got on all right before I came, didn't you?'

'Yes . . . but now mother's going too. I don't suppose father'll give me anything to eat.'

'What rubbish!'

'Take me with you, Christoph. Let me be your servant. I could be very useful, you know. I could cook for you and mend your clothes and open the door for your pupils. . . .' Otto's eyes brightened as he admired himself in this new rôle. 'I'd wear a little white jacket—or perhaps blue would be better, with silver buttons . . .'

'I'm afraid you're a luxury I can't afford.'

'Oh, but, Christoph, I shouldn't want any wages, of course.' Otto paused, feeling that this offer had been a bit too generous. 'That is,' he added cautiously, 'only just a mark or two to go dancing, now and then.'

'I'm very sorry.'

We were interrupted by the return of Frau Nowak. She had come home early to cook me a farewell meal. Her string-bag was full of things she had bought; she had tired herself out carrying it. She shut the kitchen-door behind her with a sigh and began to bustle about at once, her nerves on edge, ready for a row.

'Why, Otto, you've let the stove go out! After I specially told you to keep an eye on it! Oh dear, can't I rely on anybody in this house to help me with a single thing?'

'Sorry, mother,' said Otto. 'I forgot.'

'Of course you forgot! Do you ever remember anything? You forgot!' Frau Nowak screamed at him, her features puckered into a sharp little stabbing point of fury: 'I've worked myself into my grave for you, and that's my thanks! When I'm gone, I hope your father'll turn you out into the streets. We'll see how you like that! You great, lazy, hulking lump! Get out of my sight, do you hear! Get out of my sight!'

'All right! Christoph, you hear what she says?' Otto turned to me, his face convulsed with rage; at that moment the resemblance between them was quite startling; they were like creatures demoniacally possessed. 'I'll make her sorry for it as long as she lives!'

He swung round and plunged into the inner bedroom, slamming the rickety door behind him. Frau Nowak turned at once to the stove and began shovelling out the cinders. She was trembling all over and coughing violently. I helped her, putting firewood and pieces of coal into her hands; she took them from me blindly, without a glance or a word. Feeling, as usual, that I was only getting in the way, I went into the living-room and stood stupidly by the window, wishing that I could simply disappear. I had had enough. On the window-sill lay a stump of pencil. I picked it up and drew a small circle on the wood, thinking: I have left my mark. Then I remembered how I had done exactly the same thing, years ago, before leaving a boarding-house in North Wales. In the inner room all was quiet. I decided to confront Otto's sulks. I had still got my suit-cases to pack.

When I opened the door Otto was sitting on his bed. He was staring as if hypnotized at a gash in his left wrist, from which the blood was trickling down over his open palm and spilling in big drops on the floor. In his right hand, between finger and thumb, he held a safety-razor blade. He didn't resist when I snatched it from him. The wound itself was nothing much; I bandaged it with his handkerchief. Otto seemed to turn faint for a moment and lolled against my shoulder.

'How on earth did you manage to do it?'

'I wanted to show her,' said Otto. He was very pale. He had evidently given himself a nasty scare: 'You shouldn't have stopped me, Christoph.'

'You little idiot,' I said angrily, for he had frightened me, too: 'One of these days you'll really hurt yourself—by mistake.'

Otto gave me a long, reproachful look. Slowly his eyes filled with tears.

'What does it matter, Christoph? I'm no good . . . What'll become of me, do you suppose, when I'm older?'

'You'll get work.'

'Work . . .' The very thought made Otto burst into tears. Sobbing violently, he smeared the back of his hand across his nose.

I pulled out the handkerchief from my pocket. 'Here. Take this.'

'Thanks, Christoph . . .' He wiped his eyes mournfully and blew his nose. Then something about the handkerchief itself caught his attention. He began to examine it, listlessly at first, then with extreme interest.

'Why, Christoph,' he exclaimed indignantly, 'This is one of mine!'

One afternoon, a few days after Christmas, I visited the Wassertorstrasse again. The lamps were alight already as I turned in under the archway and entered the long, damp street, patched here and there with dirty snow. Weak yellow gleams shone out from the cellar shops. At a hand-cart under a gas-flare, a cripple was selling vegetables and fruit. A crowd of youths with raw, sullen faces stood watching two boys fighting at a doorway: a girl's voice screamed excitedly as one of them tripped and fell. Crossing the muddy courtyard, inhaling the moist, familiar rottenness of the tenement buildings, I thought: Did I really ever live here? Already, with my comfortable bed-sitting room in the West End and my excellent new job, I had become a stranger to the slums.

The lights on the Nowaks' staircase were out of order: it was pitch-dark. I groped my way upstairs without much difficulty and banged on their door. I made as much noise as I could because, to judge from the shouting and singing and shrieks of laughter within, a party was in progress.

'Who's there?' bawled Herr Nowak's voice.

'Christoph.'

'Aha! Christoph! Anglais! Englisch Man! Come in! Come in!'

The door was flung open. Herr Nowak swayed unsteadily on the threshold, with arms open to embrace me. Behind him stood Grete, shaking like a jelly, with tears of laughter pouring down her cheeks. There was nobody else to be seen.

'Good old Christoph!' cried Herr Nowak, thumping me on the back. 'I said to Grete: I know he'll come. Christoph won't desert us!' With a large burlesque gesture of welcome he pushed me violently into the living-room. The whole place was fearfully untidy. Clothing of various kinds lay in a confused heap on one of the beds; on the other were scattered cups, saucers, shoes, knives and forks. On the sideboard was a frying-pan full of dried fat. The room was lighted by three candles stuck into empty beer-bottles.

'All light's been cut off,' explained Herr Nowak, with a negligent sweep of his arm: 'The bill isn't paid . . . Must pay it sometime, of course. Never mind—it's nicer like this, isn't it? Come on, Grete, let's light up the Christmas tree.'

The Christmas tree was the smallest I had ever seen. It was so tiny and feeble that it could only carry one candle, at the very top. A single thin strand of tinsel was draped around it. Herr Nowak dropped several lighted matches on the floor before he could get the candle to burn. If I hadn't stamped them out the table-cloth might easily have caught fire.

'Where are Lothar and Otto?' I asked.

'Don't know. Somewhere about . . . They don't show themselves much, nowadays—it doesn't suit them, here . . . Never mind, we're quite happy by ourselves, aren't we, Grete?' Herr Nowak executed a few elephantine dance-steps and began to sing:

'O Tannenbaum! O Tannenbaum! . . . Come on, Christoph, all together now! Wie treu sind Deine Blätter!'

After this was over I produced my presents: cigars for Herr Nowak, for Grete chocolates and a clockwork mouse. Herr Nowak then brought out a bottle of beer from under the bed. After a long search for his spectacles, which were finally discovered hanging on the water-tap in the kitchen, he read me a letter which Frau Nowak had written from the sanatorium. He repeated every sentence three or four times, got lost in the middle, swore, blew his nose and picked his ears. I could hardly understand a word. Then he and Grete began playing with the clockwork mouse, letting it run about the table, shrieking and roaring whenever it neared the edge. The mouse was such a success that my departure was managed briefly, without any fuss. 'Good-bye, Christoph. Come again soon,' said Herr Nowak and turned back to the table at once. He and Grete were bending over it with the eagerness of gamblers as I made my way out of the attic.

Not long after this I had a call from Otto himself. He had come to ask me if I would go with him the next Sunday to see Frau Nowak. The sanatorium had its monthly visiting-day: there would be a special bus running from Hallesches Tor.

'You needn't pay for me, you know,' Otto added grandly. He was fairly shining with self-satisfaction.

'That's very handsome of you, Otto . . . A new suit?'

'Do you like it?'

'It must have cost a good bit.'

'Three hundred and fifty marks.'

'My word! Has your ship come home?'

Otto smirked: 'I'm seeing a lot of Trude now. Her uncle's left her some money. Perhaps, in the Spring, we'll get married.'

'Congratulations . . . I suppose you're still living at home?'

'Oh, I look in there occasionally,' Otto drew down the corners of his mouth in a grimace of languid distaste, 'but father's always drunk.'

'Disgusting, isn't it?' I mimicked his tone. We both laughed.

'My goodness, Christoph, is it as late as that? I must be getting along . . . Till Sunday. Be good.'

We arrived at the sanatorium about midday.

There was a bumpy cart-track winding for several kilometres through snowy pine-woods and then, suddenly, a gothic brick gateway like the entrance to a churchyard, with big red buildings rising behind. The bus stopped. Otto and I were the last of the passengers to get out. We stood stretching ourselves and blinking at the bright snow: out here in the country everything was dazzling white. We were all very stiff, for the bus was only a covered van, with packing-cases and school-benches for seats. The seats had not shifted much during the journey, for we had been packed together as tightly as books on a shelf.

And now the patients came running out to meet us—awkward padded figures muffled in shawls and blankets, stumbling and slithering on the trampled ice of the path. They were in such a hurry that their blundering charge ended in a slide. They shot skidding into the arms of their friends and relations, who staggered under the violence of the collision. One couple, amid shrieks of laughter, had tumbled over.

'Otto!'

'Mother!'

'So you've really come! How well you're looking!'

'Of course we've come, mother! What did you expect?'

Frau Nowak disengaged herself from Otto to shake hands with me.

'How do you do, Herr Christoph?'

She looked years younger. Her plump, oval, innocent face, lively and a trifle crafty, with its small peasant eyes, was like the face of a young girl. Her cheeks were brightly dabbed with colour. She smiled as though she could never stop.

'Ah, Herr Christoph, how nice of you to come! How nice of you to bring Otto to visit me!'

She uttered a brief, queer, hysterical little laugh. We mounted some steps into the house. The smell of the warm, clean, antiseptic building entered my nostrils like a breath of fear.

'They've put me in one of the smaller wards,' Frau Nowak told us. 'There's only four of us altogether. We get up to all sorts of games.' Proudly throwing open the door, she made the introductions: 'This is Muttchen—she keeps us in order! And this is Erna. And this is Erika—our baby!'

Erika was a weedy blonde girl of eighteen, who giggled: 'So here's the famous Otto! We've been looking forward to seeing him for weeks!'

Otto smiled subtly, discreetly, very much at his ease. His brand-new brown suit was vulgar beyond words; so were his lilac spats and his pointed yellow shoes. On his finger was an enormous signet-ring with a square chocolate-coloured stone. Otto was extremely conscious of it and kept posing his hand in graceful attitudes, glancing down furtively to admire the effect. Frau Nowak simply couldn't leave him alone. She must keep hugging him and pinching his cheeks.

'Doesn't he look well!' she exclaimed. 'Doesn't he look splendid! Why, Otto, you're so big and strong I believe you could pick me up with one hand!'

Old Muttchen had a cold, they said. She wore a bandage round her throat, tight under the high collar of her old-fashioned black dress. She seemed a nice old lady, but somehow slightly obscene, like an old dog with sores. She sat on the edge of her bed with the photographs of her children and grandchildren on the table beside her, like prizes she had won. She looked slyly pleased, as though she were glad to be so ill. Frau Nowak told us that Muttchen had been three times in this sanatorium already. Each time she had been discharged as cured, but within nine months or a year she would have a relapse and have to be sent back again.

'Some of the cleverest professors in Germany have come here to examine her,' Frau Nowak added, with pride, 'but you always fool them, don't you, Muttchen dear?'

The old lady nodded, smiling like a clever child which is being praised by its elders.

'And Erna is here for the second time,' Frau Nowak continued. 'The doctors said she'd be all right; but she didn't get enough to eat. So now she's come back to us, haven't you, Erna?'

'Yes, I've come back,' Erna agreed.

She was a skinny, bobbed-haired woman of about thirty-five, who must once have been very feminine, appealing, wistful, and soft. Now, in her extreme emaciation, she seemed possessed by a kind of desperate resolution, a certain defiance. She had immense, dark, hungry eyes. The wedding-ring was loose on her bony finger. When she talked and became excited her hands flitted tirelessly about in sequences of aimless gestures, like two shrivelled moths.

'My husband beat me and then ran away. The night he went he gave me such a thrashing that I had the marks afterwards for months. He was such a great strong man. He nearly killed me.' She spoke calmly, deliberately, yet with a certain suppressed excitement, never taking her eyes from my face. Her hungry glance bored into my brain, reading eagerly what I was thinking. 'I dream about him now, sometimes,' she added, as if faintly amused.

Otto and I sat down at the table while Frau Nowak fussed around us with coffee and cakes which one of the sisters had brought. Everything which happened to me to-day was curiously without impact: my senses were muffled, insulated, functioning as if in a vivid dream. In this calm, white room, with its great windows looking out over the silent snowy pine-woods—the Christmas-tree on the table, the paper festoons above the beds, the nailed-up photographs, the plate of heart-shaped chocolate biscuits—these four women lived and moved. My eyes could explore every corner of their world: the temperature-charts, the fire extinguisher, the leather screen by the door. Dressed daily in their best clothes, their clean hands no longer pricked by the needle or roughened from scrubbing, they lay out on the terrace, listening to the wireless, forbidden to talk. Women being shut up together in this room had bred an atmosphere which was faintly nauseating, like soiled linen locked in a cupboard without air. They were playful with each other and shrill, like overgrown schoolgirls. Frau Nowak and Erika indulged in sudden furtive bouts of ragging. They plucked at each other's clothes, scuffled silently, exploded into shrilly strained laughter. They were showing off in front of us.

'You don't know how we've looked forward to to-day,' Erna told me, 'To see a real live man!'

Frau Nowak giggled.

'Erika was such an innocent girl until she came here . . . You didn't know anything, did you, Erika?'

Erika sniggered.

'I've learnt enough since then . . . !'

'Yes, I should think you have! Would you believe it, Herr Christoph—her aunt sent her this little mannikin for Christmas, and now she takes it to bed with her every night, because she says she must have a man in her bed!'

Erika laughed boldly, 'Well, it's better than nothing, isn't it?'

She winked at Otto, who rolled his eyes, pretending to be shocked.

After lunch Frau Nowak had to put in an hour's rest. So Erna and Erika took possession of us for a walk in the grounds.

'We'll show them the cemetery first,' Erna said.

The cemetery was for pet animals belonging to the sanatorium staff which had died. There were about a dozen little crosses and tombstones, pencilled with mock-heroic inscriptions in verse. Dead birds were buried there and white mice and rabbits, and a bat which had been found frozen after a storm.

'It makes you feel sad to think of them lying there, doesn't it?' said Erna. She scooped away the snow from one of the graves. There were tears in her eyes.

But, as we walked away down the path, both she and Erika were very gay. We laughed and threw snowballs at each other. Otto picked up Erika and pretended he was going to throw her into a snowdrift. A little further on we passed close to a summer-house, standing back from the path on a mound among the trees. A man and a woman were just coming out of it.

'That's Frau Klemke,' Erna told me. 'She's got her husband here to-day. Just think, that old hut's the only place in the whole grounds where two people can be alone together . . .'

'It must be pretty cold in this weather.'

'Of course it is! To-morrow her temperature will be up again and she'll have to stay in bed for a fortnight . . . But who cares! If I were in her place I'd do the same myself.' Erna squeezed my arm: 'We've got to live while we're young, haven't we?'

'Of course we have!'

Erna looked up quickly into my face; her big dark eyes fastened on to mine like hooks; I could imagine I felt them pulling me down.

'I'm not really a consumptive, you know, Christoph . . . You didn't think I was, did you, just because I'm here?'

'No, Erna, of course I didn't.'

'Lots of the girls here aren't. They just need looking after for a bit, like me . . . The doctor says that if I take care of myself I shall be as strong as ever I was . . . And what do you think the first thing is I shall do when they let me out of here?'

'What?'

'First I shall get my divorce, and then I shall find a husband.' Erna laughed, with bitter triumph, 'That won't take me long—I can promise you!'

After tea we sat upstairs in the ward. Frau Nowak had borrowed a gramophone so that we could dance. I danced with Erna. Erika danced with Otto. She was tomboyish and clumsy, laughing loudly whenever she slipped or trod on his toes. Otto, sleekly smiling, steered her backwards and forwards with skill, his shoulders hunched in the fashionable chimpanzee stoop of Hallesches Tor. Old Muttchen sat looking on from her bed. When I held Erna in my arms I felt her shivering all over. It was almost dark now, but nobody suggested turning on the light.

After a while we stopped dancing and sat round in a circle on the beds. Frau Nowak had begun to talk about her childhood days, when she had lived with her parents on a farm in East Prussia. 'We had a saw-mill of our own,' she told us, 'and thirty horses. My father's horses were the best in the district; he won prizes with them, many a time, at the show. . . .' The ward was quite dark now. The windows were big pale rectangles in the darkness. Erna, sitting beside me on the bed, felt down for my hand and squeezed it; then she reached behind her and drew my arm round her body. She was trembling violently. 'Christoph . . .' she whispered in my ear.

' . . . and in the summer-time,' Frau Nowak was saying, 'we used to go dancing in the big barn down by the river . . .'

My mouth pressed against Erna's hot, dry lips. I had no particular sensation of contact: all this was part of the long, rather sinister symbolic dream which I seemed to have been dreaming throughout the day. 'I'm so happy, this evening . . .' Erna whispered.

'The postmaster's son used to play the fiddle,' said Frau Nowak. 'He played beautifully . . . it made you want to cry . . .'

From the bed on which Erika and Otto were sitting came sounds of scuffling and a loud snigger: 'Otto, you naughty boy . . . I'm surprised at you! I shall tell your mother!'

Five minutes later a sister came to tell us that the bus was ready to start.

'My word, Christoph,' Otto whispered to me, as we were putting on our overcoats, 'I could have done anything I liked with that girl! I felt her all over . . . Did you have a good time with yours? A bit skinny, wasn't she—but I bet she's hot stuff!'

Then we were clambering into the bus with the other passengers. The patients crowded round to say good-bye. Wrapped and hooded in their blankets, they might have been the members of an aboriginal forest tribe.

Frau Nowak had begun crying, though she tried hard to smile.

'Tell father I'll be back soon . . .'

'Of course you will, mother! You'll soon be well now. You'll soon be home.'

'It's only for a short time . . .' sobbed Frau Nowak; the tears running down over her hideous frog-like smile. And suddenly she started coughing—her body seemed to break in half like a hinged doll. Clasp ing her hands over her breast, she uttered short yelping coughs like a desperate injured animal. The blanket slipped from her head and shoulders: a wisp of hair, working loose from the knot, was getting into her eyes—she shook her head blindly to avoid it. Two sisters gently tried to lead her away, but at once she began to struggle furiously. She wouldn't go with them.

'Go in, mother,' begged Otto. He was almost in tears himself. 'Please go in! You'll catch your death of cold!'

'Write to me sometimes, won't you, Christoph?' Erna was clutching my hand as though she were drowning. Her eyes looked up at me with a terrifying intensity of unashamed despair. 'It doesn't matter if it's only a post-card . . . just sign your name . . .'

'Of course I will . . .'

They all thronged round us for a moment in the little circle of light from the panting bus, their lit faces ghastly like ghosts against the black stems of the pines. This was the climax of my dream: the instant of nightmare in which it would end. I had an absurd pang of fear that they were going to attack us—a gang of terrifyingly soft muffled shapes—clawing us from our seats, dragging us hungrily down, in dead silence. But the moment passed. They drew back—harmless, after all, as mere ghosts—into the darkness, while our bus, with a great churning of its wheels, lurched forward towards the city, through the deep unseen snow.

CONVALESCENCE

(1903- )

ALL THE CHILDREN came into the room and looked at mother lying on the bed. The four of them stood still, just inside the doorway, and looked at her. She might have been dead, so strange she seemed to them, and her mouth never opened to bid or greet them. But father had said they should go up alone to see her, for a grown person might set her to weeping, and it was better that way.

"What is it that makes her weep?" said Bindy.

"It's something to do with her nerves," said father.

"I didn't know people could be sick all summer," Bindy said.

Up they went to her room, and they might have stood so within the door forever had not the wind suddenly sprung to life and flung it closed behind them. There they were, caught in the room with her, and no way to turn. The grass blinds were fanning the sunlight in the windows. Bindy said: "Hello."

"Hello," said mother softly. And then she called out, as though in fear: "Oh, Bindy!" He dropped the hands of the others and went running to her side. She lifted her quivering arm from the bed and put it around him. He could almost make out the green night-gown in the dim room, and her rings, and her hair brushed back behind her ears.

"Oh, Bindy," said mother in her soft fearful voice. "Look at mother's fingers! Her rings are all too big for her now!"

"You're not really his mother," said Anne. She spun around on one foot in the room, elated by the burden of disaster on the air. "Only Rolly and Midge belong to you," she said, spinning. Her braids swung out like two accusing fingers as she spun. Anne and Midge began to laugh together, the two of them covering their mouths to muffle their laughter in their hands. The wondrous sense of infliction set them to tittering and wavering in their little skirts in the darkened room. But mother had been ill too long; she had no patience left for them. The stone hearts of little girls belonged, like those of perverts, in a privy world of their own.

Rolly was gone from sight, under the bed on his hands and knees, and no one gave a thought to him. Mother held Bindy's fingers tight. And "what am I going to do, Bindy?" she whispered. "I haven't any friends left. No-body cares any more."

"I'm your friend," said Bindy. He felt her arm pressing soft around him. "I'm a good friend of yours," he said.

"But I've got so old," said mother in complaint. "The color's all gone out of my eyes, you know, Bindy. They won't give me a looking-glass. They don't want me to see."

"Do your nerves hurt you very bad?" said Bindy.

"Oh, they hurt awfully, awfully," said mother, and her voice went suddenly blind with tears. The thought of herself so grieving, so gentle, defenseless as no other woman had ever been because of her beauty and her frailties; such thought returned like a specter to her mind and moved unseen from one fount of pity to the next. "It hurts the worst right here, Bindy," she said, and her throat was parched with anguish. "Put your hand right here where mother's heart is and maybe you'll help it to go away."

Bindy put his hand down on her night-dress. He could feel the soft quivering life of her heart in protest, as though he held it captive in his hand.

"There're an awful lot of kinds of sickness, aren't there?" said Bindy. .

"This kind has made me so old," said mother, whispering in sorrow to him. "I know what my eyes are like, and my hair coming out in handfuls all over my head, Bindy."

"I bet you'd get a prize anywhere," said Bindy. He could not bear the tears to run down her face. "I'm not fooling. I bet you'd get a prize almost anywhere for being the most beautiful woman."

Mother lifted her head up, strong from the pillow.

"Bindy, honey, do you want to do something for mother?" she said. "Just get me my looking-glass over there, so I can have a little peek at myself."

But the little girls had sped across the room to be the first at the dressing-table. There they stood, touching one thing and then another, puzzled that they could not find it there.

"There isn't any looking-glass any more," said Anne.

"They've taken everything," mother cried out. "They've taken mother's little curved scissors, and even her nail-file, Bindy! They've taken everything that hurts as if they thought I'd hurt myself some more!"

It was then that father came in and took the hands of the little girls.

"You must come away now," he said, and he looked shyly and uncertainly at mother. "Long enough for the first time, children," said father. "Come, Bindy, son," he said. "Mother must have a rest."

Father leaned over to kiss mother's face, but she turned it sharply on the pillow.

"Oh, don't! Oh, don't!" she said in her weak grievous voice. "I'm so tired, so tired."

They went out the door with him, the two little girls and Bindy. Father closed it softly behind, and they all went soundlessly down the stairs. In a moment mother began to cry; she lay crying senselessly, weakly into her pillow. After a while, with the tears still wet on her face, she fell asleep.

A wonderful fresh darkness had come into every part of the room while she lay sleeping. When she opened her eyes, it was deep behind the chairs in the room, and hanging like a cloth flung over the table. The high-boy in the corner had a row of light brass smiles, and somewhere within the shadows was a presence. There was no sound, but she could feel its breath and its being.

"Who's in this room with me?" she said. A dew of terror had sprung out on her brow, but she spoke the words sharp and loud across the room. She could not move, but she watched the little man stand up beside her. He put out his hand to her on the bed.

"Rolly," he said, with his head cocked.

"Oh, Rolly, Rolly," breathed mother. "Oh, Rolly." But her bare limbs were shaking with cold in the sheets. "How ever did mother's baby . . ." she said, and her teeth were shaking together. It must be the heart of winter, and she would never be warm again. "Does little Rolly want to help mother?" she said softly. "Come here, Rolly, darling," she said, "and mother will tell you what to do."

The little man came close in the darkness and she seized his hand in her fingers. He seemed like a dwarf to her, twisted and weird, with his face unseen in the gloom. "Rolly," she whispered, "now Rolly only needs to walk over to mother's bureau. You see mother's big bureau? Now just walk sweetly over to mother's big bureau and open the drawer wide." She gave him a little push with her fingers, and he sat down suddenly on the floor. "Rolly," said mother. "Rolly, dear, get up." She could not lift herself from the pillows to see. "Rolly," she said, "you don't want to make mother sad, do you? You want to do what mother tells you to do." She felt the hand of ice on her heart, and she could not shake it from her. The little man stood up in the dark, and what time of life does sense begin to come to them, she thought wildly. Is it at two years of age or three that they run and do as they are bid? "Rolly," she said, "now you want to help mother, don't you? Now run quick, quick to mother's big bureau and do just as she tells you."

Suddenly Rolly drew away in the darkness, and set off towards the window. She reared up her head on her neck, like an adder watching, peering helpless, cold, into the room that the night was blotting away. She heard Rolly strike a chair in the dark, and his voice cry out in pain.

"Oh, Rolly," said mother. "Aren't you mother's big Rolly? It didn't hurt so very much, did it now, Rolly? You're not going to cry over a silly thing like that. You must be mother's big brave boy and pick yourself up and do what she tells you."

She heard him sniff and move on the floor.

"Rolly," she whispered, with her head raised, seeking. "Rolly, where are you now?"

His hand slapped the smooth side of a wooden body.

"Here," said Rolly's small voice out of the dark.

"Yes, yes," said mother softly. "Now, pull the drawer open, Rolly." Her breath went whistling through her teeth as they chattered. She could hear the bureau drawer slowly easing wide.

"Rolly dear," said mother, "just put your little hand right down inside it, right down inside, right there next to the window where you are."

She could hear Rolly grunt as he groped in the darkness, and suddenly the door opened and the nurse walked straight into the room. Mother lay still on the bed and watched the nurse switch on the small blue light in the corner. Her apron hung down from her waist, as blank as paper. When she turned around she saw the baby staring at the light.

"So this is where Rolly's been all the time!" she said.

"I've been asleep," said mother in her soft weary voice. "I didn't even know."

The nurse took him up in her arms and he did not speak nor turn his head towards the deep wide bed. She bore him out the door and left it standing wide. Mother could hear her going down the hall, down, down, down the three little steps to the nursery. In a moment she would hear the water spilling warm into the bath.

The children came up the front stairs, quietly, on their toes, as father had told them they must walk now: Bindy, and Midge, and Anne passing down the hall. Mother knew the sound of each footfall as though it were a separate hammer striking. Single and blind the blows fell on her flesh, summoning her anguish from repose, striking row upon row of brass-eyed nails into the lid that closed upon exhaustion.

"Bindy," she cried out from her room. "Just Bindy. Come and see mother."

She turned her head to watch his slight, muted body come in from the hallway. Midge and Anne went whispering away.

"Bindy," she said, borrowing ease from some other time and place. "Bindy, will you get mother something out of her bureau-drawer?"

He stood still for a moment, slim and shy, looking at her.

"You're getting better, aren't you?" he said.

"I'm trying hard to get better," she said, curbing the wild speed of her blood. "Oh, so hard!" If he did not make haste, the nurse might come back to the room. "Bindy, dear, just put your hand down in the corner of the drawer that's open." Bindy set down his net of shining glassy marble eyes and crossed the soft dim room.

"There's a little bottle in there, Bindy darling," said mother. "Do you find it, darling, underneath the handkerchiefs and things?"

"Yes," said Bindy. He took it out of the drawer and held it up. "It's a pretty big bottle," he said.

"That's the one, Bindy, that's it," said mother. Her hand was shaking out before her. "Now give it to me, darling." He brought it across the room to her, treading soft and careful on the matting. She reached out her own stricken hand. "It's just between you and me, isn't it, Bindy? You and I will have a secret, you see, and we won't tell nurse or daddy or anyone at all."

"All right," said Bindy. He picked up his marbles. "Maybe if you're getting better I could play marbles here?" he said.

"But your bath must be ready now," said mother. "You'd better go now, Bindy. You'd better go and see."

She held up her head, listening to his fading steps and the hop and the skip at the nursery steps, going down. Then she set her teeth hard into the cork, and out it eased with a slow sucking gasp. Her arm was quaking in the shaded light, but she tilted the bottle up and the dark rich whiskey ran scalding down. At the first taste of it, the cold went off; she could feel it floating off, like veils from her limbs, as the cold had always done. A queer heathen laughter was beginning to shake within; the stuff ran thin against the bottle's glass and burned its way deeper and deeper into her swooning flesh.

When the nursery door opened, she flashed the bottle under the cover. But the nurse's step went past the open door and halted at the linen-closet in the hall. Mother heard her taking the towels out for the children's bath. Everything was soft and safe; the terror had been struck away, like shackles, from her wrists. Outside in the summery evening she could hear father pacing the walk below. Up and down went his steps, as if there were some distress in his soul. Up and down, walking his unrest to sleep, as if to ease its storming. What does he fear, what does he fear, thought mother, and she was shaken all over with laughter. What does he fear now that the winter has given over to spring?

After a while the little girls came down the hall, borne gently on an odorous warm wave from the bath. She could remember the smell of the powder on their flesh, and their hair brushed shining. She lay still in the swinging circles of the bed, seeking the high-boy's smile, or flower in curtain for anchor, and listening, whether she would or no, to the little girls' soft voices. This was the place allotted the grown, she thought: to eavesdrop, to watch, to spy.

"You're not my real sister," Anne's voice was saying. Spy on their actions, their hands, and the drop of their skirts; spy on their talk together. The warmth of the night was beating softly, softly now onto the dark shoals of the room.

"Who am I?" said Midge, hushed in wonder. "Who am I?"

The rising sea of warmth was lapping close to the bed now.

"Bindy's not your real brother," said Anne. "Father was married two times. Father's not your father. Bindy and father belong all to me."

"Who am I?" said Midge, lifting her voice in wonder to wisdom. Maybe these words were the words they spoke every day to each other, in worship of the mystery, or maybe they had never spoken them before.

"I don't know who you are," said the wise voice over the open sea of darkness. "Father's not your father."

The dark tide was full now, had risen; mother could no longer stir for the weight of it creeping warm upon her flesh. She was rocked close, cradled and quiet in it.

"Where's my father?" said Midge, stopped still for ever in wonder.

"Your father's dead," Anne's voice said. There was a wondrous murmur of sound now as though Bindy and Rolly too had set sail on the creeping waters.

"Did they kill him with a knife?" said Midge. Mother could hear the paddling of the oars come close, and the keels approaching. In a moment the prows would be on her, but still she did not stir. She lay floating, her arms out, her head back, drifting.

"Give me your hand, Rolly," said Bindy. He spoke in a hard whisper across the waters.

"I don't know," said Anne. "Maybe they cut his head off." The little girls tittered with laughter. "Or maybe he was sick and died in bed like everybody."

"Maybe mother will die," said Midge.

"You fools!" whispered Bindy. "Rolly, give me your hand going downstairs."

THE STATION

H. E. Bates

(1905— )

---

FOR THIRTY SECONDS after the lorry had halted between the shack and the petrol pumps the summer night was absolutely silent. There was no wind; the leaves and the grass stalks were held in motionless suspense in the sultry air. And after the headlights had gone out the summer darkness was complete too. The pumps were dead white globes, like idols of porcelain; there was no light at all in the station. Then, as the driver and his mate alighted, slamming the cabin doors and grinding their feet on the gravel, the light in the station came suddenly on: a fierce electric flicker from the naked globe in the shack, the light golden in one wedge-shape shaft across the gravel pull-in. And seeing it the men stopped. They stood for a moment with the identical suspense of the grass and the trees.

The driver spoke first. He was a big fellow, quite young, with breezy blue eyes and stiff untrained hair and a comic mouth. His lips were elastic: thin bands of pink india-rubber that were for ever twisting themselves into grimaces of irony and burlesque, his eyes having that expression of comic and pained astonishment seen on the painted faces of Aunt Sallies in shooting galleries.

His lips twisted to the shape of a buttonhole, so that he whispered out of one corner. 'See her? She heard us come. What'd I tell you?'

The mate nodded. He too was young, but beside the driver he was boyish, his cheeks pink and smooth and shiny as white cherries, his hair yellow and light and constantly ruffled up like the fur of a fox-cub. And unlike the driver's his lips and eyes were quite still; so that he had a look of intense immobility.

He could see the woman in the shack. Short white casement curtains of transparent lace on brass rods cut across the window, but above and through them he could see the woman clearly. She was big-shouldered and dark, with short black hair, and her face was corn-coloured under the light. She seemed about thirty; and that astonished him.

'I thought you said she was young,' he said.

'So she is.' The driver's eyes flashed white. 'Wait'll you git close. How old d'ye think she is?'

'Thirty. More.'

'Thirty? She's been here four year. And was a kid when she was married, not nineteen. How's that up you?'

'She looks thirty.'

'So would you if you'd kept this bloody shack open every night for four year. Come on, let's git in.'

They began to walk across the gravel, but the driver stopped.

'And don't forgot what I said. She's bin somebody. She's had education. Mind your ups and downs.'

And when they opened the door of the shack and shuffled in, the driver first, the mate closing the door carefully behind him, the woman stood behind the rough-carpentered counter with her arms folded softly across her chest, in an attitude of unsurprised expectancy. The counter was covered with blue-squared oil-cloth, tacked down. By the blue alarm clock on the lowest of the shelves behind it, the time was four minutes past midnight. At the other end of the shelf a flat shallow kettle was boiling on an oil-stove. The room was like an oven. The woman's eyes seemed curiously drowsy, as though clouded over with the steam and the warm oil-fumes. And for half a minute nothing happened. She did not move. The men stood awkward. Then the driver spoke. His india-rubber mouth puckered comically to one side, and his eye flicked in a wink that was merely friendly and habitual.

'Well, here we are again.'

She nodded; the drowsiness of her eyes cleared a little. All the same there was something reserved about her, almost sulky.

'What would you like?' she said.

'Give me two on a raft and coffee,' the driver said.

'Two on a raft and coffee,' the woman said. She spoke beautifully, without effort, and rather softly. 'What's your friend going to have?'

The mate hesitated. His eyes were fixed on the woman, half-consciously, in admiration. And the driver had to nudge him, smiling his india-rubber smile of comic irony, before he became aware of all that was going on.

'Peck up,' the driver said.

'That'll do me,' the mate said.

'Two on a raft twice and coffee,' the woman said. 'Is that it?'

Though the mate did not know it for a moment, she was addressing him. He stood in slight bewilderment, as though he were listening to a language he did not understand. Then as he became aware of her looking at him and waiting for an answer the bewilderment became embarrassment and his fair cherry-smooth cheeks flushed very red, the skin under the short golden hairs and his neck flaming. He stood dumb. He did not know what to do with himself.

'I'm afraid I don't know your friend's name or his tastes yet,' the woman said. 'Shall I make it two poached twice and coffee?'

'Just like me. Forgot to introduce you,' the driver said. His mouth was a wrinkle of india-rubber mocking. 'Albie, this is Mrs. Harvey. This is Albert Armstrong. Now mate on Number 4, otherwise Albie.'

The woman smiled, and in complete subjection and fascination the boy smiled too.

'Are you sure that's all right?' she said. 'Poached and coffee? It sounds hot to me.'

'Does me all right,' the driver said.

'I could make you a fresh salad,' she said. And again she was speaking to the mate, with a kind of soft and indirect invitation. 'There would be eggs in that.'

'I'll have that,' the mate said.

'What?' the driver said. His eyes were wide open, his mouth wide also in half serious disgust, as though the mate had committed a sort of sacrilege. 'You don't know what's good.'

'So you'll have the salad?' the woman said.

'Yes, please.'

'I can give you the proper oil on it, and vinegar. You can have fruit afterwards if you'd like it.'

'Fruit?' the driver said. 'What fruit?'

She took the kettle from the oil-stove and poured a little hot water into the coffee-pot and then a little into each of the egg-poachers. 'Plums,' she said.

'Now you're talking,' the driver said. 'Plums. Some sense. Now you are talking.'

'Go and get yourself a few if you like them so much.'

'Show me. Show me a plum-tree within half a mile and I'm off.'

'Go straight down the garden and it's the tree on the left. Pick as many as you like.'

The driver opened the door, grinning. 'Coming, Albie?'

'You're not afraid of the dark, are you?' the woman said.

This time she was speaking to the driver. And suddenly as he stood there at the door, grimacing with comic irony at her, his whole head and face and neck and shoulders became bathed in crimson light, as though he had become the victim of a colossal blush. Startled, he lifted up his face and looked up at the shack from the outside. The bright electric sign with the naked letters saying simply The Station was like a fire of scarlet and white. At intervals it winked and darkened, on and out, scarlet to darkness, The Station to nothing. The driver stood with uplifted face, all scarlet, in surprised admiration.

'Blimey, that's a winner. When'd you get that?'

'It's new this week.'

'It's a treat. It makes no end of a difference. How's it you didn't have it on when we came in?'

'I keep forgetting it. I'm so used to sitting here in the dark I can't get used to it. It's a bit uncanny.'

The driver went down the shack steps, into the night. The woman, busy with the eggs, and the boy, leaning against the counter, could see him standing back, still faintly crimson, in admiration of the eternal winking light. And for a minute, as he stood there, the station was completely silent, the August darkness like velvet, the sultry night air oppressing all sound except the soft melancholy murmur of the simmering kettle. Then the woman called:

'You'd better get your plums. The eggs won't be two minutes.'

The driver answered something, only barely audible, and after the sound of his feet crunching the gravel the silence closed in again.

It was like a stoke-room in the shack. The smells of coffee and eggs and oil were fused into a single breath of sickening heat. Like the driver, the boy stood in his shirt-sleeves. He stood still, very self-conscious, watching the woman breaking the eggs and stirring the coffee and finally mixing in a glass bowl the salad for himself. He did not know what to do or say. Her thin white dress was like the silky husk of a seed-pod, just bursting open. Her ripe breasts swelled under it like two sun-swollen seeds. And he could not take his eyes away from them. He was electrified. His blood quivered with the current of excitement. And all the time, even though she was busy with the eggs on the stove, and the mixing of the salad, and very often not looking at him, she was aware of it. Looking up sometimes from the stove or the salad she would look past him, with an air of arrested dreaminess, her dark eyes lovely and sulky. The deliberation of it maddened him. He remembered things the driver had said as they came along the road. The words flashed in his mind as though lit up by the electricity of his veins. 'She's a peach, Albie. But I'll tell you what. One bloody wink out o' place and you're skedaddled. She won't have it. She's nice to the chaps because it's business, that's all. See what I mean, Albie? She'll look at you fit to melt your bleedin' heart out, but it don't mean damn all. She wants to make that station a success, that's all. That's why she runs the night shack. Her husband runs the day show and she's second house, kind of. It's her own idea. See?'

And suddenly his thoughts broke off. The lights in his brain, as it were, went out. His mind was blank. She was looking at him. He stood transfixed, his veins no longer electric but relapsed, his blood weak.

'Like it on the lorry?' she said.

'Yes.' He hardly spoke.

She had finished making the salad and she pushed the bowl across the counter towards him before speaking again.

'You're not very old for the job, are you?'

'I'm eighteen.'

'Get on with old Spike?'

'Yes.'

'Isn't it lonely at first? They all say it's lonely when they first begin.'

'I don't mind it.'

'What's your girl say to it?'

It was as though the electric sign had been suddenly turned on him as it had been turned on the driver. He stood helpless, his face scarlet.

'I ain't got a girl.'

'What? Not a nice boy like you?' She was smiling, half in mockery. 'I know you must have.'

'No.'

'Does she love you much?' She looked at him in mock seriousness, her eyes lowered.

'I ain't got one.'

'Honest?' She pushed the bottles of oil and vinegar across the counter towards him. 'I'll ask Spike when he comes in.'

'No, don't say anything to Spike,' he begged. 'Don't say nothing. He's always kidding me about her, anyway.'

'You said you hadn't got a girl.'

'Well——'

She took two plates from the rack behind the counter and then knives and forks from the drawer under the counter and then laid them out.

'Does she hate it when you're on nights?' she said.

'Yes.'

'What's she like—dark or fair?'

'Dark.'

'Like me?'

He could not answer. He only gazed straight at her in mute embarrassment and nodded. Every word she uttered fired him with passionate unrest. The current in his blood was renewed again. He felt himself tightened up. And she could see it all.

'You'd better call Spike,' she said. 'The eggs are ready.'

He moved towards the door. Then he turned and stopped. 'Don't say nothing,' he said.

'All right.'

He stood at the door, his face scarlet under the winking sign, and called out for Spike, singing the word, 'Spi-ikel' And he could hear the sound echoing over the empty land in the darkness. There was a smell of corn in the air, stronger and sweeter even than the smell of the heat and cooking in the shack. It came in sweet waves from across the invisible fields in the warm night air.

'I know how you feel,' she said.

He turned sharply. 'How?'

'Come and eat this salad and cool down a bit.'

He came from the door to the counter in obedience, pulling out a stool and sitting on it.

'Oil and vinegar?' she said. 'The coffee will be ready by the time Spike comes.'

'How do I feel?' he insisted.

'You know.'

'Yes, but how do you know?'

'I've felt like it myself.'

She stood with her arms folded and resting on the counter edge, and leaning slightly forward, so that he could see her breasts beneath the open dress. She looked at him with a kind of pity, with tenderness, but half-amused. He saw the breasts rise and fall with the same slow and almost sulky passion as she looked at him. He stared from her breasts to her face, and she stared back, her eyes never moving. And they stood like that, not moving or speaking, but only as it were burning each other up, until suddenly Spike came in.

The woman stood up at once. Spike's cupped hands were full of plums.

'They're green,' the woman said.

'By God, if I didn't think they was tart.'

'Didn't you find the right tree? On the left?'

'I couldn't see a blamed thing.'

'Eat your eggs. I'll get a torch and we'll go down and get some ripe ones before you go.'

'Eggs look good an' all,' Spike said.

The men ate in silence, the woman busy with bread and coffee. The boy put vinegar on his salad, but not oil, and once, noticing it, she unstopped the oil bottle and pushed it across to him. It was her only sign towards him. The old manner of pity and intimacy had vanished. She was the proprietress; they were the drivers come in to eat. She stood almost aloof, busy with odd things at the far end of the counter. And the boy sat in fresh bewilderment, at a loss, and in wonder about her.

They each drank two cups of coffee and when the cups were finally empty she said:

'If you're ready we can go down and get the plums. But I don't want to hurry you.'

'I'm fit,' Spike said. 'And my God the eggs were a treat. You missed a treat, Albie, not having eggs.'

'The salad was all right.'

'I'll get the torch,' the woman said. 'You go out that door and I'll meet you round the back.'

She went out of the shack by a door behind the counter, and the boy followed Spike through the front door, under the electric sign. Outside, behind the shack, the sweet smell of ripened corn and night air seemed stronger than ever. At the side of the shack and a little behind it, the bungalow stood out darker than the darkness. And after a minute the torch appeared from the bungalow and began to travel towards the men. The boy could see it shining white along the cinder path and on the woman's feet as she came along.

'You walk down the path,' she said. 'I'll show the light.'

Spike began to walk down the path, the boy following him, and then the woman. The shadows strode like giants over the garden and were lost beyond the yellow snake fence in the dark land. The garden was short, and in a moment they all three stood under the plum-tree, the woman shining the torch up into the branches, the tree turned to an immense net of green and silver.

'I'll shine, Spike,' she said. 'You pick them. If they're soft and they lift off they're ripe.'

'This is better,' Spike said. His mouth was already full of plums. 'I struck one match to every blamed plum when I came down.'

The woman stood a little away from the tree, shining the torch steadily, making a great ring of white light across which little moths began to flutter like casual leaves. The boy stood still, not attempting to move, as though he were uninvited.

'What about you?' she said.

And again he could feel the old softness of sympathy and pity and insinuation in her voice, and again his blood leapt up.

'I'm about full up,' he said.

'Take some for the journey.'

He stood still, electrified.

'Take some to eat on the way. Look here, come round the other side. They're riper.'

She moved round the tree, shining the torch always away from her. He followed her in silence, and then in silence they stood against the plum-branches, in the darkness behind the light. He saw her stretch up her arm into the silver leaves, and then lower it again.

'Where's your hand?' she was whispering. 'Here. It's a beauty.' The soft ripe plum was between their hands. Suddenly she pressed it hard against his hands, and the ripe skin broke and the juice trickled over his fingers. 'Eat it, put it in your mouth,' she said. He put the plum into his mouth obediently, and the sweet juice trickled down over his lips and chin as it had already trickled over his hands.

'Was that nice?' she said softly.

'Lovely.'

'Sweet as your girl?'

It seemed suddenly as if his blood turned to water. She was touching him. She took his hand and laid it softly against her hip. It was firm and strong and soft. It had about it a kind of comforting maturity. He could feel all the sulky strength and passion of her whole body in it. Then all at once she covered his hand with her own, stroking it up and down with her fingers, until he stood helpless, intoxicated by the smell of corn and plums and the night warmth and her very light, constant stroking of his hand.

'Shine the light,' Spike called. 'I can't see for looking.'

'I'm shining,' she said. 'Albie wants to see too.'

'Getting many, Albie?'

'He's filling his pockets.'

She began to gather plums off the tree with her free hand as she spoke, keeping her other hand still on his, pressing it against her by an almost mechanical process of caressing. He reached up and tore off the plums too, not troubling if they were ripe, filling one pocket while she filled the other, the secrecy and passion of her movements half demoralizing him, and going on without interruption until Spike called:

'Albie! Plums or no plums, we shall have to get on th' old bus again.'

'All right.'

The boy could hardly speak. And suddenly as the woman took her hand away at last he felt as if the life in him had been cut off, the tension withdrawn, leaving his veins like dead wires.

He stumbled up the path behind Spike and the woman and the light. Spike was gabbling:

'The sweetest plums I ever tasted. When we come back I'll take a couple of pounds and the missus'll pie 'em.'

'When will you be back?'

'The night after to-morrow.'

'They'll be plenty,' she said.

She said nothing to the boy, and he was dumb.

'Let's pay you,' Spike said.

'A shilling for you, and ninepence for the salad,' she said.

'Salad's cheaper,' Spike said. 'I'll remember that. What about the plums?'

'The plums are thrown in.'

They paid her. Then she stood on the shack steps while they crunched across the pull-in and climbed up into the cab, the bright red sign flashing above her.

'That sign's a treat,' Spike called. 'You could see it miles off.'

'I'm glad you like it,' she called. 'Good night.'

'Good night!'

Spike started up, and almost before the boy could realize it the lorry was swinging out into the road, and the station was beginning to recede. He sat for some moments without moving. Then the lorry began to make speed and the smell of corn and plums and the summer land began to be driven out by the smells of the cab, the petrol and oil and the heat of the engine running. But suddenly he turned and looked back.

'The light's out,' he said.

Spike put his head out of the cab and glanced back. The sign was still flashing but the shack itself was in darkness.

'She's sitting in the dark,' he said. 'She always does. She says it saves her eyes and the light and she likes it better.'

'Why?'

'Better ask her.' Spike put a plum in his mouth. 'I don't know.'

'What's her husband doing, letting her run the place at night, and sit there in the dark?'

'It's her own idea. It's a paying game an' all, you bet your life it is.'

The boy took a plum from his pocket and bit it slowly, licking the sweet juice from his lips as it ran down. He was still trembling.

And glancing back again he could see nothing of the station but the red sign flashing everlastingly out and on, scarlet to darkness, The Station to nothing at all.

OKLAHOMA RACE RIOT

Frances W. Prentice

(1894- )

IT HAPPENED because a girl was hysterical, and a newspaper item got past the copy desk worded a little more strongly than it should have been. The girl took it back later, and the newspaper perfectly properly said its function was to give the news of the town. But some forty people were dead by then, and half the town burned up.

Maybe it didn't actually start at either of those sources. You heard people say afterward that the niggers had been getting above themselves; that race riots just naturally break loose every now and then anyway, and probably they're good things.

This curious philosophy is not a sectional affair. It doesn't spring exclusively from the smouldering animosities of ex-slave owner and ex-slave. Chicago and St. Louis, safely above the Mason and Dixon line, one would think, have each produced something in the way of records for race riots. Oklahoma hugs no bitter local traditions; they haven't had time for traditions yet. Only a few years ago the State was Indian territory; even the Indians were mostly not natives. The citizens are from any State you care to mention. About all they have in common is a variegated American tongue, a spirit of adventure (generally genial), and an interest in crude oil.

Impossible to guess, then, where this spark smoulders, or what will fan it. Perhaps it smokes always in the darkness of small minds and huge uncontrol.

At any rate——

The Negro section was rumbling with it at four o'clock in the afternoon. There are always agitators, and the sober, fearful members of the race have a hard time hushing them up. They tried hushing them. Grave-faced black men, ministers, church deacons, real-estate owners, doctors, went in to the back rooms of the short-order barbecue parlors and pleaded with the hot-heads. "Don't, boys. Don't you all go over there. You'll get us all burned out. You can't do no good. Don't go mixing in. Wait and see, boys. Maybe it's just talk. Maybe they ain't fixing to do nothing to Jim. The sheriff's a good man. He won't let them take Jim. He's the law. Don't, boys. Don't before God go over there!"

But the hot-heads were malcontents anyway. They had listened with too much imagination and too little common sense to orators who told them that the Negro was exploited and downtrodden; that if he didn't assert himself, and protect his race from the whites, what could he expect? The choc beer in those back parlors is strong stuff. It burned in the brains of the mutterers. Oklahoma wasn't the deep South, was it? Pshaw! They'd show the white folks you couldn't lynch no colored boy these days. Let the old men go along with their gloomy hushings. They'd see.

And they did see.

The town is divided straight across by railroad tracks. One side is nigger town; on the other side the whites live. The jail is in the heart of the business section. And the boy Jim was in the jail for insulting a white girl in an elevator that morning. She said later she thought she stumbled against him herself, and was just nervous, so she screamed. But no matter.

At seven o'clock three cars full of Negroes, with guns gleaming in their hands, drove over and began circling the square around the jail. Cars full of armed and half-drunk Negroes are not a popular sight in Southwestern towns. They meant to make a jail delivery; get the boy Jim out. But—fatally—they didn't quite know how to go about it. And—fatally—the sheriff didn't quite know how to stop the business and get rid of them. So he stood at a window in his office and watched.

White men began to drift in to the hot dusty square, singly and in groups. At the end of half an hour there was a big crowd. A muttering, angry crowd, waiting to see what those niggers thought they were pulling, anyway. The crowd didn't quite know what it wanted to do, either. But it was ready for anything. And then the inaction, and the breathless shifting and whispering, got on some one's nerves. Somebody fired a gun at one of the Negro cars. And one of its occupants fired back. No one was touched by those first nervous bullets. But they set the race riot off, and all the sheriffs in the country couldn't have stopped it then, though the sheriff in the window could probably have stopped it ten minutes before.

The crowd closed in on those three cars, and the Negroes deserted them, and began to run and scatter. The first one was shot on the main street, right in front of the biggest white picture palace. He lay writhing on the sidewalk, under a billboard from which smiled winsomely the face of Mary Pickford, America's Sweetheart.

His falling brought the crowd to a halt. They stood and looked at him. He was hit in the stomach, and bleeding a good deal. Three or four people must have telephoned for ambulances, because three or four ambulances clanged down to the place. But the crowd turned on them, and showed their guns. Get to hell back out of here. Don't touch the blankety blank. The ambulances didn't quite know what to do, either. So they turned off their engines and just stood there, blocking the street.

Then there was a whoop a block away. Some of the Negroes had tried to organize and get to their friend, flourishing those useless, foolish guns again. The crowd surged forward, trampling the man on the sidewalk, who was about dead anyway. The hunt was on for fair then, and there was no pausing for fourteen hours.

By midnight all the blacks who had come over in the three cars had been accounted for. They lay in alleys, or on sidewalks, or huddled in doorways. The sheriff had made up for his earlier lack of zeal, and sworn in as deputies every armed white man who came into the court-house. The oaths were a mere form. Every hardware store, every pawn shop in town had been broken into, and the firearms and ammunition taken without formality. Also a good many bathing-suits, coats, tools, tires, and little things like watches disappeared. Whether these were for immediate or future use no one stopped to inquire at the time. Every one was pretty excited, and trigger fingers were so limber that night that there was very little arguing with people about their whims.

The shooting was constant now. Pop! Pop! Pop-pop-pop-pop-pop! Not a pretty sound on the warm night air.

A melancholy and terrifying sound, heard in tense helplessness, where we sat on our porch, a dozen city blocks from the scene of activity. Behind us in the dark house slept a baby and an old Negress servant. Quite a number of the neighbors had gone down to see the fun. The woman next door moaned in high hysteria. Her husband, a good automatic Georgian, had taken down his bird gun and gone off to work. She felt worried about him, but really she needn't have. As it turned out the blacks were very inadequately armed, besides being hampered by their women and children, and vastly outnumbered.

Of course the women and children didn't get in the line of fire until around one in the morning. That was when the fighting got into their territory. The mob worked steadily down to the railroad tracks, and then across them. Some Negroes hid in a house just on the black side of the tracks, and tried to snipe out the windows. That was the place where the one white man was killed. It was also the place which suggested to the mob that fire would be effective and exciting. Whether that first house was set on fire, or caught by accident, was never quite clear. But the rest of the fires were set. Or perhaps thrown would be a more exact term.

The technic varied with different groups of the mob. But the general procedure was to go up to a cabin door and put a gun against the lock, and blow it off. The flimsy doors would have smashed easily enough; but this was gun night. Once inside the cabin everything breakable was broken, trunks and bureau drawers torn open, pictures and telephones wrenched off the walls and trampled on. They didn't often find any one in the houses, because by now the blacks were scurrying ahead of the horror, out into the hill country beyond the town. But sometimes they did find some one—with whom they dealt. When they had smashed enough they scattered around a little kerosene and threw some lighted matches in the mess. If this particular cabin didn't burn well it would be reset presently by the blaze of the one next door. The houses the mob set fire to without breaking in first were really the most unlucky. Because sometimes there were people in them. Panic-paralyzed people who didn't realize, with all the noise and fright, that the house was on fire. Not until it was too late to get out.

By two o'clock most of the houses in nigger town were ablaze. By dawn all of them were. The fire engines made a half-hearted attempt to get in and do something about it. It didn't hardly seem safe for the rest of the town, with the wind blowing and all. But the mob met the engines as it had met the ambulances. Get to hell out of here. Leave these blank blank double-blank niggers to us. A good deal of buckshot was fired into the radiators of the engines. They wavered around a little, and then withdrew. Nobody could do anything against that mob by then, anyhow. And the nigger houses weren't worth much.

There was never an accurate estimate of how many were killed that night. One white man, surely. One Mexican. The dozen Mexicans in the mob enjoyed themselves thoroughly. The Mexican laborer doesn't often have the privilege of shooting shoulder to shoulder with the whites, and he made the best of it.

The sound of shooting began to be as familiar in the hot interminable night as is the ripping hum of locusts in a summer noon. The watchman, stumping by, stopped to remark that they said a bunch of niggers was driving in from down the river. If they were they would come straight by our house. . . . A faint unreasoning stir of mob fear communicated itself to us. Right past our house. . . . What if . . . ?

For a few minutes we waited for the sound of approaching cars. Then the new tension relaxed into uneasy inaction again. The heavy air was soaked with the scent of honeysuckle, as extravagant and lavishly unreal as the gunfire. We had been in this prairie country a year. It proved always surprising. An acrid under-hint of burned powder began to cut through the perfume of the flowers.

Along about three o'clock the blacks had pretty well gone to earth. Hiding out, the watchman said as he passed again. He flashed his torch under bushes and porches. So the shooting was not so plentiful. Just singles, as it were, compared to the great coveys of game put up by the beaters earlier in the evening. Mostly fresh niggers who didn't have sense enough to realize that if you were black you'd better get to hell out of there that night.

If our choice of reported profanity seems monotonous we can answer that so is a mob's. Or else unprintable.

One "single" was a doctor. The best colored doctor in the Southwest, it was said. He came out on the steps of his house with a white handkerchief tied on his arm, and his hands over his head. His wife was by his side. "Don't shoot me, boys. I'm a doctor!"

with bullets where he fell. His wife went mad—suddenly here on the steps. The accommodations for insane very good in the South.

A mob rushed into an isolated garage. "Any niggers in boy in the back washing a car. "Just me, boss," he said, shyly. One shot through the head got him.

Began to show faint gray in the east the shooting took on authority. Distant. Intermittent staccato. There is a hill with streets filled with Negro cabins. For some time that it as having been the position of a machine-gun which those narrow alleys. . . . But there were so many that was one which an ultimately sobered town quite not choose to believe.

Said, the whole of nigger town was burning. A sight you that. One half of a fair-sized town flaming against the a curiously peaceful effect, since no one was doing it. The shooting had almost died out, for lack of any—he niggers were lying very low by now. But you still in. Pop! Pop! Pop-pop-pop-pop-pop! The morning air which gave the occasional shots more significance than ment of the night had had.

What to do. Nobody had known since the evening be-

, Mally, who had been a grown girl before emancipating breakfast. Her face was an expressionless black of the trouble she had said, "Lord Jesus! That's our nce then she had said nothing. No one talked much. sly—the telephone rang and brought the riot straight . The call was for Mally. The gnarled old hand with receiver trembled visibly.

undress. She lived over in nigger town with an ancient en messenger in a bank for twenty years. They knew of course. But their house was on the edge of things, missed them so far. Uncle Zak had never been late to the sted white folks. He thought maybe if he put on his tw it. . . . He put it on, and started out to work. Some e corner. Fanny could see him lying there. She didn't him, the mob was so close. She called Mally. . . . But ng they broke in and tore the telephone out of her re as powerless to reach her as though she had called Cars began to drive slowly along our street. Cars of men who wear their caps backward, the visors down to not to interfere with their rifle gaze. "Any niggers in would shout. The gaping children were called in hastily didn't seem a very educational sight. Nor a very safe car or so people sent their servants down in the cellar, or waited.

Nobody knew just what to do.

Around eight o'clock the train came in with the militia detained and marched up the street in splendid military preparations for breakfast. One citizen who had served in Haiti got a little impatient then. He was from Maine that the militia could cut their breakfast a trifle short. The commander and said as much. If they'd give him a shot over and stop this thing. Didn't the militia realize that the fighting were still going on? People were being robbed and were getting ready to have their coffee.

The commandant had him jailed. Martial law. Some nigger lovers. He was bailed out later in the day.

Finally, having eaten, the troops got into nigger trouble shooting. It had more or less stopped itself by then. They were out all night, and were sort of tired. There was still some trouble though. One man stood on a down-town corner and shot out of the stair windows of an office building. The colored janitor on those stairs. When he appeared at the fourth-floor window the shot picked him off.

For weeks you heard that So-and-so had a certain number of his gun. And then that some one else had more. But it was on the boasters. Just as it was hard to check up on them.

Lots of Negroes never turned up at their homes or told of them probably simply kept going, once they were out at night. And others . . .

There was the son of a cook in our street, for example. At eight o'clock the man he worked for came and asked for a car, with some other men. It seemed that the boy, who thought he ought to get to his job. Before he knew it he was in the fighting around the railroad tracks, and crawled under the tracks to hide. Some one went in after him, and shot him with a rifle. When things were quieting down a little he was lying in the tracks. The militia were assembling the blacks. But his employer would not live many hours. If Hatty wanted to see the boy he would have to and look out for her. But she was afraid to go. You would nurses anyway. Maybe those who didn't volunteer were wise. It was depressing at the relief station.

There was the problem of scattered families, missing children, fathers, mothers; of trying to coax the fugitives back in from their retreats. Airplanes would locate a little huddled group off in the country a mile or so. But when they sent cars after them the groups would melt away, running like rabbits. White men in cars didn't strike them as healthy contacts.

And then there was the matter of funerals. Complicated by that "undertaker's" wagon.

And there was the problem of getting those houses rebuilt. The Red Cross took voluminous depositions of losses. But wherever those depositions were filed they probably still remain. Almost no houses were insured. Blacks are bad riot risks. The whole affair drifted into comfortable oblivion surprisingly soon. At least on the white side of the tracks. What Mally's "wild young men" thought we do not know.

Eventually, of course, houses did struggle up out of the ashes, and the black people repossessed their part of the town. Most of them had jobs they could go on with. House or no house, missing family or not, you can still cook or wash, or dig, or drive mules.

But there were a few who didn't pick up the threads so easily. One gray-haired Negro doctor who worked tirelessly at the Red Cross centre said, courteously, that there was no use his taking up their time filling out a list of his losses. It was, he said, the second time he had been burned out. The first time, in another State, he had lost his house, his instruments, his horse and buggy. He was younger then, and had begun again. This time he had lost his brick house and office, his drugstore, his equipment, his operating table, his automobile, his new instruments, and his daughter's half-paid-for piano. He didn't, he said, think he would try again.

Things like that made for indignant talk for a few months, among certain people. Those same people thought that the photographs of riot victims in the more dramatic poses of violent death, enterprisingly printed on post-cards, and sold surreptitiously, in the manner of naughty postals in Paris, were not very nice. The opinion that a race riot now and then kept the niggers in their place was hotly contested.

But even that talk finally died down. No one really knew what to do about such things.

really. Some of the house Negroes who had allowed themselves to be put in those wandering cars and escorted to the safety of the town-hall had been shot at as they drove through the streets. It wasn't a ride an old woman wanted to undertake, even to see her boy alive. The boy's boss understood. He went back himself, and got a doctor, and stayed with the boy till he died.

But that night when he went to get the body for Hatty it was gone. He was an influential man, the boy's boss, and he had every coffin in the town opened, looking for that boy. He never found him. It seemed that some time in the afternoon some men came to the town-hall with a truck, saying they were from an undertaker. They took off a dozen or so corpses. And no one ever saw them again. Colored people share with whites the sentimentality of liking to know where their dead are buried.

But nobody knew what to do about it.

Either because the militia was efficient or because the game was played out after such a very active night, things were fairly peaceful by afternoon. Most of the black population was herded in the town-hall. It was easier to protect them there. But there had been difficulties in getting them concentrated. The look of the men who were escorting the blacks to the town-hall hadn't inspired confidence. Housewife after housewife refused to surrender servants to their dubious protection. Several small dramas took place in our street, when a woman with three or four terrified Negroes in her kitchen declined entrance to those amateur deputies with shotguns. Belief in the law had not been strengthened in the town during the last eighteen hours.

The Red Cross came down, and the fair-grounds were equipped with hundreds of temporary beds, to shelter the homeless. The homeless were marched five miles through the dust and heat to reach that haven. It was hard on the women and small children, because the food problem hadn't yet been met, and most of them hadn't had anything to eat. The thermometer was 102. It wouldn't have been an easy day to face, even on a full stomach.

On the second day any black whose employer would vouch for him or her was released, wearing a yellow arm-band. The arm-band was to indicate that the wearer was harmless. No attempt was made, of course, to indicate which members of the mob had now returned to sanity.

Those yellow-banded people wandered dazed and disconsolate through the still smoking ruins of nigger town, subdued to apathy. Twisted iron and cinders marked their homes. Broken trunks and bureaus, caked with sodden ashes, gaped empty as the looters had left them. With the help of the Red Cross an attempt was made to reunite scattered families. Largely, one might state, with the sole help of the Red Cross. Except for its professional services only ten white women worked at the relief station. One of them was staying at a hotel in the town, and three of them were district
